It is duplyed by Mr. Robert Nairne for the Pannel, that this Dittay conſiſts upon three deeds done and committed by the Pannel, together with his intention in the doing of them. As to the Pannel's intention, that it was not of purpoſe of making any Leaſing, againſt the Act of Parliament, but to the revealing of an alledged Treaſon againſt his Majeſty; the revealing whereof was neceſſitate by that addition adjoint to the laſt of Parliament libelled; for obedience of the whilk Act, the Pannel did whatever was done in this buſineſs by him, and that the firſt part of the Dittay is not relevant againſt the Pannel, to infer the puniſhment libelled againſt him, is clear by retorting of the argument after this manner. A deed commanded by the Act of Parliament, cannot infer a puniſhment by the ſame Act of Parliament; true it is, that the firſt deed contained in, the aſſumption of this Dittay was commanded by the Act of Parliament, imponing a neceſſity to all hearers of treaſonable ſpeeches againſt the King or State to reveal the ſame: Ergo he did the ſame lawfully. Whereas it is alledged in the Dittay, that by and after the information which the Pannel had by relation, he has exceeded in the particulars expreſſed in the Dittay. And firſt in the firſt particular, at the doing and ſpeaking whereof, by and after the anterior information, which the Pannel had received, the Lord Rea his Author was preſent: who being inquired of by his Majeſty, why he was ſo long in revealing of the alledged Treaſons; he anſwered, that he was afraid to do the ſame, in reſpect of the nearneſs betwixt his Majeſty and the Marquis. So that that which the Pannel did for obedience to the law, and his Author being preſent beſide him, is no ways relevant to infer the puniſhment of Leaſing-makers againſt him, contained in the Act of Parliament. Like as alſo the ſaid Lord Rea, after the ſaid relation to his Majeſty, being remitted to the Lord-Treaſurer, declared that the Marquis was party; and further ſaid, that he would cauſe as honeſt men as the Lord Rea himſelf to affirm the ſame.

Whereas my Lord Advocate, in his reply, quarrels the former words poſitively ſet down, and not by relation; it is duplyed, that the form of the ſpeech is not in queſtion here, but the matter; for albeit, that the Pannel had reported in other words, or by a deſcription, or paraphraſe; that which my Lord Rea related unto him, without changing or altering of the ſubſtance, commits no fault, nor cannot be accounted therefore a Leaſing-maker. And here the proponer repeats the words contained in the relation and depoſitions, which he remits to the Judges conſideration. And to the ſecond part of the ſubſumption, anent the delivery of the liſt of names to the Treaſurer, it is anſwered, that that part of the Dittay is moſt irrelevant, and cannot be ſubſumed upon the propoſition of the Indictment; for to reaſon thus, all Leaſing-makers ſhould be puniſhed. True it is, that the Pannel has written, and delivered a liſt of names to the Treaſurer: Ergo, he ought to be puniſhed, is an evil argument, which is remitted to the Judge, except it had libelled, that the ſaid liſt contained Leaſings, which is not libelled, and albeit it had been libelled. It is alledged that the ſaid liſt of names as it is ſet down, contains no purpoſe, for it is not written therein, prime Agent and Plotters in ſuch a Treaſon; not only indefinite prime Agent and Plotters. And if the Purſuer will force theſe words, to this alledged Treaſon contained in the relation; the Pannel then will repeat the word uſed of before, (as he is informed.) And here alledges, that it is as leſome, or rather more leſome to the Pannel, to erk true words for the Pannel's good, nor to the Purſuer of the Dittay, to erk others for his accuſation. And albeit the ſaid words had been adjected, whereby the ſentence might have been filled againſt the Pannel; yet he cloſes himſelf with the relation made by the ſaid Lord Rea verbally, before the making of the written relation. And where it is diſputed, that there cannot be a verbal relation here reſpected; it is anſwered for the Pannel, that it is clear, that the written relations was learned of the Marquis's ſervants and followers tantum.

And further alledges, that the diſputation of the time of the giving in of the liſt upon the 16th day, and the time of the ſpeaking of the Lord Rea with the Lord Seaforth, upon the 21ſt day, is no ways relevant nor material; it being confeſſed, at the leaſt not denied by my Lord Rea, that he had related of the three Earls to the Pannel: for the deed being conſtant, the circumſtance of time is not ſo material, and cannot be preſumed that the Pannel ſhould have any knowledge thereof; who had of before been very long abſent, and no ways intereſted in their advice, and altogether ignorant of them; could of himſelf, without any information, named the ſame perſons whom the revealer was to name, and none other.

It

It is anſwered by his Majeſty's Advocate, that he oppones the Dittay, with the reply made to the former defences.

Laſtly, It is alledged for the Pannel, that as it cannot be proceeded againſt the Pannel here in Scotland, but conform to the Laws and Statutes of England, the Place of the Pannel's alledged offence, and according as the fact is puniſhable, or not puniſhable, and more and leſs puniſhable in the Kingdom of England; ſo there can be no legal accuſation inſtitute or laid againſt the Pannel here in Scotland, for the ſaid facts and deeds, but upon the Laws of England, or at leaſt upon the Common Law. And true it is, that the Dittay is not founded upon the Laws of England, nor yet upon the Common Law; but upon the municipal Laws of Scotland, and Acts of Parliament thereof: and therefore the Dittay is no ways relevant, ſubſuming and concluding upon the Acts of Parliament, mentioned in the propoſition of the Dittay.

Item, If the relevancy of the Dittay all be ſuſtained, it is alledged that there can be no pain inflicted, but that whereby the ſaid facts and deeds are puniſhable by the Laws and Statutes of England, or by the Common Law, and no ways by the pains mentioned in the ſaid Acts of Parliament. Quia judex originis vel domicilii non poteſt punire ſubditum delinquentem extra territorium, niſi ſecundum pœnam impoſitam a jure communi vel ſtatutis Loci in quo deliquit, non autem ſecundum ſtatuta ipſius Loci originis vel domicilii. Jul. Clarus Quæſtio 85.

To the whilk it is anſwered by his Majeſty's Advocate, that the firſt part of the alledgance is altogether unreaſonable and abſurd; and as to the ſecond part of the alledgance, it is anſwered, that the Pannel being a Scotſman by birth; and alſo quoad domicilium being reſident, by his Lady and Children in Scotland; and having committed the crime libelled againſt four Noblemen in Scotland; he muſt be ſubject not only to the Laws of the Kingdom, but to the pain and puniſhment contained in the Laws. Like as his Majeſty, by his miſſive Letter has ordained him to be tryed and cenſured by the Laws of the Kingdom. And where it is alledged, that he is only puniſhable by the pain inflicted in England, where the crime is committed; and for this alledges Jul. Cl. in his 85th queſtion; firſt Julius Clarus in that place calls the matter diſputable, & egere deciſione Cæſaria: next, he adduces the number of Doctors, conflicting in divers opinions pro & contra. And in the end he ſeems himſelf to incline to the puniſhment Loci delicti: And after it, cites Marianus in cap. Poſtulaſti extra de foro competenti: qui dicit generaliter eſſe communem concluſionem, quod delinquens debeat punire pœna impoſita a Statutis loci in quo delinquens punitur. And this laſt ſpeech after his own carries communem opinionem, for his own is only given, ad cautionem, to free the Judges from inquiſition of law. From whilk the Juſtice General is well warranted, by his Majeſty's Letter commanding the Pannel to be judged, conform to the Laws of the Kingdom.

And further, it is granted by Jul. Clar. to the which the proponer aſſents in his acception, quod poſſet delinquens punire pœna juris communis vel pœna loci ubi delinquitur. But ſo it is, that by the Common Law, Calumniatores puniuntur pœna talionis, lege quiſvis Cod. de Calumniatoribus, novella Leonis 77. Lege finali Cod. de accuſationibus Leg. 38. digeſt. de pœnis. And Cicero in his fragments cites the Law in his twelve tables in theſe words: Noſtræ inquit, duodecim tabulæ cum per paucas res capite ſanxiſſent in his hanc ſanxiendam putaveriunt; Si quis alitaviſſet quod infamiam fateret flagitiumve alteri, & præterea atrox injuria, de jure communi punibilis eſt pœna mortis. Jul. Clar. Quæſtione 83. numero 9. The Juſtice continues this diet with all further diſputation and reaſoning in this matter, to the Morn the third day of December inſtant; and ordains the Pannel to be returned back to his Ward, therein to remain in the mean time. The Perſons of aſſize warned thereto, apud acta as of before, ilk perſon under the pain of one thouſand Marks.

JAMES Lord Uchiltrie, delated in the Crimes foreſaid, ſpecified in his Dittay.

Purſuer.

Sir Thomas Hope of Craighall, Knight and Baronet; Advocate to our Sovereign Lord for his Highneſs's Entries.

Prolocutors in Defence.

Mr. Robert Nairne,
Mr. Alexander Pierſon,
Gilbert Neilſon,

It is duplyed by the ſaid James Lord Uchiltrie himſelf, being entered upon Pannel anent the firſt part of my Lord Advocate's reply, bearing that the Clauſule, as he was informed, can no ways be repeated in the particulars. And although the Pannel ſo ſaid, yet he has no poſitive information from the Lord Rea; it is anſwered, the ſame ought to be repelled, becauſe of the Clauſe (as the Pannel was informed) purported in the Dittay itſelf: for the Pannel in that whilk is the ſame, and ſtrength of the whole Dittay, is neceſſarily underſtood, and ſhould be repeated in all the ſubſequent paſſages of the Dittay; becauſe it is unicus actus continuatus. And whilks whole three parts of the ſubſumption, as they are uſed conjunctly by my Lord-Advocate againſt the Pannel; ſo the Pannel alledges that theſe words, as he is informed, contained in the general, muſt be underſtood and repeated in all the three ſeveral parts of the ſubſumption; as being the ſum of all, whilk is after alledged, or was after imparted by the Pannel, and ought ſo to be underſtood. And where it is alledged, that where the Pannel, although he ſaid, as he was informed, yet it is no poſitive information from my Lord Rea, to ground a poſitive aſſertion of the whole, contained in the Dittay:

It is anſwered thereto, he had poſitive aſſertions and information quoad relationem; ſed quoad veritatem he was not bound to have it; ſic-like many parts of his affirmations would be beſt cleared by the confronting of the Pannel and his Informer, whilk was never yet done. Neither are the chief of the Pannel's affirmations, alledged by my Lord Advocate, ſimply taken, poſitive affirmations, but with interpretations, conſtructions and gloſſes, dipping in mentem of the Pannel: to which God is his only Judge, and it is an hard matter by preſumed conſtructions, to draw the Pannel to the queſtion of his life; Nam non preſumuntur delicta, ſed probantur. The Pannel refers himſelf to his depoſition, in ſubſtantialibus, undenied by the Lord Rea, as is clear by the Pannel's former exceptions. Whereas my Lord-Advocate mentions the madneſs and fooliſh imagination of Meldrum, as the Lord Rea's Author of the ſpeeches; firſt, the Pannel proteſts, he urges nothing againſt thoſe Noblemen from himſelf, ab origine. But he adheres to the relations of the Lord Rea, verbal and by writ, neither diſputes he againſt Meldrum's ſufficiency, or for it; but that Meldrum's words, related to him by the Lord Rea, gave him juſt ground of revealing. And as to the words alledged, related by the Pannel to the King, anent the odiouſneſs of the matter, and the Lord Marquis as party; this can no ways be laid to the Pannel's charge as a fault, much leſs as a crime capital, becauſe the informer, viz. the Lord Rea, was preſent at the diſcourſe; and related himſelf to the King, eodem tempore, the particulars of what the Pannel had ſpoken; neither did he at that time oppoſe him, or contradict him in one circumſtance, whereby the Pannel was bona fide exonered, and therefore ought not now to be laid to his charge. And further, in the time of the Pannel's relating his own words, the Pannel affirms, that he did it with tears coming over his cheeks, no ſign of malice, or ſhewing ſedition, in expreſſing theſe words to the King, like as his Majeſty bare record thereof, before the Council of England, the Impannelled being preſent.

And to that part of my Lord Advocate's reply, anent the Lord Marquis to be prime Agent; the Pannel repeats the firſt member of his duply, together with the Impannelled's former exceptions thereanent.

And where my Lord Advocate affirms, that the Pannel did his duty ſufficiently in the firſt diſcourſe, and might have acquieſced there with duty; the Pannel affirms, that he could not, becauſe all the time from the 13th of May to the 20th, it was actus continuatus, by conſtant information running from the informer to the Pannel; and ſo required a conſtant duty, whilk he durſt not omit, neither with ſafety nor duty. And this is clearly by my Lord Rea's own depoſition; who affirms the relating of ſeveral things, in ſeveral days and times, and is manifeſtly proven by the Pannel's own depoſitions.

And where my Lord Advocate refuſes to the Pannel the exception of Charity, anſwering, that crimen non poteſt purgari bona intentione, tranſeat, where there is crimen ſimplex. But where there is tantum crimen, by conſtructions, periphraſes and gloſſes, ſupra mentem, yea, contra mentem of the Pannel; there Charity juſtly may be admitted: for a good intention, as it will not purge a manifeſt crime, neither ſhould the wreſting of the Pannel's intention inforce a Crime, and ſo not debar Charity.

And where my Lord Advocate doth urge againſt the Pannel's defaming of the Noblemen, it is anſwered by the Pannel, that the firſt Author muſt be the defamer, and not the revealer; the whole matter of the pretended defamation, being original acts of the Lord Rea's quoad defenſorem, upon Pannel, and not Acts of the Pannel; as it is evident, by the Pannel's two depoſitions, the Lord Rea's firſt depoſition the 21ſt of May, where the ſaid Lord Rea doth acknowledge the Examination of the Pannel, taken the 20th of June, to be true in all points, ſo far as the ſame concerns the knowledge, words and acts of the ſaid Lord Rea; upon the explanations then following. By which explanations, and notwithſtanding thereof, there is ſubſtance enough in the Pannel's depoſition, to prove that the Lord Rea, and not the Pannel, was Author to the whole matter of the pretended defamation. And whereas my Lord Advocate would in his reply ſeem to queſtion the verbal relations, flowing from the Lord Rea to the Pannel; to this the Pannel oppoſes his own depoſition; and the firſt article of my Lord Rea's Examination formerly cited, wherein the Lord Rea ratifies the Pannel's verbal aſſertions: if he ratifies them, they muſt be in rerum natura; if they be, my Lord Advocate's aſſertion is not relevant. And where my Lord Advocate alledges the leaving forth of the Lord Rea's verbal relation, out of his repreſentation in writ, given in to the Lord-Treaſurer; the Pannel repeats his exception made thereanent of before. And to all my Lord Advocate's diſcourſe to that effect, containing one ſide of paper, the Pannel oppones his firſt anſwer, and his depoſitions, and the Lord Rea's relations, and his examinations agreeing thereto. And whereas my Lord Advocate would bind the Pannel to anſwer for the Lord Rea's omiſſions, becauſe the Lord Rea is his Author; the Pannel being ſitting behind at the time of the expreſſion, can hardly find means to be perſuaded that it came from his Majeſty's Advocate; and oppones and repeats the Pannel's exception herein. And where my Lord Advocate, upon theſe words, ye know the buſineſs, and not the time (do or die) ſays, that theſe words ſhould have a proper interpretation; which is, ſays he, to be a Counſel given by the Pannel, for ſubverſion of the Marquis's honour and eſtate: the Pannel anſwers thereto, that he adheres to his exception already alledged; and further adds, that the Lord Rea ſaid to the Pannel that Sunday Morning, that the Lord Seaforth had ſaid to the Lord Rea, their purpoſe was to take the King, the Queen, and the Prince: and ſo the information being given to the Pannel, furniſhed to the Pannel great cauſe of fear, and his fear the reaſon of the expreſſion of theſe words, of adviſing the King to prevent his danger; as the Pannel had formerly adviſed my Lord-Treaſurer of England, to adviſe his Majeſty to retire to Whitehall from Greenwich, as to a place of more ſafety. And this is clear, by the Pannel's depoſition the 20th of June, ratified by the Lord Rea in the firſt Article of his Examination, the 21ſt of June.

And where my Lord Advocate alledges, that the Lord Rea and his Majeſty's Letter, frees the Marquis of Hamilton, and the other Noblemen, by the Lord Rea's Oath:

It is anſwered thereto by the Pannel, that the Pannel doth not charge them; he only charges the Lord Rea as his Informer and Author, humbly atteſting, that in what eſſential points the Lord Rea is contrary to the Pannel, he does the Pannel wrong: and therefore the Pannel declares, that whenſoever it ſhall pleaſe his Majeſty, to permit the Pannel and the Lord Rea, to be confronted, or if then upon difference, the matter be not cleared of the Pannel's innocency; the Pannel is ready to hazard his life in a duel, to the glory of God, and to the clearing of the truth of this buſineſs; his Majeſty commanding the ſame, with a proteſtation that he carries no malice to the ſaid Lord Rea. If the buſineſs be not decided by this, or that if his Majeſty is pleaſed to admit torture before a duel-trial, the Pannel is ready with him to bear out the torture, and to be try'd thereby, with the ſaid Lord Rea, and let the truth then appear: which if it be not then, whenever it ſhall pleaſe God, to call the Pannel to bear teſtimony thereof with his blood, if God be not graciouſly pleaſed to bear him up in it, let men ſo conceive: and if God bear him out in it, then will he be found meet after his death, to have been an honeſt man, and his Blood ſhall be required of the takers thereof.

My Lord Advocate, before any anſwer to be made by him to the Pannel's former duply, produced his Majeſty's Letter ſent down to the Lords of his Majeſty Privy-Council, of the date of the 29th of June 1631, and deſired the ſame to be judicially read, of the whilk the tenor follows.

"To our right truſty and right well-beloved "Couſin and Counſellor, to our right truſty "and well-beloved Couſins and Counſellors; to "our right truſty and well-beloved Counſel"lors, the Viſcount of Duplin, our Chancellor; "the Earl of Menteith, Preſident of our Privy"Council; and to the remanent Earls, Lords, "and other of our Privy-Council, of our King"dom of Scotland."

Sic ſubſcribitur,

Charles R.

"RIght truſty and right well-beloved Couſin "and Counſellor, and right truſty and "right well-beloved Couſins and Counſellors, "and right truſty and well-beloved Counſellors, "we greet you well. Whereas we are informed "of a practice in appearance ſo pernicious, and "nearly concerning us, as we would not but "take ſome trial thereof, both by ourſelf, and "ſome of our Council, appointed by us for that "purpoſe. But in the mean time, becauſe of ſome "ſiniſtrous rumours maliciouſly diſperſed there"upon, to the prejudice of our right truſty and "right well-beloved Couſins and Counſellors, the "Marquis of Hamilton, and the Earls of Hadding"ton, Roxburgh, and Buccleugh, and ſome others; "leſt the like reports be brought unto your ears, "we have thought good hereby to declare, that "not only we have found by the trial, we ourſelves "have taken, that they are altogether innocent and "clear thereof; but likewiſe that the prime infor"mer thereof, hath now cleared them upon Oath, "teſtifying them (as we know them to be) as "good and faithful Subbjects, as we have in any "of our Kingdoms. And for the buſineſs itſelf, "whenſoever it ſhall be fully tried, we will there"after expreſs our further pleaſure concerning o"thers intereſted therein, according as weſhall find "juſt cauſe, either in puniſhing any perſon that "ſhall be found guilty, or in puniſhing any perſon "that ſhall be found to have given falſe informa"tion. And whereas we have formerly by our "Letters recommended unto you, our right truſty "and right well-beloved Couſin the Marquis Ha"milton, for furthering the ſpeedy levy and tranſ"portation of his men with all poſſible diligence; "theſe are again to require you to contribute the "beſt help that your authority or endeavours can "afford for that effect. Whereof, both out of the "regard we have to him, and to that employ"ment, being very confident of your beſt care; "we bid you farewel. From our Court at Green"wich, the 29th of June, 1631."

After reading of the which Letter of his Majeſty, it is anſwered by my Lord Advocate, that the urging of the Pannel to have the words (as he is informed) to be repeated in all the reſt of the Dittay, wants all reaſon; the points of the Dittay bearing relation of ſeveral deeds done in ſeveral times. And where it is alledged by the Pannel, that theſe words, as he was inform'd, were true quoad relationem & quoad veritatem, there was no neceſſity: If this were true, the Dittay were eluded, for the Pannel is not accuſed of a Leaſing in reſpect of the verity of the matter related, but in reſpect of his diſcrepance from his Author, and that he affirms more than his Author, and with greater certainty than his Author: and that not content with both theſe two exceſſes, he follows it out to the very point of execution, which is evident in the point of certainty, by theſe words ſpoken to his Majeſty, the buſineſs is known, whilk is more certain by the oppoſition of the uncertainty of time only, which redoubles the certainty of the buſineſs. And in the point of execution, by that pernicious and cruel Counſel do or die: the effect of which pernicious Counſel, if God in mercy had not diſpoſed the royal heart of our wiſe and gracious Sovereign, would have produced more lamentable effects, nor could be quenched with the pity of tears ſhed by the Pannel. And the conferring of the Lord Rea (whom the Pannel calls the prime Author) with himſelf, in the progreſs of his behaviour, will manifeſt the Pannel's guiltineſs, of the points of the Dittay, wherein he is accuſed: for the Lord Rea, who behoved to have greater certainty than the Pannel, never proceeded to the points of poſitive Party, prime Agent, Plotters; and to ſay to the ſupream ſovereign Prince, that the buſineſs was known, in all which points the Pannel has involv'd himſelf; but the Lord Rea was content to reveal the reports made to him by David Ramſay, and Mr. Robert Meldrum, to the Pannel, without adding or paring. And when the Pannel, upon the 22d of May, which was the day of the Marquis's returning from Scotland to England, came to the Lord Rea and told him, that he had been with the Lord-Treaſurer and acquainted him with the paſſages, which he had from the Lord Seaforth, and of the Lord Marquis's return, and that he had conceived, that it might be dangerous at that time for his Majeſty; for the which cauſe the Pannel in his own depoſition ſaith, that he did adviſe the King to remove from Greenwich, to Whiteball or London; my Lord Rea anſwer'd, that the Pannel had done evil therein, for there was no ſuch ſuddenneſs to be fear'd: yet notwithſtanding hereof, and that his Author had improv'd his raſhneſs, the Pannel went thereafter and attended his Majeſty at dinner, and at the end of dinner ſpake theſe words of the certainty of the plot, uncertainty of the time, and added the Counſel. Like as the Pannel being asked, hereupon granted that he met with the Lord Rea upon that Sunday the Marquis came to Court, and alſo that he met with the Lord-Treaſurer; and counſell'd his Majeſty's removing from Greenwich to London. But denies that the Lord Rea ſaid, that he thought it was evil done. Notwithſtanding hereof, the Pannel went thereafter and attended his Majeſty at dinner, ſpake the words and gave the Counſel; like as his Majeſty being ſomething wakened by that fearful Counſel, ſent for the Lord Rea, and did acquaint him, that ſome preſent danger was ſuggeſted to his Majeſty, upon the Marquis's returning. To the which the Lord Rea anſwered by Oath, that he knew nothing againſt the Marquis, for any thing he knew, but that he was as good a ſubject as any his Majeſty had.

And where the Pannel would labour to free himſelf, by denying the Counſel given to him by the Lord Rea; it cannot be a warrantable excuſe, except he would prove that his Author adviſed him to do it: which is improbable, ſeeing the Lord Rea his Author neither did it, nor allowed of its being done by the Pannel. And where it is alledged by the Pannel, that he had ſufficient warrant from his Informer, he cannot affirm it, as being contrary to the relation made by his Author: which is not a ſyllable of the Marquis as prime Agent, nor of the three Noblemen as Plotters. And whatever the Pannel did after the diſcovery of the buſineſs to the Lord-Treaſurer, which was upon the 15th of May; it was the Pannel's own word, work and deed, as the giving in of the liſt, expreſſing the certainy of the plot, and urging the putting in execution. And where the Pannel alledges, that all was done upon a good intention, and that God is only Judge of the mind; it is true, where the mind is not revealed by ſpeech, or act puniſhable of the Law: but if either ſpeech or deed be done againſt the Law, the pretext of the mind will never excuſe it.

And albeit it be true, as the Pannel alledges, Quod delicta nec præſumuntur ſed probantur, yet it is as true, Quod in delictis præſumitur dolus niſi probatur contrarium. And in the caſe of this Dittay, we have a Law prohibiting Leaſings and Calumnies under the pain of death; and ſeeing by the Dittay, there are three particulars libelled, which his Majeſty in his Letter of the date of the 29th of June has called falſe informations, and which directly fall within the compaſs of the Law, as reflecting upon the life, honour and eſtate of the Noblemen; the Pannel's excuſe by intention is too ſlender, to free him from the puniſhment of the Law. And where it is alledged by the Pannel, that he has named his Authors, and that he was preſent the time of his relation, and did not contradict him therein, which the Pannel alledges for a ſufficient ground of his exoneration: the contrary is true; for the Lord Rea, in his examination upon the 21ſt of June, doth acknowledge the Pannel's examination to be true in all points, ſaving the explanations thereafter ſubjoined. But this approbation cannot exceed the ſubject; and alſo the ſubject muſt be reſtricted according to the conditions of the explanation: but ſo it is, that in the Pannel's examination, which is approven by the Lord Rea; there is not one ſyllable of the Lord Marquis as Party or prime Agent, or of the three Noblemen as Plotters.

And therefore that falls not within the compaſs of the approbation; and where it may appear that in the Pannel's examination upon the 20th of June, 'tis granted that on Monday the 16th of May, he deliver'd to the Lord-Treaſurer the liſt of names; that is not a part of the Pannel's relation approven by the Lord Rea: but it is the Pannel's anſwer to an interrogatory, asked of him by the Council, which could have no reſpect to the Lord Rea's relation. Like as the Pannel being examined thereupon the 24th of June, grants that the liſt was made by himſelf; and that the Lord Rea was not privy to the making thereof, which is alſo confeſſed by the Lord Rea himſelf in his examination the 21ſt of June 1631, and laſt article thereof. Wherein he depones, not only that he was not acquainted with the liſt of names delivered to the Lord-Treaſurer, but that he had nothing to do therein; which both excludes the concurſe of the making of the liſt, and his knowledge of the purpoſe of it. And where it is alledged by the Pannel, that after the revealing to the Lord-Treaſurer, he could not abſtain from the remanent paſſages of his behaviour, becauſe it was actus continuatus by the Lord Rea to the Pannel, from the 13th of May to the 20th of May; it is anſwered, that after the firſt revealing, the Pannel had no more to do in the neceſſity of duty, becauſe his Author was revealed: and whatever followed after diſcovery made by the Pannel, would have tied the Author and not the Pannel; there being no Law that might have puniſhed the Pannel for ſifting his courſe after the revealing. But there being manifeſt hazard and danger in Law, to follow further after the revealing of the buſineſs, which the Author thought neither clear nor certain; and the Pannel not being conſcious upon what mind the Lord Rea made his firſt Information to him, which might very readily have been upon malecontentment, grudging and malice, his credulity to him was cruelty againſt the Noblemen. And his going forwards after the revealing, was a manifeſt ingagement of himſelf, in the malice of the Author, and drawing upon himſelf the opinion of greater.

And where it is alledged by the Pannel, that his Behaviour cannot be counted in the nature of Leaſings, puniſhed by Act of Parliament, but allanerly by way of illation and ſiniſter conſtruction; the contrary is clear, by the three points of the Dittay. And the Purſuer, in his reply, has moſt juſtly challenged the Pannel as a defamer of Noblemen; becauſe their fame, honour and credit was unblameable before it was taxed by the Pannel; and the Lord Marquis brought under danger of the loſs of life, honour and eſtate.

And where it is pretended by the Pannel, that the cauſe of his ſpeaking of theſe words to his Majeſty, upon the Sunday of the Marquis's coming to Court, was becauſe the Lord Rea told the Pannel, that the Lord Seaforth had aſſured him, that the Plot was for taking off the King and the Queen; firſt, that excuſe has no warrant from the Lord Rea's depoſition; next, in that ſame conference betwixt the Pannel and the Lord Rea upon the ſaid Sunday, the Lord Rea told him it was an idle fear; and thirdly, it cannot be a pretext, becauſe that paſſage of the taking the King and Queen, is contained in the relation made by the Lord Rea upon the 18th of May; and ſo cannot be pretended as a new information lately come to his knowledge, to waken the Pannel to ſuch a pernicious Counſel. And this this ſhall ſuffice for anſwer to the Duply, which is cloſed with that which is contained in the Reply; that the Pannel had no warrant of his ſpeeches and proceedings poſitive againſt the Marquis; nor colour of warrant againſt the three Earls, and neither warrant nor colour at all againſt the Earl of Buccleugh, againſt whom the Pannel by his own confeſſion, had nothing but the gueſs of the Lord Rea; which the Lord Rea not the leſs refuſes, and affirms to be the nomination of the Pannel. But howſoever it is only a gueſs, by his own confeſſion, from his Author, and yet in his liſt he makes him a Plotter. And albeit the like evidence of the Pannel's Calumnies againſt the other two Earls being undoubted, as having no warrant at all from the Lord Rea's relation, wherein there is no ſyllable of theſe Noblemen; and that the excuſe made by the Pannel of a verbal relation by the Lord Rea, has no probability, and alſo is contradicted by the Lord Rea, being poiſed thereupon: Yet in theſe two Noblemen the Pannel covers himſelf under the ſhadow of a verbal relation, againſt that which himſelf drew up in writing; but in the Lord Buccleugh's he is excluded from all verbal relation, in reſpect of his own depoſition, whereby he is manifeſtly convinced of incurring the puniſhment of the Acts of Parliament, whereupon the Dittay is formed, as having named him Plotter, when by his own depoſition he grants it to be a gueſs of the Lord Rea.

It is quadruply'd by the Pannel, that for anſwer to the Triply, made by the Lord Advocate his Purſuer, he repeats and oppones his defences contained in the former exception and duply. And further the Pannel adds, that where it is objected by my Lord Advocate againſt the Pannel, that he had no ground nor cauſe from the Lord Rea's relation, from the Pannel by word, to call the two Earls of Haddington and Roxburgh Plotters; but by the contrary, that the Lord Rea refuſes and denies the ſame; againſt the which objection, the Pannel does repeat and adhere to that article of his ſecond depoſition, dated the 24th of June in theſe words following; he ſaith the Lord Rea did affirm to the Examinant, that he had the foreſaid Report, anent the Earls of Melros and Roxburgh, from the Lord Seaforth, before the Pannel then examined made or delivered this ſaid Paper, or liſt to the Treaſurer. And in the article preceding in the ſame depoſition, the Pannel affirms the Lord Rea told him this; whereby it evidently appears by the two articles joined together, that the Pannel had ground for that part of his repreſentation.

And whereas it is affirmed by my Lord Advocate, that the Lord Rea denies the ſame, this comparing of the Pannel's aſſertion, and the word of the Lord Rea's denial together, the Lord Rea's words will be found to import no direct nor clear denial; the Pannel affirms that the Lord Rea told him, that the Earl of Seaforth told him, that the ſaid two Earls were upon the ſecrets of the buſineſs of the Marquis; my Lord Rea's words in his denial bearing, that the firſt time the Lord Seaforth had any ſpeech with him, touching the ſaid Earls of Haddington and Roxburgh, their being privy to the particulars and ſecrets of the Lord Hamilton's buſineſs, was on the Monday after the Marquis's coming out of Scotland. The Pannel affirms, that the Lord Rea told him ſuch a thing; the Lord Rea ſays, the Lord Seaforth ſpake not to him any ſuch matter before ſuch a day: how do theſe two agree, or contradict one another? The Pannel affirms the Lord Rea told him; my Lord Rea affirms my Lord Seaforth told him not ſuch a thing, before ſuch a day: what is that to the Pannel, if the Lord Seaforth had never told that to the Lord Rea, the Lord Rea might have told it to the Pannel for all that? And where it is alledged for the fortifying of the Triply by my Lord Advocate, that the Lord Rea, in his depoſition, denieth that he was acquainted with the liſt of names, delivered by the Pannel, or had any thing to do therein; the Pannel affirms, that this eludes not the particular words concerning the two Earls; becauſe of the denial of the general liſt, wherein they were ingroſſed: for the manner of the diſcovery was left to the Pannel, when the direction of the diſcovery was given him. And ſo it was not needful that the Lord Rea ſhould be acquainted with the Papers, with the Pen, the Ink, the Hour and the Manner of the writing; becauſe that was left to the Pannel. Neither can the general denial of one piece of Paper, take away the Pannel's teſtimony of the certain, determined, condeſcended upon by word. And for his word that he had no hand therein, is not meant de materia, affirmed by the Pannel, reported to him againſt the ſaid two Earls; becauſe he grants the ſubſtance in the preceding depoſition made by him thereanent. And as to that relation by that liſt, concerning the Earl of Buccleugh as Plotter, for defence of the Pannel's depoſition, it is produced in theſe words, bearing, 'And 'further faith, (to wit, the Pannel) that the Lord 'Rea had told him, he could not gueſs who alſo 'ſhould be in the plot, unleſs it were the Lord Buc-'cleugh; of whom the Lord Rea ſaid, he heard him 'ſpeak terrible words againſt the King, at his own 'table in Holland.' There it is affirmed, that he ſuſpected the Lord Buccleugh to be upon the Plot: if ſuſpected to be on the Plot by the Lord Rea, and told by him to the Pannel; the Pannel was neceſſitated to reveal the ſame, yea in iiſdem terminis, to reveal him to be a Plotter; whom he ſaid, he ſuſpected to be upon the Plot. To this my Lord Advocate objected, my Lord Rea's denial, which are in theſe words; That the Pannel and Lord Rea having ſome ſpeech together, who might be look'd for in Scotland to take arms; the Pannel, and not the Lord Rea named the Lord Buccleugh. Whereupon the Lord Rea told, that at the ſiege of the Buſſe, the Lord Rea heard the Lord Buccleugh uſe ſome words, whereby the Lord Rea took the Lord Buccleugh to have come malecontent out of England. In this preſumed denial, there is contained a diſcourſe betwixt the Pannel and the Lord Rea, as the Lord Rea alledges. And in this diſcourſe, that the Pannel ſhould have named the Lord Buccleugh, and not the Lord Rea; this naming, is a naming in the reſpect of time firſt or laſt: for the Lord Rea grants that he did name the Lord Buccleugh, becauſe of the laſt words of that clauſe; ſo that his denial reſpects only priority of time, but no ways the Pannel's aſſertion; for not a word of his aſſertion is denied. But by the contrary, for corroboration of the Pannel's juſt ground, concerning the Earl of Buccleugh; the Lord Rea makes addition of more nor the Pannel had remembrance of; and ſo fortifies his affirmation, and proves no denial thereof.

The Pannel adds further, for eluding of the miſtaking of theſe his words, Sir, we know the buſineſs, but not the time, therefore do or die. It is affirmed by the Lord Rea, that he did hear of his Majeſty, that there was a danger ſuggeſted to him; which danger my Lord Advocate alledges to have come from the Pannel's words. If a danger but by the King's ſelf apprehended, then not a perſecution, for a danger imports defenſive remedies, and not violent and malicious attempts; yea, it imports and implies a preventing, and not a perſecuting. And laſtly, it clearly confirms the mentioned intention of the Pannel's, expreſſing of thoſe words, which was to prevent his Majeſty's danger. This the Pannel's alledgance, is cleared in the Lord Rea's depoſition, made the 21ſt of June; yea, this is my Lord Rea's relation, to whom the Pannel never ſpake, ſince the Pannel and he entered to their Trial. As for the words, Sir, we know the buſineſs infallibly, this is no lye; becauſe the Pannel and the Lord Rea was at his Majeſty's ten days before, and affirmed the ſame: the Pannel by relation from the Lord Rea, and the Lord Rea from others, and ſo that is no lye. And that the Pannel did not know the time, it is alledged in the contrary, Ergo not no lye. As for the words do or die, by my Lord Advocate's declaration, it is but conſilium perniciosum. And that it is not mendacium, neither can it be made nor interpreted mendacium, by any probability or ſenſe, and no malicious Counſel, as is alledged againſt the Pannel; conſidering the Pannel's declared intent, and the Lord Rea's before-mentioned examination, wherein it is called a danger, ſo not a lye, and therefore not rightly ſubſumed.

My Lord Advocate repeats his former replies and triplies, and deſires my Lord Juſtice to cloſe this proceſs, ſo that there be no further diſpenſation or reaſoning herein, till anent the relevance or irrelevance of the Indictment. The Juſtice by Interloquitor declares the proceſs to be cloſed; and continues Interloquitor upon the alledgances, proponed by the Pannel againſt the Dittay, and Anſwers made thereto by his Majeſty's Advocate, to Wedneſday next, the ſeventh of December inſtant; the perſons of Aſſize warned apud Acta, to compear the ſaid day in the hour of cauſe, ilk perſon under the pain of a thouſand Marks. And ordained the Pannel to be returned to Ward, therein to remain in the mean time: whereupon my Lord Advocate asked Inſtruments.

" * The Lord Uchiltrie, a Man of a ſubtil Spirit and good Parts, had not thoſe Endowments of his mind been ſtained with ſome " ill Qualities, his Malice againſt the Marquis of Hamilton was hereditary, he being the Son of Capt. James Stewart, who in " King James's minority, when the Hamiltons were groundleſſly and in a mock Parliament attainted, carried the Title of Earl of " Arran, and poſſeſſed their Fortunes." Burnet's Memoirs of the Dukes of Hamilton, p. 11, and 12. where he relates the whole buſineſs; and pag. 12. ſays, " This was a Calumny, than which Hell could not have forged a fouler, for Lord Uchiltrie " judged that this would infallibly have produced one of two effects, either raiſed ſuch a Jealouſy in the King's thoughts, as to have " uite ruin'd the Marquis, ſince few Miniſters are proof againſt ſuch whiſpers, or at leaſt it would have ſtopp'd his Voyage for

" a while, till he was tired, and the ſmalleſt delay in that would have ſcatter'd his Soldiers, (which the King was to ſend under " the Marquis's command, to aſſiſt the King of Sweden to recover the Palatinate) ſo that this deſign failing, in which his Ho- " nour was now ſo far engag'd; a ſtain ſhould lie on him thro' all Europe. Lord Weſton carried this ſtory to the King, whether " provoked to it out of hatred to the Marquis, or mov'd from his zeal and duty to the King, ſhall not be determined; tho' the " laſt was pretended by him. in many of his Letters to the Marquis. But his Majeſty knew the Marquis too well, and under- " ſtood all his motions and the progreſs of this Affair, too exactly, to give any credit to this Forgery, And pag. 13. But the Marquis " was not able to lie under ſuch terrible Impurations, wherefore he preſſed that Uchiltrie might be put to it, to prove what he " had alledg'd: but all he offered againſt Ramſay was only a preſumption, which Ramſay denied, and Rea affirm'd; ſo that they " were both put under Bail, and nothing appear'd that did touch the Marquis: for tho' Ramſay had been as guilty as the Lord Rea " call'd him, that left no Imputation on him, ſince none can be made anſwerable for thoſe they employ, unleſs it appear that " they followed the Inſtructions given them. So the Marquis was diſpatched to Germany. Lord Uchiltrie had charged the Mar- " quis with Treaſon, and failing ſo totally in his Probation, was ſent down to Scotland to be tried, where he had a legal and free " Trial for his falſe Charge, before the Juſtice-General, and ſuch Aſſeſſors as were appointed to ſit with him, by the Privy-Coun- " cil: and had the Marquis repaid him in his own Coin, he could not have eſcap'd capital Puniſhment. But he was ſatisfied with " his own juſtification, and ſuch a Cenſure put on the Calumniator, as might deter others from the like Attempts. Wherefore " he was condemn'd to perpetual Impriſonment in Blackneſs Caſtle, and he continued there for twenty Years."

XXI. Proceedings in Parliament againſt Sir John Finch, Baron of Fordwich, Lord-Keeper, for High-Treaſon, 1640. 16 Car. I*.

THE Houſe of Commons having ſecur'd that great Stateſman the Earl of Strafford, and that zealous Churchman Archbiſhop Laud; began to prepare an Impeachment againſt the great Officer of the Law, the Lord-Keeper Finch, of High-Treaſon.

December 14th, a Committee was appointed to prepare a Charge againſt him; of which he having notice, ſent to the Houſe of Commons a Letter, deſiring to be admitted to ſpeak for himſelf, before any Vote paſt againſt him. Upon this Letter there aroſe a great debate in the Houſe, and after ſome time ſpent therein, it was granted him; and Monday December the 21ſt, was appointed for the hearing of him.

On Monday he was admitted in this manner; there was a Chair ſet for him to make uſe of if he pleaſed, and a Stool to lay the Purſe upon, a little on the ſide of the Bar on the left hand as you come in; he himſelf brought in the Purſe, and laid it in the Chair, but would not ſit down himſelf, nor put on his Hat, though he was mov'd to it by Mr. Speaker, but ſpake all the while bare-headed and ſtanding; the Serjeant at Arms attending on the Houſe, ſtanding by him with the Mace on his ſhoulder: And ſpake as follows.

Mr. Speaker,

I Do firſt preſent my moſt humble thanks to this Honourable Aſſembly, for this favour vouchſafed me, in granting me admittance to their preſence, and do humbly beſeech them to believe it is no deſire to preſerve myſelf or my fortune, but to deſerve the good opinions of thoſe that have drawn me hither.

I do profeſs in the preſence of him that knoweth all hearts, that I had rather go from door to door, and crave Da obolum Belizario, &c. with the good opinion of this Aſſembly, than live and enjoy all the honours and fortunes I am capable of.

I do not come hither with an intention to juſtify my words, my actions, or my opinions; but to make a plain and clear narration for myſelf, and then humbly to ſubmit to the wiſdom and juſtice of this Houſe myſelf, and all that concerns me.

I do well underſtand (Mr. Speaker) with what diſadvantage any man can ſpeak in his own cauſe, and if I could have told how to have tranſmitted my thoughts and actions, by a clearer repreſentation of another (I do ſo much defy my own judgment in working, and my ways in expreſſing) that I ſhould have been a moſt humble ſuitor, another might have done it. But this Houſe will not take words, but with clear and ingenuous dealing; and therefore I ſhall beſeech them to think, I come not hither with a ſet or ſtudied ſpeech, I come to ſpeak my heart, and to ſpeak it clearly and plainly, and then leave it to your clemency and juſtice: and I hope if any thing ſhall ſlip from me, to work contrary to my meaning, or intention, diſorderly or ill-placed, you will be pleaſed to make a favourable conſtruction, and leave me the liberty of explanation, if there ſhall be any; but I hope there ſhall be no cauſe for it.

I hope, for my affection in Religion no man doubteth me, what my education, what, and under whom for many years, is well known; I lived near thirty years in the Society of Gray's-Inn: and if one that was a reverend Preacher in my time (Dr. Sibbs) were now alive, he were able to give teſtimony to this Houſe, that when a party ill-affected in Religion ſought to weary him, and tire him out, he had his chiefeſt encouragement from me.

* This Proceeding explains the manner of obtaining the Judges opinions in Mr. Hampden's Caſe about Ship-Money, Vol. I. pag. 483. as alſo the Lord-Keeper's Reaſons for what he did as Speaker in the Parliament 1629. for which ſee, ante Page. 217. Elſe this had not been inſerted, his Lordſhip not putting in any Anſwer to the Articles exhibited againſt him.

I have now (Mr. Speaker) been fifteen years of the King's Council; from the firſt hour to this minute, no man is able to ſay that ever I was author, adviſer, or conſenter to any project.

It pleaſed the King (my gracious Maſter) after I had ſerved him divers years, to preſer me to two places; to be Chief-Juſtice of the Common-Pleas, and then Keeper of his Great-Seal: I ſay it in the preſence of God, I was ſo far from the thought of the one, and from the ambition of the other, that if my Maſter's grace and goodneſs had not been, I had never enjoyed thoſe honours.

I cannot tell (Mr. Speaker) nor I do not know what particulars there are, that may draw me into your diſfavour or ill opinion, and therefore I ſhall come very weakly arm'd; yet to thoſe that either in my own knowledge, or by ſuch a knowledge as is given me, and not from any in this Houſe, I ſhall ſpeak ſomewhat, that I hope being truth, and accompanied with clearneſs and ingenuity, will at laſt procure ſome allay of that ill opinion which may perhaps be conceived of me.

Mr. Speaker, I had once the honour to ſit in the place that you do: from the firſt time I came thither, to this unfortunate time, I do appeal to all that were here then, if I ſerved you not with candor. Ill office I never did to any of the Houſe, good offices I have witneſſes enough I did many; I was ſo happy, that upon an occaſion which once happened, I received an expreſſion and teſtimony of the good affection of this Houſe towards me.

For the laſt unhappy day, I had a great ſhare in the unhappineſs and ſorrow of it. I hope there are enough do remember, no man within the walls of this Houſe did expreſs more ſymptoms of ſorrow, grief, and diſtraction than I did.

After an adjournment for two or three days, it pleaſed his Majeſty to ſend for me, to let me know that he could not ſo reſolve of things as he deſired, and therefore was deſirous that there might be an adjournment for ſome fews days more. I proteſt I did not then diſcern in his Majeſty, and I believe it was not in his thoughts, to think of the diſſolving of this Aſſembly; but was pleaſed in the firſt place, to give me a command to deliver his pleaſure to the Houſe for an adjournment for ſome few days, till the Monday following, as I remember, and commanded me withal to deliver his pleaſure, that there ſhould be no further ſpeeches, but forthwith upon the delivery of the meſſage come and wait upon him: he likewiſe commanded me, if queſtions were offered to be put, upon my Allegiance I ſhould not dare to do it. How much I did then in all humbleneſs reaſon with his Majeſty, is not for me here to ſpeak; only thus much let me ſay, I was no Author of any counſel in it. I was only a perſon in receiving Commiſſion; I ſpeak not this as any thing, I now produce or do invent, or take up for my own excuſe, but that which is known to divers, and ſome honourable perſons in this Houſe, to be moſt true. All that I will ſay for that, is humbly to beſeech you all to conſider, that if it had been any man's cauſe, as it was mine, between the diſpleaſure of a gracious King, and the ill opinion of an honourable Aſſembly; I beſeech you lay all together, lay my firſt actions and behaviour with the laſt, I ſhall ſubmit to your honourable and favourable conſtructions.

For the Shipping buſineſs, my opinion of that cauſe hath lain heavy upon me; I ſhall clearly and truly preſent unto you what every thing is, with this proteſtation, that if in reckoning up my own opinion what I was of, or what I delivered, any thing of it be diſpleaſing, or contrary to the opinion of this Houſe, that I am far from juſtifying of it, but ſubmit that and all other my actions to your wiſdom and goodneſs.

Mr. Speaker, the firſt Writs that were ſent out about the Shipping-buſineſs, I had no more knowledge of, and was as ignorant as any one Member of this Houſe, or any man in the Kingdom. I was never the Author nor Adviſer of it, and will boldly ſay, from the firſt to this hour, I did never adviſe nor counſel the ſetting forth of any Ship-Writs in my life.

Mr. Speaker, it is true that I was made Chief-Juſtice of the Common-Pleas ſome four days before the Ship-Writs went out to the Ports and Maritime Places; as I do remember, the 20th of October 1634, they do bear teſte, and I was ſworn Juſtice the 16th of October: ſo as they went out in that time, but without my knowledge or privity, the God of Heaven knows this to be true.

Mr. Speaker, afterwards his Majeſty was pleaſed to command my Lord Chief-Juſtice of the King's-Bench, that then was, Sir Thomas Richardſon, and Chief-Baron of the Exchequer that now is, and myſelf then Chief-Juſtice of the Common-Pleas, to take into conſideration the Precedents then brought unto us; which we did, and after returned to his Majeſty, what we had found out of thoſe precedents.

It is true, that afterwards his Majeſty did take into conſideration, that if the whole Kingdom were concerned, that it was not reaſon to lay the whole burthen upon the Cinque-Ports and Maritime Towns.

Thereupon, upon what ground his Majeſty took that into his conſideration, I do confeſs I do know nothing of it.

His Majeſty did command my Lord Chief-Juſtice that now is, my Lord Chief-Baron, and myſelf, to return our opinions; Whether, when the whole Kingdom is in danger, and the Kingdom in general is concerned, it be not according to Law and Reaſon, that the whole Kingdom, and his Majeſty, and all intereſted therein, ſhould join in defending and preſerving thereof?

This was in time, about 1634.

In Michaelmas-Term following, his Majeſty commanded me to go to all the Judges, and require their opinions in particular.

He commanded me to do it to every one, and to charge them upon their duty and allegiance, to keep it ſecret.

Mr. Speaker, it was never intended by his Majeſty (ſo profeſſed by him) at that time, and ſo declared to all the Judges, that it was not required by him, to be ſuch a binding opinion to the Subject, as to hinder him from calling it in queſtion, nor be binding to themſelves, but that upon better reaſon and advice they may alter it; but deſired their opinions, for his own private reaſon.

I know very well, that extrajudicial opinions of Judges ought not to be binding.

But I did think, and ſpeak my Heart and Conſcience freely; myſelf, and the reſt of the Judges being ſworn, and by our Oaths tied to counſel the King, when he ſhould require advice of us, that we were bound by our Oaths and Duties to return our opinions.

I did obey his Majeſty's command, and do here before the God of Heaven avow it.

I did never uſe the leaſt promiſe of preferment or reward to any, nor did uſe the leaſt menace; I did leave it freely to their own Conſciences and Liberty; for I was left to the liberty of my own by his Majeſty, and had reaſon to leave them the liberty of their own Conſciences.

And I beſeech you be pleaſed to have ſome belief, that I would not ſay this, but that I know the God of Heaven will make it appear; and I beſeech you that extravagant ſpeeches may not move againſt that which is a poſitive and clear truth.

Mr. Speaker, in the diſcourſe of this (as is between Judges) ſome ſmall diſcourſes ſometimes aroſe, yet never was any cauſe wherein any Judges conferred, that were ſo little conference as between me and them.

Mr. Speaker, againſt a Negative, I can ſay nothing; but I ſhall affirm nothing unto you, but by the grace of God, as I affirm it to be true, ſo I make no doubt of making it appear to be ſo.

This opinion was ſubſcribed without ſolicitation, there was not any man of us, did make any doubt of ſubſcribing our opinion, but two, Mr. Juſtice Hutton, and Mr. Juſtice Croke.

Mr. Juſtice Croke made not a ſcruple of the thing, but of the introduction; for it was thus:

That whereas the Ports and the Maritime Towns were concerned, there according to the precedents in former times, the charge lay on them.

So when the Kingdom was in danger, of which his Majeſty was the ſole Judge; whether it was not agreeable to Law and Reaſon, the whole Kingdom to bear the charge?

I left this caſe with Judge Croke.

The next Term I ſpake with him, he could give me no reſolution, becauſe he had not ſeen the Writs in former times; but did give his opinion, that when the whole Kingdom was in danger, the charge of the defence ought to be born by all.

So of that opinion of his, there was no need of a ſolicitation.

I ſpeak no more here, than I did openly in my argument in the Exchequer-Chamber.

This is the naked truth: for Mr. Juſtice Hutton, he did never ſubſcribe at all.

I will only ſay this, that I was ſo far from preſſing him to give his opinion, becauſe he did ask time to conſider of it, that I will boldly ſay, and make it good, that when his Majeſty would have had him ſometimes ſent for, to give his opinion, I beſeeched his Majeſty to leave him to himſelf and his conſcience; and that was the ill office I did.

The Judges did ſubſcribe in November or December, 1635.

I had no conference, nor (truly I think) by accident any diſcourſe with any of the Judges touching their opinions: for till February 1636, there was no ſpeech of it, for when they had delivered their opinions, I did return according to my duty to my Maſter the King, and delivered them to him: in whoſe cuſtody they be.

In February 1636, upon a command that came from his Majeſty, by one of the then Secretaries of State, the Judges all aſſembled in Gray's-Inn; we did then fall into a debate of the caſe then ſent unto us, and we did then return our opinion unto his Majeſty; there was then much diſcourſe and great debate about it.

Mine opinion and conſcience at that time was agreeable to that opinion I then delivered.

I did uſe the beſt arguments I could, for the maintenance of my opinion; and that was all I did.

It is true, that then at that time, Mr. Juſtice Hutton, and Mr. Juſtice Croke, did not differ in the main point, which was this:

When the Kingdom was in danger, the charge ought to be born by the whole Kingdom.

But in this point, whether the King was the ſole Judge of the danger, they differed.

So as there was between the firſt ſubſcription, and this debate, and conſultation, ſome fifteen months difference.

It is true, that all of them did then ſubſcribe, both Juſtice Hutton, and Juſtice Croke, which was returned to his Majeſty, and after publiſhed by my Lord-Keeper (my predeceſſor) in the Star-Chamber.

For the manner of publiſhing it, I will ſay nothing, but leave it to thoſe, whoſe memories will call to mind what was then done.

The reaſon of the ſubſcription of Juſtice Hutton, and Juſtice Croke, (though they differed in opinion) grew from this, that was told them, from the reſt of the Judges;

That where the greater number did agree in their vote, the reſt were involved and included.

And now I have faithfully delivered, what I did in that buſineſs, till I came (which was afterwards) to my argument in the Exchequer-Chamber: for the queſtion was, A ſcire facias iſſued out of the Exchequer in that caſe of Mr. Hampden's; of which I can ſay nothing, for it was there begun, and afterwards rejourned, to have advice of all the Judges.

Mr. Speaker, among the reſt (according to my duty) I argued the caſe.

I ſhall not trouble you, to tell you what my argument was, I preſume there are copies enough of it; only I will tell you there are four things, very briefly, that I then delared.

Firſt, concerning the matter of danger, and neceſſity of the whole Kingdom.

I profeſs that there was never a Judge in the Kingdom did deliver an opinion, but that it muſt be in a caſe of apparent danger.

When we came to an argument of the caſe, it was not upon a matter of iſſue, but it was upon a demurrer;

Whether the danger was ſufficiently admitted in pleading, and therefore was not the thing that was in diſpute, that was the firſt degree and ſtep that led unto it.

I did deliver myſelf as free and as clear as any man did, that the King ought to govern by the poſitive Laws of the Kingdom, that he could not alter nor change, nor innovate in matters of Law, but by common conſent in Parliament.

I did further deliver, that if this were uſed to make a further revenue or benefit to the King, or in any other way but in caſe of neceſſity, and for the preſervation of the Kingdom, the judgment did warrant no ſuch thing:

My opinion in this buſineſs, I did in my concluſion of my argument ſubmit to the judgment of this Houſe.

I never deliver'd my opinion, that money ought to be raiſed, but Ships provided for the defence of this Kingdom, and in that the writ was performed.

And that the charge ought not to be in any caſe, but where the whole Kingdom was in danger.

And

And Mr. Juſtice Hutton, and Mr. Juſtice Croke, were of the ſame opinion with me.

I do humbly ſubmit, having related unto you my whole carriage in this buſineſs; humbly ſubmitting myſelf to your grave and favourable cenſures, beſeeching you not to think that I delivered theſe things, with the leaſt intention to ſubvert or ſubject the Common Law of the Kingdom, or to bring in or to introduce any new way of Government; it hath been far from my thoughts, as any thing under the Heavens.

Mr. Speaker, I have heard too that there hath been ſome ill opinion conceived of me about Foreſt buſineſs, which was a thing far out of the way of my ſtudy, as any thing I know toward the Law.

But it pleaſed his Majeſty, in the ſickneſs of Mr. Noy, to give ſome ſhort warning to prepare myſelf for that employment.

When I came there, I did both the King and Commonwealth acceptable ſervice; for I did and dare be bold to ſay, with extream danger to myſelf and fortune, (ſome do underſtand my meaning herein) run through that buſineſs, and left the Foreſt as much as was there.

A thing in my judgment, conſiderable for the advantage of the Commonwealth, as could be undertaken.

When I went down about that employment, I ſatisfied myſelf about the matter of perambulation.

There were great difficulties of opinions, what perambulation was.

I did arm myſelf as well as I could, before I did any thing in it.

I did acquaint thoſe that were then Judges, in the preſence of the noble Lords, with ſuch objections as I thought it my duty to offer unto them.

If they thought they were not objections of ſuch weight, as were fit to ſtir them, I would not do the King that diſſervice.

They thought the objections had ſuch anſwers as might well induce the like upon a conference with the whole Country; admitting me to come and confer with them, the Country did unanimouſly ſubſcribe.

It fell out afterwards, that the King commanded me, and all this before I was Chief-Juſtice, to go into Eſſex, and did then tell me he had been informed, that the bounds of the Foreſt were narrower, than in truth they ought to be; and I did according to his command.

I will here profeſs that which is known to many, I had no thought or intention of enlarging the bounds of the Foreſt, further than H. and that part about it, for which there was a perambulation about 26 Edw. IV.

I deſired the Country to confer with me about it, if they were pleaſed to do it; and then according to my duty, I did produce thoſe Records which I thought fit for his Majeſty's ſervice, leaving them to diſcharge themſelves as by Law and Juſtice they might do.

I did never, in the leaſt kind, go about to overthrow the Charter of the Foreſt.

And did publiſh and maintain Charta de Foreſta, as a ſacred thing, and no man to violate it, and ought to be preſerved for the King and Commonwealth.

I do in this humbly ſubmit, and what I have done, to the Goodneſs and Juſtice of this Houſe.

[Mr. Ruſhworth ſays, many were exceedingly taken with his Eloquence and Carriage, and it was a ſad ſight to ſee a Perſon of his greatneſs, parts and favour, to appear in ſuch a poſture, before ſuch an Aſſembly, to plead for his Life and Fortunes.]

After his Lordſhip was retir'd, it was moved that this admiſſion of the Lord-Keeper, might not be drawn into precedent; and in anſwer to what his Lordſhip ſaid, Mr. Rigby made this following ſpeech.

Mr. Speaker,

THough my judgment prompts me to ſit ſtill and be ſilent, yet the duty I owe to my King, my Country and my Conſcience, moves me to ſtand up and ſpeak.

Mr. Speaker, had not this Syren ſo ſweet a tongue, ſurely he could never have effected ſo much miſchief to this Kingdom: you know, Sir, optimorum putrefactio peſſima, the beſt things putrefied become the worſt: and as it is in the natural, ſo in the body politick; and what's to be done then, Mr. Speaker, we all know enſe recidendum eſt, the ſword, Juſtice muſt ſtrike, ne pars ſincera trahatur.

Mr. Speaker, it is not the voice, non vox ſed votum, not the tongue, but the heart and actions that are to be ſuſpected: for doth not our Saviour ſay it, Shew me thy faith by thy works, O man? (St. James, not our Saviour, ſaith it.) Now, Mr. Speaker, hath not this Kingdom ſeen, (ſeen, ſay I?) nay felt and ſmarted under the cruelty of this man's Juſtice? So malicious as to record it in every Court of Weſtminſter; as if he had not been contented with inſlaving of us all, unleſs he entailed it to all poſterity. Why ſhall I believe words now, cum factum videam? Shall we be ſo weak men, as when we have been injured and abuſed, will be gained again with fair words and complements? Or, like little Children, when we have been whipt and beaten, be pleaſed again with ſweetmeats? Oh no, there be ſome birds in the ſummer of Parliament will ſing ſweetly, who in the winter of perſecution, will for their prey ravenouſly fly at all, upon our goods, nay ſeize upon our perſons; and hath it not been with this man ſo, with ſome in this Aſſembly?

Mr. Speaker, it hath been objected unto us, that in judgment you ſhould think of mercy, and be ye merciful as your heavenly Father is merciful; now God Almighty grant that we may be ſo, and that our hearts and judgments may be truly rectified to know truly what is mercy, I ſay to know what is mercy; for there is the point, Mr. Speaker: I have heard of fooliſh pity, fooliſh pity; do we not all know the effects of it? And I have met with this epithet to mercy, crudelis miſericordia; and in ſome kind I think there may be a cruel mercy: I am ſure that the ſpirit of God ſaid, be not pitiful in judgment, nay it ſaith, be not pitiful of the poor in judgment; if not of the poor, then à latiori, not of the rich; there's the emphaſis. We ſee by the ſet and ſolemn appointment of our Courts of Juſtice, what proviſion the wiſdom of our anceſtors hath made for the preſervation, honour, and eſteem of Juſtice, witneſs our frequent Terms, Seſſions, and Aſſizes, and in what pomp and ſtate the Judges, in their Circuits, by the Sheriffs, Knights and Juſtices, and all the Country, are atttended oft-times for the hanging of a poor Thief for the ſtealing of a Hog or a Sheep, nay in ſome caſes for the ſtealing of a penny, and Juſtice too, in terrorem: and now ſhall not ſome of them be hanged that have robb'd us of all our propriety, and ſheered at once all our Sheep and all we have away, and would have made us indeed poor Belizario's to have begged for half-pennies, when they would not have left us one penny that we could have called our own?

Let us therefore now, Mr. Speaker, not be ſo pitiful as that we become remiſs; not ſo pitiful in judgment, as to have no judgment; but ſet the deplorable eſtate of Great-Britain now before our eyes, and conſider how our moſt gracious Sovereign hath been abuſed, and both his Majeſty and all his Subjects injured by theſe wicked inſtruments; for which my humble motion is, that with theſe particulars we become not ſo merciful, as to the generality (the whole Kingdom) to grow mercileſs.

Fiat Juſtitia.

Whereupon he was the ſame day voted a Traitor, upon the following particulars.

1. For refuſing to read the Remonſtrance againſt the Lord-Treaſurer Weſton, 4 Car. when the Parliament deſired it.

2. For ſolliciting, perſuading, and threatning the Judges to deliver their opinion, for the levying of Ship-money *.

3. For ſeveral illegal actions in Foreſt-matters.

4. For ill offices done, in making the King diſſolve the laſt Parliament, and cauſing his Declaration thereupon to be put forth.

Whereupon it was reſolved upon the queſtion,

That John Lord Finch Baron of Fordwich, Lord-Keeper of the Great Seal of England, ſhall be accus'd in this Houſe, in the name of all the Commons of England, of High-Treaſon and other great Miſdemeanors.

Reſolved,

That a meſſage be ſent by the Lord Falkland, to accuſe John Lord Finch, Baron of Fordwich, Lord-Keeper of the Great Seal of England, in the name of this Houſe, and all the Commons of England, of High-Treaſon, and other great Crimes and Miſdemeanors; and to deſire that he may be forthwith ſequeſtred from Parliament, and be committed; and that in ſome convenient time, this Houſe will reſort to their Lordſhips, with particular Accuſations and Articles againſt him.

The next morning the 22d, the Lord-Keeper, (conſidering with what impetuoſity and violence every thing was managed) got up early, and eſcaped in diſguiſe into Holland, from whence he wrote a Letter to the Lord-Chamberlain, dated from the Hague, January 3, 1640.

My moſt well-beloved Lord,

THE Intereſt your Lordſhip hath ever had in the beſt of my fortunes, and affections, gives me the privilege of troubling your Lordſhip with theſe few lines, from one that hath nothing left to ſerve you withal but his prayers; theſe your Lordſhip ſhall never fail of, with an heart as full of true affection to your Lordſhip as ever any was. My Lord, it was not the loſs of my place, and with that of my fortunes, nor being exiled from my dear Country and Friends, though many of them were cauſe of ſorrow, that afflicts me; but that which I moſt ſuffer under, is that diſpleaſure of the Houſe of Commons conceived againſt me. I know a true heart I have ever born towards them, and your Lordſhip can witneſs in part, what ways I have gone in: but ſilence and patience beſt becomes me, with which I muſt leave myſelf and my actions to the favourable conſtructions of my noble Friends, in which number your Lordſhip hath a prime place. I am now at the Hague, where I arrived on Thurſday the laſt of the laſt month, where I purpoſe to live in a faſhion agreeable to the poorneſs of my fortunes; for my humbling in this World, I have utterly caſt off the thoughts of it, and my aim ſhall be to learn to number my days, that I may apply my heart to wiſdom, that wiſdom that ſhall wipe away all tears from my eyes and heart, and lead me by the hand to true happineſs, which can never be taken from me. I pray God of Heaven to bleſs this Parliament both with a happy progreſs and concluſion; if my ruin may conduce but the leaſt to it, I ſhall not repine at it. I truly pray for your Lordſhip and your noble Family, that God would give an increaſe of all worldly bleſſings, and in the fulneſs of days to receive you to his Glory; if I were capable of ſerving any body, I would tell your Lordſhip, that no man ſhould be readier to make known his devotion and true gratitude to your Lordſhip, than

Your Lordſhip's moſt humble, and moſt affectionate, poor Kinſman and Servant,
J. Finch.

Jan. 14. The Committee having prepar'd Articles of Impeachment againſt the Lord-Keeper, they were preſented to the Houſe, and are as follow.

The Accuſation and Impeachment of † John Lord Finch, Baron of Fordwich, Lord-Keeper of the Great Seal of England, by the Houſe of Commons.

Imprimis. THAT the ſaid John Lord Finch, Baron of Fordwich, Lord-Keeper, &c. hath traitorouſly and wickedly endeavoured to ſubvert the fundamental Laws and eſtabliſhed Government of the Realm of England, and inſtead thereof to introduce an arbitary tyrannical Government againſt Law; which he hath declared by traitorous and wicked words, counſels, opinions, judgments, practices and actions.

II.

* Lord Clarendon in his Hiſtory, Vol. I. pag. 71. (8vo Edition) ſays, Undoubtledly my Lord Finch's Speech in the Exchequer-Chamber, made Ship-money much more abhorr'd, and formidable, than all the Commitments by the Council-Table, and all the Diſtreſſes taken by the Sheriffs in England. And pag. 74. ſays, he took up Ship-money, where Mr. Noy left it, and being a Judge, carried it up to that Pinnacle, from whence he almoſt broke his own Neck, having in his Journey thither, had too much influence on his Brethren, to induce them to concur in a Judgment they had all cauſe to repent. To which his Declaration, after he was Keeper of the Great Seal of England, muſt be added, upon Demurrer put into a Bill before him, which had no other equity in it, than an Order of the Lords of the Council; "That whilſt he was Keeper, no man ſhould be ſo ſaucy as to diſpute thoſe Or-" ders, but that the wiſdom of that Board ſhould be always ground enough for him to make a Decree in Chancery."

† Sir John Finch was a man exceedingly obnoxious to the People, upon the buſineſs of Ship-money; and not of Reputation and Authority enough to countenance and advance the King's Service. Lord Clarendon's Hiſtory, Vol. I. pag. 131. in 8vo.

II. That in purſuance of thoſe his traitorous and wicked purpoſes, he did in the third and fourth year of his Majeſty's reign, or one of them, being then Speaker of the Commons Houſe of Parliament, contrary to the commands of the Houſe then aſſembled and ſitting, deny and hinder the reading of ſome things which the ſaid Houſe of Commons required to be read, for the ſafety of the King and Kingdom, and preſervation of the Religion of this Realm; and did forbid all the Members of the Houſe to ſpeak, and ſaid, that if any did offer to ſpeak, he would riſe and go away, and ſaid nothing ſhould be done in the Houſe, and did offer to riſe and go away, and did thereby and otherwiſe, as much as in him lay, endeavour to ſubvert the ancient and undoubted rights and courſe of Parliament.

III. That he being of his Majeſty's Council at the Juſtice-ſeat held for the County of Eſſex, in the month of October, in the tenth year of his now Majeſty's reign, at Stratford-Langton in the ſame County, being then of his Majeſty's Council, in that ſervice did practiſe by unlawful means to enlarge the Foreſt of that County, many Miles beyond the known bounds thereof, as they had been enjoyed near 300 years, contrary to the Law, and to the Charter of the liberties of the Foreſt; and other Charters, and divers Acts of Parliament: and for effecting the ſame, did unlawfully cauſe and procure undue return to be made of Jurors, and great numbers of other perſons who were unſworn, to be joined to them of the Jury, and threatned and awed the ſaid Jurors to give a verdict for the King, and by unlawful means did ſurprize the County, that they might not make defence, and did uſe ſeveral menacing wicked ſpeeches and actions, to the Jury and others, for obtaining his unjuſt purpoſe aforeſaid. And after verdict obtained for the King in the month of April following (at which time the ſaid Juſtice-ſeat was called by adjournment) the ſaid John Finch, then Lord Chief-Juſtice of his Majeſty's Court of Common-Pleas, and one of the Judges aſſiſtants for them; he continned by further unlawful and unjuſt practices, to maintain and confirm the ſaid verdict, and did then and there, being aſſiſtant to the Juſtice in Eyre, adviſe the refuſal of the traverſe offered by the County, and all their evidences, but only what they ſhould verbally deliver; which was refuſed accordingly.

IV. That he about the month of November, 1635, being then Lord Chief-Juſtice of the Common Pleas, and having taken an Oath for due adminiſtration of Juſtice to his Majeſty's liege people, according to the Laws and Statutes of the Realm, contrived an opinion in hæc verba, (when the good and ſafety, &c. Vide State-Trials, Vol. I.) and did ſubſcribe his name to that opinion, and by perſuaſions, threats, and falſe ſuggeſtions, did ſolicite, and procure Sir John Bramſtone Knight, then and now Lord Chief-Juſtice of England; Sir Humphrey Davenport Knight, Lord Chief-Baron of his Majeſty's Court of Exchequer; Sir Richard Hutton Knight, late one of the Juſtices of his Majeſty's Court of Common-Pleas; Sir John Denham Knight, late one of the Barons of his Majeſty's Court of Exchequer; Sir William Jones Knight, late one of the Juſtices of the ſaid Court of King's-Bench; Sir George Croke Knight, then and now one of the Judges of the ſaid Court of King's-Bench; Sir Thomas Trevor Knight, then and now one of the Barons of the Exchequer; Sir George Vernon Knight, late one of the Juſtices of the ſaid Court of Common-Pleas; Sir Robert Berkley Knight, then and now one of the Juſtices of the ſaid Court of King's-Bench; Sir Francis Crawley Knight, then and now one of the Juſtices of the ſaid Court of Common-Pleas; Sir Richard Weſton Knight, then and now one of the Barons of the ſaid Court of Exchequer; ſome or one of them to ſubſcribe, with their names, the ſaid opinion preſently, and enjoined them ſeverally ſome or one of them ſecreſy, upon their Allegiance.

V. That he the fifth day of June, then being Lord Chief-Juſtice of the ſaid Court of Common-Pleas, ſubſcribed an extrajudicial opinion in anſwer to queſtions in a Letter from his Majeſty, in hæc verba, &c. Vol. I. page 487.

And that he contrived the ſaid queſtions, and procured the ſaid Letter from his Majeſty: and whereas the ſaid Juſtice Hutton, and Juſtice Croke, declared to him their opinions to the contrary; yet he required and preſſed them to ſubſcribe, upon his promiſe that he would let his Majeſty know the truth of their opinions; notwithſtanding ſuch ſubſcriptions, which nevertheleſs he did not make known to his Majeſty, but delivered the ſame to his Majeſty, as the opinion of all the Judges.

VI. That he being Lord Chief-Juſtice of the ſaid Court of Common-Pleas, delivered his opinion in the Exchequer-Chamber againſt Mr. Hampden in the caſe of Ship-money; that he the ſaid Mr. Hampden upon the matter and ſubſtance of the caſe was chargeable with the money then in queſtion; a Copy of which proceedings the Commons will deliver to your Lordſhips: and did ſolicite and threaten the ſaid Judges, ſome or one of them, to deliver their opinions in like manner againſt Mr. Hampden. And after the ſaid Baron Denham had delivered his opinion for Mr. Hampden; the ſaid Lord Finch repaired purpoſely to the ſaid Baron Denham's chamber in Serjeant's-Inn in Fleet-ſtreet; and after the ſaid Mr. Baron Denham had declared and expreſſed his opinion, urged him to retract the ſaid opinion; which he refuſing, was threatned by the ſaid Lord Finch, becauſe he refuſed.

VII. That he being then Lord Chief-Juſtice of the Court of Common-Pleas, declared and publiſhed in the Exchequer-Chamber, and Weſtern Circuit where he went Judge; that the King's right to Ship-money, as aforeſaid, was ſo inherent a right to the Crown, as an Act of Parliament could not take it away; and with divers malicious ſpeeches inveighed againſt, and threatned all ſuch as refuſed to pay Ship-money: all which opinions contained in the fourth, fifth, and ſixth Articles, are againſt the Law of the Realm, the Subjects right of property, and contrary to former reſolutions in Parliament, and to the Petition of Right: which ſaid reſolutions and Petition of Right, were well known to him, reſolved and enacted in Parliament, when he was Speaker of the Commons Houſe of Parliament.

VIII. Then he being Lord Chief-Juſtice of the Court of Common-Pleas, did take the general practice of that Court to his private chamber; and that he ſent warrants into all or many Shires of England to ſeveral men, as to Francis Giles of the County of Devon, Robert Benſon of the County of York, Attorneys of that Court, and to divers others, to releaſe all perſons arreſted on any outlawry for about forty ſhillings fees; whereas none by Law ſo arreſted, can be bailed or releaſed without ſuperſedeas under ſeal or reverſal.

IX.

IX. That he being Lord Chief-Juſtice of the Court of Common-Pleas, upon a pretended ſuit begun in Michaelmas-Term, in the 11th year of his Majeſty's reign, although there was no plaint or declaration againſt him, did notoriouſly and contrary to all Law and Juſtice, by threats, menaces, and impriſonment, compel Thomas Laurence, an Executor, to pay nineteen pound, twelve ſhillings; and likewiſe cauſed Richard Bernard, being only Overſeer of the laſt Will of that Teſtator, to be arreſted for the payment of the ſaid money, contrary to the advice of the reſt of the Judges of that Court, andagainſt the known and ordinary courſe of Juſtice, and his ſaid Oath and Knowledge: and denied his Majeſty's ſubjects, the common and ordinary Juſtice of this Realm, as to Mr. Limerick, and others; and for his private benefit endamaged and ruined the eſtates of very many of his Majeſty's ſubjects, contrary to his Oath and Knowledge.

X. That he being Lord-Keeper of the Great Seal of England, and ſworn one of his Majeſty's Privy-Council, did by falſe and malicious ſlanders labour to incenſe his Majeſty againſt Parliaments, and did frame and adviſe the publiſhing the declaration after the diſſolution of the laſt Parliament.

All which Treaſons and Miſdemeanors abovementioned, were done and committed by the ſaid John Lord Finch, Baron of Fordwich, Lord-Keeper of the Great Seal of England; and thereby he the aforeſaid Finch hath traitorouſly, and contrary to his Allegiance laboured to lay imputations and ſcandals upon his Majeſty's Government, and to alienate the hearts of his Majeſty's liege People from his Majeſty, and to ſet a diviſion between them, and to ruin and deſtroy his Majeſty's Realm of England; for which they do impeach him the ſaid Lord Finch, Baron of Fordwich, Lord-Keeper of the Great Seal of England, of High-Treaſon againſt our ſovereign Lord the King, his Crown and Dignity, of the Miſdemeanors above-mentioned. And the ſaid Commons by proteſtation, ſaving to themſelves the liberty of exhibiting at any time hereafter, any other accuſation or impeachment againſt the ſaid Lord Finch, and alſo of replying to the anſwer, that the ſaid John Lord Finch ſhall make unto the ſaid Articles or to any of them; and of offering proof of the premiſſes, or any of their impeachments or accuſations that ſhall be exhibited by them, as the caſe ſhall, according to the courſe of Parliaments, require; do pray, that the ſaid John Lord Finch, Baron of Fordwich, Lord-Keeper of the Great Seal of England, may be put to anſwer to all and every of the premiſſes, and ſuch Proceedings, Examinations, Trials, and Judgments, as may be upon every of them, had and uſed, as is agreeable to Law and Juſtice.

That theſe Articles thus read and engroſs'd ſhall be ſent to the Lords in maintenance of the Commons charge againſt John Lord Finch of Fordwich, late Lord-Keeper of the Great Seal of England.

Mr. Arthur Goodwin is appointed to go up with a meſſage to the Lords to a conference with their Lordſhips, by a Committee of both Houſes, concerning Articles to be deliver'd in maintenance of the Commons accuſation of John Lord Finch of Fordwich, late Lord-Keeper of the Great Seal of England; and concerning the liberty and property of the ſubject.

At the requeſt of the Lord Falkland, Mr. Hyde is appointed to be aſſiſtant unto him, for the reading of the Articles to be deliver'd againſt the late Lord-Keeper.

Mr. Goodwin brought anſwer, that according to the order of this Houſe, he had deliver'd the meſſage to their Lordſhips, and their Lordſhips will give a meeting to-morrow morning, at nine of the Clock, by a Committee of the whole Houſe as is deſired.

Accordingly the Articles againſt the Lord-Keeper were preſented to the Lords; and after reading the ſame, the Lord Falkland ſpoke as follows.

My Lords,

THESE Articles againſt my Lord Finch being read, I may be bold to apply that of the Poet, Nil refert tales verſus qua voce legantur; and I doubt not but your Lordſhips muſt be of the ſame opinion, of which the Houſe of Commons appears to have been, by the choice they have made of me, that the charge I have brought is ſuch, as needs no aſſiſtance from the bringer, leaving not ſo much as the colour of a colour for any defence, including all poſſible evidence, and all poſſible aggravation (that addition alone accepted) which he alone could make, and hath made; I mean, his confeſſion, included in his flight.

Here are many and mighty Crimes, Crimes of Supererogation, (ſo that High-Treaſon is but a part of his charge) purſuing him fervently in every ſeveral condition, (being a ſilent Speaker, an unjuſt Judge, and an unconſcionable Keeper.) That his life appears a perpetual warfare, (by mines, and by battery, by battle, and by ſtratagem,) againſt our fundamental Laws, which (by his own confeſſion) ſeveral Conqueſts had left untouch'd, againſt the excellent conſtitution of this Kingdom, which hath made it appear unto ſtrangers rather an Idea, than a real Commonwealth, and produced the honour and happineſs of this to be a wonder of every other Nation; and this with ſuch unfortunate ſucceſs, that as he always intended to make our ruins a ground of his advancement, ſo his advancement the means of our further ruin.

After that, contrary to the further end of his place, and the ending of that meeting in which he held his place, he had as it were gagg'd the Commonwealth, taking away (to his power) all power of ſpeech from that body, of which he ought to have been the mouth, and which alone can perfectly repreſent the condition of the people, whom they only repreſent: which if he had not done, in all probability, what ſo grave and judicious an Aſſembly might have offered to the conſideration of ſo gracious and juſt a Prince, had occaſioned the redreſs of the grievances they then ſuffered, and prevented thoſe which they have ſince endured, according to the ancient maxims, Odiſſe quos læſeris. He purſued this offence towards the Parliament, by inveighing againſt the Members, by ſcandalizing their proceedings, by trampling upon their Acts and Declarations, by uſurping and devolving the right, by diminiſhing and abrogating the power, both of that and other Parliaments, and making them (as much as in him lay) both uſeleſs and odious to his Majeſty; and purſued his hatred to this fountain of Juſtice by corrupting the ſtreams of it, the Laws; and perverting the conduit-pipes, the Judges.

He practiſed the annihilating of ancient and notorious perambulations of particular Foreſts, the better to prepare himſelf to annihilate the ancient, and notorious perambulation of the whole Kingdom, the metes and boundaries between the liberties of the ſubject and ſovereign power; he endeavoured to have all tenures durante beneplacito, to bring all Law from his Majeſty's Courts, into his Majeſty's breaſt; he gave our goods to the King, our lands to the Deer, our liberties to his Sheriffs; ſo that there was no way by which we had not been oppreſt, and deſtroyed, if the power of this perſon had been equal with his will, or that the will of his Majeſty had been equal to his power.

He not only by this means made us liable to all the effect of an Invaſion from without, (but by deſtruction of our liberties, which included the deſtruction of our propriety, which included the deſtruction of our induſtry) made us liable to the terribleſt of all Invaſions, that of want and poverty. So that if what he plotted had taken root, and he made it, as ſure as his declaration could make it, (what himſelf was not, Parliament proof) in this wealthy and happy Kingdom, there could have been left no abundance but of grievances, and diſcontentment, no ſatisfaction but amongſt the guilty. It is generally obſerved of the Plague, that the infection of others, is an earneſt, and conſtant deſire of all that are ſeized by it: and as this deſign reſembles that diſeaſe, in the ruin, deſtruction, and deſolation it would have wrought, ſo it ſeems no leſs like it in this effect: he having ſo laboured to make others ſhare in that guilt, that his ſolicitation, was not only his action, but his works, making uſe both of his authority, his intereſt, and importunity, to perſuade; and in his Majeſty's name (whoſe Piety is known to give that excellent prerogative to his Perſon, that the Law gives to his place, not to be able to do wrong) to threaten the reſt of the Judges, to ſign opinions contrary to Law, to aſſign anſwers contrary to their opinions, to give Judgment which they ought not to have given, and to recant Judgment when they had given it as they ought: ſo that whoſoever conſiders his care of, and concernment, both in the growth and in the immorality of this project, cannot but by the ſame way, by which the wiſeſt judgment found the true mother of the Child, diſcover him not only to have been the foſterer, but the father of this moſt pernicious and envious deſign.

I ſhall not need to obſerve, that this was plotted and purſued by an Engliſhman againſt England, (which increaſeth the Crime in no leſs degree than Parricide is beyond Murder) that this was done in the greateſt matter joined to the greateſt bond, being againſt the general liberty, and publick propriety, by a ſworn Judge (and if that ſalt itſelf, becauſe unſavory, the Goſpel hath deſign'd whither it muſt be caſt) that he poiſoned our very antidotes, and turned our guard into a deſtruction, making Law the ground of illegality; that he uſed this Law not only againſt us, but againſt itſelf, making it, as I may ſay, Felo de ſe, making the pretence (for I can ſcarce ſay the appearance of it) ſo to contribute to the utter ruin of itſelf.

I ſhall not need to ſay, that either this is (or can be) of the higheſt kind, and in the higheſt degree of Parliamentary Treaſon, a Treaſon which needs not a computation of many ſeveral actions, which alone were not Treaſon, to prove a Treaſon all together; and by that demonſtration of the intention, to make that formally Treaſon which were materially but a miſdemeanor: this is a Treaſon as well againſt the King, as againſt the Kingdom; for whatſoever is againſt the whole, is undoubtedly againſt the head, which takes from his Majeſty the ground of his rule, the Laws, (for if foundations be deſtroyed, the pinnacles are moſt endangered) which takes from his Majeſty the principal honour of his rule; the ruling over Freemen, a power as much nobler than that over Villeins, as that is than that over Beaſts, which endeavoured to take from his Majeſty the principal ſupport of his rule, their hearts and affections over whom he rules; (a better and ſurer ſtrength and wall to the King, than the ſea is to the Kingdom;) and by begetting a mutual diſtruſt, and by that a mutual diſaffection between them, to hazard the danger even of the deſtruction of both.

My Lords,

I ſhall the leſs need to preſs this, becauſe as it were unreaſonble in any caſe to ſuſpect your Juſtice, ſo here eſpecially, where your intereſt ſo nearly unites you; your great ſhare in poſſeſſions, giving you an equal concernment in propriety, the care and pains uſed by your noble Anceſtors in the founding and aſſerting of our common liberties rendring the juſt defence of them your moſt proper and peculiar inheritance, and both exciting to oppoſe and extirpate all ſuch deſigns as did introduce, and would have ſettled an arbitrary, that is, an intolerable form of Government, and have made even your Lordſhips and your poſterity but Right Honourable Slaves.

My Lords,

I will ſpend no more words, luctando cum larva, in accuſing the Ghoſt of a departed Perſon, whom his Crimes accuſe more than I can do, and his abſence accuſeth no leſs than his Crime. Neither will I excuſe the length of what I have ſaid, becauſe I cannot add to an excuſe, without adding to the fault, or my own imperfections, either in the matter or manner of it; which I know muſt appear the greater, by being compared with that learned Gentleman's great ability, who hath preceded me at this time: I will only deſire, by the command, and in the behalf of the Houſe of Commons, that theſe proceedings againſt the Lord Finch, may be put in ſo ſpeedy a way of diſpatch, as in ſuch caſes the courſe of Parliament will allow.

The ſame day, the Commons order'd thanks to be returned from the Houſe to Mr. St. John, Mr. Whitlock, the Lord Falkland, and Mr. Hyde, for the great ſervice they have perform'd to the honour of the Houſe, and good of the Commonwealth, in the tranferring the Articles againſt the late Lord-Keeper.

Jan. 30. It was ordered by the Lords, that ſuch Judges as the Houſe of Commons ſhall deſire, are to be examined in the caſe of the Lord Finch, by the ſame deputed Lords as were appointed in the Earl of Strafford's caſe: but the Judges are not to be examin'd upon any thing to accuſe themſelves.

Feb. 15. The Houſe of Lords thought fit, that a Proclamation do iſſue out to ſummon the Lord Finch, late Lord-Keeper, perſonally to appear before the Lords in Parliament; to anſwer an Accuſation Accuſation of High-Treaſon brought againſt him by the Commons.

But his Lordſhip never thought fit to ſurrender himſelf, and the Civil War ſoon after breaking out, there was no further proceedings againſt him, and he endured eight years Baniſhment, and Compoſitions amounting to about 7000*l.* But lived to ſee the horrid Murder of King Charles I. and the happy Reſtoration of King Charles II.

XXII. Two Judgments of the Lords aſſembled in Parliament, in 1647. againſt John Morris alias Poyntz, Mary his Wife, Iſabel Smith, Leonard Darby, and John Harris; for forging, framing, and publiſhing a Copy of a pretended Act of Parliament.

Die Martis 21 Septemb. 1647.

WHereas John Brown Eſq; Clerk of the Parliaments, did the 25th of June 1647, exhibit a charge before the Lords in Parliament, againſt John Morris alias Poyntz, Mary his wife, Iſabel Smith, Leonard Darby, and John Harris; for forging, framing, and publiſhing a Copy of a pretended Act of Parliament, alledged to have been made in the 43 of Elizabeth, and intitled, An Act to enable and make good a conveyance and aſſurance made of the Manors of Chipping-Onger, Northokenden, Southokenden, and other Lands in the County of Eſſex, and Beaves-Marks alias Buries-Marks in London, by James Morris Eſq; and Gabriel Poyntz Eſq; to John Morris alias Poyntz, and his Heirs; and to eſtabliſh the ſaid Manors upon the ſaid John Morris alias Poyntz, and his Heirs, according to the ſaid conveyance: Whereas in truth there neither is, nor ever was any ſuch Act of Parliament. And for forging and counterfeiting his hand-writing, and ſubſcribing to the ſaid Copy, John Brown Cleric. Parliamentorum. And the better to colour their leud practices, have charged the ſaid John Brown with the loſs of the ſaid Record, and denying of his own hand. And whereas Sir Adam Littleton Bart. who had good title to part of the ſaid Manors and Lands, as in right of Dame Audery his wife, whoſe Inheritance thereunto was ſought to be impeached by the ſaid Copy of the ſaid pretended Act of Parliament, complained likewiſe againſt the ſaid perſons before their Lordſhips, for the ſaid forgery and publication; in that the ſaid John Morris, Leonard Darby, John Harris, and Iſabel Smith, did produce the ſaid Copy at Chelmsford, at Lent-Aſſizes, 1646, for the County of Eſſex; at a Trial in an Ejectione firmæ, brought by Thomas Smith, huſband of the ſaid Iſabel, and leſſee of the ſaid John Morris againſt Joſias Clarke, Tenant to the ſaid Sir Adam Littleton, of part of the ſaid Lands contained in the ſaid pretended Act; and did plead and affirm the ſame to be a true Copy of an Act of Parliament: and the ſaid Darby and Harris did falſly and perjuriouſly ſwear in open Court at the ſaid Trial, that they had examined the ſaid Copy, by them produced, with the Record of the ſaid pretended Act, in the Office of the Clerk of the Parliament; and did there alſo falſly and perjuriouſly ſwear, that they did ſhew that writing to the Clerk of the Parliament, and that he did acknowledge the ſaid writing to be his own hand; whereas in truth the ſaid ſubſcription to the ſaid pretended Act of Parliament is counterfeit, and none of the ſaid Clerk of the Parliament's hand. And the ſaid Sir Adam further complained of an exemplification under the Great Seal of England, for countenancing the ſaid forged Copy of the ſaid pretended Act, by ſome undue means by the ſaid parties thereunto affixed, of the parties ſhewing, whereof proof was made before their Lordſhips.

All which being Crimes of a very high and tranſcendent nature, and do concern the publick Juſtice of the Kingdom, and of this honourable Houſe, the ſupremeſt Judicatory of this Kingdom; that Acts of Parliament, the higheſt Records in this Kingdom, ſhould be framed, invented, forged, and given in evidence, and publiſhed as true Acts of Parliament; and the hand of the Clerk of the Parliament, a ſworn Officer, forged, counterfeited, and ſubſcribed to the ſame; as that if ſuch a bold and audacious act ſhould not be ſeverely puniſhed, no man can be ſafe in his life, perſon, or eſtate: the ſaid John Brown, and Sir Adam Littleton, deſired that the perſons aforeſaid might forthwith anſwer the ſaid charges; and that their Lordſhips would inflict ſuch exemplary puniſhment upon the offenders, as may deter the like attempts and leud practices in others, and give ſuch fitting reparations as their Lordſhips in their wiſdom ſhould think meet.

Whereupon the perſons aforeſaid put in their anſwers to the premiſes, and pleaded not guilty; and after the caſe had been divers days fully heard by Counſel on both ſides, and witneſſes produced at this Bar, and the whole matter after throughly weighed, debated, and fully conſidered of by the

Houſe;

Houſe; the Lords in Parliament aſſembled, being fully ſatisfied of the guilt of the ſaid perſons, for the aforeſaid high Crimes charged againſt them, do award and adjudge:

1. That the ſaid John Morris, alias Poyntz, ſhall pay as a fine to our ſovereign Lord the King, the ſum of 1000 l. Iſabel Smith 200 l. Leonard Darby 400 l. and John Harris 400 l.

2. That the ſaid parties ſhall pay to John Brown Eſq; Clerk of the Parliament, for his damages, 500 l.

3. That all the ſaid parties ſhall before their inlargement out of priſon, be bound to their good behaviour during their lives, before ſome one of his Majeſty's Juſtices of his Bench at Weſtminſter, with good ſureties.

4. That the ſaid Copy of the pretended Act of Parliament, falſly affirmed upon Oath, to have been ſubſcribed with the name of the ſaid Clerk of the Parliament, intitled, An Act to enable and make good a conveyance and aſſurance, made of the Manors of Chipping-Onger, Northokenden, Southokenden, and other Lands in the County of Eſſex; and Beaves-Marks alias Buries-Marks in London; by James Morris Eſq; Gabriel Poyntz Eſq; to John Morris alias Poyntz, and his Heirs, and to eſtabliſh the ſaid Manors upon the ſaid John Morris, alias Poyntz, and his Heirs, according to the ſaid conveyance; is hereby declared to be forged and counterfeit; and is by their Lordſhips adjudged and decreed to be for ever damned and cancelled, and never to be pleaded in any Court or Cauſe whatſoever; nor to be admitted to be given in evidence; there being no Record of ſuch pretended Act of Parliament to warrant the ſame.

5. That all the ſaid ſeveral perſons hereby adjudged guilty of the ſaid crimes, ſhall ever hereafter be made uncapable to be witneſſes in any cauſe whatſoever.

6. That John Brown Eſq; Clerk of the Parliament, is in the judgment of this Houſe free, and clear of and from all and every the aſperſions, falſities, and charges of the ſaid John Morris alias Poyntz, Iſabel Smith, Leonard Darby, and John Harris, charged, uttered, divulged, and given out by them againſt him, concerning the matters herein mentioned. And that this judgment ſhall be openly read and publiſhed in the face of the County of Eſſex, at the next Aſſizes to be held for that County.

7. That the ſaid parties ſhall bring, or cauſe to be brought into this Houſe by the firſt day of October next, one exemplification under the Great Seal of England, concerning the Manor of Little Munden, in the County of Hertford; and the aforeſaid exemplification of the ſaid counterfeit Act of Parliament, to which the Great Seal of England, is charged to have been unduly and fraudulently affixed, that ſo the foreſaid forged exemplification may be cancelled and vacated.

8. That they ſhall be impriſoned during the pleaſure of this Houſe.

Joh. Brown, Cler. Parliamentorum.

Die Martis, 2do Die Novemb. 1647.

WHereas the Lords in Parliament aſſembled, upon the 21ſt of September laſt, gave judgment concerning a Copy of a pretended Act of Parliament, intitled, An Act to enable and make good a conveyance and aſſurance, made of the Manors of Chipping-Onger, Northokenden, Southokenden, and other Lands in the County of Eſſex; and Beaves-Marks alias Buries-Marks in London, by James Morris Eſq; Gabriel Poyntz Eſq; to John Morris alias Poyntz, and his Heirs, and to eſtabliſh the ſaid Manors upon the ſaid John Morris alias Poyntz, and his Heirs, according to the ſaid conveyance; and declared the ſame to be forged and counterfeit, and there to be for ever damned and cancelled, as by the ſaid judgment more at large appeareth.

And whereas Dame Audery Littleton, late wife of Sir Adam Littleton deceaſed, Sir Folke Grevil, Knt. and Maurice Barrow Eſq; by their Petition exhibited before the Lords in Parliament complained, that notwithſtanding the ſaid judgment, one Iſabel Smith (a perſon ſentenced by their Lordſhips, and commited to Newgate for the ſaid forgery) having procured the ſaid forged Act of Parliament, and other forged writings, viz. three fines of the Lands contained in the ſaid forged Act, and a forged Pleading, ſetting forth the uſes of the ſaid forged fines, to be written in Parchment; and having by ſome ſlight made them to ſeem as if they had been written long ſince, did foiſt and ſhuffle in the ſame amongſt other evidences, and writings remaining in the Treaſury of the late Court of Wards; and pretending the ſame to be found there, obtained Copies thereof under the hand of Mr. Awdely Clerk of the ſaid Court, hoping thereby to gain ſome credit, and authority to the ſaid forgeries, and further to impeach the titles of the Petitioners.

To which Petition the ſaid Iſabel Smith put in her anſwer, and a day was appointed for hearing the ſame. At which day the ſaid Iſabel Smith, being preſent at the Bar, and not making good any of the particulars in her ſaid anſwer, nor giving any ſatisfaction to ſuch queſtions as were by their Lordſhips demanded of her concerning the ſame: And the ſaid ſeveral writings after full examination by hearing of Counſel, and Witneſſes produced; and alſo upon view of the ſaid writings (being by their Lordſhips order brought into the Houſe) manifeſtly appearing to their Lordſhips to be groſs forgeries: the Lords in Parliament aſſembled do declare, and adjudge;

I have ſearched the Records of the Common-Pleas, de Termino Sancti Trinitat. Anno triceſimo octavo Reg. Eliz. Rollo viceſimo primo, and do find that there is no inrollment of any ſuch Record there, as is above-mentioned.

I have ſearched in the Treaſurer's Remembrancers Office in the Exchequer, amongſt the Records of Trinity-Term, Anno xxxviii. Reginæ Elizabeth. Roll. xxi. but do not find that there is any ſuch Record or Inrollment, as is above-mentioned.

MEmorandum, that I Francis Blake, Keeper of the Books for the ſearchers of fines, and of the Records thereof in the Chirographer's Office, have made diligent ſearch in the ſaid Books, and amongſt the ſaid Records of Michaelmas-Term, 35 and 36 Eliz. and all the Terms after, till Hilary, 38 Eliz. and I can find no fine at all from Gabriel Poyntz and William Cutts, or either of them, to any perſon whatſoever, of any Lands in the Counties of Eſſex or London. And moreover, I find by the ſaid Records, that Michaelmas-Term, 36 and 37 Eliz. was held at the City of Weſtminſter, and not at the Town of St. Albans. All which I do hereby (at the requeſt of Sir Adam Poyntz, alias Littleton, Bart.) certify to all whom it may concern.

Here ends the Proceedings of the Lords againſt them.

Soon after a ſhort Breviate of Mr. John Morris's caſe, was drawn up and delivered to his Excellency Sir Thomas Fairfax, by divers of the Parliament's Agents.

May it pleaſe your Excellency,

BEing deeply oppreſſed in our ſpirits, and overburdened in ourſelves, at the manifold and doleful outcries and complaints of the people, in all parts of our quarters where we come, uttered againſt the daily preſſures and inroads, that are made by prerogative and arbitrary violence upon their common rights; and in particular, the cry and miſerable moan of certain oppreſſed Commoners, to wit, of John Poyntz, alias Morris Eſq; Iſabel Smith, John Harris, and Leonard Darby, coming unto our ears, that we could not, but (as in duty we are bound) deeply repreſent their miſerable condition, as fellow-feelers of their oppreſſions, and perſons liable (when we come into their ſingle capacity of Commons) to the ſaid miſchief; and therefore conceiving it our duty to contribute our utmoſt endeavours for the remedy of the ſame, we could not but unburthen in ſome meaſure our ſpirits unto your Excellency in their behalfs, who in ſuch a horrid and barbarous manner, have been abuſed and ſupplanted of their common rights, by acts of violence and force, committed by John Brown, Clerk unto the Houſe of Lords, and his accomplices, under the colour of ſeveral orders ſurreptitiouſly by miſinformations gained from the ſaid Houſe, to the high uſurpation and abuſe of the name and authority of Parliament, in permitting the image thereof upon his own prerogative, outrage and violence, to the total ruin and ſupplantation of the juſt freedoms, and birthright, inheritance of the ſaid perſons, as the ſeveral papers thereunto ſubjoined, for the full information of your Exellency lency do demonſtrate. And for more certain confirmation of our premiſes, repreſented by the ſame, be pleaſed to conſider, that whereas the aboveſaid perſons are accuſed, condemned, and ſentenced by the Lords (ſurprized by Brown's miſrepreſentations and deluſions) to pay 2500*l.* fine, and ſuffer impriſonment, contrary to the regular courſe of the Laws, during the pleaſure of the ſaid Houſe, for forging and framing a copy of an Act of Parliament, touching the eſtate of the ſaid John Poyntz alias Morris, pretended to be taken out of the Office of the ſaid John Brown, with his hand thereunto; no ſuch original Record as Brown pretendeth is to be found in his Office: that ſince the ſaid accuſation, another original Record of the ſaid Act of Parliament, with other writings and evidences for the ſaid eſtate, is found in the Court of Wards, and they have gained copies thereof, examined and ſubſcribed by the Maſter of the ſaid Court and his Clerks, the which with their hands thereunto are herewith preſented; and concerning the truth thereof, three of us can alſo give it upon Oath, that the wife of one Godfrey Cade, now priſoner in the Fleet, did declare unto us, that the ſaid John Brown went to the Fleet unto her husband, and gave him twenty-five ſhillings in hand, and promiſed him five pounds more, and his inlargement, to ſwear at the Lords Bar, that he forged the copy of the ſaid Act of Parliament, and counterfeited the Clerk's hand unto it; and the ſaid Cade did alſo confeſs the ſame.

Wherefore we humbly implore that your Excellency would be pleaſed to grant the ſaid diſtreſſed perſons your letter of requeſt unto the Parliament, according to their Petition, herewith directed to your Excellency, that the ſaid perſons and their adverſaries, may be left to the free courſe and trial at Common Law; and that in the mean time till the controverſy concerning the eſtate be decided at Law, the ſaid perſons may enjoy their enlargement upon bail, without any further trouble or durance, and the execution of their ſevere ſentence be ſuſpended, and the ſaid Poyntz alias Morris, enjoy peaceable poſſeſſion of the ſaid eſtate, like as all his anceſtors from the days of Queen Elizabeth have done before him. Which requeſt is ſo reaſonable and juſt, and their condition ſo miſerable, deſperate, and dangerous, and of ſuch concernment to the whole Commonwealth, that no man, if ſuch exorbitances be not ſtopp'd and curb'd, can have any ſecurity in his eſtate or liberty, that we cannot but promiſe to ourſelves your Excellency's commiſeration of their condition, and readily aſſent unto their juſt ſuit. Thus we humbly take our leave, beſeeching your favourable conſtruction upon our boldneſs, and remain

Your Excellency's moſt humble
Servants and Soldiers,

XXIII. The Trial of Col. John Morris, Governor of Pontefract Caſtle; at the Aſſizes at the Caſtle of York, before Mr. John Puleſton, and Mr. Baron Thorpe, Juſtices of Aſſize, the 16th of Auguſt, Anno Dom. 1649. for High-Treaſon.

COlonel Morris being demanded to hold up his hand, refuſed, and the Indictment was read againſt him for Treaſon, for levying War againſt the late King and the Parliament, upon Stat. 25 Ed. III. The Court deſired him to plead Guilty, or Not Guilty.

Col. Morris. My Lords, under correction I conceive this Court hath not power to try me in this caſe; I being a martial man, I ought to be tried by a Council of War.

Court. Sir, what do you ſay, Are you guilty or not guilty? This is the ſecond time you have been asked: Sir, if you will not anſwer the third time, we ſhall know what to do. Are you guilty or not guilty?

Col.

Col. Morris. My Lords, I ſtill conceive I ought not be tried here; if I have done any thing worthy of death, I appeal to a martial Court, to my Lord Fairfax, Major-General, or a general Council of War: you have not any precedent for it, either for you to try me in this way, or me to ſuffer by it.

Court. Are you guilty or not guilty? This is the third time.

Col. Morris. My Lords, if your Honours will force me to plead, I conceive I am not guilty.

Court. How will you be tryed?

Col. Morris. My Lords, I was never at any Bar before, I am ignorant herein.

Court. Tell him what to ſay. [Upon that, ſome near him, told him, by God and his Country.]

Col. Morris. By God and my Country. (After that, challenge is made for Col. Morris to except againſt any of the Jury.) [Mr. Brooke, a great man for the cauſe, comes firſt returned, to be ſworn as Foreman of the Jury.]

Col. Morris. My Lords, I except againſt this Brooke.

Court. Sir, he is ſworn, and you ſpeak too late.

Col. Morris. My Lord, I appeal to himſelf, whether he be ſworn or no.

Mr. Brooke. Sir, I am not to anſwer you, but the Court. My Lord, I did not kiſs the Book.

Court. Sir, that is no matter, it's but a ceremony.

Col. Morris. My Lords, I beſeech your Honours that I may except againſt him; I know him, as well as I know my right hand, to be my enemy.

Clerk of Aſſize. Sir, he is recorded ſworn, there is no diſputing againſt the Record.

Col Morris. My Lords, I muſt ſubmit to your Honours. (After that Col. Morris challenged 16 men, and my Lord Puleſton, thinking Col. Morris tedious in excepting againſt ſo many, anſwer'd, Sir, keep within your compaſs, or I will give you ſuch a blow as will ſtrike off your head.)

Col. Morris. My Lords, I deſire nothing but Juſtice; for by the Statute of 14 Hen. VII. fol. 19. I may lawfully challenge thirty-five men, without ſhewing any cauſe to the contrary.

Court. It is granted. After a full Jury, the Indictment read, and Evidence for the State very full, that Col. Morris was Governor of Pontefract; which, Morris being very modeſt and civil, did not contradict any thing, until his time of anſwer.

Col. Morris. My Lords, I humbly deſire a Copy of my Indictment, that I may know what to anſwer, I conceive I may plead ſpecial as well as general.

Court. Sir, you cannot by Law.

Col. Morris. My Lords, I conceive there is a point of Law in it, and I humbly deſire to have Counſel; for I conceive by the Law, being attainted for High-Treaſon, I ought to have Counſel by the Statute 1 Hen. VII. fol. 23.

Court. Sir, I tell you, you cannot have it.

Col. Morris. Then, my Lords, I conceive I am not any way guilty of the Indictment for Treaſon: my Lords, it is ſaid to be againſt the King, his Crown, and againſt his Peace; whereas, my Lords, I can make it appear, I have acted only for the King, and nothing againſt him, which may appear here by my Commiſſion. The Court looks upon it, and anſwers, Court. Sir, you are deceived, this is falſe, it is from the Prince.

Col. Morris. My Lords, it is very well known, my Lord Fairfax hath his Commiſſion derived from the Parliament, and upon that he grants Commiſſion to his Officers, which is all one and the ſame. The Prince hath his from his Father, and I have mine from the Prince, which is full power, he being Captain-General of his Majeſty's Forces.

Court. Sir, have you nothing elſe to ſay?

Col. Morris. My Lords, under correction, I conceive it is ſufficient; for by the ſame power, all Judges, Juſtices of Peace, your Lordſhips, your Predeceſſors, and all other Officers, did act by the ſame power, and all proceſs and writs of Law were acted, and executed in his name, and by his authority.

Court. His power was not in him, but the Kingdom, for he was in truſt for the Kingdom; the King's Highway, and the King's Coin being ſo called, is not his own, but his Subjects; and his natural power, and legal power, are different.

Col. Morris. My Lords, under correction, I conceive his legal and perſonal power, are undiviſible, all one, and cannot be ſeparated.

Court. Sir, all is one if the King bid me kill a man, is this a ſufficient warrant for me to plead? No Sir, it is unlawful. Sir, have you no more?

Col. Morris. I beſeech your Honours give me leave, I am upon my life.

Court. Speak what you will, Sir, you ſhall be heard.

Col. Morris. Your ſervant, my Lord; then, my Lords, I conceive I have acted nothing againſt the Parliament, for that which I acted, it was for the King: and ſince the aboliſhing of regal power, I have not meddled with any thing againſt the Parliament, for that Act was but enacted the 14th of July laſt, and before that Time and Act of aboliſhing Kingly-Government, that princely Palace which I kept by his Commiſſion was demoliſhed. My Lords, I beſeech your Honours, that my Commiſſion may be read, to give ſatisfaction to the Court.

Lord Puleſton. Sir, it will do you no good, you may as well ſhew a Commiſſion from the Pope, all is one.

Col. Morris. My Lords, I deſire your Lordſhips to do me that Juſtice.

Lord Thorpe. For my part, I am willing, if my Brother be not againſt it.

Lord Puleſton. Sir, we hold it for Law to be void, it is to no purpoſe.

Col. Morris. Then if your Lordſhips be not pleaſed to do me that Juſtice that it may be read, I deſire it may be reſtored me again. [Upon that, Col. Morris received his Commiſſion unread.] My Lords, it ſeemeth ſtrange, that your Honours ſhould do that which was never done the like before, never any of your Predeceſſors ever did the like; I wiſh it may not be to your own and your friends wrong, that you make yourſelves precedents of your acting, and myſelf of ſuffering. But, my Lords, I do not ſpeak for ſaving my own life, for (I thank my God) I am prepared, and very willing to part with this lump of clay: I have had a large time of repentance, it being twenty-two weeks ſince my impriſonment; and I am ſorry for thoſe which are like to undergo the ſame ſufferings, if your Lordſhips take away my life. And though I do not ſpeak any way in glory, indeed at this preſent there is a cloud hanging over our heads, I deſire there may be a fair Sunſhine to diſpel it. And though there were a world of plots in the Kingdom when I took the Caſtle, there is not wanting the ſame now, only the time is not yet come; and as I was to be the fire-brand to Scarborough, ſo he (meaning Bointon) to Tinmouth, and that to others; and though you take away my life, there will be others which will take up the Lintſtock to give fire, though I be gone.

Court. Sir, you have little hopes to talk of any fire to be given here, having received ſuch a total rout in Ireland.

Col. Morris. My Lords, I ſhould have been unwilling to have contradicted your late news concerning Ireland; but ſince you have given me a hint of it, you muſt give me leave to let your Honours know, that I received Letters from the Marquis of Ormond dated the 3d of Auguſt, and yours is but the 2d; wherein he pleaſes to let me underſtand of the great care he hath of me, and that whatſoever ſhall befall me here, the like ſhall be to thoſe which he hath priſoners there, which (as he ſaith) are good ſtore. Therefore if your Lordſhips did not at all value my perſon, yet methinks you ſhould have ſome care of it, for your own friends good.

Court. Sir, have you no more to ſay?

Col. Morris. My Lords, ſtill I appeal to my Commiſſion, which I conceive is ſufficient to defend me withal, in what I have done, nothwithſtanding your power to the contrary.

Court. It is nothing at all, we have power to try you here.

Col. Morris. Then, my Lords, (under correction) Laymen may as well be tried at a Martial Court: which if granted, thoſe excellent Acts of Magna Charta, and the Petition of Right, would be deſtroyed.

Court. But you are not looked on here as a Soldier, we ſhall do what in Juſtice belongs to us.

Col. Morris. My Lords, ſtill (under correction) I have taken the Oath of Allegiance, and I conceive in that I was bound to do as much as I did or have done, though I had not had any Commiſſion at all. And I beſeech your Lordſhips that you will do me Juſtice, and not incline to the right-hand of affection, or the left of hatred, but to have an ear for the accuſed as well as for the accuſer: neither have I acted any thing contrary to my Allegiance, which Allegiance I was willing to pay to the Son, as well as to the Father. Now for the Allegiance, I owe to any perſon or authority but to theſe, I know none.

Lord Thorpe. Sir, if you have any thing elſe to ſay, ſpeak for yourſelf, for this is not much to the purpoſe.

Col. Morris. My Lord, 'tis true, ſince you have rejected that authority which I acted by, I might as well have held my tongue at the firſt, and ſpake nothing, were it not for the ſatisfaction of the hearers; but if it muſt be ſo, that you will make me a precedent, you muſt do with me as you did with my dear and honoured Lord, [meaning my Lord of Strafford] making an Act for the future, that this my ſuffering ſhall not be a precedent to any Soldiers hereafter. Beſides, my Lord, this ſame Statute which you alledge againſt me, is, if that any ſhall act againſt the King, 'tis Treaſon; which I have not done; but contrary, for him, and by his authority. And there is an Act of 11 H. VII. cap. 1. That whoſoever they are that ſhall aid or aſſiſt the King at home or abroad, ſhall not be queſtioned at all.

Lord Thorpe. 'Tis true, Sir, but Hen. VII. then ſtood in a fickle condition, and being an Uſurper, made that Act for his own ſafety; ſometimes the Duke of York ruling, ſometimes the Duke of Lancaſter, and others contending, therefore it was enacted.

Col. Morris. My Lord, but this ſame Act of H. VII. was later than that of Ed. III. which you have laid againſt me; and as yet was never repealed, until this laſt Act of 14 of July, before which time I had delivered up the place.

Lord Thorpe. Well, Sir, it ſeems you have not any more to ſay. After he had anſwered, the Court commanded Irons to be laid on them. (Cornet Blackſton being condemned at the ſame time.)

Col. Morris. My Lord, I humbly deſire that we may not be manacled; if you make any doubt of us, that we may have a greater guard upon us.

Lord Puleſton. Sir, you that have made ſuch attempts through ſuch guards, as were of purpoſe ſet to receive you, ought to be look'd to now. Yet if Mr. Sheriff pleaſe, I am content.

Col. Morris. Mr. Sheriff, I deſire that this manacling may be forborn: if you pleaſe to clap a guard of an hundred men upon us, I ſhall pay for it. This is not only a diſgrace to me, but in general to all Soldiers; which doth more trouble me than the loſs of my life. Mr. Sheriff, what do you ſay?

Mr. Sheriff. Sir, Irons are the ſafeſt guards.

Col. Morris. My Lords, hitherto (I thank God) I have not done any unſoldiery or baſe act, and to begin now, I will not do it to ſave my life; and though you look upon me Samſon-wiſe, I vow to God, I would not touch the pillars, though it lay in my power, to injure you; therefore I ſtill beg pardon, that I may not be manacled.

Under-Sheriff. Come, Sir, it cannot be help'd, we are commanded.

Col. Morris. My Lords, I beſeech you grant me this favour; it is not my life I beg, but to forbear this manacling, which ſhame and diſhonour doth more trouble me, than the loſs of my life.

Under-Sheriff. It muſt be done. And upon that, did it, and carried him away. After dinner the Jury brought in their verdict, guilty of Treaſon *.

Col.

* Letters from York, "" That one Morris, and one Blackſton, were arraign'd before Baron Thorpe, and Judge Puleſton, for " levying War againſt the Kingdom; they pleaded not guilty, but deſired, as they were martial men, that they might be tried by mar- " tial Law: which was denied them.

" Morris at laſt ſaid, He would be tried by God and the Country, and ſeventeen Witneſſes proved foul Crimes againſt him." He had two ſheets of paper written with matters of Law, and Statutes, many of which he pleaded, " and urged the caſe of the War " betwixt the two Houſes of York and Lancaſter, the difference of which from his caſe was ſhewed by the Judges."

Then he produced a Commiſſion from the King when he was Prince; the Judges told him, that the Prince was a Subject as well as he, and muſt be tried by the ſame Law.

Col. Morris. My Lord, I am here found guilty of Treason by that villain Brooke, whom I know to be mine enemy, and the first man that I did except against: in which I conceive I have received hard measure, for none could have found me guilty of Treason, had they gone according to the Letter of the Law, which they did not.

Lord Pulestон. Sir, you speak too late, you are not to dispute it now.

Col. Morris. Neither would I, my Lord, if this were a Court of Chancery, but being a Court of Law, bound up in expres words and letter, I conceive I ought to dispute it, and my business better weighed.

Lord Pulestон. Well Sir, you are found guilty, therefore hold your peace.

Col. Morris. If I must suffer, I receive it with all alacrity and chearfulness, and I thank God I shall die for a good Cause, and the testimony of a good Conscience; for which, had I as many Lives as there are Stars in the Firmament, I would sacrifice them all for the same.

Court. Sheriff, Goaler take them away.

Col. Morris. Well, I beseech God bless King Charles, and fight for all those that fight for him, or have fought for him.

After he was condemn'd, Colonel Bethel writ to the General and his Council of War, that Morris might be reprieved; but Colonel Pride oppos'd it, urging, That it would not stand with the Justice of the Army, nor the Safety of the Commonwealth, to let such Enemies live, the Parliament having adjudg'd him worthy of Death, and given instructions to the Judges accordingly.

The Speech of Col. John Morris, Governor of Pontefract-Castle, at the place of Execution at York, August 23, 1649.

'WHEN he was brought out of prison, 'looking upon the sledge that was there 'set for him, lifting up his eyes to Heaven, knock-'ing upon his breast, he said, I am as willing to 'go to my death, as to put off my doublet to go to 'bed; I despise the shame as well as the Cross; I 'know I am going to a joyful place:' with many like expressions.

When the Post met him about St. James's Church, that was sent to the Parliament to mediate for a reprieve; and told him he could not prevail in it, he said, 'Sir, I pray God reward you 'for your pains, I hope, and am well assured to find 'a better pardon than any they can give; my hope 'is not in man, but in the living God.'

At the place of Execution he made this profession of his faith, his breeding, and the cause he had fought in.

'Gentlemen, First I was bred up in the true Pro-'testant Religion, having my education and breed-'ing from that honourable House, my dear Lord 'and Master Strafford's, which place I dare boldly 'say, was as well-governed and ruled as ever any 'yet was before it; I much doubt, better than any 'will be after it, unless it please God to put a pe-'riod to these distracted times: this Faith and Re-'ligion, I say, I have been bred in, and I thank 'God, I have hitherto lived in, without the least 'wavering, and now I am resolved by God's assi-'stance to die in.

'These pains are nothing, if compared to those 'dolors and pains, which Jesus Christ our Saviour 'hath suffered for us; when in a bloody-sweat he 'endured the wrath of God, the pain of Hell, and 'the cursed and shameful death which was due to 'our sins; therefore I praise the Lord that I am not 'plagued with far more grievous punishment, that 'the like hath befallen others, who undoubtedly are 'most glorious and blessed Saints with Christ in Hea-'ven. It is the Lord's affliction, and who will not 'take any affliction in good part when it comes 'from the hand of God? And what, Shall we re-'ceive good from the hands of God, and not re-'ceive evil? And though I desire, as I am carnal, 'that this Cup may depart from me, yet not my 'will, but thy will be done. Death brings unto 'the godly an end of sinning, and of all miseries 'due unto sin: so that after death there shall be no 'more sorrow, nor cry, nor pain, for God shall 'wipe away all tears from our eyes; by death our 'souls shall be delivered from thraldom; and this 'corruptible body shall put on incorruption, and this 'mortal immortality.

'Therefore blessed are they that are delivered 'out of so vile a world, and freed from such a 'body of bondage and corruption; the soul shall 'enjoy immediate communion with God in ever-'lasting bliss and glory; it takes us from the mi-'series of this world, and the society of sinners, 'to the city of the living God, the celestial Je-'rusalem.

'I bless God I am thought worthy to suffer for 'his name, and for so good a cause, and if I had a 'thousand lives, I would willingly lay them down 'for the cause of my King, the Lord's anointed; 'the Scripture commands us to fear God and ho-'nour the King, to be subject to every Ordinance 'of man for the Lord's sake; whether to the King 'as supreme, or to those that are in authority un-'der him. I have been always faithful to my trust: 'and, though I have been most basely accused for 'betraying Liverpool; yet I take God to witness, 'it is a most false aspersion, for I was then sick in 'my bed, and knew not of the delivering of it, till 'the Officers and Soldiers had done it without my 'consent, and then I was carried prisoner to Sir 'John Meldrum. Afterwards I came down into 'the Country, and seeing I could not live quietly 'at home, I was persuaded by Col. Forbes, Col. 'Overton, Lieut. Col. Fairfax, whom I took for 'my good friends, to march in their Troops: 'which I did, but with intention still to do my 'King the best service when occasion was, and so 'I did; and I pray God to turn the hearts of all 'the Soldiers to their lawful Sovereign, that this 'Land may enjoy peace, which till then it will 'never do: and though thou kill me, yet will I 'put my trust in thee; wherefore I trust in God he 'will not fail me nor forsake me.' Then he took his Bible, and read divers Psalms fit for his own occasion and consolation, and then put up divers prayers, some publickly, and some privately; which being ended, he was executed.

XXIV. The Proceedings, Examination, and Trial of Col. EUSEBIUS ANDREWE, (a Barriſter of Gray's-Inn,) before the High-Court of Juſtice, Aug 16. 1650. for High-Treaſon.

Publiſhed by Francis Buckley, Gent. who was Aſſiſtant to Mr. Andrews in time of his Impriſonment, and an Eye-witneſs of all the bloody and execrable Proceedings.

ON Monday the 24th of March 1649. Col. Andrewe was taken priſoner at Graveſend by Major Parker.

The next day, he was convented before the Lord-Preſident Bradſhaw, Sir Henry Mildmay Knt. and Thomas Scot Eſq; three of the Members of State, delegated by the Council for the taking of the examination of him, and of Sir Henry Chichley Knt. Dr. Henry Edwards, and Mr. Clark, caſually found in the ſame Inn with Mr. Andrewe.

Thoſe Gentlemen examined him ſo punctually to every action and circumſtance that had paſſed on his part ſince he took up arms, and eſpecially ſince the ſurrender of Worceſter, and his return from thence to London; and alſo concerning his ſeveral Lodgings, Names, Acquaintances, Removes, Abodes in the Country, Correſpondencies by Letters, and Intereſt in places and perſons, as if they had kept a Diary for him. Which conſidered, and that Sir John Gell Bart. Major Barnard, Capt. Smith, Capt. Benſon, and Capt. Aſhley, (with whom he had the laſt and moſt queſtionable correſpondence) were all in cuſtody, he found himſelf to be betrayed, but could not at preſent gueſs by whom; but well ſaw that he had better be fair in his confeſſion, than to deny what he ſaw by the perfectneſs of his examiners, would be proved againſt him, by the diſcovery of ſome of thoſe formerly ſecured, and examined before his coming up.

In his Anſwers, he would have been circumſtantial, but was kept cloſe to the Queſtion; at his departure he deſired that he might ſet down his own Narrative, according to his own ſenſe, which was granted him to prepare, and to ſend or bring to them as there was opportunity. And having totally, as much as in him lay, excuſed his fellow-priſoners, as to any thing relating to his Delinquency, he was with them committed to the Gatehouſe.

Wedneſday following, he was re-convented and re-examined.

On Friday, he was again convented, and delivered in his Narrative to the Lord-Preſident, and the Houſe. But buſineſs happening, detaining the other two examiners, he was by the Preſident returned.

On Saturday he was re-called, and then, as at all times before, uſed and treated with civility, and no little preſſure to diſcover ſome great perſons, his ſuppoſed confederates; the aim, as he conjectur'd (and that upon ſtrong inference, and ſome expreſſions) was at Sir Guy Palmes, Sir John Curſon, and Sir Thomas Whitmore, &c. But he accounted it a great bleſſing in his unhappineſs, that his misfortune was not fatal to any of his friends or familiars, who yet knew nothing of the reaſon of his Impriſonment, more than for what they were beholden to common fame.

On Sunday, he was called out of his bed, and by two Meſſengers, his Keeper, and his Man, brought into a boat at King's-bridge, at Weſtminſter, and thence carried to the Tower. The warrant which at the Lieutenant's houſe was read, imported, that he was committed cloſe priſoner for High-Treaſon, in endeavouring to ſubvert the preſent Government, &c. to be kept till delivered by Law.

The Narrative follows.

To the Right Honourable the Council of State;

The humble Narrative * of Col. Euſebius Andrewe, as to the Queſtions and Matters of charge, whereupon he was examined before Preſident Bradſhaw, Sir Henry Mildmay, and Thomas Scot Eſq; in that behalf delegated by the Council the 27th of March 1650.

May it pleaſe your Lordſhips,

BEING unfortunately, and by a treacherous practice ſeduced into an action which renders me obnoxious to your Lordſhips Diſpleaſure and Juſtice, and thereupon convented and brought to examination, I aſſured your Lordſhips delegates, that I came with a reſolution to deal candidly, and not to preſerve my life by framing a lye, or denying a truth. The ſame purpoſe I ſtill retain, caſting myſelf wholly at your Lordſhips feet; humbly praying leave, that while I anſwer to matter of fact, I may be permitted to cloath it with pertinent circumſtances; that while the one lays me liable to your your Juſtice, the other may bring me within the capacity of your mercy; which in caſe it be afforded, I ſhall embrace with all humility and thankfulneſs. And if denied, I ſhall find cauſe within my boſom to juſtify God Almighty in his permiſſion of my ruin; and I hope Charity enough to forgive whoſoever have, or ſhall be inſtrumental to it, and bear the gurdon of my folly, with a ſober confidence of God's reſerved favour.

My engagement for his late Majeſty began ſoon after Hillary-Term 1642, and continued until the ſurrender of Worceſter in July 1645.

I have omitted to make my compoſition, not having a conſiderable, and not willing to own an inconſiderable eſtate.

I have not taken the proteſtation, ſolemn league and covenant, negative Oath, nor ſubſcribed the preſent engagement.

John Barnard, ſometimes a Major under me, and by reaſon of his good parts and ſober demeanor, being in my good opinion, at my return to a private practice in my calling for my neceſſary ſupport, frequently viſited me, and imparted to me ſuch occurrences as he met abroad in diſcourſe, and did often intimate the diſcontent of the Reformades, the factions of the Levellers and Agitators, and the proceeding of a certain Committee, or ſelect Council of Officers, of which Col. Cook was chief, and himſelf their Clerk, upon a printed charge againſt ſome for oppreſſion, and againſt others for conceal'd delinquency; to the penning, promoting or counſelling in which, I was originally a ſtranger, nor did ever intereſt myſelf therein further than the hearing his diſcourſe; neither did ever mediately or immediately meddle with any of the perſons or actions of the Reformades, Levellers, or Agitators upon any of his diſcourſes.

About * Trinity-Term laſt, Major Barnard obtruded to my acquaintance one Capt. Holmes, who ſoon after brought with him one John Benſon, (who pretended to have had command under Sir John Gell, was anciently his ſervant, and until this time his dependant,) who uninvited frequently produced to me tranſcripts of Letters, (with the copying of which he pretended to be entruſted under Mr. Ruſhworth) which did appear to purport the occurrences in reference to the affairs of State, and their concernments at home and abroad, from their ſeveral agents; which I only read in his ſight, and immediately delivered them back, he pretending that he was to carry them to Mr. Thomas Buſhel to be tranſmitted over ſea.

Capt. Holmes, and John Benſon, in their diſcourſes did inſinuate that their intereſt was great in the Reformades, and that by them great advantage would upon any importunity be done for the Royal Party, and magnified Sir John Gell's intereſt in his Country, his reluctance at what he had done in the Parliament's ſervice, and his willingneſs to expiate his former fault with a beneficial ſervice to the Prince. And Major Barnard propounded, that a former deſign in the time of the war laid by me for the taking of the Iſle of Ely, might by their help, and the conjuncture of ſome ſtrength to be raiſed by Sir John Gell, then to me a ſtranger, and by Holmes and Benſon, pretended to be willing and able to raiſe conſiderable numbers, be revived and executed; and thereupon it was concluded, that I ſhould with Benſon try who in Cambridgeſhire would engage in it, and then ride down to Sir John Gell, to ſee if his ſtrength and purpoſe were ſuch as pretended; and this not to be executed but upon the contingency of ſucceſſes in Ireland, and Scotland, was let fall as ſoon as conceived.

About the middle of December, Capt. Holmes brought me inſtructions, to draw a petition for Sir John Gell, for the getting of his arrears, which I drew accordingly, and not long after, I was invited to give him a meeting, till then having not ſeen or correſponded with him, and received an invitation and inſtruction to arbitrate between him and his Lady, with Sir Thomas Preſtwich. And amongſt other diſcourſes, Sir John Gell did take notice of his irrequital of his ſervice, and his loſſes, and the miſapplication of his, and other ſervices, to an end they intended not, and that he deſired to be ſo underſtood, and when opportunity ſhould be, to be ſo repreſented to the Prince; and did intimate, that if ever he took up arms again, it ſhould be for the Prince: and at ſeveral other ſubſequent meetings, the diſcourſes were general, and much to this purpoſe, but no particular deſign laid or contrived.

The time limited by the Act for departure, &c. being near expired, and myſelf being purpoſed to withdraw into the Country, until the ſummer voyage into ſome of the plantations, and to that purpoſe being in treaty with Sir Edmund Plowden, about the conditions of New Albion plantation, of which he writes himſelf Count Palatine, and Proprietor; on Saturday 16 Martii, I was unexpectedly viſited by Major Barnard, and John Benſon, and they enquiring my reſolution concerning my leaving the Town in obedience to the Act; I ſignified my purpoſe to go to New Albion or to Virginia; upon which they took an opportunity to make a propoſal to me in effect, that they had a conſiderable deſign laid, and friends and money to ſet on foot and back it, and that I ſhould have two hundred pounds in hand, and power to draw money by Bills of Exchange, for what more ſhould be neceſſary for my ſupport, and management of what ſhould concern the ſaid deſign in Holland, if I would undertake to go over, and promote it to the Prince. And they did then in general terms ſignify, that it was an eaſy matter, eſpecially the Cavaliers going out of the Town, by correſpondence in all Counties, to ſurprize the horſe of the army in their ſeveral quarters; and did intimate, that Major Barnard had a deſign in draught, which as I remember he produced, and I believe was concerning ſuch ſurprizal, but was not read, but referred to further time of conſideration. My anſwer was, that if the money were ready, I would divert my former purpoſe from any Plantation, and entertain the motion,

Sunday morning, they came again and informed me, that ſeveral perſons of quality and fortune in Kent, Buckingham, and Dorſet, were, or would then preſently come up near the Town, and would join in an engagement, and advance money; and that Sir John Gell would alſo engage, and might with a word of his mouth bring in his friends, and Sir Andrew Kniveton, Sir Guy Palmes, and Mr. Fitzherbert, and a fourth perſon, whoſe name I remember not; and therefore deſired me to draw an engagement, (which I did in a looſe paper, after the ſenſe by them or one of them, the ſaid Barnard, or Benſon, inſtructed) and to move Sir John Gell to join in ſuch an engagement; but did preſs me to join in the ſame at that preſent, for the encouraging of their before-mentioned friends, amongſt whom, whom, I remember only theſe Surnames Boyes, Thatch, Baker, all to me abſolute ſtrangers.

* This Error in time, as ſome others both of ſubſtance and circumſtance, are rectified upon better memory by ſome following papers ſent to the Lord-Preſident.

That day I ſpake with Sir John Gell, and acquainted him with their offer and propoſal to me, and deſire from him. He anſwered, that he would not meddle with acting in that deſign (which he took upon him to be acquainted withal,) for which he was as then in no capacity, nor would be engaged under his hand and ſeal, to be bound to, by any future action for them; for that Benſon was a fellow given to drink, and laviſh of his tongue: but entruſted me, that if I went over upon this occaſion, to poſſeſs the Prince with a good opinion of him, and that he would do nothing againſt him; and if he were at all in command, he would be ſo to his advantage, or to that effect.

I returned to them Sir John Gell's anſwer, with which they were not, or ſeemed not altogether unſatisfied, and appointed on Monday five of the clock, that the perſons of the Counties of Kent, Buckingham, and Dorſet, or ſome of each County from the reſt, ſhould give a meeting at the Three Cranes, at the Savoy-Gate, and be all ſatisfied in the deſign, and agree their reſpective portions of money to be paid in preſent, and raiſed for the future; deſiring me to take care to move, that they might be alſo provided for, to be able to hold intelligence, and ride about from place to place to lay the deſign.

At the time I came; and Major Barnard produced two letters, one ſubſcribed by Smith, another by Thatcher, purporting that the Kentiſh Gentlemen were come as far as Rocheſter, and would that night be within twelve miles of London, and lie there all day, and then in the evening, on Tueſday by eight of the clock, would at any place give meeting to himſelf, and his Colonel; and that they had ſent a ſpecial guide to bring Barnard to them that night, whither he was inſtantly deſired to repair, and that they durſt come no nearer in fear of the watchfulneſs of Colonel Blunt; and that the two hundred and fifty pounds were ready to be laid down to perform their undertaking: No man of any County giving any meeting according to the firſt appointment at the Cranes, but the ſaid Barnard, and Benſon, and one who calls himſelf Captain Aſhley, only known in face to me, who pretended to be privy and knowing of the truth of all that their former diſcourſe and theſe letters tended to; and Barnard pretending to go inſtantly to horſe from Weſtminſter, I brought him and Benſon to the water-ſide, and in the walk they importun'd me again to obtain Sir John Gell's ſignature, and ſeal to the engagement, which Benſon had then ready engroſſed, and that I would go preſently to Weſtminſter with them about it; which I refuſed, and told them, that I was able to ſatisfy any man of quality, diſcretion, and ſecrecy, concerning Sir John's reality, though not actually engag'd; and ſo left them.

That night about eight of the clock, one Smith came to me (till then) an abſolute ſtranger, and Capt. Aſhley came to me, and brought me a letter from Major Barnard, highly reproving me, and Sir John Gell of backwardneſs, in withholding our own hands from the engagement, and that we intended our own honours upon their dangers, without giving them aſſurance of our ſecrecy and conſtancy; and that unleſs the engagement were ſubſcribed by Sir John Gell, his Kentiſh friends would not proceed further. I was known to Mr. Smith, who took upon him to come as from them for ſatisfaction in that point. And in anſwer, I under a vow of ſecrecy told him, that I was ſatisfied concerning Sir John Gell, and preſumed, that if any Gentleman of quality in whoſe judgment the reſt would abide, ſhould addreſs to Sir John, that under an Oath of ſecrecy he would ſatisfy him, but durſt not truſt Benſon, and Barnard was to him a ſtranger. With this they departed, aſſuring me that they thought no more would be expected from Sir John, and that they would, or one of them, away that night to the company; and that the next day being Tueſday, the money ſhould be paid at the Palſgrave's-head.

They broke their time, and my occaſions preſt me into London, being next day to be gone by the Act; and about nine of the clock at night, I was ſent for by Captain Aſhley and Benſon, who delivered me a letter from Barnard, preſſing me to ſubſcribe the engagement which Benſon engroſſed; and that being done, he would go with me the next day to Graveſend, and the Gentlemen of Kent ſhould meet there, and there the money to be paid.

The tide being fit for paſſage on Wedneſday, Barnard came not, but Benſon pretended him to be at Tottenham-Court with the Buckinghamſhire Gentlemen, and that he was well-hors'd, and would come preſently, and ſhould follow; and ſo Captain Aſhley and myſelf, with no more than fifty ſhillings in my purſe, preſuming upon the money there, went to Graveſend, and expected till Thurſday night, but found no Kentiſh men, and no one from London coming. Capt. Aſhley went that night with the evening-tide for London, to enquire the reaſon; and on Friday morning early came Major Barnard, and Mr. Smith with a letter from Benſon, purporting that if Sir John Gell would not co-ingage under his hand and ſeal, with thoſe whoſe names were ſubſcribed (of which I only know Barnard, Smith, Benſon, and Aſhley,) they would go over themſelves (meaning himſelf and Barnard) to the Prince, and ſpoil both mine and Sir John's credit with him, and diſappoint all that I intended in his favour: and that he had letters from Sir John, which he could produce, ſhould make him repent his refuſal, or to ſuch effect; and therefore deſired me to write to Sir John Gell, to let him ſee his danger, which I did, laying the caſe before him, and not preſſing him, but leaving him to do as God ſhould direct him, and his judgment lead him. With which letter Barnard and Smith went away, with aſſurance that whether Sir John Gell engaged or not, I ſhould hear next day from them, and if he did engage, they would come down and go for Rocheſter, where their former undertaking ſhould be performed to me; and if he did not, I ſhould be diſengag'd, and have my ſubſcription and ſeal ſent me, and the deſign ſhould fall. I expected till Saturday night, and finding no anſwer, reſolved on Monday to intend my privacy in the Country, upon my firſt purpoſe for New Albion; and in the morning early was ſeized by a party of horſe, and brought to London.

My Lords,

In that Narrative you will ſee a believing nature wrought upon by treacherous men, ſuch who cannot be true to any, whilſt falſe to parties.

The pretended deſign vaniſh'd, as never being more than a phantaſm, and not worth your regard, the real deſign effected ſo far as they had power or opportunity; that is, to bring the game into the toil, and there leave them to be entangled and made a quarry.

You

You will find me paſſively active, being prompted and enticed by their inſinuation, and not once but hearkening to them.

It lies in your Lordſhips power to cut me off, by extending which, you can arrive to no honour amongſt men; and poſſibly by an Act of lenity, you may do an office acceptable to God.

Cujus fiat voluntas, modo in ruinâ meâ.

Whoſoever ſhall be preſent at my Trial, or into whoſe hands this Narrative ſhall fall, will eaſily conclude with me.

Quos vult perdi Deus, hos dementat prius.

EUS. ANDREWE.

On Tueſday the firſt of April, after his remove to the Tower, he was called to be further examined, and at his return writ back to them ſome particulars, (viz.) concerning Captain Holmes, by want of memory not before ſignified. And in caſe the ſtate ſhould have ſuffered aught by the ſaid Holmes, it might have made Mr. Andrewe incapable of lawful favour, by reaſon of his tenacity concerning the ſaid Holmes, who (for aught Mr. Andrewe knew) was guilty of his being betrayed; and if ſo, might as well intimate his knowledge of Holmes's purpoſes, to the end that Mr. Andrewe's concealment of them might augment his crime; and alſo concerning Mr. Thomas Barnard, who being at large and unqueſtioned, Mr. Andrewe had cauſe to have the like jealouſy of.

On Friday ſevennight following, being the 11th of April, he was called again, and was confronted with Sir John Gell, and avowed what he did indeed neither directly deny, nor was troubled that he did aver; freely telling the Preſident, that howbeit he did not remember ſome things in point, yet he was confident that he would not do him, nor any man wrong: and then declared to the Preſident, that he look'd upon Sir John Gell, as upon himſelf, as a betrayed man; but as concerning others, he knew not by whom, he had been free in his confeſſions, though to his own injury.

He then acquainted their Lordſhips, that he had ſomething to rectify in his former examinations and papers, upon better memory in point of material circumſtances. They directed him to put them into writing, and to ſend them, and they called for his hand to the former examinations and papers; which he gave them, and the ſame day writ to them as followeth.

To the Right Honourable the Lord-Preſident and Council of State.

May it pleaſe your Lordſhips,

ACcording to the favourable licence by your Lordſhips to me given, I have digeſted into writing thoſe matters of circumſtance, wherein my Examinations and Narrative are in defect of my memory only incertain and ſhort; humbly praying, that they may be received and made a part of that relation, which I muſt abide by at my Trial; and that the former errors may be rectified and defects ſupplied ſo far, as by this ſupplementary account upon my ſerious re-collections given, may be done. And I ſhall then be confident, I ſhall appear not to have wilfully concealed (however guilty) or miſrendred any thing pertinent, whether the ſame carry with it my condemnation, or excuſe.

What paſſed between myſelf and Mr. Barnard, before my acquaintance with Holmes and Benſon, and which is expreſt in my Anſwers and Narrative, was in time before Eaſter-Term laſt, when there was an order for departure of perſons in my condition, from this Town; and I in obedience thereunto, did leave this City on Saturday the 6th of May, and came to Mr. Oſborn's houſe at Carleton-Hall in Suffolk, on Thurſday following; from whence I ſtirred not at any time more than five miles, until the ſixth of Auguſt, when I was ſent for to make aſſurances between a Kinſwoman and her husband in point of Jointure, by them to me mutually referred: in which buſineſs, and in other matters between another Kinſwoman, and a Merchant of London, being under reference to arbitrement; as alſo in endeavouring to get ſome friend to contract in the behalf of my daughter, for the reverſion of a Leaſe holden of the Dean and Chapter of Ely, in which ſhe is intereſted for a life in being, I continued in and near the City, until the third day of September; in which time Barnard voluntarily brought to my acquaintance Holmes and Benſon, upon the pretences in my Anſwers and Narrative ſet forth, to which I humbly refer.

The note which mentions Benſon's going with me to Cambridgeſhire, and ſo to Sir John Gell, which in my anſwers I have expounded, was drawn from me by Barnard's importunity, and written at his requeſt; but what uſe he made of it, (other than to lay it up, and reſerve it for his preſent purpoſe) I know not, nor had any account of it, but went away the third of September, there being no concluſion of any thing to be done in ſubſtance, or circumſtance poſitive. But Mr. Barnard, who knew how to direct to me, promiſed by Letter to intimate further to me; from whom after that, I never received any Letter or Meſſage to that, or any other purpoſe, until my return near Michaelmas-Term; when he told me, that the unſucceſsfulneſs of things in Ireland had been the impediment.

As to the day, viz. the 18th of October, being the Fair-day at Ely, it was only in diſcourſe mentioned to be an opportune time, in caſe the Iſle were (as indeed it was not) garriſoned. Neither any ſolemn or ſerious deſign or concluſion, then-to-fore or then-after made or laid, other than in tranſient communication; nor any perſon engaged ſo much as by word or promiſe, until this freſh ſtratagem was ſet on foot by Barnard.

I drew Sir John Gell's petition before Chriſtmas, and had ſeveral complements from him by Holmes, (at leaſt pretended) before I ſaw him, and I believe after Twelf-tide I was invited to him, and entruſted by him in the compoſing the differences between him and his Lady: in the laſt Term I drew his anſwer, and in the ſeveral times of our caſual or occaſional meetings, the diſcourſes have amounted to what I have before ſignified, and in your preſence and his avowed; and how more exactly to give your Lordſhips an account in time, I cannot.

As to the matter of the engagement, I abide by what I have formerly ſaid, with this only, that at my engaging, which was late in the night, before my going out of Town, in obedience to the Act, I was promiſed by Benſon, that if Sir John Gell, and their pretended friends of the Country did not co-engage, I ſhould be diſengaged; and in the hour of my going away, Barnard being not ready according to promiſe, but by Benſon pretended to be at

Tottenham-

Tottenham-Court with ſome Buckinghamſhire men, and that he would undoubtedly follow; I told Benſon, as I remember, in the preſence of Captain Aſhley, that whether he came or not, I muſt for the preſent remove to Graveſend, not having convenience of horſe to go elſewhere ſo ſuddenly. And if there were performance on Barnard's part with me, I ſhould be ready on mine; and if not, I deſired to be diſengaged, and left to purſue my private occaſions into Surry. And I did really carry with me deeds of my Clients, to have employed myſelf upon, in caſe of their failure with me.

I humbly beg your Lordſhip's pardon for a favourable interpretation of this trouble, which is a duty to truth, and right to others, and myſelf; which could not be omitted by

(My Lords)

Your Lordſhips humble priſoner, and ſervant,

EUS. ANDREWE.

This, together with a petition for allowance and liberty of friends reſorts, being the ſame day ſign'd in the preſence of the Lieutenant, were ſeal'd up, and ſent to the Lord Preſident's own hand.

This was his ſecond petition, which with a former to the ſame effect, (and not of moment to ſubſcribe) did never receive any anſwer.

At the ſame time he writ to Sir Henry Mildmay, on the behalf of the Gentlemen who were taken with him.

Mr. Andrewe at ſeveral times took upon him to aver to the Committee of State, that they had ſpies upon him for ſome years, and particularly Barnard; which the Lord-Preſident did not deny, but juſtified the State, by the practice of all States to ſet watches upon perſons of ill affections to them.

This day the Lord Grey was with the other three of the State.

His third petition ſent about Eaſter, being by Sir Henry Mildmay and Mr. Scot put upon it, to ſubmit himſelf, with promiſe of favour if he ſought the State in ſuch manner; which for his relations ſake he did, but with ſome caution, in theſe words.

To the Right Honourable the Lord-Preſident, and Council;

The Humble Petition of Euſebius Andrewe.

Sheweth,

THAT your Petitioner is ſeriouſly ſenſible, and humbly acknowledgeth, that for his high delinquency againſt the State, he is become forfeited to their Juſtice.

That he hath not in the leaſt prevaricated with your Lordſhips, in the confeſſion of his proper faults and follies, nor hath kept aught reſerved concerning himſelf, or any perſon, or thing, which may ſatisfy your Lordſhips, and more ſecure the State; and is not hopeleſs to be look'd upon as capable of your preſent favour and future mercy, which he now doth, and ſhall always implore.

That his preſent deſerved condition is made more uncomfortable, by his wants, and the excluſion of his friends and relations; without a ſupply in which, life itſelf becomes a puniſhment.

Your Petitioner caſting himſelf at the feet of your Lordſhips, humbly prays,

That his being proſecuted before the High Court of Juſtice, may be ſuſpended.

That by your order, his paſt and future charge of neceſſaries may be diſcharged, whilſt he remains your priſoner.

That his friends and kindred may have recourſe to him, and that he may have the freedom of his pen.

And in caſe your Petitioner ſhall be found in the leaſt to miſapply thoſe favours, he ſhall adjudge himſelf worthy of a total deprivation of them, and of your future goodneſs towards him.

And your Petitioner, &c.

This was leſs than was look'd for, though as much as he could venture on; in which his deſire for reſpite of his Trial was inſerted, to prevent only his being the firſt, and exaſperating them by giving others aim in the ſcrupling the Court.

This petition was ſolicited thirty-three days, but no anſwer could be obtained; and his wants growing upon him daily, he put in the Lieutenant's hands this following petition.

The Petition, (with ſtile as formerly, &c.)

Sheweth,

THAT your Petitioner hath been twelve weeks cloſe priſoner, his friends neither permitted to viſit, nor daring to relieve him, his ſcore for neceſſaries ſwoln beyond his ability to diſcharge, his credit proteſted, and nothing more viſible to him than his immediate periſhing.

That he hath not been wanting to pray your favours, having three petitions lodged with your Lordſhips, conſtantly ſolicited, but unanſwered.

That he hath in his confeſſions ſpared nothing which can more conduce to the State's ſecurity, or his own condemnation.

Your Petitioner therefore humbly prays,

That if at all he muſt, he may ſpeedily receive his Trial, he being ready to ſubmit to the will of God in the iſſue.

That if mercy be reſerved for him, which he hath, and doth implore, your Lordſhips would pleaſe to admit him to ſue out his pardon, and to a free converſation in this Commonwealth, upon ſecurity given for his future good demeanor.

That in the mean time he may have the liberty of the Church and Tower, and the freedom of his friends reſort, and that order may be given for the debt incurred there in the time of his cloſe reſtraint to be diſcharged.

And your Petitioner, &c.

The Warrant of Commitment, which I could not get a Copy of till the 14th of July, is as followeth.

THeſe are to will and require you, herewith to receive into your cuſtody the body of Euſebius Andrewe Eſq; and him you are ſafely to keep in cloſe impriſonment in the Tower of London, in order to his further examination, he being committed unto you for High-Treaſon, in plotting and endeavouring the ſubverſion and alteration of the preſent Government. Of this you are not to fail; and for ſo doing, this ſhall be your Warrant.

Given at the Council of State ſitting at Whitehall, this 30th day of May 1650.

Signed in the name, and by the order of the Council of State appointed by Authority of Parliament.

To the Lieutenant of the Tower of London.

This

This warrant is vitious in itſelf, for two reaſons, which make a right warrant of Commitment, Coke's 2*d* part Inſtit. fol. 52, 590, 591. allowed by the Parliament.

1. That it is not done by due proceſs of Law.

2. That it hath not a concluſion, viz. 'And ſafely 'to keep until he be delivered by due courſe of Law.'

But leaves it indefinite, and is rather a condemnation to perpetual, at leaſt to arbitrary impriſonment, which is worſe.

The cloſe impriſonment is but in order to his further examination, and he had been twice ſince examined, and ſigned his examinations before Eaſter, and did not refuſe to anſwer any queſtion demanded of him.

The Warrant is dated from the Council of State ſitting at Whitehall the 30*th* of May; whereas he was brought to the Tower the 30*th* of March, being Sunday, by ſeven in the morning, at the opening of the Gate, (no Council ſitting) and the Warrant ſign'd on Saturday the 29*th* of March.

Having attended a Month in expectation of an anſwer to his laſt Petition, he petitioned the Parliament again.

To the High and Honourable the Parliament of England;

The humble Petition of Euſebius Andrewe Eſq; cloſe Priſoner in the Tower of London:

Sheweth,

THAT your Petitioner hath been by a confederate pack of ſetters, wrought into actions, which (abſtracted from their circumſtances) render him liable to your Juſtice; and this done, not without their further hope, that your Petitioner, as they ſuppoſed, had intereſt to have drawn divers perſons of quality and fortune into the ſame entanglement.

That failing of that part of their aim, the ſaid confederates did betray your Petitioner to the honourable Council of State, by whoſe Warrant he hath been ſixteen weeks a ſtrictly cloſe priſoner, without a fortune of his own, the acceſs of friends, or means of ſubſiſtence allowed; and is like to periſh by his wants, before it be diſtinguſh'd by a publick Trial, whether he be a fitter object for the applying of your Juſtice, or your Mercy.

That he is hereby diſabled to be accountable to the ſervice of God, the duty to his family and friends, and to thoſe who give him credit for bread. And in caſe he ſhould be call'd from ſuch his cloſe reſtraint to his Trial, muſt be deſtitute and deprived of all fair means of making his reaſonable defence; which however it may ſuit with policy, will not be conſiſtent with Religion and Honour.

Your Petitioner having for relief in the premiſes, by all opportune Addreſſes, and by four Petitions importunely ſolicited and ſought the ſaid Council of State without anſwer; in the deep ſenſe of his preſſing ſufferings humbly appealeth to this high Court, caſting himſelf wholly thereupon, and as humbly prayeth,

1. That you would prevent your Juſtice by your Mercy, and admit him to ſue out his pardon, upon ſecurity given for his future good demeanor to the State in this Commonwealth.

2. That if that be too great a favour, you would grant him licence to depart the Commonwealth, he engaging not to act, or contrive aught to the diſſervice of the State.

3. That if he be not thought capable of either, but that he muſt receive a publick Trial, he may have a convenient time of preparation, after a qualifying of his impriſonment.

4. That in the mean time he may have the liberty of the Tower, and reſort of his friends; and that by your order, his debt for livelihood, incurred in his cloſe reſtraint, may be diſcharged.

In all which your Petitioner is ready to ſubmit to the will of God, whoſe providence hath put Juſtice and Mercy into your preſent diſpenſing.

And ſhall ever pray.

Notwithſtanding his Petitions and Letters, he was brought before the High Court of Juſtice (in Auguſt) of which John Bradſhaw was Preſident, and his own Narrative was urg'd againſt him as a confeſſion, and Attorney-General Prideaux uſed him with very ill Language. But he put into Court his anſwers in writing, which were as follow.

The humble Anſwer of Euſebius Andrewe Eſq; in his defence to the proceeding againſt him before the Honourable the High Court of Juſtice, preſented the 16*th day of* Aug. 1650.

THE ſaid Reſpondent (with the favour of this honourable Court) reſerving and praying to be allowed the benefit and liberty of making further anſwer, offereth to this honourable Court;

Firſt, That by the Statute or Charter ſtiled Magna Charta, which is the fundamental Law, and ought to be the ſtandard of the Laws of England, confirmed above thirty times, and yet unrepealed, it is in the 29th Chapter thereof granted and enacted,

1. That no Freeman ſhall be taken, or impriſoned, or be diſſeiſed of his freehold or liberties, or free cuſtom, or be out-lawed, or exiled, or be any otherwiſe deſtroyed; nor will we paſs upon him, nor condemn him, but by a lawful judgment of his Peers, and by the Laws of the Land.

2. We ſhall ſell to no man, nor defer to any man Juſtice or Right.

Secondly, That by the Statute of 42 of Edw. III. chap. 1.

1. The Great Charter is commanded to be kept in all the points. And,

2. It is enacted, that if any Statute be made to the contrary, that ſhall be holden for none; which Statute is unrepealed.

The Reſpondent obſerveth, that by an Act of the 26th of March 1650, entitled an Act for eſtabliſhing an High Court of Juſtice; power is given to this Court to try, condemn, and cauſe execution of Death, to be done upon the Freemen of England, according as the major number of any twelve of the Members thereof ſhall judge to appertain to Juſtice.

And thereupon the Reſpondent doth humbly infer and offereth for Law,

That the ſaid Act is diametrically contrary unto, and utterly inconſiſtent with the ſaid Great Charter, and is therefore by the ſaid recited Statute to be holden for none.

That it can with no more Reaſon, Equity, or Juſtice, hold the value and reputation of a Law (the ſaid Statute before recited being in force) than if, contrary to the ſecond clauſe in the 29th chap. of Magna Charta, it had been alſo enacted, that Juſtice and Right ſhall be deferred to all Freemen, and ſold to all that will buy it.

Thirdly, That upon premiſing, by the Petition of Right, 3 Car. that contrary to the great Charter, Trials and Executions had been had and done againſt the Subjects by commiſſions martial, &c. it was therefore prayed, and by the commiſſion enacted, That,

1. No commiſſions of the like nature, might be thenceforth iſſued, &c. And that done,

2. To prevent, leſt any of the Subjects ſhould be put to death contrary to the Laws and Franchiſe of the Land.

The Reſpondent humbly obſerveth and affirmeth, That

This Court is (though under a different ſtile) in nature, and in the proceedings thereof, directly the ſame with the commiſſion martial; the Freemen thereby being to be tried for life, and adjudged by the major number of the Commiſſioners ſitting (as in Courts of Commiſſioners martial was practiſed, and was agreeable to their conſtitution) and conſequently againſt the Petition of Right; in which he, and all the Freemen of England (if it be granted there be any ſuch) hath, and have right and intereſt; and he humbly claims his right accordingly.

Fourthly, That by the Remonſtance of the 15th of December, and the Declaration the 17th of January 1641, the benefit of the Laws and ordinary Coūrts of Juſtice, are the Subjects birth-rights.

By the Declarations of the 12th of July, and 16th of October 1642, the preſervation of the Laws, and the due adminiſtration of Juſtice, are owned to be the juſtifying cauſe of the War; and the ends of the Parliament's affairs, managed by their Swords and Councils. And God's curſe is by them imprecated, in caſe they ſhould ever decline thoſe ends.

By the Declaration of the 17th of April 1646, promiſe was made not to interrupt the courſe of Juſtice in the ordinary Courts thereof.

By the Ordinance or Votes of Non-addreſſes, Jan. 1648, it is aſſured on the Parliament's behalf, That Though they lay the King aſide, yet they will govern by the Laws, and not interrupt the courſe of Juſtice in the ordinary Courts thereof.

And thereupon the Reſpondent humbly inferreth and affirmeth, That

The conſtitution of this Court is a breach of that publick faith of the Parliament, exhibited and pledged in the Declarations and Votes to the Freemen of England.

And upon the whole matter the Reſpondent (ſaving as aforeſaid) doth humbly affirm for Law, and claim as his right,

1. That this Court, in defect of the validity of the Act, by which it is conſtituted, hath not power againſt him, or to preſs him to a further anſwer.

2. That by virtue of Magna Charta, the Petition of Right, and the before recited Remonſtrance and Declarations, he ought not to be proceeded againſt by this Court, but by an ordinary Court of Juſtice, and to be tried by his Peers.

And prays, That this preſent anſwer and ſalvo may be accepted, and regiſtred, and that he may be tried by his Peers accordingly.

EUS. ANDREWE.

The farther and ſecond Anſwer of Euſ. Andrewe Eſq; to the Honourable the High Court of Juſtice, preſented the 16*th day of* Aug. 1650.

THE ſaid Reſpondent (with the favour of this Honourable Court) reſerving and praying to be allowed the benefit and liberty of making further anſwer (if it ſhall be adjudged neceſſary) in all humbleneſs for preſent anſwer, offereth to this honourable Court,

That by the letter and genuine ſenſe of the Act, entitled, An Act for eſtabliſhing an High Court of Juſtice, the ſaid Court is not qualified to try a Freeman of England (and ſuch the Reſpondent averreth to be) for life in caſe of Treaſon.

Firſt, For that, 1. The ſaid Court is not conſtituted a Court of Record, and (but upon Record) cannot at all have that account of their Freemen, which Kings were wont to have of their Miniſters of Juſtice.

2. The Freeman, and ſuch who are and may be concerned in him, can have no Record to reſort unto, by which to preſerve the rights due to him and them reſpectively, viz. of

1. A Writ of Error, in caſe of erroneous judgment, due by the precedents.	Paſch. 39 Ed. III. fol. of Gaunt's caſe. 4 Ed. III. Rot. Par. Num. 13. Count de Arundel's caſe. 42 Ed. III. Rot. Par. Nu. 23. Sir John of Lee's caſe.
2. A Plea of Auterfoys acquit, in caſe of new queſtion for the ſame fact; the right to which, and the neceſſity of ſuch Record, appears by	Wetherel and Darley's caſe, 4 Rep. 35 Eliz. Vaux's caſe, ibid. 33 Eliz.
3. A being enlarged upon acquittal, as is the Freeman's due, by the Stat. 14 Hen. VI. C. 1. and the caſe thereupon grounded.	Dyer fol. 120. and abridg. fol. 33. The Year-Book of Edw. VI. 10. fol. 19.
4. A Writ of Conſpiracy againſt thoſe who have practiſed the betraying the life of the Reſpondent not to be brought before acquittal, and no acquittal but upon Record, as appeareth by	The Poulterers caſe, 9 Rep. fol. 55.

This Court is to determine at a day, without account of their proceedings; have power to try, judge and cauſe execution, but not to acquit or to give enlargement: ſo that the nocent are thereby puniſhable, the innocent not preſervable; the injured and betrayed, not vindicable; which are defects incompatible with a Court of Juſtice, and inconſiſtent with Juſtice itſelf, and with the Honours of a Chriſtian Nation and Commonwealth.

Secondly, For that the Members of this Court are by the Act directed to be ſworn,

1. Not in conſpectu populi, for the Freemens ſatisfaction.

2. Not in words of indifferency, and obliging to equality.

3. In words of manifeſt partiality, viz.

You

You ſhall ſwear, that you ſhall well and truly, according to the beſt of your skill and knowledge, execute the ſeveral powers given unto you by this Act.

The Reſpondent humbly offers, That,

1. The Court in their capacity of Triers ought (in reaſon) to have been appointed by their conſtitution, to have been ſworn as Triers in full Court, according to the practice in all equal ways of Trial.

2. The Court as Commiſſioners of Oyer and Terminer, (being authorized by the Act to hear and determine) ſhould in like reaſon be appointed by an Oath, ſuch as is uſual for perſons ſo qualified, as provided by 18 Edw. III. viz.

You ſhall ſwear, that well and lawfully you ſhall ſerve our Lord the King, and his People (mutatis mutandis) in the office of Juſtice, &c. and that you deny to no man common right, &c.

Or ſome Oath equivalent at leaſt to that of a Juſtice of Peace, Dalton fol. 13.

I A. B. do ſwear, that I will do equal right; and according to my beſt wit, cunning, and power, after the Laws and Cuſtoms of the land and the Statutes thereof made, &c.

3. The Court in the capacity of Triers ſhould (in reaſon) be obliged by an Oath, of as equitable ſenſe as that uſually adminiſtred to Jurors, viz.

You ſhall well and truly try, and true deliverance make between our Sovereign Lord the King, (mutatis mutandis) and the priſoner at the bar; ſo help you God.

Whereas when this Court ſhall (as it is now conſtituted) have condemned the Freeman, the Reſpondent, or other, by applying their skill and knowledge, to their power, whether juſtly or not, the Oath by them taken is not in the letter broken; as to be exactable by man, though God will probably have a better account.

And therefore upon the whole matter premiſed, the Reſpondent (ſaving as before) offers for law and reaſon, that the honourable Court, the High Court of Juſtice, is not, by the letter and proper ſenſe of the words of the Act, by which it is conſtituted, qualified in reſpect of the pre-objected defects to paſs upon him for his life, upon a charge or crimination of High-Treaſon.

And humbly prays, that this his ſecond Anſwer, and Salvo, may be received, and regiſtred; and that he may be tryed, as in his former Anſwer he prayed.

EUS. ANDREWE.

The farther and third Anſwer of Euſebius Andrewe Eſq; to the Honourable the High Court of Juſtice, preſented the 16*th day of* Aug. 1650.

THE ſaid Reſpondent (with the favour of this honourable Court) reſerving and praying to be allowed the benefit and liberty of making further anſwer, (if it ſhall be adjudged neceſſary) in all humbleneſs for preſent Anſwer, offereth to this honourable Court,

That, Firſt, It is his right (if he muſt admit this Court to be duly and legally eſtabliſhed and conſtituted, as to their being a Court) to be tried by his Peers, men of his own condition, and neighbourhood.

Secondly, It is within the power of the Court by the Letter, and Senſe of the Act, or at leaſt as being not repugnant to the Act, to try him by ſuch his Peers, &c.

Firſt, That it is his right to be ſo, and only ſo tryed, appears by Magna Charta, cap. 29. 25 Ed. I. cap. 1, and 2. 25 Ed. III. cap. 4. 25 Ed. III. cap. 2, and 4. 28 Edw. III. cap. 4. 37 Edw. III. cap. 18. 42 Edw. III. cap. 3.

By all which Statutes made in full Parliament, conſiſting of the head, and all the members actually, as well as virtually, this the Reſpondent's right is maintainable, and demandable, and the contrary proceedings thereunto are to be held for none, and redreſſed, &c. to be held for void, and error, &c.

So that, if the Laws and Courts were not obſtructed, (in the caſes of ſome ſort of Freemen of England,) the whole proceeding contrary to theſe Laws, without a Jury of his Peers, were avoidable, and reſervable by Writ of Error, as appears alſo by the precedents vouched by the Reſpondent in his ſecond Anſwer.

Secondly, That it is in the Court's power to try the Freeman, and conſequently the Reſpondent, by a Jury of his Equals; the Court is humbly deſired to conſider the words of qualification.

The Court is,

Firſt, Required to hear and determine; and ſo, if at all Commiſſioners, then Commiſſioners of Oyer and Terminer, and ſuch Commiſſioners, in their natural conſtitution and practical execution, do proceed againſt the Freemen according to Law, by a Jury of his Equals, and not otherwiſe.

Secondly, Authorized to proceed to trial, condemnation, and execution, &c. But not reſtrained to the manner of Trial, limitativè, as to trial by the Court's opinion as Triers, non excluſivè, as to trial per Pares; but is left in the manner, as in the judgment itſelf, to the opinion of the major number of twelve; and if they ſhall think fit to try by a Jury, it will be no offence againſt the Act, there being no clauſe or prohibition to the contrary.

And therefore the Reſpondent humbly claimeth his ſaid Right, as conſiſting with the ſaid Power.

And the more to induce the Court to grant him ſuch his right, and the benefit thereof, the Reſpondent humbly repreſenteth the manifeſt wrong, and multiplied diſheriſon, done to him, and in him to the Freemanry of England, in the following particulars of their like juſt right, (depending upon ſuch trial to be allowed) if denied him, by this honourable Court.

Firſt, The benefit of Challenge to the Triers, thirty-five peremptorily, and for Treaſon ſans number. } Stampf. pl. Cor. fol. 150, Tit. Challenge, Poyning's caſe. 32 Hen. VI. Fitz. fol. 26. Allowed Hill. 1 Jacobi to Sir Wal. Raleigh and Brooks.

Secondly, The liberty of Seeing, hearing, and counter-queſtioning the witneſſes, for clearing the evidence in matter of circumſtance, as well as in matter of fact; which appears to be the Reſpondent's right by Stampf. pl. Cor. fol. 163, 164. the Statute of } 1 and 2 Phil. and Mary, cap. 10 and 11. 1 Edw. VI. cap. 12.

The Authority of (the Law's Oracle) Coke 2 part Inſt. fol. 12. commenting upon the words in 25 Edw. III. cap. 2. Provablement Attaint, becauſe the puniſhment was heavy, the proof to be punctual, and not upon preſumptions, or inferences, or ſtrains of wit, but upon good and ſufficient proofs: alſo by the Statute of 1 Eliz. cap. 6. 13 Eliz. cap. 1.

Thirdly, The being Convinced, or acquitted by a full, free, and fully-conſented verdict. For Firſt, A verdict by a Jury paſſeth from all, or not at all. In the proceeding by voices, a ſentence paſſeth by way of concurrence, with which the Star-Chamber, High-Commiſſion, and Courts Martial, were branded, and condemned of Inequality.

Secondly, A verdict paſſeth upon a Jury before diſcharged, upon their affairs of Eſtate, or ſupplies of Nature, to prevent corruption of money and power; but as this Court proceeds (if it will proceed by voices) a Trial may be had this day, and a ſentence may be given at leiſure; when the will of thoſe, by whom the Freeman is proſecuted, be firſt known.

And upon the whole matter,

The Reſpondent humbly claims the benefit, and right, of being tried (if before this honourable Court) per Pares, men of his own condition, and of his neighbourhood, and that he may hear and ſee all the witneſſes produced againſt him, viva voce & aperto vultu; and may have power, liberty, and time to produce witneſſes in his defence.

And (ſaving as formerly) humbly prays that this his Anſwer, and Salvo, may be received, and regiſtred.

Eus. Andrewe.

The ſeveral Arguments of Col. Andrewe at his Trial.

The Firſt Argument.

My Lords, and you Gentlemen, Members of this Honourable Court,

I Have (as becomes me) been attentive to the charge which has been read againſt me. It appears in that dreſs it is put already, (though I preſume it ſhall be clad in other apparel by Mr. Attorney) ſo ſpecious, and ſo great, as that my friends (if I have any here) begin to fear, the indifferent to doubt, and the partial to deſire, and join in my condemnation; myſelf (I hope I am not partial to myſelf) believe, that it will be no more than the mountain's labour, and when it ſhall come to be diſſected, will prove to be inane aliquid; like the Apples of Sodom, that however they take the firſt ſenſe the eye, as this the ear, do rather foul the fingers that touch them, than ſatisfy the appetite in its expectation upon them.

My Lord,

I am at an unuſual bar, and engaged in a great cauſe of a far extendable concernment, my fee is life, and my duty is ſelf preſervation; which in itſelf were leſs conſiderable, if by a precedent of my ſuffering, the conſequence would not prove miſchievouſly epidemical.

I do not wilfully refuſe to plead to the charge, but humbly crave leave to offer my reaſons for the ſuſpending of my Plea. And if I be importunate (yet within the bounds of civility) I beg your pardon, and that I may have a full, free, and an uninterrupted hearing.

My Lord,

When the Jews preſs'd Pilate to ſentence Chriſt, they obtruded to him that they had a Law, and by that Law he ought to die. What they thought reaſonable to claim, when it ſerved their turn to vent their malice, will be I hope warrantable for me to lay hold on in a better ſenſe, for the vindication of Chriſt, who ſuffers when Juſtice is a ſufferer. We have a Law too, and by that Law, I ought not to plead, not to be tried, not to be judged.

The Laws of England were not unknown, but miſpractiſed, when the Barons fought King John into a conſent to the (not new making, but) reſtorement of the ancient Laws.

And * Magna Charta itſelf is but a confirmation or reſtitution of the Common Law, and is become the ſtandard by which Laws are reducible, and is the foundation of all other Acts of Parliament.

It hath been at no time diſmembred; no part abrogated by any repeal.

It hath been confirmed above thirty times, and commanded as often to be obſerved and put in execution.

In the Act call'd Confirmatio † Chartarum, it is directed to be allowed as the Common Law in judgment, in all points, by all the ‖ Judges and Diſpenſers of Law, or which have the Law to guide.

It hath in former ages gained an honourable eſteem in the old books: ‡ Charta libertatum communis Libertas Angliæ, Charta de Libertatibus, &c. theſe are the Appellations.

It was a Noli me tangere, and for ſeeking a reverſal or avoidance of it, Hubert de Burgh was ſentenced by the Barons, and the ſentence confirmed by  King Hen. III.

The great Hugh Spencer in the reign of Edw. II. was baniſh'd, but for raſhly counſelling againſt the †† Encounter la forme de la grande Charter.

And to draw downwards yet one King's reign, and to the point to which I would apply; I find in the 42d ‖‖ of Ed. III. this great Charter was not only barely confirmed and commanded to be kept in all the points, for thoſe are the words; but to prevent any alteration of it, it is enacted, That if any Statute be made to the contrary, that ſhall be holden for none.

By this ‡‡ Magna Charta it is granted, and enacted too; if my Lord Coke ſay true, who ſaith it is a Statute, as well as a Charter, being made by aſſent and authority of Parliament; That

No Freeman ſhall be taken or impriſoned or be diſſeiſed of his freehold, or liberties, or free cuſtoms, or be out-law'd, or exiled, or any otherwiſe deſtroyed; nor will we paſs upon him nor condemn condemn him, but by lawful judgment of his Peers, and by the Law of the Land.

* Coke 1ſt part inſtit. fol. 80, 81. † 25 Edw. I. cap. 1. ‖ Bracton 414, 491. Fleta lib. 2. cap. 48. lib. 3. cap. 3. ‡ Mirror cap. 2. 18. Briton fol. 177.  17 Hen. III. Rot. Cla. mem. 1. 2. Pro utriuſ. M. 1. †† 14 Edw. II. ‖‖ 42 Edw. III. cap. 1. ‡‡ Coke 1ſt Inſtit. fol. 81.

We ſhall ſell to no man, nor defer to any man either Juſtice or Right.

If this be truth and law, which I have in theſe particulars premiſed to you; then, my Lords, give me leave to take notice,

That by that Act by which you are conſtituted a Court of Juſtice, you are authorized to try the Freemen of England; not per Pares, upon or for offences againſt Articles, and the puniſhment to reach to life, as the major part of any twelve of the Commiſſioners ſhall judge to appertain to Juſtice.

Laying theſe together, a poſting rider may read, that theſe Laws are diametrically oppoſite, and conſequently inconſiſtent.

The latter hath its doom inherent by its innate contrariety to the former, and is a building, a ſuperſtructure ſo unſuitable to the foundation, that if it had not a double-edged ſupport, it need no help to be demoliſh'd, but would fall I know not whither, to ſay ſua mole, or ſua penſilitate.

The Conſtitutors of this Law are Gladiis cincti; and therefore as I am not in opportune place to ſpeak to them, ſo there is ſomething of danger to ſpeak too freely to them; but, my Lord, your Lordſhip, as you are in this place, are (I am ſure ought to be) like the Eſcutcheons of Princes, with their adopted ſupporters, Knowledge and Conſcience: and if you are, I am confident you will doubt of your Commiſſion or Warrant to proceed againſt me, and compel me to preſerve an inch of life, by giving away mine and my Countrymens liberty, in condeſcending to a Plea and Trial, in this contra-legal way, and by power of this Act.

The Second Argument.

My Lord,

I Shall further beg leave to call to your memory the Petition of Right; which was made the buſineſs of the Parliament, at the time when it was preferred, and received the Royal Aſſent; muſt never be forgotten by thoſe who hold in eſteem the care of Parliaments, and gracious conceſſions of Kings.

In the Proem or leading part of that Petition, the Statute of Magna Charta is inſtanced as to this particular, Trial for life by proper Courts, with other the Laws and Statutes, (ſome of which I have cited, and the reſt ſhall upon another point in their place.) And as it is complained, that proceedings had been by Commiſſioners martial, when and where, if by the Laws and Statutes of the Land they had deſerved Death, by the ſame Laws and Statutes alſo they might, and by no other Laws ought to have been judged; ſo it is prayed, and accordingly enacted, That no Commiſſions of like nature may be henceforth iſſued to any perſon or perſons whatſoever to be executed, &c. and this to prevent, leſt by colour of them, any of the ſubjects ſhould be deſtroyed or put to death, contrary to the Laws and Franchiſe of the Land.

My Lord,

1. The Commiſſioners Martial were not evil in reſpect of the perſons commiſſioned, being as this power is to you, ſo thoſe always given to perſons of quality and learning; but the evil of them were their proceedings by their own will and opinion, being themſelves the Judges and the Jury; offices incompatible and inconſiſtent with the people's liberties, by the former Laws become their rights. When your Lordſhips ſhall read the Act by which you now ſit, I am confident you will grant this power to be of the ſame nature, though not under the ſame name; and conſequently in that Petition complained of, in ſuppoſition that ſuch might be, and enacted againſt in Terminis, that none ſuch ſhould be.

2. For that you are called by the Act, Commiſſioners, and yet have no Commiſſion, but the Act itſelf; whereas you ſhould, in regard you are not a Court of Record in yourſelves, have Commiſſions returnable at a day, into ſome Court of Record, where your proceedings might be extant and viſible: and as you are now conſtituted, you have a day prefixed to determine in; but that being come, you are to vaniſh, and your veſtigia will be as imperceptible to the times and men to come, as the trace of a Swallow in the Air; which is inconſiſtent with the Honour and Juſtice of any Kingdom, or of any Chriſtian Commonwealth.

For that you have only by this Act, a bare and ſingle power to adjudge, and cauſe execution to be done, in caſe you ſhall judge it to appertain to Juſtice; but you have no power, if you think it appertain to Juſtice, to acquit, and upon acquittal to diſcharge the perſon tried, as is the Law expreſly in my * Lord Dyer; and in the Year-book of Edw. IV. grounded upon the Statute of † Hen. VI. 14 of his reign, cap. 1. That Juſtices of Niſi prius (who are Commiſſionary Juſtices) ſhall have power of all the caſes of Felony, and of Treaſon, to give their judgment, as well where a man is acquit of Felony, and of Treaſon, as where he is thereof attainted, at the day and place where the Inquiſition, Inqueſt, and Jury ſhall be taken; and then from thenceforth to award execution to be made by force of the ſame judgments, which in an acquitted man's caſe can only be enlargement.

But, my Lord, you have only power, if you can, to reach my life, if in your opinion deſerving it: but not to reach me out of priſon; ſo that if you kill me not here with the ſword of Juſtice, you muſt leave me in worſe hands, to be buried alive in reſtraint and want.

Which all is againſt the laws of Nature and Nations, and particularly of this land, that are all ſo ballanced and poyſed, as that they have equal regard to the delivery and freeing the Innocent, as to the condemnation of the Nocent.

And Iſidore in his Etymologies ſays of a Law, thus;

Erit autem lex honeſta, juſta, poſſibilis, ſecundum naturam & conſuetudinem patriæ; Loco, temporique conveniens, neceſſaria, & utilis; manifeſta quoque, ne aliquid incautum per obſcuritatem captione contineat; nullo privato commodo, ſed pro communi civium utilitate conſcripta.

And as Laws ſhould be, ſo ſhould Courts and the Diſpenſers of Laws be.

But, my Lord, if this Court muſt be granted to be a Court, yourſelves can make no more of it than a Court, ex parte, and ſet up to ſerve a particular end, with the privation of the common utility and liberty, however uſhered in with a preamble of another ſtile, of preſervation of peace, and prevention of

* Read's caſe, Dyer fol. 120. 10 Edw. IV. fol. 19.

of war; but Thucydides will tell you, my Lord, in his fourth book, That Turpius eſt his qui impia tenent inſidiare honeſto prætextu, quam inſidioſâ malevolentiâ uti; nam violentia videtur aliquid Juris habere, propter potentiam à fortunâ datam, ſed fraus tantum ab injuſtitiâ oritur.

The Third Argument.

BUT, my Lord, if your Lordſhip be in your judgment and conſcience ſatisfied, that the Act itſelf, in and as to its conſtitution, is good and valuable, and impowereth you ſufficiently to proceed againſt me ſome way; then Argumenti ergo dato, ſed non juris ergo conceſſo, that it is a Law, or an Act, and that all thoſe Ordinances are out of doors; yet I pray your Lordſhip's leave, that I may make evident to your Lordſhip, that you are not hereby conſtituted a Court capable, in defect of the very letter of the Act, to paſs upon any man, and conſequently not upon me, in matter of life, or where life may be the concernment.

1. For Reaſon, you are not conſtituted a Court of Record, * which is abſolutely neceſſary, having life and forfeiture of lands in your charge.

Firſt, For the State, that they may have an account, (not in their Council-Chamber, but upon Record) what is become of the matter in iſſue, and of the perſon put upon his Trial.

2. For the Freeman of England, that in caſe he be acquitted of the crime wherewith he ſhall ſtand charged before this Court, he might at all times reſort to the Record, upon any new queſtion for the ſame fact, in any other Court holding Pleas of that nature, by which Record to plead his Auterfoys Acquit, and to make his defence, as alſo to preſerve his eſtate, ſi non legalement acquitte en le Poulterer's caſe 9. R. Benegiſt demant acquittal nul req. ſi non de Record, as alſo my benefit, a writ of Conſpiracy.

To come nearer our own times, the like cauſe to complain, and the ſame redreſs is given in the Act † for aboliſhing of the Star-Chamber, upon the grounds and reaſons drawn from theſe Laws; the Innovations and Invadings, upon which (as being fundamentals) was a great part of the ſubſtance of the grand remonſtrance, committed to the whole World againſt the late King by the preſs: The ‖ charges againſt the Earl of Strafford and the Archbiſhop of Canterbury.

The Intereſt of the Subject in theſe Laws, was cryed up to be ſo precious, as that it had influence even to the abſolving of all old Oaths, and the impoſing of new, and to bring to adventure eſtate and life, and ſoul, rather than to be uſurped, or in the leaſt intrenched upon.

Four ‡ ſeveral Declarations of the preſent Parliament have entitled the ſubject to them, and to the benefit of the ordinary Courts of Juſtice, as their birthright. I have owned the preſervation of them to be the cauſe of the War, and the ends of their affairs managed by their Swords or Councils; and God's curſe is by them imprecated, in caſe they ſhould ever decline the ends.

My Lord,

We have the Parliament's word and  promiſe, not to interrupt the courſe of Juſtice in the ordinary Courts.

And in the ordinance of Non-addreſſes to the late King, they ſay, Though they lay the King aſide, yet they will govern by the Laws, and not interrupt the courſe of Juſtice in the ordinary Courts thereof.

My Lord,

I am entitled to all theſe Laws, and theſe Promiſes and Declarations; and if this Court proceed againſt me, thoſe notwithſtanding, (the ordinary Courts of Juſtice being open and unobſtructed) I am robb'd, and diveſted of them all, and in me the Freemanry of England are all deſpoiled, at the Parliament's will (according to this precedent) deſpoilable, and may with Mr. Stampford, in his Pleas of the Crown, take up this ſaying, it will ſerve for a lamentation, Miſera ſervitus eſt, ubi jus eſt vagum & incognitum.

Attorney-General Prideaux. Take heed you ſcandal not the Court.

The Fourth Argument.

THomas Aquinas (who, though a Papiſt, is not the leſs worthy to be vouched, where not Religion, but Policy, is the thing in queſtion) ſaith, That Lex eſt regula & menſura actuum agendorum vel omittendorum, not Actorum and Omiſſorum.

And St. Paul ſays, Rom. 7. 7. Concupiſcentiam neſciebam, niſi lex diceret non concupiſces.

My Lord, your authority is in two ſeveral places to proceed againſt as Traitors, ſuch who have broken articles before they were made; viz.

Whoſoever hath, or ſhall plot, contrive, or endeavour, &c.

Whatſoever Officer, &c. hath, or ſhall deſert their truſt, &c. ſhall die without mercy.

And thus, my Lord, the end of Laws and Lawmaking is perverted; which are not merely to puniſh offenders, but to prevent offences, which amongſt Chriſtian Men was never otherwiſe done, but by way of premonition; by Laws firſt interdictory, and then ſubpenatory.

The Earl of Strafford did (and very reaſonably) take it unkindly, and ſo expreſs'd himſelf upon his Trial; that a neglected Law ſhould lie moulding amongſt old parchments 200 years unuſed and unexerciſed, and at laſt brought out to meaſure his paſt actions by; or to uſe his own words, To lie like a Coal raked up in the aſhes, to be at pleaſure blown into a flame, and to make him and his family the firſt fewel to feed it. Truly if he had ſeen theſe articles (as he felt after ſomewhat like them) he would have cried out, and but modeſtly enough, that it is not the mending of the fault, but the deſtruction of the perſon, which is manifeſtly deſigned in theſe Articles of Retroſpection.

Diſuſage of Law, is ſome excuſe for him who falls into a tranſgreſſion; but the non-exiſtence of a Law, is a juſtification of the greateſt offence.

And, my Lord, as you are to look backward to actions done before the Law made, ſo you are to take cognizance of offenders againſt two former Acts, which make the Crimes therein certain in the matters of fact, fault and puniſhment; and if they be laws, they muſt be deemed part of the Laws of the land, and deſirable and diſpenſable by the ordinary Courts of the land, in caſes criminal: for extra-extraordinary Courts of that kind, have long ſince (even by the Parliament, of which this is the ſurviving part) been denied.

And although it is true, that when ſome particular fact is committed by ſome one or more particular perſons againſt the Laws criminal, it often falls (and properly enough) that eſpecial Commiſſions of Oyer and Terminer are for ſome urgent and expedient reaſon iſſued to try the matter and men; yet thoſe Commiſſions do not reſtrain the Commiſſioners to proceed only againſt thoſe perſons, and upon thoſe particular crimes, which the common fame hath rendred hac vice, to be triable; but run in general terms, and with general enablement to try all manner of Treaſons, Felonies, &c.

And the Reaſon is,

1. For that it might poſſibly fall out, that a grand Jury will not find the bill againſt John a Stile; and if not, the Commiſſioners are ſent down without their errand, if only directed to try J. S.

2. It may fall out, that where there are Treaſons or Felonies committed by J. S. they may be accompanied with miſpriſions and miſdeameanours in J. O. And if the particular crime of Treaſon, and the particular perſon of J. S. be only authorized to be enquired of, then the Commiſſioners can do but half their work: and therefore this commiſſionary power of yours, my Lord, (the ordinary Courts being not obſtructed, and you limited to particulars) is ſo far againſt the Common Law and Uſage, that it is againſt common and vulgar reaſon; and (pardon that I muſt ſay it) ſavours more of a Snare, than of a Law; and more of a warrant of arbitrary execution, than of an enablement, to and for a judicial and legal Proceeding or Trial.

The Fifth Argument.

My Lord,

IN all Courts of Juſtice, as there is ſuppoſed to be an equality intended to ſuch as ſhall fall under their cognizance and enquiry, which is a principle of morality innate, as well as a practical policy; ſo there have always in this Nation, at leaſt beyond memory, or indeed record to the contrary, been certain Oaths obligatory, and of indifference adminiſtred to perſons either enquiring of, or paſſing judgment againſt, or upon the ſubjects in all caſes whatſoever. And the ſame thing, is but neceſſary in your Lordſhips and this Court to be done, (if at all you will proceed in ſo weighty a matter as life) againſt which I make this exception.

1. If you are at all ſworn, you are not ſworn in Conſpectu; and if you will be my Jury and my Judges alſo, I ought to have ſatisfaction that you are ſo ſworn. Had you been only my Judges, and conſtituted after the ordinary manner, and to ordinary ends, I would have taken your being ſworn for granted.

2. If you are ſworn, and to no other words of Oath than what are compriſed in the Act, (which myſelf and all men elſe will eaſily believe you are not) then you are not ſworn to any manner of equality.

The words are,

You * ſhall ſwear, that you ſhall well and truly, according to the beſt of your ſkill and knowledge, execute the ſeveral powers given unto you by this Act.

I beſeech your Lordſhip, † that I may compare theſe words, with the Oaths of Judges in England, when it was a Kingdom.

The words pertinent are only theſe,

You ‖ ſhall ſwear, that well and lawfully you ſhall ſerve our Lord the King, and his People in the office of Juſtice, &c.

And that you deny to no man common right, by the King's letters, or none other man's, nor for none other cauſe, &c.

I ‡ A. B. do ſwear that I will do equal right, &c. according to my beſt wit, cunning and power, after the Laws and Cuſtoms of the Land, and the Statutes thereof made, &c.

My Lord, theſe will concern you as my Judges, to conſider how little the ſtiles agree, and how far your Oath is in reſpect of theſe unobligatory, and conſequently unſatisfactory to the perſons which are or ſhall be concerned.

1. As to the firſt, yours contains no ſuch words of equality.

2. As to the ſecond Oath, yours hath ſuch words as ſkill and knowledge, holding ſome reſemblance with thoſe of wit, cunning and power. But, my Lord, if your words were as well uſher'd, and as well paged as thoſe, it were ſome ſatisfaction, viz.

To do equal right, according, &c.

After the Laws and Cuſtoms of the Land, and the Statutes thereof made.

My Lord, as you are my Triers alſo, as well as my Judges, I beſeech you to obſerve the Oath of a Juror, and the difference in ſenſe, (in letter, I know, for the dignity ſake it ought to differ.)

You  ſhall well and truly try, and true deliverance make between our ſovereign Lord the King, and the priſoner at the bar, &c. I preſume it is ſtill the ſame (mutatis mutandis.)

Truly, my Lord, when I look upon your enablement to try the matters and perſons, which, and whom you are to try; you have power to deſtroy, and not to ſave; though to ſpare, yet not to acquit, or diſcharge; and your obligation by Oath to execute that power, according to your beſt ſkill and knowledge. I muſt needs ſay, and it is apparent, that when you have deſtroyed me, you have diſcharged all the duty that man can exact from you (though God will have a better reckoning) and inſtead of being tried by ſworn Jurors, and adjudged by ſworn Juſtices, myſelf and all who are or may fall into my condition, are to be tried by our ſworn adverſants, I might have ſaid ſworn enemies: and we cannot in reaſon expect more Juſtice, than when the Son lays the wager, the Mother keeps ſtakes, and the Father is Judge in a point of controverſy.

More and better you may do, more or better we cannot by any light of reaſon expect.

The Sixth Argument.

BUT, my Lord, if all this be but a wind againſt a Rock, and move you to no declining of the exerciſe of your power, though againſt my right; yet certainly, my Lord, where your power and my right may be conſiſtent, you will not ſtretch your power to the taking away of my right, but rather by giving me my right, magnify your power.

This

* The Oath of the Commiſſioners. † 18 Edw. III. ‖ Oath of Juſtices. ‡ Dalton's Juſtice of Peace, fol. 13.  Oath of a Juror.

This I may reaſonably expect.

It is my right (granting you to be my Judges) to be tried by my Peers, the good men of my neighbourhood, and it is in your power (if your power be not inward) to try me ſo.

That this is my right, I muſt reviſit * Magna Charta, Niſi per legale Judicium parium ſuorum.

The Law of Edw. I. having confirmed the great Charter, † ſaith, 'And we will, that if any judgment 'hereafter be given contrary to the points of the 'Charter aforeſaid, by the Juſtices, or by any other 'our Miniſters that hold Plea before them againſt the 'points of the Charter, it ſhall be undone and holden 'for nought.'

And upon this very Law or Clauſe, a writ of error was brought by the ‖ Earl of Lancaſter, for the miſattainder of his brother, whoſe heir he was, and in that the points were two, and upon them both, judgment given for a reverſal.

1. Quod non fuit araniatus & ad reſponſionem poſitus tempore pacis, eo quod cancellaria, & aliæ curiæ Regis fuerant apertæ, in quo lex fiebat unicuique prout fieri conſuevit.

Attinctus.

2. Quod condemnatus ſive adjudicatus fuit abſque araniamento ſeu reſponſione, ſeu legali judicio parium, contra legem, & contra tenorem Magnæ Chartæ.

The like reverſals, and upon the like reaſons, have been had,

In the ‡ Count de Arundel's caſe.

In Sir John of Lee's caſe.

It is provided, that no man from thenceforth ſhould be attached by any accuſation, nor forejudged of life, nor of limb, nor his lands, &c. againſt the form of the great Charter, and the Law of the land **.

My Lord,

Our fathers ſaw a Parliament (and reaped the bleſſing of it) which was called Benedictum Parliamentum, (which hath circumſcribed the looſe interpreters of Treaſons to a ſtandard, and not left it to be Individuum vagum;) and there it is ſaid, that perſons guilty of High-Treaſon (and my charge is not for leſs) muſt be provably attaint of open deed, by people of their own condition.

And again it is accorded, aſſented and eſtabliſhed, that from henceforth none ſhall be taken by petition, or ſuggeſtion made to the King, or his Council, unleſs it be by indictment, or preſentment of his good and lawful people of his neighbourhood where ſuch deeds be done, in due manner, or by proceſs made by writ original at the Common Law: Nor †† that none be ouſted of his franchiſes, or of his freehold, unleſs he be duly brought to anſwer, and fore-judged of the ſame by the courſe of Law; and if any thing be done againſt the ſame, it ſhall be redreſſed, and holden for none.

It is aſſented and eſtabliſhed (for the good governance of the Commons) that no man be put to anſwer without preſentment before Juſtices, or matter of Record, or by due Proceſs and Writ original, according to the old Law of the land; and if any thing from henceforth be done contrary, it ſhall be void in Law, and holden for error.

My Lord,

That it is my right to be tried by a Jury of twelve men de vicineto, is evident; and it is as evident, that if you otherwiſe proceed with me (if Law were not out of faſhion) you would but weave Penelope's web, and one day's judgment would be unravel'd by the next day's writ of error.

But after-games for life are dangerous; and for eſtate, I have no great cauſe to be ſolicitous: but my right is my duty to preſerve, as in relation to myſelf, and my honour to keep it, if it may be, from being in my precedent taken alſo from my Countrymen the freemen (if any ſuch be now) of England, who have equal reaſon, though they may be wanting (ſome of them) of the ſame reaſons wherewith to defend it.

That your Lordſhip may proceed by Jury, for aught is ſaid, or contained in your Act to the contrary;

1. I pray conſider the before recited Laws are all unrepealed; and therefore if this Law intend to oppoſe thoſe Laws, it ſhould have repealed them, or at leaſt have afforded a ſlight Non-obſtante, or have given the ſubject the comfort of a hac vice tantum, that we might not have thought ourſelves robb'd of all, but only plundered of a part of our right for neceſſity and experience ſake, or at leaſt have given us the favour of the Earl of Strafford's Act, that it ſhould never be drawn into example: but I am ſure in this Act, that proceeding againſt him is ſuper-exampled.

2. I deſire you would conſider your qualification; you are made Commiſſioners, and that of Oyer and Terminer, and thoſe are not proceeders in their own proper natural and habitual conſtitution and practices, upon and according to their own judgments in matters of fact: you are in theſe words, viz.

Required to hear and determine, &c. conſtituted Commiſſioners of Oyer and Terminer.

3. You are authorized to proceed to Trial, Condemnation and Execution, &c. but you are not reſtrained to the manner of ſuch proceedings to Trial excluſively, as to Trial per pares, but left to do the manner of the Trial, as well as the judgment or execution, as you, or the major part of you, or twelve of you ſhall judge to appertain to Juſtice: And if ſuch major part ſhall think fit to proceed by Preſentment and Jury, doubtleſs ſuch your proceeding is no Præmunire againſt the power given you by the Act; but it is juſtifiable to fall within the letter of the Act, and that without a ſtrained conſtruction.

4. And if when you may lawfully (I mean by your own Law, if, Argumenti ergo, it be granted a Law) try me by a Jury, and will not; then, my Lord, pardon me, that I muſt aver, that you take from me, and in me from the commonalty of England, three great privileges, franchiſe and rights; to which I and they are, by the known, ancient, and unabrogated, unrepealed and conſtantly practiſed Laws, entitled; which will be neither equitable nor honourable for you to do.

1. You take away the benefit of challenge, which I might make to a Jury or Jurors.

And that is contrary to my right which is given me by the ‖‖ Common Law, in favorem vitæ, to challenge

* Magna Charta 9 Hen. III. 29. † 25 Edw. I. cap. 1, and 2. ‖ Paſch. 39 Edw. III. John of Gaunt's caſe. ‡ 4 Edw. III. Num. 13. Rot. Parl. 42 Edw. III. Num. 23. Rot. Parl. 5 Edw. III. 9.  52 Edw. to challenge in caſe of High-Treaſon (for I go to no leſs) thirty-five peremptorily, and for reaſon of challenge ſans number.

This was judged in 32 Hen. VI. abridged by * Fitz-herbert, fol. 26. per challeng. where eight Jurors were ſworn, and the reſt challenged, a new return made; and thoſe eight returned, and though formerly allowed and ſworn, yet challenged, and adjudged good.

The like allowed in Hill. 1 Jac. in the caſes of Sir Walter Raleigh and Brook.

If this benefit were allowed me, my Lord, to except or challenge the whole Court, who are in number and quality my Triers, as a Jury are, I ſhould not need to be peremptory in my challenge, being furniſhed with abundant reaſon.

(Here he was interrupted by Keeble, who ſaid, thoſe Statutes and Caſes were out of date now.)

My Lord,

A Jury of Middleſex will be no more nor leſs, if what I am accuſed of, to have endeavoured, ſhould take effect; and therefore are not leſs concerned: I cannot ſay the ſame of the Court, (or if I ſhould, I ſhould not be believed) and he that but whiſpers againſt ‖ Diana at Epheſus, makes all the Craftſmen his enemies.

2. The ſecond benefit and right, which by denying me a Trial per pares, you take from me, is the benefit of ſeeing, hearing, and counter-queſtioning the witneſſes produced againſt me; which in ſuch way of Trials, ought to be viva voce.

That ſuch is the Law, ‡ Mr. Stamford averreth in his Pleas of the Crown. And,

In Treaſon, two ſufficient witneſſes by the Statute  of Edw. VI. are requiſite; ſufficient in relation to their quality, and to the fulneſs of their teſtimony.

Sir †† Edward Coke (an Author as authentick as any) puts this for Law in his expoſitions of the words in the Statutes for Treaſon, Provablement attaint; becauſe the puniſhment was great, the proof ſhould be punctual, not upon preſumptions or inferences, or ſtrains of wit, but upon good and ſufficient proofs. And this he makes good by the Authority of ‖‖ Stamford, and the ſeveral Statutes of Philip and Mary, and of Queen Elizabeth, and of Ed. VI.

Now, my Lord, an evidence either taken in writing, as the perſon will voluntarily give it, or cautiouſly taken as the examiner will aſk it, (who is not ſworn to take it indifferently, no more than the framers of the queſtions are to propound them fairly) may be a ſeeming fair, appoſite, and a full teſtimony; or concerning the perſon giving teſtimony, or concerning the modus, the ubi, the quando, &c. the whole laid together may prove either nothing, or a malicious thing.

The caſe of Sir Thomas More, Lord-Chancellor, accuſed for bribery, is common; and I hope if mine have fair play, it will prove no worſe.

3. The third and laſt right and privilege you take from me, is the main of all the reſt, and to the making of which, (as it ſhould be made up) all the reſt are but conducing, and leading; that is, of a fair verdict.

My Lord,

By a Jury a verdict paſſeth from all, or not at all; and one knowing and conſcientious man, may preſerve that innocent man, whom eleven either ignorant or careleſs men would deſtroy.

This Court's ſentence is to be ſtated by number of voices, and ſome of them poſſibly not judging their own judgments, but concurring where their opinion of another's judgment ſhall lead them; which, as it was the great evil of the late Court of Star-Chamber, ſo whereſoever it is uſed (in Trials of Life eſpecially) it is and can be no other than an evil.

My Lord,

By and from a Jury a verdict paſſeth before their diſcharge upon their neceſſary affairs, nay affairs of nature; and therefore they will give it both the righter, becauſe their evidence is freſh in memory, without the intervention of other matters, as alſo for that they are without opportunity to be perverted by money, or friendſhip. If this Court receive the evidence to-day, they may at any time (before the 29th of September next) give their ſentence; for vere-dictum I never expect but from a Jury: and in the mean time, how much their own affairs may put the remembrance of me out of their heads, and how much the State's power may put my ſafety out of their hearts, I have juſt cauſe to ſuſpect. For fear, I will not, being reſolved never to be in love with that life, which the Common Law of England cannot protect; and had rather die the Law's Martyr, than live the State's Slave.

The Cloſe.

My Lord,

I have ſaid; and now it only remains that I tell your Lordſhip, that I deſire you to take into conſideration what I have ſaid; and that you would not ſuddenly, but deliberately give your judgment, whether I ought to plead before you as Judges, and to the charge in the Articles, and not in a Preſentment or Indictment? whether to be tried without a Jury, and condemn'd upon Evideuce unſeen? which this is, (and I deſire it may be recorded.) As I do not now wilfully refuſe to plead or anſwer, but offer my reaſons for the ſuſpenſion of my Plea, until your judgment in the points be known and pronounced; ſo, if I be in them over-ruled, I ſhall then give ſuch anſwer to the charge, as ſhall become a man in my condition.

Fiat voluntas Dei, modo in ruinâ meâ.

Here the Attorn. Gen. Prideaux put a ſtop to Mr. Andrewe, telling him that the Court was not at leiſure to take notice of thoſe Law-Caſes, but of his confeſſion; that he had an affection to act, though nothing acted, was ſufficient Treaſon, and for that affection he deſerved death. And thereupon the Court pronounced ſentence againſt him, That he ſhould be hang'd, ‡‡ drawn and quarter'd: but on his Petition to the Parliament, an Act paſs'd authorizing Commiſ-

Commiſſioners of the High-Court of Juſtice to iſſue their warrant for the beheading him according to his Petition.

Col. Andrewe. If I be over-rul'd by the Court, that I muſt either anſwer or be ſentenced for my willfulneſs; then I move that I may have a Copy of my charge, and a day aſſigned me to deliver my Anſwer under my hand.

Upon theſe Reaſons.

1. If the Court proceed upon Articles, they cannot in reaſon conceive that I can plead the general iſſue to particulars; for in ſo doing, in caſe I be convinced of any one Article, I ſhall receive the doom of all.

2. For that de facto ſome of the Articles may be true, yet de modo they may not be available againſt me; and upon the general iſſue, I ſhall not be received to qualify fact with circumſtance, and ſo inſtead of being allowed the freedom of my defence, which is allowed to every Thief in Newgate, I ſhall be tried and ſnared by ſuch confeſſion, or proof, as will ſerve the turn of my proſecutors, and not preſerve myſelf, by making myſelf and actions underſtood.

The Articles are of ſeveral kinds and crimes; and as one ſingle Plea will not be applicable to them all, ſo it is but requiſite that I have a Copy of them, to give thereby to each one its proper Anſwer; which though in Indictments is not allowed, yet in this way of proceeding was never denied in the moſt arbitrary Courts.

The Council-Table gave a charge, and received anſwer in writing, in caſes of contempt againſt themſelves or their commands.

The Star-Chamber afforded the Defendant a Copy of the Bill, and liberty to examine and croſs-examine witneſſes, in caſe the fact charged were denied by the Anſwer.

The High-Commiſſion the like, by their Articles and Proceedings upon them.

My Anſwer, if not in writing, may either not be underſtood, or miſapprehended, or miſs ſet down by the Clerk, to my prejudice.

If this be denied me, then I muſt conclude they intend to wipe off my head, with the ſmooth glazed ſword of pretended Juſtice; and muſt apply myſelf to my memory, in reference to the charge, and ſhall hear it read, which by my own knowledge of what has paſſed between the State and me, I may conjecture; and therefore prepare theſe following heads to help my memory, which in a caſe of ſo much concernment, is not totally to be relied upon.

Firſt, As to what may be alledged againſt me in general terms, as a diſaffected perſon, an oppugner of the State, or otherwiſe, &c.

There are two things which draw ſubjection, and oblige perſons to a Commonwealth.

1. Eſtate (if any) ſequeſtrable, and not permitted by the Laws of the Nation to vindicate it.

2. Calling taken away, which the Turk would not have done, had he been conqueror.

3. Dwelling not permitted where I can ſubſiſt, but where I may be obnoxious to want, and to the State's infliction of puniſhment, when they ſhall take occaſion to repeat upon me any thing they ſhall call a crime, in reference to my paſt actions for the late King, and my now Sovereign.

4. Right I can have none, unleſs I will damn my ſoul to preſerve my eſtate, or repair my wrong by a contra-legal and contra-evangelical engagement.

This was ſufficient reaſon, owned and juſtified by the Parliament, for their ſubſtraction of obedience, ὁ Βασιλευς ὁ Πεϱτιμάϱτυϱος λάων, by their * Declarations, and Ordinances.

1. I have not taken the proteſtation of May 1642.

2. I have not taken the ſolemn Oath and Covenant; yet if I had, I might have juſtified my actions by them.

3. I have not taken the negative Oath, becauſe my Oath of Allegiance (from which no man can abſolve me) is a negative to that, &c.

4. I have not taken the preſent engagement, much more againſt my Oath of Allegiance than the negative Oath.

If I had had ſo little conſcience as to have taken them, I would have had ſo much as to have kept them; and the State cannot in reaſon expect from me, or any other, that we ſhould take a ſecond, when we ſee no conſcience made of keeping the firſt; nor to take a third, the firſt and ſecond being broken, without other diſpenſation than power, which like Alexander's ſword cuts the Gordian knot which it cannot untie.

Neither hath any man aſſurance, if he ſhould take the laſt engagement, that he ſhould have liberty to keep it longer than the fancy of the State held to the now new faſhion of Government.

And therefore I ſtand clear as a down-right ſubject of England, to ſtand or fall by the Common Laws of England; and if they will deny me that, they deny my Birth-right, which is equally righteous, and no more juſt, than to deny me my eſtate, my calling, my abode, my means of right.

Secondly, As to my action at Linton, I juſtify myſelf,

1. By the late King's Commiſſion, which my accuſer knows I had, and under which he was by the ſame King conſtituted my Major.

2. † What was done, was ſo done, when he who gave me the Commiſſion was in being, and oppreſſed by injurious impriſonment; and what I did, was in order to his inlargement from his thraldom, and reſtorement to his lawful power: which was that to which my duty as a ſubject by my Oath of Allegiance did bind me in general terms, and the duty of my qualification laid me under a particular obligation.

It was done before the now reputed Parliament were, or pretended to be the ſupreme authority of the Nation, or had aſſumed the power of Government, or were fram'd into a State; and conſequently I am not anſwerable to them for any oppoſition to

* Declar. 17 April 1646. Ordinance of Non-Addreſſes, in Jan. 1648.

That the Subjects of this Realm are obliged, by reaſon of their allegiance, to ſerve the Prince for the time being, in his Wars for the defence of him and the land againſt every rebellion or foreign power, within the land or without; and ought not to ſuffer in life, member, eſtate or office for ſo doing.

to them, further than the Common Law binds to Parliaments without their head, and hand, or defective in their members; and as to ſuch offence (if it be one) this Court is not qualified to take any cognizance.

Thirdly, As to the deſign concerning the ſurprize of the Iſle of Ely, it was but a bare diſcourſe or communication, and no formal deſign laid, agreed unto, nor perſon engaged in it, ſo much as by promiſe.

And in caſes of conſpiracy againſt the Lives of Kings, there were ſome Statutes made, that very words and communication ſhould be reputed Treaſon; but all repealed, or expired.

And not thought fit by wiſdom of Law-makers (having indiſputable power to make Laws) to be revived ſince the days of Queen Mary, notwithſtanding thoſe very many Treaſons hatched and deſigned againſt Queen Elizabeth, and King James, &c.

If in the higheſt point of Treaſon, communication be not Treaſon againſt lawful Princes, certainly, an affection where the offence (ſuch as it is) is of a far inferior nature of itſelf, ſo it had a far inferior object, or ſubject, concerning whom ſuch diſcourſe was holden.

Fourthly, As to my ſuppoſed correſponding with the King, the Lord Hopton, and the Earl of Cleveland, (if true) it was ſo long ſince, as that it falls not within compaſs of this Court's Commiſſion to try, being confin'd to infant matters of a year old, and my charge not exhibited to the Court of Juſtice, before Monday the 15th of July. My laſt letter received from Lord Hopton, bears date at the Hague, 18th or 28th of June, and was received in two days into Suſſex.

Fifthly, As to the drawing, ſigning, or ſealing of the engagement, it conſiſts of ſeveral branches.

That de facto I did it, and muſt not deny it, becauſe I have confeſſed it, which was more than needed, to them who knew it without enquiry; for I dare aver, that they had their inſtrument, by them imployed, and cheriſh'd in betraying me to it: And have ſome years paſt, had a man in my boſom to watch me and my motions, which I did affirm to the Lord-Preſident, and he not denied, it but ſaid, it was no more than did become any State to do, who had ſo much cauſe to hold an active man in ſuſpect, as they had me, having never come in, and laid down the Cudgels, but held to my principles, and was ready upon every occaſion to take fire.

And this I will prove, if I have legal (or becauſe that word is worn out of uſe) fair dealing from the Court. And,

Out of that I may juſtly infer, what will be viſible enough, that it is the State's Act, and but my Conſent, and they in no danger of me, but that I ſhould preſerve myſelf from their new Laws; into the lapſe of which I was not otherwiſe, or by any other action fallen.

As to the parts of it,

1. It conſiſts of an Oath of ſecrecy.
2. An owning of King Charles II. to be ſuch.
3. A reſolution to endeavour to make him ſuch.
4. A crimination of the State, under the names of rebels, and oppoſers, who would not have him to be ſuch.

To theſe, as they are rank'd.

The Oath of ſecrecy hath relation only as to the not diſcovering the co-engagers in that reſolution, and the reſolution itſelf being not Treaſon, the Oath of keeping ſecret that reſolution is not greater than the thing reſolved.

1. The thing reſolved was to endeavour, but was not an actual endeavouring.

2. If it were an actual endeavouring, yet it can only be ſuppoſed, that it muſt be endeavoured by a war to be levied; and the endeavour to levy a war never actually levied, is not Treaſon againſt the King, againſt whom only, and his relations, by our old Laws, which are Laws, a Treaſon can be committed; and Petty-Treaſon I am not accuſed for.

That a bare intention, reſolution, or engagement to levy a war is not Treaſon, I refer myſelf to my * Lord Coke; who tells us, (and he is a man of credit) in his Book (printed and allowed for Law by the Houſes when they were two) that a conſpiracy (and this engagement amounts not to ſo much, but rather to an intention only to conſpire) to raiſe a war, (as hath been ſaid, and ſo reſolv'd) is no Treaſon by the † Act of Edw. III. until the War levied, as within, or to be reached by thoſe words in that Law, (Overt Act:) and if it were not Treaſon in thoſe words in the original, it falls not within the words of the tranſlation of this new-born Law, viz. by any open deed.

As to the firſt and third branches of the engagement, which are interwoven, I conclude that neither of them, that is to ſay, neither the Oath, nor the Reſolution, are Treaſons either within the old, or the new Laws, either in reſpect of the perſons againſt whom, or the progreſs made in the thing itſelf.

2. As to the owning of Charles II. it falls not within your Law; for that it is not a Publiſhing, Proclaiming, or publickly Declaring his Title. The words of the Act are, [proclaim, declare, publiſh, or any way promote] which promoting is matter of action more than a private owning.

And this by the Oath itſelf was not to be publiſh'd, nor could, without publiſhing the engagement itſelf, which was contrary to the Oath.

And though it may be objected, that the raiſing the war could not be done, but by publiſhing his Title, and the Engagement at laſt; yet that, if it be granted, was no forwarder than an intendment: no more was this publiſhing, and being not done, falls not within your Act.

The crimination of the State is but gueſſed at by implication (for they are not named) to be meant, and I believe your Law reaches only to things literal, and not conſtructive only; and for the word Rebels, I hope they will not take that to themſelves, and the word Oppoſers is a very innocent expreſſion, and at the worſt is all but a ſcandal.

Laſtly, Be this engagement what it will, yet the terms upon which I ſigned and ſealed it were ſuch, as that it was my act not abſolute, but upon condition, and to be undone and avoided, in caſe of the non-co-engaging of others, by the State's decoy aſſured to be ready to do it; and at whoſe inſtance, and for whoſe ſatisfaction, it was pretended to be deſired at my hands.

If

3. I have not taken the negative Oath, becauſe my Oath of Allegiance (from which no man can abſolve me) is a negative to that, &c.

4. I have not taken the preſent engagement, much more againſt my Oath of Allegiance than the negative Oath.

If I had had ſo little conſcience as to have taken them, I would have had ſo much as to have kept them; and the State cannot in reaſon expect from me, or any other, that we ſhould take a ſecond, when we ſee no conſcience made of keeping the firſt; nor to take a third, the firſt and ſecond being broken, without other diſpenſation than power, which like Alexander's ſword cuts the Gordian knot which it cannot untie.

Neither hath any man aſſurance, if he ſhould take the laſt engagement, that he ſhould have liberty to keep it longer than the fancy of the State held to the now new faſhion of Government.

And therefore I ſtand clear as a down-right ſubject of England, to ſtand or fall by the Common Laws of England; and if they will deny me that, they deny my Birth-right, which is equally righteous, and no more juſt, than to deny me my eſtate, my calling, my abode, my means of right.

Secondly, As to my action at Linton, I juſtify myſelf,

1. By the late King's Commiſſion, which my accuſer knows I had, and under which he was by the ſame King conſtituted my Major.

2. † What was done, was ſo done, when he who gave me the Commiſſion was in being, and oppreſſed by injurious impriſonment; and what I did, was in order to his inlargement from his thraldom, and reſtorement to his lawful power: which was that to which my duty as a ſubject by my Oath of Allegiance did bind me in general terms, and the duty of my qualification laid me under a particular obligation.

It was done before the now reputed Parliament were, or pretended to be the ſupreme authority of the Nation, or had aſſumed the power of Government, or were fram'd into a State; and conſequently I am not anſwerable to them for any oppoſition to

* Declar. 17 April 1646. Ordinance of Non-Addreſſes, in Jan. 1648.

† 11 Hen. I. cap. 1. That the Subjects of this Realm are obliged, by reaſon of their allegiance, to ſerve the Prince for the time being, in his Wars for the defence of him and the land againſt every rebellion or foreign power, within the land or without; and ought not to ſuffer in life, member, eſtate or office for ſo doing.

to them, further than the Common Law binds to Parliaments without their head, and hand, or defective in their members; and as to ſuch offence (if it be one) this Court is not qualified to take any cognizance.

Thirdly, As to the deſign concerning the ſurprize of the Iſle of Ely, it was but a bare diſcourſe or communication, and no formal deſign laid, agreed unto, nor perſon engaged in it, ſo much as by promiſe.

And in caſes of conſpiracy againſt the Lives of Kings, there were ſome Statutes made, that very words and communication ſhould be reputed Treaſon; but all repealed, or expired.

And not thought fit by wiſdom of Law-makers (having indiſputable power to make Laws) to be revived ſince the days of Queen Mary, notwithſtanding thoſe very many Treaſons hatched and deſigned againſt Queen Elizabeth, and King James, &c.

If in the higheſt point of Treaſon, communication be not Treaſon againſt lawful Princes, certainly, an affection where the offence (ſuch as it is) is of a far inferior nature of itſelf, ſo it had a far inferior object, or ſubject, concerning whom ſuch diſcourſe was holden.

Fourthly, As to my ſuppoſed correſponding with the King, the Lord Hopton, and the Earl of Cleveland, (if true) it was ſo long ſince, as that it falls not within compaſs of this Court's Commiſſion to try, being confin'd to infant matters of a year old, and my charge not exhibited to the Court of Juſtice, before Monday the 15th of July. My laſt letter received from Lord Hopton, bears date at the Hague, 18th or 28th of June, and was received in two days into Suſſex.

Fifthly, As to the drawing, ſigning, or ſealing of the engagement, it conſiſts of ſeveral branches.

That de facto I did it, and muſt not deny it, becauſe I have confeſſed it, which was more than needed, to them who knew it without enquiry; for I dare aver, that they had their inſtrument, by them imployed, and cheriſh'd in betraying me to it: And have ſome years paſt, had a man in my boſom to watch me and my motions, which I did affirm to the Lord-Preſident, and he not denied, it but ſaid, it was no more than did become any State to do, who had ſo much cauſe to hold an active man in ſuſpect, as they had me, having never come in, and laid down the Cudgels, but held to my principles, and was ready upon every occaſion to take fire.

And this I will prove, if I have legal (or becauſe that word is worn out of uſe) fair dealing from the Court. And,

Out of that I may juſtly infer, what will be viſible enough, that it is the State's Act, and but my Conſent, and they in no danger of me, but that I ſhould preſerve myſelf from their new Laws; into the lapſe of which I was not otherwiſe, or by any other action fallen.

As to the parts of it,

1. It conſiſts of an Oath of ſecrecy.
2. An owning of King Charles II. to be ſuch.
3. A reſolution to endeavour to make him ſuch.
4. A crimination of the State, under the names of rebels, and oppoſers, who would not have him to be ſuch.

To theſe, as they are rank'd.

The Oath of ſecrecy hath relation only as to the not diſcovering the co-engagers in that reſolution, and the reſolution itſelf being not Treaſon, the Oath of keeping ſecret that reſolution is not greater than the thing reſolved.

1. The thing reſolved was to endeavour, but was not an actual endeavouring.

2. If it were an actual endeavouring, yet it can only be ſuppoſed, that it muſt be endeavoured by a war to be levied; and the endeavour to levy a war never actually levied, is not Treaſon againſt the King, againſt whom only, and his relations, by our old Laws, which are Laws, a Treaſon can be committed; and Petty-Treaſon I am not accuſed for.

That a bare intention, reſolution, or engagement to levy a war is not Treaſon, I refer myſelf to my * Lord Coke; who tells us, (and he is a man of credit) in his Book (printed and allowed for Law by the Houſes when they were two) that a conſpiracy (and this engagement amounts not to ſo much, but rather to an intention only to conſpire) to raiſe a war, (as hath been ſaid, and ſo reſolv'd) is no Treaſon by the † Act of Edw. III. until the War levied, as within, or to be reached by thoſe words in that Law, (Overt Act:) and if it were not Treaſon in thoſe words in the original, it falls not within the words of the tranſlation of this new-born Law, viz. by any open deed.

As to the firſt and third branches of the engagement, which are interwoven, I conclude that neither of them, that is to ſay, neither the Oath, nor the Reſolution, are Treaſons either within the old, or the new Laws, either in reſpect of the perſons againſt whom, or the progreſs made in the thing itſelf.

2. As to the owning of Charles II. it falls not within your Law; for that it is not a Publiſhing, Proclaiming, or publickly Declaring his Title. The words of the Act are, [proclaim, declare, publiſh, or any way promote] which promoting is matter of action more than a private owning.

And this by the Oath itſelf was not to be publiſh'd, nor could, without publiſhing the engagement itſelf, which was contrary to the Oath.

And though it may be objected, that the raiſing the war could not be done, but by publiſhing his Title, and the Engagement at laſt; yet that, if it be granted, was no forwarder than an intendment: no more was this publiſhing, and being not done, falls not within your Act.

The crimination of the State is but gueſſed at by implication (for they are not named) to be meant, and I believe your Law reaches only to things literal, and not conſtructive only; and for the word Rebels, I hope they will not take that to themſelves, and the word Oppoſers is a very innocent expreſſion, and at the worſt is all but a ſcandal.

Laſtly, Be this engagement what it will, yet the terms upon which I ſigned and ſealed it were ſuch, as that it was my act not abſolute, but upon condition, and to be undone and avoided, in caſe of the non-co-engaging of others, by the State's decoy aſſured to be ready to do it; and at whoſe inſtance, and for whoſe ſatisfaction, it was pretended to be deſired at my hands.

If

If the Court proceeds by way of Indictment, then I ſhall move, that thoſe perſons may be confronted, whom in my Narrative, Examinations and Letters I have named; and that I may demand of them, &c.

As alſo that Major Parker may be produced to be likewiſe demanded of, as a perſon by me lately, and ſince my papers ſent to the State, diſcovered to be of the Plot to betray me.

If the Court proceed by way of Articles, and upon Examinations taken againſt me; I deſire, and that is but reaſon, that I may examine my defence, as in all Courts, where ſuch proceedings were uſed, was allowed.

If it be objected, That it was not uſed in caſes of Treaſon, I anſwer, it is true, if they hold the ancient way of Trials, not; but if they proceed this way, it is but juſt; and otherwiſe the Court are at liberty to uſe all means, publick or private, to catch me; but I have none to defend myſelf: ſo that it appears, that they ſeek not to do Juſtice, but Execution.

And whether they be confronted or examined, theſe queſtions are to be propounded, either viva voce, or by Interrogatory; and if by Interrogatory, I muſt ſtand upon a fair way of examination, viz.

That ſome one from me, as well as one for the State's behalf, may be preſent, and ſet down the examinations or depoſitions; and that I may have a Copy of them as well againſt me, as for me, as well taken already by the State, or to be taken upon my motion.

The Queſtions.

1. Whether he knows Major Barnard, how long? &c. What communication and correſpondence concerning me, or my actions held between them? Whether he knew of the ſuppoſed deſign againſt the Iſle of Ely, and of the late engagement? How he knew them, and upon what reaſon, and to what end diſcovered to him, and by whom?

2. Whether he did inform the State (or any Member of the Council) of them, and how long he hath ſo informed?

3. Whether he ever had in his cuſtody the engagement under the hands and ſeals, and my letter to Sir John Gell? If ſo, where, and whether not at Graveſend at my being there? Whether he were ſent to watch me, and knew of my being there, before my being apprehended?

The ſame queſtions (mutatis mutandis) to be propounded to Barnard; and farther to him, and to Benſon, Holmes, Aſhley, Smith, as they are marked.

4. Whether he did propound in both deſigns to me, or I to him? Whether I ſought him, or he me? In what diſpoſition he found me, upon the time by the Act limited for departure, &c.

5. Whether he were real to me in the particulars of perſons, confederates or money, ready to engage and to be advanced, and if not; then to what end he feigned theſe to me?

6. Whether the letters by him to me produced from Smith, and Thatch or Thatcher, were true, or feigned? And if feigned, to what end, and by whom ſet on work?

7. Whether he were ſet upon me to watch my ways and motions? And whether he were not promiſed, or did deſign unto himſelf profit for the diſcovering of me, and ſuch whom I ſhould bring in?

8. Whether I fram'd, or ever read the ſaid ſuppoſed deſign? Or was to be de futuro acquainted with it?

9. Whether he brought, or I ſought Benſon, or Holmes? And whether confederates with him, or deſigned upon by him?

10. Whether my engagement were abſolute, or conditional, and what I ſignified at my departure, and upon Barnard's not coming; and where Barnard was pretended to be, and where he really was? What promiſe I had concerning the return of my engagement, in caſe Sir John Gell did not engage at Graveſend?

11. Whether copies of letters weekly ſhewed to me, were real or feigned? And if feigned, why pretended to be real?

12. Whether there were really any Kentiſh, Dorſet, or Buckinghamſhire men, and who confederates, &c.

Theſe preparations formerly made in rough notes, were tranſcribed and put into form, and finiſhed the 8th day of July 1650, by God's good aſſiſtance; notwithſtanding my abundant diſadvantages of cloſe impriſonment, and want of Books, or advice; and I commit and ſubmit the iſſue to God, whom I beſeech to fortify my ſpirit, and enlarge my underſtanding, when they ſhall come to be made uſe of; myſelf reſolving to be the Law's confeſſor while I live, and (if called to it) to be the Law's Martyr, when I die by the hand of the impending violence, under the ſpecious name of Juſtice.

A perſon trying, viz. a Juror, and in this way of Trial he is ſuch, ought to be a Freeman, viz. not in perſon, but in his pre-judicating opinion; which he is not, having publiſhed that the Reſpondent was the greateſt Traitor in England, and that there was enough under his hand to hang him the Reſpondent.

Sir William Roe, Captain John Stone, two of my Triers were employed to examine the Reſpondent, on the 2d of July 1650, and brought with them all the evidence againſt him; and therefore in their capacity of my Triers, by the rule in challenges, they are challengeable, and incapable to ſit.

But no regard was had to any of his Exceptions, or any Anſwer returned to his Queſtions; and he was ordered to be beheaded.

The laſt Speech of Col. Euſebius Andrewe, on the Scaffold on Tower-hill, Auguſt 22. 1650.

THE Lieutenant of the Tower delivering the Colonel to the Sheriff, ſaid, he had brought him thus far on his journey. The Colonel replied, I hope I ſhall neither tire in the way, nor go out of it.

When he came on the Scaffold (kiſſing the block) he ſaid, I hope there is no more but this block between me and Heaven. After he had been ſome while while on the Scaffold, he ſpake to the people as followeth:

Chriſtian Gentlemen and good People,

Your buſineſs here this day is to ſee a ſad ſpectacle, a man brought in a moment to be unmann'd, cut off in the prime of his years, taken from further opportunity of doing ſervice to Himſelf, his Friends, the Common-wealth, or eſpecially to God. It ſeldom happens but upon very great cauſe; and though, truly, if my general known courſe of life were enquired into, I may modeſtly ſay, there is ſuch a moral honeſty, as ſome may be ſo forward as to expoſtulate, why this great judgment is fallen upon me? But know, I am able to give them and myſelf an anſwer; and out of this breaſt, to give a better account of my Judgment and Execution, than my Judges themſelves, or you. It's God's juſt diſpleaſure towards me, for my ſins long unrepented of; many judgments withſtood, and mercies ſlighted; therefore doth my gracious father chaſtiſe me with this correction, that he may not loſe me; and I pray you aſſiſt me with your prayers, that this rod may not be fruitleſs: that when under his rod I have laid down my life, by his ſtaff I may be comforted, and received into Glory.

I am very confident, by what I have heard ſince my ſentence, there are more exceptions made againſt the proceedings againſt me, than ever I made; my Triers had a Law, and the validity of that Law is indiſputable for me to ſay againſt it, or to make a queſtion of it; I ſhould but ſhame myſelf and my diſcretion. In the ſtrictneſs of the Law, ſomething is done by me, that is appliable to ſome clauſe therein, by which I ſtand condemned; the means by which I was brought under that interpretation, of that which was not in myſelf intended maliciouſly, being teſtimony given by perſons whom I pity, ſo falſe, yet ſo poſitive, that I cannot condemn my Judges for paſſing ſentence againſt me, according to legal Juſtice; for equity lies in higher breaſts. For my accuſers, or rather betrayers I pity, and am ſorry for them; they have committed Judas's crime, I wiſh and pray for them St. Peter's tears; and I wiſh other people ſo happy, they may be taken up betimes, before they have drunk more blood of Chriſtian men, poſſibly, leſs deſerving than myſelf.

It is true, there have been ſeveral addreſſes made for mercy, and I will lay the obſtruſtions to nothing more than my own ſins; and ſeeing God ſees it fit (I having not glorified him in my life) I ſhall do it in my death, I am content.

I profeſs in the face of God, particular malice to any one of the State or Parliament, to do them a perſonal injury, I had never; for the cauſe in which I had a great while waded, I muſt ſay, my engagements and purſuance in it, hath laid no ſcruple upon my conſcience; it was upon principles of Law, whereof I am a profeſſor, and upon principles of Religion, my judgment rectified, and my conſcience ſatisfied, that I have purſued theſe ways; for which (I bleſs God) I find no blackneſs upon my conſcience, nor have I put this into the bead-roll of my ſins.

I preſume not to decide controverſies, I deſire God to glorify himſelf in proſpering that ſide that hath right with it, and that you may enjoy peace and plenty here, when I ſhall enjoy my God.

In my converſation in the world, I do not know where I have an enemy with cauſe, or that there is a perſon, to whom I have regret; but if there be any whom I cannot recollect under the notion of Chriſtian men, I pardon them as freely as if I had named them; yea, I forgive all the world, as I deſire my heavenly Father for his Chriſt's ſake to forgive me.

For the buſineſs of Death, it is a ſad ſentence in itſelf, if men conſult with fleſh and blood: But, truly, without boaſting I ſay it, or if I do boaſt, it is in the Lord, I have not to this minute had one conſultation with fleſh about the blow of the Axe, or one thought of it, more than my paſſport to Glory.

I take it as an honour, and I owe a thankfulneſs to thoſe under whoſe power I am, that they have ſent me hither to a place, however of puniſhment, yet of ſome honour, to die a death ſomewhat worthy my blood; and this courteſy of theirs hath much helped towards the ſatisfaction of my mind.

I ſhall deſire God, that thoſe Gentlemen in that ſad bead-roll to be tried by the High Court of Juſtice, that they may find that really there, that is nominal in the Act, An High Court of Juſtice, or Court of High Juſtice; high in its Righteouſneſs, not in its Severity: no more clouded with the teſtimony of folks that ſell blood for gain. Father, forgive them, and I forgive them, as I deſire thee to forgive me.

I deſire you now to pray for me, and not give over praying until my laſt moment; that as I have a very great load of ſins, ſo I may have the wings of your prayers aſſiſting thoſe Angels that ſhall convey my ſoul to Heaven. And I doubt not but I ſhall there ſee my bleſſed Saviour, and my gallant Maſter the King of England, and another Maſter which I much honour, my Lord Capel; hoping this day to ſee Chriſt in the preſence of the Father, the King in the preſence of him, my Lord Capel in the preſence of them all, and myſelf with them, and all Saints to rejoice for evermore.

Dr. Swadling. You have this morning, in the preſence of a few, given ſome account of your Religion, and under general notions or words, have given account of your Faith, Charity and Repentance: (then ſpeaking to the ſtanders-by) if you pleaſe to hear the ſame queſtions asked here, you ſhall, that it may be a general teſtimony to you all, that he dieth in the favour of God.

(To the Colonel.) Now, Sir, I begin to deal with you; you do acknowledge, that this ſtroke you are by and by to ſuffer, is a juſt puniſhment laid upon you by God for your former ſins.

Col. Andrewe. I dare not only not deny it, but dare not but confeſs it. I have no opportunity of glorifying God more, than by taking ſhame to myſelf; and I have a reaſon of Juſtice, for juſtifying God in my own boſom, which I have intruſted to yours.

Dr. You acknowledge you deſerve more than this ſtroke of the Axe, and that a far greater miſery is due to you, even the pains and torments of Hell, that the Damned there endure.

Col. I know it is due in righteous judgment; but I know again, I have a ſatisfaction made by my elder brother Chriſt Jeſus, and then I ſay it is not due; it's due to me, but acquitted by his mediation.

Dr. Do you believe to be ſaved by that mediation, and no other?

Col. By that, and that only, renouncing all ſecondary cauſes.

Dr.

Dr. Are you truly and unfeignedly ſorry before God, as you appear to us, for all theſe ſins that have brought you hither?

Col. I am ſorry, and can never be ſorrowful enough, and am ſorry that I cannot be more ſorry.

Dr. If God ſhould by a miracle, not to put you to a vain hope, but if God ſhould, as he did to Hezekiah, renew your days, what life do you reſolve to lead hereafter?

Col. It is a queſtion of great length, requires a great time to anſwer; men in ſuch ſtreights would promiſe great things; but I would firſt call ſome friends to limit how far I ſhould make a vow, that I ſhould not make a raſh one, and ſo offer the ſacrifice of fools: but a vow I would make, and by God's help endeavour to keep it.

Dr. Do you wiſh health and happineſs upon all lawful Authority and Government?

Col. I do prize all obedience to lawful Government, and the adventuring againſt them is ſinful; and I do not juſtify myſelf (whatever my judgment be) for my thus venturing againſt the preſent Government; I leave it to God to judge whether it be righteous; if it be, it muſt ſtand.

Dr. Are you now in love and charity with all men? Do you freely forgive them?

Col. With all the World freely; and the Lord forgive them, and forgive me as I freely forgive them.

Dr. You have for ſome late years laid down the Gown and took up the Sword, and you were a man of note in theſe parts where you had your reſidence; I have nothing to accuſe you for want of diligence in hindring the doing of injuries; yet poſſibly there might be ſome wrong done by your Officers, or thoſe under you, to ſome particular men; if you had your eſtate in your hands, would you make reſtitution?

Col. The wrongs themſelves you bring to my mind are not great nor many; ſome things of no great moment; but ſuch as they are, my deſire is to make reſtitution, but have not wherewithal.

Dr. If you had ability, you would likewiſe leave a legacy of thankfulneſs to Almighty God; ſomething to his poor ſervants, to his lame members, to his deaf members, to his dumb members.

Col. My will hath been always better than my ability that way.

Dr. Sir, I ſhall trouble you very little farther; I thank you for all thoſe heavenly Colloquies, I have enjoyed by being in your company theſe three days; and truly I am very ſorry I muſt part with ſo heavenly an aſſociate: we have known one another heretofore, but never to Chriſtianity before; I have rather been a Scholar to learn from you, than an Inſtructor.

I wiſh this ſtage whereon you are made a ſpectacle to God, Angels and the World, may be a School to all about you; for though I will not diminiſh your ſins, nor ſhall conceal or hypocrize my own, for they are great ones between God and myſelf; but I think there are few here have a lighter load upon them than you have, if we conſider things well; and I only wiſh them your repentance, and that meaſure of faith God hath given you, and that meaſure of courage you have attained from God, and that conſtant perſeverance God hath crowned you hitherto with.

Col. His Name be praiſed.

Here the Doctor prayed with him almoſt a quarter of an hour, after which the Colonel turning himſelf again to the people, ſpake as followeth:

One thing more I deſire to be clear in, there lieth a common imputation upon the Cavaliers, that they are Papiſts, and under that name we are made odious to thoſe of the contrary opinion. I am not a Papiſt, but renounce the Pope with all his dependencies. When the diſtractions in Religion firſt ſprung up, I might have been thought apt to turn off from this Church to the Romiſh, but was utterly unſatisfied in their Doctrine in point of Faith, and very much as to their Diſcipline. The Religion I profeſs, is that which paſſeth under the name of Proteſtant; though that be rather a name of diſtinction, than properly eſſential to Religion: but that Religion found out in the Reformation, purged from all the Errors of Rome, in the Reign of Edw. VI. practiſed in the Reign of Queen Elizabeth, King James, and King Charles, that bleſſed Prince deceaſed; that Religion, before it was defaced, I am of, which I take to be Chriſt's Catholick, though not the Roman Catholick Religion.

Then he turned himſelf to the Executioner: I have no reaſon to quarrel with thee; thou art not the hand that throws the ſtone: I am not of ſuch eſtate to be liberal, but here is 3 l. for thee, which is all I have; now tell me what I lack.

Executioner. Your hair to be turned up.

Col. Shew me how to fit myſelf for the block.

After which, his doublet off, his hair turned up, he turned himſelf about to the people, and prayed a good while before he lay down to the block. He ſpake to the people as followeth:

There is none that looks upon me, though many faces, and perhaps different from me in opinion and practice, but hath ſomething of pity in it; and may that mercy that is in your hearts, fall into your own boſoms when you have need of it: and may you never find ſuch a block of ſin to ſtand in the way of your mercy as I have met with.

I beſeech you join with me in Prayer. Then he prayed, leaning on the Scaffold, half a quarter of an hour. Having done, he had ſome private conference with Dr. Swadling; then he taking his leave of the Sheriff and his friends, kiſſing them, and ſaluting him next him, he prepared himſelf for the block, kneeling down, ſaid, let me try the block, which he did. After caſting his eyes, and fixing them very intentively above, he ſaid, when I ſay, Lord Jeſus receive me, Executioner then do thy office. Then kiſſing the Axe, he lay down, and with as much undaunted, yet Chriſtian Courage as poſſibly could be in man, did he expoſe his Throat to the fatal Axe, his Life to the Executioner, and commended his Soul into the hands of God, as into the hands of a faithful and merciful Creator, thro' the meritorious paſſion of a gracious Redeemer. Saying the fore-mentioned words, his Head was ſtricken off at one blow.

Be it remembred, that at the general Quarter-Seſſions of the publick Peace holden for the City of London, at the Guildhall of the ſame City, on Monday the 12th day of July, in the year of our Lord one thouſand, ſix hundred and fifty two, before John Kendrick, Mayor of the City of London, Thomas Atkin, Thomas Andrews, and Thomas Foot, Aldermen of the ſame City; and others their Fellow-Juſtices aſſigned to keep the publick Peace in the City aforeſaid; and alſo to hear and determine divers felonies, treſpaſſes and other miſdemeanors committed within the ſame City; by the Oaths of Robert Dawks, John Harvy, William Pitcher, Pelham Moore, George Boddington, Thomas Peirſon, Joſeph Ruthorn, Samuel Coleman, Richard Payn, John Draſgate, Robert Trolaffe, Richard Bartholomew, John Robinſon, Robert Alkington, and Thomas Wilmer, good and lawful men of the City of London, then and there ſworn, and charged to enquire for the Keepers of the Liberty of England, by the authority of Parliament, and the body of the City aforeſaid, it is preſented that the Bill following is true.

Lond. ſſ. The Jurors for the Keepers of the Liberty of England, by authority of Parliament, upon their Oath do preſent, That Richard Faulconer of Weſtbury, in the County of Southampton Gent. not having the fear of God before his eyes, but moved and ſeduced by the inſtigation of the Devil; and minding and endeavouring to bring the Right Honourable William Lord Craven, Baron of Hamſtead-Marſhal in the County of Berks; in danger of the loſs of his life, and of the ſequeſtration, confiſcation, forfeiture of all his Lands, Goods, and Chattels within this Commonwealth of England; the 10th day of February, in the year of our Lord God one thouſand, ſix hundred and fifty, at the Pariſh of Mary Stainings, in the Ward of Cripplegate, London, before Samuel Moyer Eſq; James Ruſſel Eſq; Edward Winſlow Eſq; Joſias Barners Eſq; and Arthur Squib Eſq; then being Commiſſioners for compounding with Delinquents, and for managing of all and every the Eſtates of Delinquents and Popiſh Recuſants, that the 15th day of April, in the ſaid year of our Lord one thouſand, ſix hundred and fifty, were, or then after ſhould be under ſequeſtration, did upon the Holy Evangeliſts, corruptly, wilfully, falſely and maliciouſly, of his own proper act, conſent and agreement, ſwear, and upon his corporal Oath before the Commiſſioners aforeſaid, on the ſaid 10th day of February, in the ſaid year one thouſand, ſix hundred and fifty, then having power to adminiſter the ſaid Oath, then and there depoſe concerning the ſaid Lord Craven, in theſe Engliſh words following; that is to ſay, That about a fortnight before the concluſion of the Treaty at Breda, the Lord Craven, the Queen of Bohemia and her two Daughters came to Breda, to the Scots King Charles, and went not thence till the King went to Honſlaerdike, a houſe of the Prince of Orange. That during that time, this Informant ſaw the Lord Craven divers times in preſence with the ſaid King; and every day with the ſaid King at the Court there, he being there with the Queen of Bohemia, and her two Daughters, to take their leave (as they ſaid) of the King of Scots before he went to Scotland. That ſeveral Officers, about thirty in number, made a Petition to the ſaid King, to entertain them to fight for him againſt the Commonwealth of England, by the name of barbarous and inhuman Rebels, either in England or Scotland, for the recovering of his juſt rights, and re-inſtating him in his Throne; and deputed this Informant and Colonel Drury to preſent the ſaid Petition, who indeed drew the ſame. That when this Informant and ſome other Officers came to the Court at Breda, intending to preſent the ſaid Petition immediately to the King's hand; but finding the Lord Craven very near to him, likewiſe the Marquis of Newcaſtle, (who preſented his brother Sir Charles Cavendiſh to kiſs the ſaid King's hand, the evening before the ſaid King's departure, who this Informant ſaw kiſs the King's hand accordingly;) the Lord Wilmot, the Earl of Cleveland, the Queen of Bohemia, the Lord Gerrard, &c. and a great buſtle of buſineſs: this Informant, with Colonel Drury, applied themſelves to the Lord Craven, intreating him to preſent the Petition to the Queen of Bohemia, to preſent it to the King of Scots. The ſaid Lord Craven taking the Petition, and reading the ſame chearfully, ſaid to Colonel Drury and this Informant, There is the Queen of Bohemia, deliver it to her, and I will ſpeak for you. Upon which they applied themſelves to the ſaid Queen, and ſhe preſented the Petition; after which, the King of Scots, the Lord Craven, the Marquis of Newcaſtle, and the Queen of Bohemia, with ſome other Lords went into a withdrawing room, where this Informant and company could not enter. But the Lord Craven came forth of the withdrawing Chamber, and told this Informant and company, That they ſhould receive an anſwer from the Queen of Bohemia to their Petition, and that he had ſpoken to the Queen of Bohemia in their behalf: who afterwards came and told this Informant and company, that ſhe had delivered their Petition, and that the King had taken order for it. The next morning at three of the clock, the King departed, but this Informant and Company had their quarters ſatisfied by the Princeſs of Orange, according to the ſaid King's order upon their Petition; and thereby to enable them to follow the ſaid King in the proſecution of thoſe Wars againſt the Parliament of England, which was the effect of their aforeſaid Petition: That this Informant ſaw the Lord Craven very often and familiar with the ſaid King, and enter with the ſaid King into the withdrawing Chamber, and ſtaid there, the laſt night the ſaid King was at Breda, very late; which ſaid Oath was, the ſaid 10th day of February in the year of our Lord one thouſand, ſix hundred and fifty, at the Pariſh and Ward aforeſaid, reduced into writing, and taken before the ſaid Commiſſioners, then having ſufficient and lawful power to adminiſter the ſaid Oath, and to take the teſtimony and depoſitions of witneſſes upon their Oaths in ſuch caſes. Whereas in truth neither did the ſeveral Officers, or any Officer make a Petition to the ſaid King, to entertain him or them, to fight for him againſt the Commonwealth of England. Nor did ſeveral Officers or any Officer make a Petition to the ſaid King, to entertain him or them, to fight for him againſt the Commonwealth of England, by the name of barbarous and inhuman Rebels, either in England or Scotland; for the recovering of his juſt rights, or re-inſtating him on his Throne: nor deputed he the ſaid Richard Faulconer, and Colonel Drury, to preſent the ſaid Petition, in the ſaid Oath mentioned; nor did the ſaid Richard Faulconer, with the ſaid Colonel Drury, apply themſelves to the ſaid Lord Craven, intreating him to preſent the ſaid Petition to the ſaid Queen of Bohemia, to preſent it to the ſaid King of Scots. Nor did the ſaid Richard Faulconer, with the ſaid Colonel Drury, intreat him the ſaid Lord Craven, to preſent the ſaid Petition to the ſaid Queen of Bohemia, to preſent it to the ſaid King of Scots. Nor did the ſaid Lord Craven take the ſaid Petition or read the ſame; nor ſaid unto the ſaid Richard Faulconer and Colonel Drury, There is the Queen of Bohemia, deliver it to her, and I will ſpeak for you. Nor did the ſaid Lord Craven, tell the ſaid Richard Faulconer and company, in the ſaid depoſition mentioned, that they ſhould receive an anſwer to their ſaid Petition, or that he had ſpoken to the Queen of Bohemia in their behalf; as the ſaid Richard Faulconer in and by the ſaid depoſition hath depoſed. And ſo the Jurors aforeſaid, upon their Oaths aforeſaid, do ſay, that the ſaid Richard Faulconer, in manner and form aforeſaid, corruptly, wilfully, falſly and maliciouſly, of his own proper act, conſent and agreement, did commit wilful, falſe, and corrupt Perjury; to the great diſhonour of Almighty God, and to the great damage, loſs and infamy of the ſaid William Lord Craven, and in contempt of the Laws of this Commonwealth; to the evil example of all others in the like caſe offending, and againſt the publick peace, &c.

Sadler.

This Indictment, upon the Teſtimony then produced upon Oath, was accordingly found by the Grand Jury.

The ſame day that this Indictment was found, Colonel Drury, who had given evidence to the Grand Jury, repaired to Whitehall, to Captain Biſhop, (having been formerly examined by him concerning the Lord Craven) and told him, that as he was that morning going down Holborn-hill, he was ſerved with a Subpæna to appear that day at Guildhall, London; and that he was examined there concerning the Information given by Faulconer, againſt the Lord Craven: and that after he was ſworn before the Lord-Mayor, he gave the ſame evidence to the Grand Jury which he had formerly given to Captain Biſhop upon his examination. Whereupon the ſaid Capt. Biſhop took the writ under ſeal out of his hand, with which he was ſerved to appear, and ſaid to Drury; how durſt you be examined againſt the Commonwealth, and not acquaint me firſt therewith? And ſaid further, Mr. Mayor, (meaning the Lord-Mayor) had better have done ſomething elſe, than to have ſuffered that Indictment to be found; and immediately calls for a meſſenger, and commits the ſaid Drury to the cuſtody of one Middleton, a meſſenger to the Council of State: who forthwith carried Drury away Priſoner into the Strand, to the houſe of the ſaid Middleton, where the ſaid Drury was kept by him in ſtrict cuſtody, from Monday that the Indictment was found, and the Seſſions begun, till Saturday, that the Seſſions was paſt; by which reſtraint of Drury, who had Faulconer's own hand-writing to produce againſt himſelf; and being otherwiſe the moſt material witneſs againſt Faulconer, there could be no further proſecution upon that Indictment that Seſſions.

In Michaelmas-Term, courſe was taken to remove the Indictment by a Certiorari into the Upper-bench, to the end the ſaid Faulconer might be outlawed for Perjury. The Record being accordingly removed, a Capias in order to an Out-lawry was taken out againſt the ſaid Faulconer, who for ſeveral Seſſions before had refuſed to appear. At laſt the ſaid Faulconer was taken upon the ſaid Capias, and carried to Newgate, where he lay for ſome time, but would not appear, nor plead to the Indictment; whereupon the proſecutors for the Commonwealth were inforced to move the Court for a Habeas Corpus, to bring him to the Bar, that he might be enjoined to plead, and accordingly the Court required him to plead; whereupon he pleaded not guilty to the Indictment.

In Hillary-Term following, a day was appointed for Trial upon the Indictment, at Guildhall, London, before the Lord Chief-Juſtice Rolls, where the ſaid Captain Biſhop and Faulconer appeared with their Counſel and Witneſſes; and Mr. Ruſhworth alſo appeared in behalf of the Commonwealth with Counſel and Witneſſes, and had given in the Record to have the Jury called: but it ſo fell out, that a perſon of integrity then in Court, who had gotten certain knowledge when and where the ſaid Oath was taken, gave Mr. Ruſhworth notice, that the Oath given to Faulconer, was adminiſtred unto him at Whitehall in Middleſex, and not at Haberdaſhers-hall in London; and therefore the place being miſlaid in the Indictment, a London Jury could not find a fact done in Middleſex: whereupon Mr. Ruſhworth immediately withdrew the Record for that time, and gave a ſtop to the Trial.

No

No time was miſpent to recover this miſtake: for within two days a new Indictment was drawn, and preferred to the Grand Jury in Middleſex, (Sir Henry Blunt being Foreman) where the Indictment was found: and was as followeth.

Hillary-Term 1652.

Middleſex. Before this time, that is to ſay, upon Tueſday next after the morrow of the Purification of the Virgin Mary, this ſame Term, before the Keepers of the Liberty of England, by authority of Parliament, in the Upper-Bench at Weſtminſter, by the Oaths of twelve honeſt and lawful men, it is preſented, That Richard Faulconer late of Weſtbury, in the County of Southampton Gent. not having the fear of God before his eyes, but moved and ſeduced by the inſtigation of the Devil; and minding and endeavouring to bring the Right Honourable William Lord Craven, Baron of Hampſtead-Marſhal in the County of Berks, in danger of the loſs of his life, and of the ſequeſtration, confiſcation, and forfeiture of all his Goods, and Chattels, Lands, and Tenements, within this Commonwealth of England; the 10th day of February, in the year of our Lord God one thouſand, ſix hundred and fifty, at Whitehall, in the Pariſh of Martins in the Fields, in the County of Middleſex, before Samuel Moyer Eſq; James Ruſſel Eſq; Edward Winſlow Eſq; Joſias Barners Eſq; and Arthur Squib Eſq; then being Commiſſioners for compounding with Delinquents, and for managing of all and every the Eſtates of Delinquents and Popiſh Recuſants, that the 15th day of April, in the ſaid year of our Lord God, one thouſand, ſix hundred and fifty, were, or then-after ſhould be under ſequeſtration, did upon the Holy Evangeliſts, corruptly, wilfully, falſely and maliciouſly, of his own proper act, conſent and agreement, ſwear, and upon his corporal Oath before the Commiſſioners aforeſaid, on the ſaid 10th day of February, in the ſaid year one thouſand, ſix hundred and fifty, then having ſufficient and lawful power to adminiſter the ſaid Oath, and to take the teſtimony and depoſitions of Witneſſes upon their Oaths in ſuch caſes, then and there depoſed; That ſeveral Officers, about thirty in number, made a Petition to the Scots King Charles, to entertain them to fight for him againſt the Commonwealth of England, by the name of barbarous and inhuman Rebels, either in England or Scotland, for the recovering of his juſt rights, and re-inſtating him in his Throne. And did alſo then and there, corruptly, wilfully, falſely, and maliciouſly, before the ſaid Commiſſioners, ſwear, that the ſaid Officers deputed him, the ſaid Richard Faulconer, and Colonel Drury, to preſent the ſaid Petition; who, as the ſaid Richard Faulconer, then and there, corruptly, wilfully, falſely, and maliciouſly, before the ſaid Commiſſioners did ſwear, indeed drew the ſame; and did alſo, then and there, corruptly, wilfully, falſely, and maliciouſly, before the ſaid Commiſſioners ſwear, that he the ſaid Richard Faulconer, with Colonel Drury, applied themſelves to the Lord Craven, (meaning the aforeſaid William Lord Craven) intreating him to preſent the ſaid Petition to the Queen of Bohemia, to preſent it to the King of Scots; and did alſo then and there, corruptly, wilfully, falſely and maliciouſly, before the ſaid Commiſſioners ſwear, that the ſaid Lord Craven taking the ſaid Petition, and reading the ſame chearfully, ſaid to Colonel Drury, and him the ſaid Richard Faulconer, There is the Queen of Bohemia, deliver it to her, and I will ſpeak for you. And that the ſaid Queen of Bohemia did preſent the ſaid Petition; and did alſo then and there, corruptly, wilfully, falſely and maliciouſly, before the ſaid Commiſſioners ſwear, that the ſaid Lord Craven after told him the ſaid Richard Faulconer, and company, That they ſhould receive an anſwer from the Queen of Bohemia to their Petition, and that he (meaning the ſaid William Lord Craven) had ſpoken to the Queen of Bohemia in their behalf. Whereas in truth neither did ſeveral Officers, or any Officer, make a Petition to the ſaid King, to entertain him or them, to fight for him againſt the Commonwealth of England. Nor did ſeveral Officers or any Officer make a Petition to the ſaid King, to entertain him or them, to fight for him againſt the Commonwealth of England, by the name of barbarous and inhuman Rebels, either in England or Scotland. Nor did ſeveral Officers or any Officer make a Petition to the ſaid King, to entertain him or them, to fight for him againſt the Commonwealth of England, by the name of barbarous and inhuman Rebels, either in England or Scotland, for the recovering of his juſt rights, or re-inſtating him on his Throne. And whereas in truth, the ſaid Richard Faulconer, and Colonel Drury, were not deputed by the ſaid Officers, to preſent the ſaid Petition, in the ſaid Oath mentioned; and whereas in truth, he the ſaid Richard Faulconer, with Colonel Drury, did not apply themſelves to the ſaid Lord Craven, intreating him to preſent the ſaid Petition to the Queen of Bohemia, to preſent it to the ſaid King of Scots. Nor did he the ſaid Richard Faulconer, with the ſaid Colonel Drury, intreat him the ſaid Lord Craven, to preſent the ſaid Petition to the ſaid Queen of Bohemia, to preſent it to the ſaid King of Scots. And whereas in truth, the ſaid Lord Craven did not take the ſaid Petition, nor read the ſame; nor ſay unto the ſaid Colonel Drury, and him the ſaid Richard Faulconer, There is the Queen of Bohemia, deliver it to her, and I will ſpeak for you. And whereas in truth, the ſaid Lord Craven, did not tell him the ſaid Richard Faulconer and company, in the ſaid depoſition mentioned, that they ſhould receive an anſwer from the ſaid Queen of Bohemia, to the ſaid Petition, nor that he the ſaid Lord Craven, had ſpoken to the Queen of Bohemia in their behalf; as the ſaid Richard Faulconer in and by the ſaid depoſition hath depoſed. And ſo the Jurors aforeſaid, upon their Oaths aforeſaid, do ſay, that the ſaid Richard Faulconer, in manner and form aforeſaid, corruptly, wilfully, falſely and maliciouſly, of his own proper act, conſent and agreement, did commit wilful, falſe, and corrupt Perjury; to the great diſhonour of Almighty God, and to the great damage, loſs and infamy of the ſaid William Lord Craven, and in contempt of the Laws of this Commonwealth; to the evil example of all others in the like caſe offending, and againſt the publick peace, &c.

(The reaſon wherefore this Indictment did not recite the Oath in hæc verba, as in the former Indictment, but aſſigned the Perjury in the material parts of the Oath; was by reaſon it came lately to knowledge, that the original Oath could not be found, and therefore the Oath was to be proved by the Entries in the Book of Parliament, and at Haberdaſhers-hall, and by the teſtimony of the Perſons who adminiſtred the Oath.)

The next day after the Indictment was found, the Profecutors for the Lord Craven moved the Court for a Habeas Corpus, to bring Faulconer to the Bar to plead to the Indictment; who being brought into Court, defired time to plead till the next Term. Whereupon the Court made this order;

That the faid Faulconer, having now in Court appeared unto the Indictment, fhould have time to plead unto the fame, until the beginning of the next Term, fo that the iffue thereupon may be tried at the Bar in open Court the fame Term.

Term Pafch. 1652.

Faulconer having all this vacation neglected to appear, or plead to the Indictment, the Profecutors for the Lord Craven were enforced again to move for another Habeas Corpus, to bring Faulconer to the Bar, to appear, or plead to the Indictment; who appearing, defired longer time to attend his Counfel, which the Court granted accordingly: and the ordinary Rules of Court were given unto him for the peremptory days of pleading, or Judgment to be entered againft him; and the very laft day, when the laft Rule was out, and not before, he pleaded Not Guilty. And the Court ordered, that the iffue upon the Indictment of Perjury againft the Defendant, be tried at the Bar upon Friday on the morrow of the Afcenfion of our Lord, and that the Sheriff of Middlefex do attend Andrew Broughton Efq; with the Book of Freeholders, forthwith; fo that an indifferent Jury may be returned between the faid Keepers, and the faid Defendant, to try the iffue aforefaid, by confent of the parties on both fides.

Mr. Broughton accordingly appointed the Sheriff to attend him the next day in the afternoon, with the Book of Freeholders; who accordingly named the Jury, and notice was given by the Sheriff, requiring them to appear at the day of Trial.

Friday, May 20. 1652.

THE Jury appearing according to fummons, and Faulconer being brought in cuftody, the Court proceeded to Trial, and ordered the Indictment to be read; which being afterwards opened by Mr. Boynton, the Evidence was managed by Mr. Maynard, Mr. Hales, Mr. Twifden, Mr. Wilde, Mr. Philips, Mr. Baldwin, and Mr. Drury; who were of Counfel for the Commonwealth againft the faid Faulconer.

Before the Counfel for the Commonwealth proceeded to produce any Witneffes, they offered unto the Court and the Jury fomething in general concerning the Indictment. That the Indictment was for the crime of Perjury, wilfully and corruptly committed; that Faulconer makes an Oath, that there was a Petition delivered, in which there was a very fharp reflexion (as he fwears) upon the Parliament, by the name of barbarous and inhuman Rebels; he fwears he was deputed to deliver it, being drawn by himfelf and Drury, and fubfcribed by thirty Officers; that in order to the delivery thereof, they did require the affiftance of the Lord Craven, that he promifed to fpeak for them, and brought them an anfwer: but they hoped to prove unto the Jury, that this Oath which Faulconer did take, was very falfe, that it was by defign, a defign for money; that the confequence of it was very notorious, the ruin of that Gentleman, of his Eftate, Fame and Fortune; that Witneffes will be produced to prove, what in truth the Petition was. There was a Petition delivered, but not a Petition to this effect at all, and Faulconer knew the contrary. We fhall produce what it was, and that under his own hand, whereby it will appear that there was no fuch matter in it, as he hath depofed; the Witneffes themfelves will beft fpeak the Particulars.

For the opening of fome things concerning this Oath of Faulconer, it is to be obferved, he took this Oath before the Commiffioners of Haberdafhers-hall, at Whitehall, and it was there reduced into writing, and a Tranfcript was made of the original: which Tranfcript was fent to the Council of State, and they ordered the fame to be reported to the Parliament; and being reported there, is entred in the Journal-Book, and there remains a Record in Parliament.

The firft thing therefore infifted upon by the Counfel for the Commonwealth, was the proving of a true Copy of Faulconer's depofition, in refpect the original was loft, or rather imbezeled by Faulconer. To prove the fame,

A Copy thereof was produced in Court, which agreed verbatim with that depofition of his, which was filed upon Record at Haberdafhers-hall; (the proper Court where it ought to remain:) and though that upon the file was but a Copy, yet it was filed as evidence of that defpofition he was fworn unto by them. But this was oppofed by the Counfel for Faulconer, as not fufficient proof; and thereupon a Copy of an order of the Council of State, of March 6. 1650, was produced unto the Court, whereby it did appear, that the depofitions againft the Lord Craven, had been tranfmitted to the Council of State, by the Commiffioners at Haberdafhers-hall. And it appeared further by the faid order, that Mr. Attorney-General was appointed by the Council of State, to report thefe depofitions to the Parliament, fo tranfmitted to that Council by the Commiffioners at Haberdafhers-hall. And the Attorney-General being fworn in Court, did declare that he reported no other depofitions to the Parliament, than what he received from the Council of State; and that the depofitions produced to him in Court, (whereof the faid Faulconer's was one) was endorfed with the hand-writing of the Lord Bradfhaw, then Lord-Prefident of the Council of State; and that the Votes of confifcation of the Lord Craven's Eftate, did pafs upon the report of the faid depofitions, which he prefented to the Parliament from the Council of State.

Mr. Fermin, Chief-Clerk to Mr. Scobel, Clerk of the Parliament, did depofe in Court, that the very fame depofitions fhewed in Court to Mr. Attorney-General, endorfed with the Lord Bradfhaw's hand-writing, were entered in the Journal-Book, as read in Parliament that day, when Mr. Attorney-General did make his Report unto the Parliament; which he knew the better to be true, for that he received the fame from the hands of Mr. Scobel, or Mr. Darnel, the Clerk-affiftant in Parliament, the fame day they were read in Parliament, to be entred in the Journal Book: and that he did enter the fame accordingly with the Votes of confifcation, which paffed upon the reading of thofe depofitions. And afterwards he and Mr. Darnel did examine the faid depofitions, whereof the faid Faulconer's was one, after the fame were fo entred into the Journal-Book.

And

And for the further ſatisfaction of the Court, he produced the Journal of Parliament, wherein the ſaid depoſitions (and particularly that of Faulconer) were entered, which were read in Court out of the Journal; whereby it did appear that the depoſitions of the ſaid Faulconer, Kitchingman and Reyley, were entred into the ſaid Journal, and did agree verbatim with the Copy of Faulconer's, and their depoſitions remaining at Haberdaſhers-hall, and with the Copy reported by Mr. Attorney-General from the Council of State to the Parliament.

Mr. Winſlow, one of the Commiſſioners at Haberdaſhers-hall, being one before whom the ſaid Faulconer was ſworn, did teſtify upon Oath in Court, that the depoſition of Faulconer produced unto him, and whereupon there was an endorſement of the Lord Bradſhaw's hand-writing; was, as he did believe, a true Copy of that depoſition to which the ſaid Faulconer was ſworn at Whitehall, for that he findeth his own hand ſubſcribed thereunto, (as examined by him to be a true Copy;) and ſaid it was uſual with the Commiſſioners at Haberdaſhers-hall, when they take examinations concerning any Perſon of Quality, to appoint one of themſelves to go from the Table to examine the Copy by the original: but whether when he ſubſcribed his name unto the Copy produced unto him, he did examine the ſame by the original depoſition before it was ſent for away by the Council of State, or afterwards, or by the Tranſcript remaining upon the file as a Record at Haberdaſhers-hall, he could not poſitively remember; but conceives that the Copy, to which his hand is ſubſcribed, as examined by him, to be a true Copy, was taken when they had the original in cuſtody; but cannot certainly ſay it.

Mr. Barners, another of the Commiſſioners at Haberdaſhers-hall, before whom alſo the ſaid Oath was taken, did teſtify upon Oath, that to the beſt of his remembrance, the particulars mentioned in Faulconer's depoſition, then read in Court, were the ſame to which the ſaid Faulconer was ſworn unto by himſelf and the reſt of the Commiſſioners, though he could not remember every Syllable and Letter.

Mr. Winſlow, and Mr. Barners, were again produced to declare what they did remember concerning this clauſe in the depoſition of the ſaid Faulconer's (viz.) That ſeveral Officers, about thirty in number, made a Petition to the King of Scots, to entertain them to fight for him againſt the Commonwealth of England, by the name of barbarous and inhuman Rebels, either in England, or Scotland, &c. And thereupon Mr. Winſlow did declare unto the Court, that he did well remember that clauſe in Faulconer's depoſition, when he was ſworn thereunto; but whether the number of Officers were thirty or no, he could not tell, but a certain number of Officers were named.

Mr. Barners did declare the like, but whether the word inhuman was in, he could not poſitively ſay; but was certain that barbarous Rebels was contained in that clauſe: and that when Faulconer was ſworn unto the ſame, it was firſt read unto him, and amended in ſeveral places, and then he ſwore it to be true. And Mr. Barners ſaid, that he did remember his depoſition the better, for that himſelf, and the reſt of the Commiſſioners had ſeveral debates upon it at Haberdaſhers-hall, whether they ſhould thereupon ſeize, ſequeſter, or ſecure the Lord Craven's Eſtate.

Having thus traced this Oath of Faulconer's, which was taken at Whitehall, and brought to Haberdaſhers-hall, afterwards brought from Haberdaſhers-hall back again to Whitehall, and from Whitehall to the Parliament, and there entered in the Journal-Book, as the grounds upon which the Votes of confiſcation did paſs; and having withal proved that particular clauſe of barbarous and inhuman Rebels, &c. the Counſel for the Commonwealth concluded as to that point, and left it to the Jury to judge; and to Faulconer to produce the original, which he hath got into his cuſtody, if he can find any variance in it from the depoſition recited in the Indictment.

And to prove that Faulconer had got the original Oath into his cuſtody; Mr. Knight a Witneſs was produced, who did teſtify upon Oath, that being in the company of Faulconer, he did ſhew him a writing written with Captain Biſhop's own hand, (ſo far as he could judge one man's hand to be like another) and that Faulconer's name was ſubſcribed thereunto; and that Faulconer told him the ſaid Knight, that that writing was the original depoſition he was ſworn unto, againſt the Lord Craven, and which he kept on purpoſe to keep Mr. Biſhop in awe, (Faulconer being then in neceſſity and want) and that the ſaid Faulconer further ſaid unto him, the ſaid Knight, that he had received 20 l. for the buſineſs of the Lord Craven, and was to have more; but ſaid he deſerved 2000 l. for what he had done.

In the next place, the Counſel for the Commonwealth did apply themſelves to prove the falſity of the Oath, (viz.) That there was no ſuch thing in the Petition mentioned by Faulconer in his depoſition, [as that thirty Officers did petition to be entertained to fight for the King of Scots againſt the Commonwealth of England, by the name of barbarous and inhuman Rebels, &c.] And being to prove a Negative, they applied their proof to a certain time and place, which Faulconer in his own depoſition did prove for them; for he ſwears, that the Petition was delivered the Evening before the King of Scots went from Breda, and that the ſaid King went away the next morning at three a-clock. He ſwears further, that he and Drury drew the Petition, and were deputed to deliver the ſame, accordingly they applied their evidence.

Proofs, as to the Falſity of Faulconer's Oath.

MR. Horſnel being produced, did teſtify; that the night before the King of Scots went from Breda, Colonel Drury, Captain Briſco, and divers others, were with a little ſhort Petition to remember the King of a former Petition which they had delivered, that ſome courſe might be taken, that their arrears which they owed in the Town might be paid, that their Landlords where they lodged might not ſuffer, for they were not able themſelves to pay them; that he went along with them to the great window juſt over the moat, and there he the ſaid Horſnel did ſet his hand unto the ſame, and that he was in the Chamber when Drury and Briſco came in to deliver the Petition, in which there was not a word that concerned any thing, but only the relief of their preſent neceſſities. Being aſked by the Court, if there were not a mention of barbarous and inhuman Rebels; he anſwered, not any thing of that nature was in it. He further ſaid, that this Petition had reference to a former Petition he was not acquainted withal, nor was his hand ſet to the former Petition.

Captain Briſco being produced, did teſtify, that there were divers Gentlemen in great diſtreſs met together in Colonel Drury's chamber, at the time of the Treaty of the Scots King with the Commiſſioners at Breda, and among other things it was agreed to draw a Petition to the King; which was drawn in Colonel Drury's chamber, expreſſing their neceſſities, that the People of the Town might be relieved, and that the Petitioners might not be left to periſh: that going to deliver it, they met with Secretary Long by the way, who told them it was to no purpoſe, for there was no moneys come in. Afterwards the Petitioners had notice the King was to depart from Breda, whereupon they met together again, and went into the further end of the Gallery to draw a ſhort Petition, to put the King in mind of his promiſe to Secretary Long, concerning the People of the Town of Breda, that they might be ſatisfied, and the Petitioners relieved; which Paper he the ſaid Briſco delivered to the Scots King, who threw it on a Table; and doing ſo, they ſtood all amazed, being likely to be left in diſtreſs: and unexpectedly came in the Lord Craven, whereupon he the ſaid Briſco, having long ſerved in the Country, and knowing him to be a lover of Soldiers, he ſpoke unto him, and ſaid, Sir, we are a company of poor diſtreſſed Gentlemen, likely to be left here in miſery, (he ſaid, Well) and the next morning the King went away, without giving any relief unto the Petitioners. The Court demanded of Briſco, whether there were no ſuch matter in it as barbarous and inhuman Rebels; he anſwered, that he read it, and was ſure there was no ſuch thing in it, the whole ſcope of it being to relieve their neceſſities, which was the occaſion of that Petition. Being demanded again by the Court, if barbarous and inhuman Rebels were not in the Petition; he anſwered, no, not any ſuch words at all, nor ſo much as any mention of the Parliament.

Colonel Drury was in the next place produced, who teſtified, that being at Breda, Lieutenant-Colonel Bardſey, Major Faulconer, Major Hall, Captain Kitchingman, and divers others came to his lodging, and told him that they were in a condition of ſtarving, and deſired him that he would aſſiſt them to draw a Petition to the King of Scots, to relieve their neceſſities, or elſe they muſt periſh; that the ſaid Drury being in their condition, conſented unto it, and in his chamber, in his ſon's paper-book the Petition was drawn, Major Faulconer writ it with his own hand; which, ſaith Drury, I have here to ſhew; and ſo preſented the original under Faulconer's hand unto the Court: in which Petition (ſaid Drury) we deſired ſome relief from his Majeſty, ſhewing how we had ſerved the former King, and in what neceſſities we were. That they were adviſed to deliver it to Secretary Long, for that they were told that the King had not a Piſtole to relieve himſelf, and it would be a vain thing, ſaid Long, to deliver it. That they followed Secretary Long, and ſolicited him daily for three weeks together, and ſtill he put them off; and the day before the King went from Breda, they drew a ſhort Petition to mind the King of his promiſe to Secretary Long, and to deſire that the Inhabitants of Breda that had relieved them, might not be undone; that Briſco was deputed with him to deliver it, and he accordingly delivered it to the King; that the King laid it down upon the Table: in ſteps the Lord Craven, then Captain Briſco, having trailed a Pike under the Lord Craven, went to him, and told him there were many Gentlemen ready to ſtarve, and deſired him to ſpeak a favourable word to the Queen of Bohemia. To which the Lord Craven anſwered, Well, as Briſco then told him. The next morning the King of Scots went away, and ſo nothing at all was done for the Petitioners; that original Petition which Drury produced unto the Court, of Faulconer's own hand-writing, and in the preſence of Faulconer, was publickly read in Court, and was as followeth, viz.

May it pleaſe your Majeſty,

THE great ſenſe we have always had of your Majeſty's preſent condition, hath been the prime cauſe of our long ſilence; but now our neceſſities are grown ſo great and inſupportable, that we are inforced either to petition or periſh: Moſt humbly deſiring your Majeſty, to take into your princely conſideration, their extremities, who have been ever ready to proſtrate their Lives in your Majeſty's Royal Father's ſervice: nor no leſs willing and ready to proſecute the ſame in what your Majeſty ſhall command: Moſt humbly petitioning your Royal Order, that ſome courſe may be taken for our preſent ſubſiſtance, that our future endeavours may not be buried in that unavoidable calamity, which our Loyalty hath reduced us unto.

And we ſhall cordially pray for your Majeſty.

The Court demanding of Colonel Drury, if the ſaid Petition was Faulconer's own hand-writing; he ſaid yea, and looking back upon Faulconer, ſaid, he cannot deny it: I did dictate unto him, and Faulconer did write it in my chamber; and that is the very original that was ſo drawn, and being fair written, was afterwards delivered to Secretary Long: the other that was delivered, was a memorial, to put the King in mind of his promiſe when money came in. And Drury further ſaid, that when he was examined by Mr. Biſhop, he did give in his Examination, the contents of the firſt and latter Petition; and ſaid, he did expreſs himſelf at that time of his Examination by Mr. Biſhop, to the ſame effect which he had now done in Court. Being asked by the Court, if the words barbarous and inhuman Rebels were in that firſt Petition, the ſaid Drury anſwered, that Faulconer moved to have barbarous and inhuman Rebels inſerted into that Petition ſo drawn by himſelf, but was anſwered by the Petitioners, that as they were Soldiers of fortune, it was uncivil language, and ſo they would not give way unto it. Being demanded by the Court, who was deputed to deliver the laſt Petition, he ſaid, Captain Briſco was one, in regard he had many wounds at Canon-Froom, that the King might commiſerate his caſe the more, and that he the ſaid Drury was alſo deputed with Briſco to deliver the ſame, becauſe he was known to the Queen of Bohemia, and ſome other perſons of quality, and Faulconer was not at all deputed. Being asked, if the Lord Craven was preſent at the delivery of the firſt Petition; he anſwered no, the Petition was delivered three weeks before: but the Lord Craven was preſent when the laſt Petition was delivered, to mind the King of his promiſe. The ſaid Drury further informed the Court, that afterwards Faulconer being diſcontented that he got no money, ſaid, as he was going into Town, This is a horrid thing, that we ſhould be in this caſe, to follow a thing they call a King, (God damn me) I will go into England, and do all the miſchief I can.

Proofs as to the Credit of Faulconer.

IN the next place the Counſel for the Commonwealth did apply themſelves to offer proof as to the credit of Faulconer. Mr. Wooldridge of Clements-Inn, Inn, Attorney at the Common Law, being ſworn, did teſtify to this purpoſe; that being in his chamber at Clements-Inn, about this time twelve Month, Faulconer came to him, asked how ſome of his Countrymen near Petersfield did? That he asked Faulconer where he had been of ſo long a time? Who anſwered, he had been in the Low-Countries; had ſeen ſome Lords ſit in Council for the King, that he had been ſworn againſt the Lord Craven, which would bring a great deal of advantage to the State, that he had money for the doing of it, and ſaid that he had received already 80*l.* (it was that ſum here mentioned, ſaid Mr. Wooldridge, to the beſt of his remembrance:) but Faulconer ſaid, he did expect a greater reward; that the ſaid Faulconer hath been as wicked a man as any in England; that he ſpent his Eſtate and left the Country, did wicked acts while he was there; that being at Petersfield, he drank an health to the Devil in the middle of the Street, of which information being given, we ſent to the Juſtice of the Peace in the Town, and had him bound over to the Seſſions for doing of it; but ſaid, he did not ſee him drink the health to the Devil.

Mr. Jackſon of Petersfield being produced, teſtified, about five years ago, Faulconer was ranting and drinking of healths, that he did drink a health to the Devil, and ſaid this, I have ſpent my Brother's Eſtate, and my own, I will never want money, for whilſt there is any in the Nation, I will get it one way or other, and I will do ſomething of Infamy to be talked of, that the name of Faulconer ſhall never die. Being asked in what manner he did drink the health, he anſwered, in the Street, down upon his knees; that he was preſent, and thouſands can witneſs it, that he was had before a Juſtice of Peace for it.

James Graham being ſworn, did teſtify, that in May 1647, after the Siege at Exeter, it was his fortune to fall into the company of Faulconer, and as he was with him in the cellar, he was ſwearing damn him, blood and wounds; takes a two and twenty ſhilling piece of Gold, put it into his hand, and ſaid, God damn him, blood and wounds, he would bugger his Soul to Hell, and theſe words he uſed frequently to Man, Woman and Child, bugger, bugger, bugger; and correct him for it, he would ſay, damn him, blood and wounds, he would do it. Being asked by the Court, if Faulconer did any thing upon him; he anſwered, no, he was able to deal with as good a Man as he.

Mr. Hughes hath often heard Faulconer ſwear, damn him and ſink him, and ſuch wicked expreſſions.

Mr. Bradley did teſtify, that he heard Faulconer ſay, our Saviour Chriſt was a Baſtard, and a Carpenter's Son, and carried a basket of Tools after his Father.

Mr. Dyer being produced, did declare that Faulconer confeſſed to him, that he had ten pound of a man, by procuring one to perſonate Captain Biſhop; it was thus, (as Faulconer told him) that a Citizen, as he remembred Faulconer ſaid, did deſire Faulconer to get Captain Biſhop to do a buſineſs for him, which Citizen did promiſe him twenty pound, ten in hand, and ten afterwards; whereupon Faulconer ſaid he got one to perſonate Captain Biſhop, and to go along with him to the Citizen: which man ſo perſonating Captain Biſhop, promiſed the Citizen upon the account of Major Faulconer's good ſervices for the publick, to afford him his beſt aſſiſtance in the effecting of what was deſired in his Petition, which ſtory Faulconer himſelf told. And Faulconer further ſaid, that Captain Biſhop had uſed him ill, in keeping him ſo low in money, that he had it one time in his thoughts, as Captain Biſhop came from the Committee-Chamber, through the Guard-Chamber, down the ſtairs, to have cut his throat. Being asked by the Court, what money Faulconer had of Captain Biſhop, he anſwered, he paid to Faulconer with his own hands, by Captain Biſhop's direction, twenty pound at one time, and about thirty pound more at other times, in ſeveral portions; that Faulconer confeſſed to him he had twenty pound afterwards. Being demanded what it was for, he gave that money; he ſaid, I will not ſpeak to that, I cannot ſpeak to that.

Captain Ballard being produced, did teſtify, that about three or four years ago, he came to Faulconer's lodging, and ſaw him write a letter in his chamber, and that he writ it as if it had come from Colonel Burgeſs from Jerſey, and ſet Burgeſs's name to it; and Faulconer would have had him the ſaid Ballard, to carry this letter to one Captain Biſhop that belonged to the Council of State, and to ſay he had the letter from one of Briſtol, and get ſome money of Biſhop for that intelligence mentioned in the letter, of which the ſaid Ballard was to have half: but he the ſaid Ballard refuſed to go with the ſame, knowing it to be unjuſt.

Mr. Powel, a Juſtice of Peace of the County of Middleſex, did teſtify to the Court, that this Faulconer was brought before him upon ſuſpicion of Felony, and committed, which Mittimus he produced in Court; and that afterwards the Lord Chief-Juſtice Rolls did ſend for him out of New-Priſon to Newgate; that Faulconer hath a common name for a Robber on the highway.

Mr. Goodman, Goaler of Ailesbury, did teſtify unto the Court, that the ſaid Faulconer the 20th of March 1648, was committed to Ailsbury Goal, by Sir Thomas Saunders, Mr. Bulſtrode, and two other Juſtices of the Peace, upon ſuſpicion of Felony, Robbery and Murder, and tendered a Certificate thereof in writing unto the Court.

The Defence made on the behalf of Faulconer.

THE evidence being given on the behalf of the Commonwealth, Mr. Windham, Mr. Latch, Mr. Lechmere, and Mr. Haggat, of Counſel for Faulconer, did offer ſomething to the conſideration of the Court, before they did produce their Witneſſes; viz. that although it concerns every man that Perjury ſhould be puniſhed; for every man's life, liberty, fortune and eſtate depends upon an Oath, and in theſe times it is ſomewhat dangerous if they ſhould be forſworn; ſo on the other ſide, if Faulconer be not forſworn, it is but juſt he ſhould be acquitted. That the Counſel for the Commonwealth have endeavoured to prove that there was a Petition, but that there was no ſuch words in the Petition as are ſuggeſted, and have endeavoured to impeach the credit of Faulconer: that they have produced a copy of Faulconer's Oath, which ought not to be admitted, becauſe it is but a Tranſcript of a Tranſcript, a Copy of a Copy, brought from Haberdaſhers-hall to the Council of State, and from the Council of State to the Parliament, and there the copy is entered in the Journal-book. And the Witneſſes that have been produced, do not ſwear poſitively to the Oath as it is in writing, and one particle may turn the whole ſenſe of an Oath: and though theſe words barbarous and inhuman Rebels were in it, yet how it is applied, and how the ſenſe of it falls, it cannot be judged, but by the original writing itſelf, and it concerns the Counſel for the Keepers to produce it. How it ſhould come into Faulconer's hands, there is no account given, but by one Knight, who ſaith Faulconer ſhewed him a thing, which Faulconer ſaid was his [original] depoſition againſt the Lord Craven, but the credit of Knight's teſtimony is left to the Jury. It is ſworn, that that copy produced in Court was examined, but Mr. Winſlow doth not poſitively ſay it was examined by the original, when in their cuſtody.

That as to the Witneſſes produced againſt the credit of Faulconer, they did hope to counterpoiſe his life to be, as of a man that might be credited: that in the Petition delivered at Breda, there is ſomething of thoſe words, though there be not barbarous and inhuman Rebels, which was but a nominal thing; yet the proſtrating of themſelves to proſecute the cauſe, is deſired may be obſerved; though the actual words be not there, yet the ſenſe doth bear it: that the caſe is ſomewhat hard with Faulconer, who was imployed at the Court at Breda as an emiſſary, as a ſpy: and at his return in giving an account of his obſervations at Breda, let ſomething fall concerning the Lord Craven, without any deſign in him; and that what Faulconer delivered in his depoſition was with qualifications, as he did believe to his beſt remembrance, and the like.

Hereupon Captain Biſhop was produced on the behalf of Faulconer, as a Witneſs, whoſe diſcourſe was long, and conſiſted of three parts.

1. It took notice how the Council of State ſent for him from his habitation at Briſtol, to be imployed in matters of great truſt, and afterwards what truſt was repoſed in him and Mr. Scot, in order to the ſafety of the Nation.

2. By way of argument on behalf of Faulconer, he did declare what ſervices Faulconer had done for the Commonwealth, and that Faulconer was one by whom this Commonwealth ſate ſafe at this hour, and by whom he enjoyed his life: and what an ill requital this was to be thus proceeded againſt.

The third part of his diſcourſe was, to declare what particular deſigns the State formerly had in hand, and what deſigns the enemy had againſt the State; and what ſervice he did to countermine the enemy in their deſigns: the laſt of the three being not (as was conceived) ſo adviſedly ſpoken in publick, and which would be more unfit to be in print, ſhall therefore here be paſt over in ſilence, as alſo what Captain Biſhop ſaid at large concerning the two firſt particulars, in reſpect they are no proofs pertinently to be applied, as to the Perjury in queſtion.

An account only ſhall be therefore given what Captain Biſhop properly ſpoke as a Witneſs.

As a Witneſs, Captain Biſhop ſaid, he had never ſeen Faulconer in drink or misbehave himſelf, but ever obſerved him as a ſober man; that he drew Faulconer's information [which Faulconer did deliver as the ſubſtance] and that he muſt ſay, that the words [or to that effect] ſhould have been put in, and that it was his fault they were not in, and he could not tell but that they were in; that the Commiſſioners at Haberdaſhers-hall, were deſired to come to Whiteball to adminiſter an Oath to the ſaid Faulconer privately, leſt danger ſhould befall the Witneſſes if they were diſcovered.

That Horſnel was formerly an Agent for the Prince, and was to receive orders from Tom Cook in the Tower, and was ordered to be tried by the High Court of Juſtice: that Colonel Drury was a Papiſt in arms, and being brought before him to be examined, ſtill had the Lord Craven in his mouth, before he was asked a queſtion.

The like of Briſco. He ſaid, that before Drury and Briſco came from beyond ſeas, his Agent gave him notice of their coming, and thereupon he laid wait for them, and caught them; that Drury ſaid, when he was examined, that he had not a penny of money, that he did not commit him to priſon, but took his parole, and in commiſeration gave him two ſhillings and ſix pence for his ſupper. He ſaid further, that Drury did contradict himſelf in what he had formerly informed the Council of State, and to that end produced in Court the copy of Drury's Information; which being read in Court, agreed with the teſtimony which Drury then gave to the Jury.

[By way of digreſſion obſerve, That Drury's and Briſco's Informations, which Captain Biſhop had taken above twelve months ſince, and which tended to clear the Lord Craven, he concealed till this hour that he produced the ſame in Court, and never tranſmitted thoſe two mens Examinations to the Parliament; though before the Bill of Sale did paſs, he did tranſmit Bardſey's and Kitchingman's Re-Examination taken by himſelf, and which he apprehended made againſt the Lord Craven.]

Captain Biſhop further ſaid, that whereas it was objected that Faulconer had money; he anſwered, that it is great reaſon he ſhould have money, for there was a real effect of the ſafety of the Commonwealth by his ſervices: that notwithſtanding any thing hath been ſworn againſt Faulconer, he believes what he ſwore was truth.

Captain Biſhop ſpeaking again of Faulconer's depoſition, that the words [or to that effect] ſhould have been added; the Court asked him whether Faulconer gave any directions to expreſs theſe words in his Examination: to which Captain Biſhop made anſwer, that the depoſition he made, was the ſubſtance of things, and he put it in words, and that [or to that effect] if they were not in, ſhould have been in. The Court again asked him, if Faulconer did direct him to put in theſe words, [or to that effect;] he replied again, he did deliver the whole, as the effect of it.

Captain Biſhop being further asked by the Court, if he were preſent when the Commiſſioners gave the Oath, and took what Faulconer ſaid in way of Information, he anſwered, That he prepared it before the Commiſſioners were ſent for, and then they had only the adminiſtring the Oath; and ſaid again, I prepared the Information which he made Oath of. Hereupon Mr. Winſlow deſired leave to inform the Court, that when he and the reſt of the Commiſſioners came to Whiteball to adminiſter this Oath, being ſent for to that end, the Information was ready prepared by Captain Biſhop, and having no Regiſter with them, they made uſe of Captain Biſhop; being well skilled in the uſe of his pen, to write over the depoſition: for though he had prepared the depoſition, the Commiſſioners did ſee occaſion to alter much of it; and it was writ over again, and then read to Faulconer, and atteſted by him, and ſubſcribed unto by the hands of all the Commiſſioners then preſent; and the Oath which we gave him was this, Whether the depoſition thus drawn, and that which he was examined unto, was the Truth, the whole Truth, and nothing but the Truth; Mr. Barners atteſted the like: then Captain Biſhop ſat down.

After this Lieutenant-Colonel Joyce was produced, who likewiſe ſpake of very great deſigns, and of matters of State, and what diſcoveries were made by Faulconer; which being not pertinent to the Perjury, ſhall be here omitted: but as a Witneſs he ſaid, that Horſnel was formerly an Agent for the Prince.

That Faulconer was a Hampſhire man, a Gentleman well-bred, that he was an enemy to himſelf in ſpending his Eſtate, that he was always faithful to the Parliament; that he believes Faulconer hath cufft ſome of the Witneſſes produced againſt him for their malignancy, and that nothing could be expected to come from them to the credit of Faulconer: that Faulconer was ſent over by him as a ſpy into Holland, upon account of his faithfulneſs.

Lieutenant-Colonel Bardſey was produced in the next place, on the behalf of Faulconer, who teſtified, that he put his hand to the Petition, at Breda; that the Lord Craven was deſired to deliver it to the King of Scots, that the Lord Craven ſaid he was no Courtier, but a ſervant to the States of Holland; that it was fitter for the Princeſs Royal to deliver it, than himſelf, and ſo returned the Petition again. That the Queen of Bohemia told the Petitioners, the King would do for them what he was able; but about four a-clock in the morning he went away, and they had no other anſwer: that the contents of it was to put the King in mind of his promiſe, that ſome money might be delivered to the Petitioners for diſcharge of their quarters at Breda. Being asked by the Court, if there were any ſuch expreſſions in it, as barbarous and inhuman Rebels, he anſwered no. Being asked, if to that Petition which Faulconer drew, he would have had barbarous and inhuman Rebels added; he anſwered yea, Faulconer did move to have thoſe words in, but was refuſed it: that he the ſaid Bardſey read over that Petition, and ſet his hand to it, and was at the penning of it, and Faulconer wrote it.

Captain Kitchingman being produced, did teſtify, that a Petition was drawn at Breda, and ſigned by him, Faulconer, and others, to be preſented to the King of Scots; that it was in purſuance of gaining money to diſcharge their quarters, and to enable them to ſerve the King, but knows not by whom it was delivered; that Secretary Long was to iſſue out money unto them, but they never had any; and in order to the gaining of that money, there was another Petition drawn, but by whom delivered, he knew not; only he ſaw a paper in the Queen of Bohemia's hand, which was told him was the Petition, and after a quarter of an hour's diſcourſe with the King, ſhe delivered it to the King, but they never received any money upon that neither: that he did not read the laſt Petition at all, nor heard it read; that it was the firſt Petition which he ſigned.

Colonel Dove was produced in Court on the behalf of Faulconer, who ſaid, he knew nothing of his birth, he only knew his Father and Mother, that they lived in good faſhion and credit; but how this Faulconer hath been brought up, and where he hath inhabited for theſe ten or twelve years, he knew not: and that this was as much as he could ſay.

Michel, an Alehouſe-keeper, was then produced, who ſaid he knew nothing of Faulconer, but that he was a very honeſt man, Faulconer having lain in his houſe, a year and three quarters; that he knows nothing to the contrary, but that he was a good Scholar, an honeſt man, and brought up at the Univerſity.

Captain Mowbrey being produced as a Witneſs, did teſtify, that Anno 1649, in Amſterdam, he met accidentally with Captain Briſco, who ſaid to him and others, Gentlemen, I ſee you are in a ſad condition, I will ſet you in a way to get money; here are Dutchmen taking up Men to go to Plantations, and you ſhall have twelve ſtivers a-piece a day, but I will warrant you, I will force them to leave you behind: and accordingly they received twelve ſtivers a day, and Briſco would have had them on ſhip-board, but one Church an Engliſhman, bid them take heed what they did, for he ſerved ſome Engliſhmen ſo before, clapt them under decks, and received ſo many ſix Dollars a-piece for them, and ſo left them: that he hath known Faulconer five years, and he hath behaved himſelf civilly for aught he ever knew.

Mr. Corey did teſtify ſomething to this purpoſe, in reference to Briſco's ſending men to Plantations; who ſaid further, he had no more to ſay againſt Briſco, but that he was a man would drink, and ſometimes ſwear as well as other men, that are accuſtomed to it; that he knows nothing to the contrary, but that he came to Breda to wait for imployment: in the mean time, whilſt he was there, he did as other men did, ſtrive to ſeek for relief.

After the Court had with much patience heard Captain Biſhop, and the reſt of the Witneſſes on the behalf of Faulconer, the Counſel for Faulconer ſum'd up the Evidence, and left it to the Jury, with ſome further obſervations; viz.

That though the words barbarous and inhuman Rebels were not in the Petition, yet there were words of tender of ſervice, as the King ſhould command, and to proſecute his cauſe, which was the ſubſtance of the thing informed by Faulconer; that Captain Biſhop, and Lieutenant-Colonel Joyce, who have teſtified of Faulconer's ſervices, were witneſſes to be preferred before any witneſſes produced againſt Faulconer; that the endeavour is not only to convict this man, but by conviction and diſabling of his credit, to undermine that which hath been acted by the Parliament, upon his teſtimony, and other concurrent teſtimonies, not only in paſſing Votes, but in paſſing an Act of Parliament to ſell an Eſtate.

That there was nothing objected againſt the credit of this Witneſs, ſo long as there was any other ſtone to turn, though there were other endeavours uſed in Parliament, to prevent the ſale of the Lord Craven's Eſtate; ſo that when all other refuges failed, then they make uſe of this Indictment of Perjury, and ſo hope to undermine the Act of Parliament. Though Faulconer might have ſome extravagance, yet you ſee what his part was to act, to diſſemble that he was not what he was; and it may be, when he was amongſt the God-dammes, and ſuch kind of men, it was his part to be what moſt conduced to his end, [like themſelves:] for a man, as he was imployed, muſt twine himſelf into all ſhapes, and though not drink a health, yet ſometimes hold a candle to the Devil; that they acknowledge the charge in part, and would lay it in words, not in ſubſtance, and therefore not ſtrictly in the letter true.

That it was proved that the firſt Petition was to ſerve the King, as they formerly had ſerved his Father, and they ſerved his Father againſt the Parliament: ſo their offer muſt needs be, to be entertained to ſerve the King againſt the Parliament.

That it is a ſad caſe, that this man for ſo many ſervices performed by him for the Commonwealth, and ſettlements grounded upon his information, muſt be blaſted here by an artificial Indictment a great while after.

And if he ſhall after all this be convicted of Perjury, it will be a diſcouragement for all men to undertake the like imployment for the future.

And laſtly, the Counſel for Faulconer did offer, that if there be a miſtake in what he hath ſworn, yet it appears not to be maliciouſly or corruptly done, and that therefore the Jury ought to find for Faulconer.

The Reply by the Counſel, on the behalf of the Commonwealth, againſt Faulconer, was to this purpoſe following.

GEntlemen of the Jury, you have heard the defence that Faulconer hath made; we have charged him, that he did take the Oath that was ſet down in the Indictment. They ſay, Firſt, We have not proved it; Secondly, That he did not take it, but did take it in effect; and Thirdly, If he did, it was not maliciouſly, nor corruptly: but not one of them hath ſaid it is not falſe, no not one of their own Counſel. The evidence that hath been given, for the moſt part, hath been to magnify the ſervice of this man, that is now in queſtion before you: we ſhall admit his ſervices to be true, but this we ſhall be bold to ſay, that a man that is imployed beyond ſea, and gives good return of his ſervice in ſome kind, that that will not give him licenſe to make a falſe accuſation in another kind: and it is no argument to ſay, that becauſe this man was a ſpy beyond the ſea, and did good ſervice as a ſpy, that therefore he did not give a falſe Information; in this he muſt not take a liberty to ruin any man by a falſe Oath: his ſervice muſt not excuſe him, if what he hath ſaid be falſe.

As for what Mr. Biſhop ſaid concerning his Oath; Mr. Biſhop tells you, it is his fault if the words [or to that effect] were not put down; if it were not, whoſe fault was it? It was mended by thoſe whoſe judgments and conſciences induced them to it: the Information he took was done by the judgment of the Committee, and not by the direction of him that was a Miniſter, a Scribe to write, and not a Judge to dictate and correct. You have here two men of unqueſtionable truth and honeſty every way, (meaning Mr. Winſlow, and Mr. Barners,) that ſay poſitively, he did ſwear it; and God forbid that we ſhould live to that day, that any man ſhould be ruined upon a depoſition, taken by the judgment of a Clerk, to ſuch or ſuch effect. If we ſhould come to ſuch a piece of Juſtice, that a depoſition to ſuch and ſuch effect, and that taken by a Clerk, ſhould come to caſt a man, it is beyond an Oath of &c. For it is the Judges that muſt ſay, what is the effect of an Oath, and not the Clerk that writes it. If a Clerk ſhall take an Oath, and he ſhall come and ſay, it is to this effect, never ſhall any man be free from him, that by Perjury will ruin another man. It is proved unto you, it was read over to Faulconer, expreſly mended in his ſight, and ſworn by him, and let the effect go with the &c. that went before it.

They objected to our Witneſſes, that Briſco had ſold his companions for twelve ſtivers a day; that information had no other foundation, than the ſaying of a Dutchman, that ſaid ſo, or of an Engliſhman in a Dutch bottom; and what was teſtified, was what was ſaid, and not what was known or ſworn. They objected, that Briſco would ſwear as well as another; that takes not off his teſtimony. But what do they ſay, concerning their own Witneſs Bardſey, whom they have produced? He hath ſworn in terminis, in effect with Drury, which you will not forget: he ſwore, that when the firſt Petition was drawing, it was moved by Faulconer, that the words barbarous and inhuman Rebels ſhould be put in; but it was rejected by them that were there, as a thing uncivil: ſo their own Witneſs concurs with Drury.

As for the depoſition on record at Haberdaſhers-hall, which being filed there, it is proof of itſelf, which no man may aver againſt, when it is recorded; we have ſhewed it there, traced it here, brought a copy of it, endorſed with the Lord Bradſhaw's hand; ſhall it be believed that a man ſhall be confiſcated and loſe his eſtate, and not ſo much as an Oath taken againſt him? It is apparent there was an Oath, and it is hoped you will believe that which the Parliament hath recodred, and expreſly proved by the Gentlemen of Haberdaſhers-hall here preſent; which you will believe before any imaginations that can be made on the other ſide.

They have endeavoured to ſay ſomething touching the converſation of this man, to uphold his credit; but Gentlemen of the Jury, you are to conſider of the man, what damnable blaſphemy hath come out of his mouth, you have heard it. If a man will go ſo high, as to kneel down to drink a health to the Devil, I hope there is no excuſe for that; his good ſervices muſt not plead for him to comply with God-dammes, that will not juſtify him, he was not ſent to do any ſuch thing. But we have not reſted there; have we not proved him a perſonater of other men, a decoy, and things that a man ſhould be aſhamed to name: the two and twenty ſhillings piece he took out, and what baſe wild words he ſpake, not fit to be repeated? that will not be palliated by any ſervice whatſoever. And for that which Mr. Biſhop hath ſaid, nothing ſhall be ſaid againſt him, but what appears to you; that Mr. Biſhop hath gone beyond a Witneſs: for when he hath done his teſtimony, he acteth and manageth the buſineſs, and in that is not equal to others that do not. For his expreſſion, that Faulconer is one of them by which the Commonwealth of England ſits ſafe at this hour; it is God we ſit ſafe by, and not by him: I blame him not for his ſervice, but when we are upon a queſtion of truth, I ſay truth and righteouſneſs is beyond all the ſervice in the world.

They ſay, my Lord Craven furthered the Petition, and promiſed to ſecond it. Gentlemen, you muſt diſtinguiſh that which my Lord Craven knew, and that which he knew not: There is not one Witneſs from beginning to ending, that can ever ſpeak one word, that my Lord Craven knew what the firſt Petition was. In that Petition was the expreſſion of venturing their Lives, which was three weeks before the latter, which was ſingly to deſire they might have money for their quarters. The firſt Petition had ſome expreſſions relating to their former ſervice, and ſome expreſſions of their readineſs for the future; but that Petition, my Lord Craven never ſaw, but was delivered to one Long three weeks before, and Drury did put it down in his depoſition, when he was examined by Mr. Biſhop, which agrees with that which was read in Court.

But

But the particular time when the latter Petition, or Memorial, was delivered, with which the Lord Craven is charged, was the evening before the King went from Breda.

They ſay that here is no corruption proved, and a man cannot be guilty without corruption: but certainly he that ſwears a thing that is falſe, it muſt of neceſſity be corrupt.

Faulconer ſwears, that thirty Officers did ſubſcribe the Petition: doth he bring any one to confirm his teſtimony, or the leaſt colour of evidence to what he hath ſworn?

It was further preſſed by the Counſel for the Commonwealth, that the Jury would diſtinguiſh theſe two things, between the Petition framed and dictated by Drury, and writ by Faulconer; and that other Petition delivered the night before the King went from Breda; the firſt is produced, and proved to be Faulconer's own hand: that Petition was three weeks before, which begs for maintenance, and proffers ſervice, the copy of which was brought forth before any evidence was given by them; for Drury upon his examination before the Council of State made the ſame known, and which agrees verbatim with that read in Court. So the dictating of that Petition was by Drury, the writing by Faulconer, the delivery was to Secretary Long, and that was the thing whereof they did expect an account; but that was not the Petition to which the teſtimony of Faulconer at all goes. That Petition of which this Oath is ſpoken, and to which it is apply'd, is the Petition which was drawn the evening before the Scots King went from Breda; that is the Petition talked of in the depoſition, that is the Petition upon which we pitch; and therefore if in that Petition there be none of theſe words, that which he hath ſworn unto is falſe: for in that Petition we ſay there was no ſuch words, as barbarous and inhuman Rebels; nor ſuch words of proffer of ſervice or malignity, but a meer deſire of ſupply; and they have not offered the leaſt proof to the contrary. And ſecondly, that it was not promoted by the Lord Craven, for the Petition was delivered by them to the Scots King, before ſuch time as the Lord Craven came into the room, ſo that my Lord Craven was no promoter of the Petition; and had he been a promoter of it, there was no ſuch thing in it, as might give offence: no not the leaſt mention of the Parliament, nor any thing that might offend. And whereas they object, that this Oath was not corrupt, the very words of his expreſſion are very conſiderable, for he doth remarkably fix the words in his depoſition, To fight againſt the Commonwealth of England, by the name of barbarons and inhuman Rebels: why would he fix ſuch an emphaſis upon it as that was? It could not be a bare miſtake: nor the words to this effect, as Mr. Biſhop would have had in, could never have ſerved the turn; for to ſay he would fight againſt the barbarous and inhuman Rebels, or to that effect, there is no ſuch effect in the one Petition nor in the other. Then a ſecond thing is, that this Faulconer being, as he depoſeth, the contriver of the Petition, it could not be a meer overſight and miſtake in him; and then when he could not have his deſire beyond ſeas, to get moneys, he ſaid, He would come here and do what miſchief he could.

The Counſel urged further: Gentlemen of the Jury, what is become of the original depoſition, it concerns not us to know, no more than the original of depoſitions taken in the Country: it lies upon them that are for the Oath to make it out. It cannot be preſumed that the Parliament would confiſcate a Nobleman's eſtate, and order it to be ſold: would they enter it into the Journal-book, and make it a record, ſhould it come and be tranſmitted from Haberdaſhers-hall, (the proper Judicatory for that buſineſs) to the Council of State, and from the Council of State to the Parliament, and then not to be a true Oath, or falſe Copy? That is not to be born, that a falſe Copy ſhould ſell a Gentleman's Eſtate, that a falſe Copy ſhould be recorded to ſtand to all Eternity.

After the reply was made; every Judge in Court ſpoke what they in their judgment thought fit, for the better direction of the Jury: whereupon the Jury withdrew, and the next day brought in their Verdict, That they found the ſaid Faulconer guilty of the Perjury mentioned in the Indictment. The Order following was thereupon made, viz.

By the Court;

The Defendant was this day brought into Court, under the Cuſtody of the Marſhal of this Court, upon an Indictment for Perjury, whereunto he had formerly pleaded not guilty; and the Jury thereupon being impannelled, and ſworn, found him guilty of the Perjury in the Indictment mentioned: and thereupon the ſaid Faulconer is committed to the Cuſtody of the ſaid Marſhal; there to remain until, &c.

XXVI. The Trial of Mr. John Lilburn, at the Seſſions of the Peace held for the City of London, at Juſtice-Hall in the Old-Bailey, upon Wedneſday, Thurſday, Friday and Saturday, the 13th, 14th, 15th, and 16th Days of July 1653. for returning into England, being baniſh'd by Act of Parliament.

[Written (the chief part) by the ſaid John Lilburn.]

I WAS Counſel or Proctor for my Uncle George Lilburn Eſq; and one Mr. Joſiah Primate, &c. about a Colliery taken from them in the County of Durham, by force and violence, by Sir Arthur Haſlerig; which he by his certificate computes to be worth five thouſand pounds Sterling per Annum. About which Colliery the ſaid Mr. Primate preferred a Petition to the Parliament, upon the 23d of December 1651. in the delivery and management of which I appeared, as by the declared Law of England, I might juſtifiably do.

Which Petition being by the Parliament referred to a Committee to examine it, who ſpent twelve or thirteen large hearings thereupon, and upon the 15th of January 1651, new ſtile, the Chairman thereof, Mr. Hill made his report to the Houſe; but what it was, we never were permitted to ſee nor to hear read. And as ſome Members of Parliament have ſince told me, he made his réport quite contrary to, or ſhort of the evidence that was given in: whereupon the Parliament, the ſaid 15th day of January, voted the foreſaid Mr. Primate's Petition to be falſe, malicious and ſcandalous; and that Sir Arthur Haſlerig is not guilty either of Oppreſſion or Tyranny, in the Carriage and Proſecution of this buſineſs; and that all the Copies of the ſaid Petition, (which, relating only to Primate, is not here inſerted) ſhould be burnt by the hands of the Common Hangman. And voted Mr. Primate to pay ſeven thouſand pound, or to lie in priſon till he pay it; which is all his puniſhment. And then the ſame day they paſſed certain votes againſt me, which as they themſelves, by ſpecial order of the 17th of January, have printed them, verbatim thus follow.

Reſolved, &c.

That the Fine of three thouſand pounds be impoſed upon Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburn, to be paid to the uſe of the Commonwealth.

That he be fined two thouſand pounds more, to be paid to Sir Arthur Haſlerig for his damages; and two thouſand pounds more to be paid to James Ruſſel, Edward Winſlow, William Molins, and Arthur Squib Eſqrs; four of the Commiſſioners for compounding; that is to ſay, to each of them five hundred pounds for their damages.

Reſolved, &c.

That Lieut. Col. John Lilburn, be baniſhed out of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the Iſlands and Territories thereunto belonging; and not to return into any of them, upon pain of being proceeded againſt as a Felon, and in caſe of ſuch return, ſhall ſuffer death accordingly.

Reſolved, &c.

That Lieut. Col. John Lilburn, do depart out of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the Iſlands and Territories thereof, within thirty days now next coming, and in caſe the ſaid John Lilburn ſhall, after the ſaid thirty days, be found within England, Scotland, or Ireland, or the Iſlands and Territories thereunto belonging, or any of them; the ſaid Lieut. Col. John Lilburn, ſhall be proceeded againſt as a Felon, and ſhall ſuffer the pains of death, accordingly.

Reſolved, &c.

That the Serjeant at Arms attending the Parliament, do apprehend the ſaid Lieut. Col. John Lilburn, and bring him to the bar of this Houſe, upon Tueſday morning next, to receive the judgment of Parliament aforeſaid, and that Mr. Speaker do direct a warrant to the Serjeant at Arms accordingly.

But being myſelf at the Parliament door when theſe Votes paſt, and underſtanding what they had done, although they ſate (to my remembrance) a good while after candle-light, I ſtaid: and when the Serjeant at Arms came forth with his mace, and the Speaker, I ſpoke to him in theſe words, or to this effect; Mr. Serjeant, I underſtand, the Houſe hath this day paſſed ſome Votes againſt me, in which regard I ſtaid on purpoſe, to ſee if you have any thing to ſay to me. Unto which he replied, No, Sir, I have no warrant yet to meddle with you, and therefore therefore you may go whither you pleaſe. Well, Sir, if you have none to-night, I will promiſe you, to wait upon you to-morrow morning, to ſee whether then you will have any or no. And being as good as my word, the next day being Friday, January the 16*th*, he committed me to the cuſtody of his Deputy Mr. Parſons, where I remained till Tueſday morning next, (as it was ordered in the laſt Vote) which was January the 20*th*; and coming to the Parliament-door, I was uſhered into the Bar by the Serjeant at Arms, having his mace upon his ſhoulder; where Mr. Speaker, as the mouth of the Houſe, expreſſed himſelf in theſe words, or to this effect.

Lieutenant Col. Lilburn, you are commanded by this Houſe to kneel: unto which I anſwered in theſe words, or to this effect; Sir, with all ſubmiſſion to this honourable Houſe, I deſire firſt a little liberty to ſpeak. No, Sir, ſaid he, you are not permitted to ſpeak at all, but commanded to kneel. Well then, Sir, ſaid I, with all ſubmiſſion I ſtoop unto your ſentence, that you have already paſt upon me, but I cannot kneel.

Lieutenant Col. Lilburn, ſaid he, the Houſe commands you to kneel. Well then, Sir, ſaid I, to be ſhort with you, I neither can kneel, nor will I kneel. Withdraw then, ſaid he; which I did accordingly, making them two or three congées at my going out, the which alſo I did as I came in. Whereupon, as I was informed, ſeeing that I would not kneel at their Bar to receive my ſentence, they voted to draw up an Act of Parliament to baniſh me; and paſſed another vote by way of puniſhment, to take off ten days of the time they had formerly given me to depart the land in. Although upon the Friday at night before, I with my Keeper went to the Serjeant's Houſe, and ſpoke to him to this purpoſe: Mr. Serjeant, I underſtand the Parliament ſits to-morrow, to chooſe the Commiſſioners for regulating the Law, and I know it is their uſual manner to command all men that come to their Bar, (that they look upon as delinquents or offenders) to receive their ſentence at their Bar kneeling. And truly, Sir, I have no deſire at all to affront them, or to vex them more than they are, for I believe they are vexed enough already at me. And therefore I beſeech you, oblige me ſo far unto you, as to tell the Speaker and ſome other Members, whom you pleaſe, from me, That when upon Tueſday I ſhall come to their Bar, to receive their ſentence, I ſhall not kneel, although they ſhould order you with your mace at their Bar to knock my brains out: and Sir, if you pleaſe to give me leave, I will render you my reaſon, and it is this. I know when any kneels at your Bar to receive a ſentence, the Parliament looks upon that action or geſture of kneeling, as a demonſtration of a man's own convincement in his own conſcience, that he is guilty, and thereby does deſerve ſuch a puniſhment, as by that ſentence is paſt upon him; the which if I ſhould do, I were in my own underſtanding the verieſt rogue in the world, becauſe my conſcience and ſoul tells me, that I have done no evil, nor broke none of the Parliament's Laws, but followed (as by the Laws of England I may juſtifiably do) an honeſt, juſt and righteous buſineſs, in a juſt and honeſt way, without uſing any baſe or wicked ungodly means to effect my deſign in it. And whatever Mr. Hill hath reported to the Houſe, I am ſure of it, we have fully proved every clauſe and circumſtance contained in our Petition, ſave only that clauſe of Sir Arthur Haſlerig's private correſponding with ſome of the Commiſſioners of Haberdaſhers-Hall. But if we had not proved the Petition, there is no Law extant in England to enable the Parliament in the leaſt to paſs ſuch a ſentence upon me: and therefore for me in words, actions or geſture, to do the leaſt circumſtance, to make the Parliament believe that I in mine own conſcience was convinced that they had paſſed a juſt ſentence upon me; I had rather, Mr. Serjeant, be cut in ten thouſand pieces, than be ſuch a rogue and traitor to mine own liberties and the nation's; and therefore I beg of you beforehand to tell them as much from me, that ſo they may avoid, if they pleaſe, their forcing me on Tueſday next to affront them. And he afterwards aſſured me, that the next day, being Saturday, he told twenty or thirty of the Members of Parliament of it; ſo that they put the affront upon themſelves, and not I. But upon the ſaid Tueſday, after that I was withdrawn out of the Houſe, and ſet at liberty to be gone as ſoon as I pleaſed, there being great ſtore of Citizens, my very good friends, at the door, (who were Perſons that had always faithfully adhered to the Paliament's cauſe) with a Petition for the revoking of my baniſhment; the Petition being called for in, was read and debated, but laid aſide, without giving any anſwer to the Petitioners. The Copy of which Petition, as ſince it is printed in England, thus followeth.

To the ſupreme Authority the Parliament of the Commonwealth of England,

The Humble Petition of many well-affected People, inhabiting the City of London, Weſtminſter, Southwark, and parts adjacent, in behalf of the juſt Liberties of the free People of England, highly concerned in the ſentence againſt Lieutenant Colonel John Lilburn *.

HUMBLY SHEWING,

THAT if the manifold ſervices, and extreme ſufferings of Lieutenant Col. John Lilburne, in oppoſition to tyranny and oppreſſion, and how inſtrumental he hath been in the removal of divers ſorts of oppreſſors, his wonderful deliverances and clear acquitments by legal trials, from all former accuſations, without the leaſt ſtain to his reputation; if all theſe could be forgotten, and that he ſtood in our thoughts, but as the meaneſt of well-affected perſons, (and ſuch at the leaſt we muſt allow him, having in all times adhered to Parliaments) yet in your late proceedings towards him, and heavy cenſure upon him, we apprehend our native rights ſo much concerned, that we never conceived a greater cauſe of ſpeedy application to you for redreſs, than upon this ſad occaſion.

For certainly it cannot be denied, but if he be really an offender, he is ſuch by the breach of ſome Law, made and publiſhed before the fact, and ought by due proceſs of Law, and verdict of twelve men, to be thereof convict, and found guilty of ſuch crime; unto which the Law alſo hath preſcribed ſuch a puniſhment agreeable to that our fundamental liberty; which enjoineth, that no freeman of England ſhould be adjudged of life, limb, liberty, or eſtate but by Juries; a freedom which Parliaments in all ages contended to preſerve from violation; as the birthright, and chief inheritance of the people, as may appear moſt remarkably in the Petition of Right, which you have ſtiled, that moſt excellent Law.

* This Petition ſhewing the eſteem and veneration Lilburn was in among the People; and the ſentiments thoſe times had of his Caſe, and the value they ſet on Trials by Juries, as the birthright of ENGLISHMEN; is the reaſon it's here inſerted.

And therefore we truſt upon ſecond thoughts (being the Parliament of England) you will be ſo far from bereaving us (who have never forfeited our right) of this our native right, and way of trials by Juries, (for what is done unto any one, may be done unto every one;) that you will preſerve them entire to us, and to poſterity, from the encroachments of any, that would innovate upon them. And if the original of the unhappy differences between Sir Arthur Haſlerig and Mr. Lilburn, be duly weighed, (being as we are informed) it will appear, that Sir Arthur's ſtoppage of moneys due to Mr. Lilburn, without legal proceſs, was the firſt occaſion thereof.

And it is believed, that if Mr. Primate's cauſe [wherein Sir Arthur and Mr. Lilburn have been ingaged] had at any time either at firſt or laſt been admitted to a trial at Law, and had paſſed any way by verdict of twelve ſworn men; all the trouble and inconveniences ariſing thereupon had been prevented: the way of determination by major votes of committees, being neither ſo certain nor ſo ſatisfactory in any caſe as by way of Juries, the benefit of challenges and exceptions, and unanimous conſent, being all eſſential privileges in the latter: whereas committees are tied to no ſuch rules, but are at liberty to be preſent or abſent at pleaſure. Beſides, Juries being birthright, and the other but new and temporary, men do not, nor [as we humbly conceive] ever will acquieſce in the one as in the other; from whence it is not altogether ſo much to be wondered at, if upon diſſatisfactions, there have been ſuch frequent printing of men's caſes, and dealings of committees, as there have been; and ſuch harſh and inordinate heats, and expreſſions between parties intereſted, ſuch ſudden and importunate appeals to your authority, being indeed all alike out of the true Engliſh road, and leading into nothing but trouble and perplexity, breeding hatred and enmities between worthy families, affronts and diſguſt between perſons of the ſame publick affection and intereſt, and to the rejoicing of none but publick adverſaries. All which, and many more inconveniences, can only be avoided, by referring all ſuch caſes to the uſual trials and final determinations of Law.

And, whereas you have cenſured Mr. Lilburn ſeven thouſand pounds fine, and to perpetual baniſhment, and to die as a felon if he return; we are exceedingly afflicted in our ſpirits thereby, not only becauſe he hath not had the uſual way of trial by Jury, which yet weighs very much with us; nor for that we believe he hath followed Mr. Primate's cauſe, out of ſtrong perſuaſion of the juſtneſs thereof, (the cauſe in it ſelf, as we have been informed, being very intricate and hard to be underſtood, and ſo did not wilfully or intentionally carry it out againſt his conſcience, ſome of the commiſſioners wiſhing to God it had therefore never came before them,) nor for that we believe him innocent of any wilful breach of Parliament privilege, in delivering printed Petitions, before the original was preſented unto you, [that being never before publiſhed, to be a breach] though all theſe add to our grief, yet the main of our affliction ariſeth from the deſtructiveneſs of the ſentence, as being therein contrary to that other our fundamental native right, which injoins that fines ſhould have regard to the qualities of the perſons; a plowman ſaving his wainage, and a merchant his merchandiſe. Whereas this, if relating to his eſtate, we believe is ſo far from preſerving him in his quality, as that it leaves himſelf, his wife and children, without ſuſtenance; if in relation to his perſon, his affection to Parliaments, and zeal to publick freedom, renders all foreign Nations ſo unſafe to him, as that in effect he is baniſhed into a wilderneſs, and expoſed naked to the fury of bears and lions.

The premiſes duly weighed, and for that (as we are informed) the parties accuſed and cenſured, have had no means to ſee what report hath been made by the honourable committee, nor have had the liberty of exceptions thereunto, in like caſes granted; and in that many well-affected people that heard the debates, and evidences on both ſides, are unſatisfied, both in point of poſſeſſion, and title to the colliery in queſtion; that the honour of Parliament may ſtand immaculate, our native fundamental rights inviolable, and all thoſe gentlemen concerned in this cauſe left without any the leaſt grudging, or juſt complaint;

We have deemed ourſelves bound in conſcience in moſt humble manner to intreat,

I. That you will be pleaſed to recall your forementioned grievous ſentence upon Lieutenant Col. John Lilburn, and the reſt concerned therein.

II. To give free liberty to Mr. Primate to proſecute his cauſe, both for title, and poſſeſſion at the common Law; and therein to make uſe of what counſel he ſhall think fit.

III. That Sir Arthur Haſlerig be referred to take his courſe at Law, for whatſoever injuries conceived to be done unto him by Lieutenant Col. John Lilburn, or any others, as was granted in M. Muſgrave's caſe with the ſaid Sir Arthur; and that Mr. Lilburn, or any others may have the ſame liberty againſt Sir Arthur, if they conceive any cauſe.

After which, the ſaid friends of mine drew up another, as they hoped, much more effectual than that foregoing. And upon the Tueſday after, being January the ſeven and twentieth, went up with it to the Parliament-houſe, but could not that day get it read. Upon which I that night ſup'd with about two hundred of them, at an houſe behind the Exchange in London; and the next morning went to the Speaker of the Parliament, and told him, that on the morrow, being Thurſday, I intended, by God's aſſiſtance, to take my journey for beyond ſea, and therefore intreated him to give me his Paſs: but he told me he durſt not for his hanging give me a Paſs. Unto which I replied; Sir, that is very ſtrange, that your houſe will command me, upon pain of death to leave England by ſuch a day, [which I am willing to do] and yet you will not enable me by your Paſs to be gone. For want of which, it is very probable, when I come at the ſea-ſide, your officers of the Cuſtom-houſe will ſtop me: and yet, becauſe I am not gone out of England before ſuch a day, I muſt be hanged. What is this elſe, but to lay a ſnare for my life? for you command me upon pain of death to be gone, and and yet you will not give me your Paſs to enable me to go, although it be almoſt impoſſible without it for me to get away.

Well, ſaith the Speaker, I dare not for my life give it you. So I was forced to depart without it. And the next morning, being Thurſday, January 29th, I took horſe at Finsbury-Stables by Moor-fields, and rid through London and Southwark, being accompanied with great ſtore of my friends on horſeback, who brought me divers miles on my journey. And the next day I came to Dover.

And being forced at Dover to make uſe of the Parliament's printed Votes about my baniſhment, for my Paſs, I was by the officers let go, and in a few hours time I arrived ſafe at Oſtend; and upon the 8*th* of February laſt, arrived (by God's bleſſing) at Amſterdam, the place of my deſired reſt and abode, where, within a few days after, I found a printed Act of Parliament, which thus followeth:

An Act for the Execution of a Judgment given in Parliament againſt Lieutenant Col. John Lilburn.

WHereas, upon the fifteenth day of January, in the year of our Lord, 1651, a Judgment was given in Parliament againſt the ſaid Lieutenant Col. John Lilburn, for high Crimes and Miſdemeanours by him committed, relating to a falſe, malicious and ſcandalous Petition heretofore preſented to the Parliament, by one Joſiah Primate, of London, Leatherſeller, as by the due proceedings had upon the ſaid Petition, and the Judgment thereupon given at large, appeareth: Be it therefore Enacted by this preſent Parliament, and by the Authority of the ſame, That the Fine of three thouſand pounds impoſed upon the ſaid John Lilburn, to the uſe of the Commonwealth, by the Judgment aforeſaid, ſhall be forthwith levied by due Proceſs of Law, to the uſe of the Commonwealth accordingly. And be it further Enacted, That the ſum of two thouſand pounds impoſed by the ſaid Judgment upon the ſaid John Lilburn, to be paid to Sir Arthur Haſlerig for damages, and the ſum of two thouſand pounds likewiſe impoſed by the ſaid Judgment upon the ſaid John Lilburn, to be paid to James Ruſſel, Edward Winſlow, William Molins and Arthur Squib in the ſaid Judgment named; that is to ſay, to each of them five hundred pounds for their damages, ſhall be forthwith paid accordingly: and that the ſaid Sir Arthur Haſlerig, James Ruſſel, Edward Winſlow, William Molins and Arthur Squib, their Executors and Adminiſtrators, ſhall have the like remedy and proceedings at Law reſpectively againſt the ſaid John Lilburn, his Heirs, Executors, Adminiſtrators and Aſſigns, for the recovery of the reſpective ſums ſo given to them by the ſaid Judgment, as if the ſaid reſpective ſums had been due by ſeveral Recognizances in the nature of a ſtatute Staple, acknowledged unto them ſeverally by the ſaid John Lilburn upon the ſaid 15th day of January, in the year of our Lord 1651. And be it likewiſe Enacted by the Authority aforeſaid, That the ſaid John Lilburn ſhall, within twenty days, to be accounted from the ſaid 15th day of January 1651, depart out of England, Scotland, Ireland, and the Iſlands, Territories, and Dominions thereof: And in caſe the ſaid John Lilburn at any time after the expiration of the ſaid twenty days, to be accounted as aforeſaid, ſhall be found, or ſhall be remaining within England, Scotland, Ireland, or within any of the Iſlands, Territories, or Dominions thereof; the ſaid John Lilburn ſhall be, and is hereby adjudged a Felon, and ſhall be executed as a Felon, without benefit of Clergy. And it is laſtly Enacted by the Authority aforeſaid, That all, and every perſon, and perſons, who ſhall, after the expiration of the ſaid twenty days, wittingly relieve, harbour, or conceal the ſaid John Lilburn, he being in England, Scotland, or Ireland, or any the Territories, Iſlands, or Dominions thereof, ſhall be hereby adjudged acceſſary of Felony after the fact. And all Judges, Juſtices, Mayors, Bailiffs, Sheriffs, and all other Officers, as well Military as Civil, in their reſpective places, are hereby required to be aiding and aſſiſting in apprehending the ſaid John Lilburn, and in putting this Act in due execution.

Friday, the 30*th* of January, 1651. Ordered by the Parliament, That this Act be forthwith printed and publiſhed.

Henry Scobell, Cleric. Parliamenti.

But the ſaid John Lilburn returning to his native Country in June, 1653, was apprehended, and committed to Newgate, as appears by the following Mittimus.

John Fowk, Mayor.

Before the Seſſions began, John Lilburn petition'd the Parliament, but they taking no notice of his Petition, he was brought to his Trial, July 13th, as follows.

The

The Keepers of the Liberties of England, by Authority of Parliament, againſt John Lilburn, now Priſoner at the Bar.

MR. Lilburn was brought to the Bar upon Wedneſday, the 13*th* of July, where after ſilence being made in the Court, the Clerk commanded him to hold up his hand at the Bar: Mr. Lilburn applying his ſpeech to the Lord Chief Baron Wylde, deſired his honour to explain what was meant by holding up the hand at the Bar, that ſo by doing that Act, Ceremony, or Form, he might not run himſelf into ſnares and dangers. And after a large diſpute betwixt the Court and him upon that point, he ſaith, Then, my Lord, my name I muſt acknowledge to be John Lilburn, Gent. ſon of Richard Lilburn of Thickley-Punchardon in the County of Durham Eſq; and I am here ready to anſwer any thing any man hath to lay to my charge. And the Indictment being read, Mr. Lee, the Clerk of the Court, demanded of him whether he was Guilty, or not guilty. But Mr. Lilburn, the priſoner at the Bar, applied himſelf to the Court, and ſaid,

My Lord Chief Baron Wylde,

I humbly deſire, as my right by Law, to ſpeak freely againſt the inſufficiency and illegality of the Indictment, before I join iſſue to it. Which being (with a little ſtruggling) granted him, he ſaid, Well then, my Lord, now is the time, or never, for me to aſſign my errors againſt the Indictment, before I plead to it: for if once I ſhould plead to it, it will then be too late to aſſign the errors; but if I do it before, then of right and juſtice you ought to grant me a Copy of my Indictment, and aſſign me learned Counſel in the Law to conſult with, and a convenient time to return in my Anſwer unto the ſaid Indictment: all which (ſaid the Priſoner) is fully declared for good Law by the Lord Coke, in his 3d Inſtitute, fol. 29. 34. 137. 230. which Book was publiſhed by two ſpecial Orders of the Houſe of Commons in their virginity and purity, in Anno 1641 and 1642, for good Law. The pregnant and pertinent paſſages of which places were diſtinctly read by the Priſoner at the Bar, and preſſed with all the earneſtneſs and reaſon he poſſibly could, to enjoy the benefit thereof. And, to the apprehenſion of the Priſoner, and multitudes of the by-ſtanders, the Court expreſly ordered that he ſhould have Counſel aſſigned, and the Copy of the Indictment; but withal, he was ordered under his hand to ſend in his Exceptions: upon which the Priſoner was carried into the Garden, on the backſide of the Court, to draw them up; where, having remained ſome ſpace, during the dining of the Court, he writ a Letter, the Copy of which thus followeth:

For the Right Honourable the Lord Chief Baron Wylde, and the reſt of the Honourable Bench, theſe humbly preſent.

My Lord, and the Honourable Bench,

SInce I departed the Court, I have ſeriouſly conſidered, that I cannot legally make any Exceptions concerning the errors in the Indictment, without a true Copy thereof, to compare with the Act againſt Lieutenant Col. John Lilburn, and therefore I humbly pray that you would be pleaſed ſo far to do me that right in point of life, that I may have a true Copy thereof, and I ſhall ſpeedily preſent my Exceptions under my hand, and thankfully remain,

Your Lordſhips moſt humble Servant,

John Lilburn.

Which Letter being delivered by one of the Officers, as the Judge was at dinner; as ſoon as the Court ſat again, the Priſoner, contrary to his expectation, was called to the Bar again, and Mr. Lee, the Clerk of the Court preſſed very hard to him to plead to the Indictment, Guilty, or Not Guilty: but the Priſoner at the Bar applying himſelf to the Lord Chief Baron Wylde, very much wondered why he ſhould be called to the Bar any more, before he had enjoyed the benefit of their own Order, for a Copy of his Indictment, and the aſſignation of learned Counſel in the Law to conſult with. Judge Warburton with ſome heat falls upon the Priſoner, and undervalues the works of that learned Man in the Law of England, Sir Edward Coke, and the Parliament's Orders that had cauſed his ſecond, third, and fourth part of his Inſtitutes to be printed; and highly extols the abſoluteneſs of Parliaments. Upon which, the Priſoner at the Bar replies with a great deal of zeal, earneſtneſs, reaſon, underſtanding, and length of time. And after a long and tedious ſtruggling, he could obtain no more that night, but a lame Order to have Counſel aſſigned him only to one individual point. And taking out the Order by his Friends the next morning, being Thurſday, July 14, 1653. he ſent a Letter to the Court, the true Copy of which thus followeth:

My Lord,

VOuchſafe me liberty to acquaint you, that immediately upon my getting to my lodging in Newgate, I diſpatch'd away this bearer, Mr. Overton, with another Friend, to the Court for their Order, which was given unto them; and by it Mr. Serjeant Glyn, Mr. Serjeant Earl, Mr. Maynard, Mr. Hales, Mr. Twiſden, Mr. Wylde, Mr. Chute, and Mr. Norbury, ſhould be aſſigned of Counſel with John Lilburn Gentleman, to adviſe with him whether he ſhall inſiſt upon his Plea in Law, or whether he be the ſame John Lilburn named in the Act, or not, before ten of the clock to-morrow in the forenoon. Sir, the parties who took the Order, poſted away to ſeek the Counſel, and ſpent ſeveral hours, but could find none of them but Mr. Maynard, who was ſick; and Mr. Chute, who was juſt a going out of Town: and beſides, my Lord, give me leave to acquaint your Honour, that in a private way, I have got the opinion of ſome well verſed in the Law, and really, my Lord, when they read the Order of the Court, and are told that I cannot get a Copy of the Indictment, they ſtand amazed at it, and know not what to adviſe: Therefore, ſeeing that really and in ſeriouſneſs I have done the utmoſt to get the advice of Counſel according to the ſaid Order, and cannot obtain it to any purpoſe; neither can theſe that are willing privately to help me, do me any good (as they ſay) for want of the Copy of the Indictment, which they ſay in Law and Reaſon ought not to be denied to me; therefore I humbly continue my Suit to your Honour, nour, and the honourable Bench, that you would not require impoſſibilities from me, that am no Lawyer, in an abſolute unprecedented caſe, wherein I have no footſteps at all to tread in, or any other guide to walk by, but only the natural reaſon of an ignorant and illiterate Man in the practick part of the Law of England. And therefore do moſt humbly pray and beſeech your Honour, and the honourable Bench, as you are Chriſtians, and men of honour and conſcience, to afford me a Copy of my Indictment, and time till the next Seſſions to conſult with the Counſel that you have aſſigned me: for which favour and juſtice, I ſhall be very much obliged to remain,

Yours in ſincerity and heartineſs to ſerve you,

Newgate, July 14, 1653.

John Lilburn.

But for all the aforeſaid Letter, he was called to the Bar upon Thurſday in the forenoon, where he again ſtruggled very earneſtly for a Copy of his Indictment, as his right by Law: and the Lord Chief Baron Wylde ſitting upon the Bench, the Recorder and the Priſoner had a long and hot encounter each with other; and about two a-clock in the afternoon the Priſoner was diſmiſſed, with a promiſe of the Copy of his Indictment, being thereupon ordered to bring in his Exceptions by two a-clock the next day in the afternoon: but the Priſoner, ſeveral hours after his diſmiſſion, apprehending himſelf wronged with thoſe delays or denials (of right and juſtice) that were put upon him, writ a third Letter, the Copy of which thus followeth.

For the Right Honourable the Lord Chief Baron Wylde, and the Honourable the Court of Goal-delivery, ſitting in the Old-Baily, theſe humbly with ſpeed preſent.

My Lord,

I Stand amazed why I am denied a Copy of my Indictment, which I apprehended the Court granted me at the Bar as my right; I did therefore ſend my father and father-in-law, with my brother-in-law, and my couſin-german, humbly to deſire it as my right, but they returned me your denial of it: in which regard, in all humility, though much of my time be expired, I have by theſe few lines once again ſent my father and brother to wait upon you for a Copy of it, (to leave you without excuſe) which is my abſolute right by Law; and do therefore humbly intreat you it may be ſent to me preſently, without which I am not bound in Law to draw up a Plea, nor cannot. But if I muſt be murdered and deſtroyed without Law, my innocent blood be upon the heads of thoſe that ſhall be guilty of it, by will to take it from me. So humbly craving your Lordſhips legal, ſpeedy, and juſt anſwer, I reſt,

Your Lordſhips moſt humble Servant, ſo far as you are a maintainer of the People of England's fundamental Laws and Liberties, Thurſday, July 14, 1653. paſt 5 a-clock at night.

John Lilburn.

But receiving no benefit by the ſaid letter, the next morning, being Friday, his father went to the Lord Chief Baron's Chamber; but he being preparing to go out of Town, he could not be permitted to ſpeak with him. After which, the old Gentleman came back to the Old-Bailey, to complain of his ſon's hard uſage; and from them, with a meſſenger went back again to the Lord Chief Baron's Chamber, and from thence to Attorney-General Prideaux's Chamber, to get a Warrant from him to enjoy the Copy of the Indictment: and then coming to the Court again; about ten of the clock he received it from the hand of Mr. Lee; the Copy whereof thus followeth.

At the Seſſions of Peace held for the City of London, at Juſtice-Hall in the Old-Bailey, now ſitting this preſent 16th day of July 1653.

London ſſ. THE Jurors for the Keepers of the Liberty of England, by authority of Parliament, upon their Oaths do preſent, that in, and by a Statute made in the Parliament of this Commonwealth of England, holden at Weſtminſter, in the County of Middleſex, the 30*th of* January, in the year of our Lord 1651. intitled, An Act for the execution of a judgment given in Parliament againſt Lieut. Col. John Lilburn; it was enacted by the ſaid Parliament, and by the authority of the ſame, that the ſaid John Lilburn ſhould (within twenty days, to be accounted from the 15*th day of* January 1651,) depart out of England, Scotland, Ireland, and the Iſlands, Territories and Dominions thereof. And in caſe the ſaid John Lilburn, at any time after the expiration of the ſaid twenty days, to be accounted as aforeſaid, ſhould be found, or ſhould be remaining within England, Scotland, Ireland, or within any of the Iſlands, Territories or Dominion thereof; the ſaid John Lilburn ſhould be, and was thereby adjudged a Felon, and ſhould be executed as a Felon without benefit of Clergy. And it was alſo enacted by the authority aforeſaid, that all and every perſon and perſons, who ſhould after the expiration of the ſaid twenty days, wittingly relieve, harbour, or conceal the ſaid John Lilburn, he being in England, Scotland, or Ireland, or any the Territories, Iſlands, or Dominions thereof, ſhould be thereby adjudged acceſſary of Felony after the fact. And all Judges, Juſtices, Mayors, Bailiffs, Sheriffs, and all other Officers, as well Military as Civil, in their reſpective places, are thereby required to be aiding and aſſiſting, in apprehending the ſaid John Lilburn, and in putting the ſaid Act in due execution, as in and by the ſaid Act of Parliament appeareth. And that the ſaid John Lilburn, late of London, Gentleman, the Statute aforeſaid not weighing, nor the puniſhments therein contained any whit fearing, after the expiration of the ſaid twenty days, to be accounted from the ſaid 15*th day of* January 1651, as aforeſaid, to wit, the 15*th day of* June, in the year of our Lord 1653, was found, and was feloniouſly remaining within England aforeſaid; that is to ſay at London, to wit, in the Pariſh of Giles without Cripplegate, in the Ward of Cripplegate, London aforeſaid, againſt the form of the Statute aforeſaid, and againſt the publick peace, &c.

Sadler.

And bringing it to his ſon, who, with the beſt Counſel that he had, reading it, his work was all of new to begin again; ſo that he was forced firſt to poſt away his own father and others, to let the Court know, that although it was their order in Court, that he ſhould have had the Copy of his Indictment Indictment the day before, being Thurſday, about two a clock in the afternoon; yet it was ten a clock upon Frriday forenoon, before he could get it. And at two a clock in the afternoon upon the ſaid Friday, he was to appear at the bar; and all his work, upon the ſerious viewing the Indictment, was to begin a-new, ſo that it was impoſſible that in three or four hours time he could be ready. And therefore his father and Mr. Overton, preſt the Court to give him time till the next morning, being Saturday the 16th of July, to make his Exceptions ready, and put them in; but it would no ways be granted, nor no longer time than two hours to be added to the former. At the underſtanding of which, he intreated his father-in law, and Mr. Thomas Prince, to go down to the Court again, and tell them that it was altogether impoſſible that the Priſoner could make his Exceptions ready by four a-clock in the afternoon of the ſaid Friday, it being ten in the forenoon, before he could get the Copy of the Indictment; although it was their order, that he ſhould have had it by two a-clock in the afternoon the day before: and therefore they preſſed hard at the Bar to the Court, to have till the next morning being Saturday, for the Priſoner to bring in his Exception; but they alſo returned with a Negative. The Priſoner and ſuch as he had at work, followed his papers as for their lives; and about ſix or ſeven at night, came the meſſengers from the Court for Mr. Lilburn the Priſoner, who being come to the Bar, Mr. Lee the Clerk preſſed him again to plead guilty or not guilty, to the ſaid Indictment; but the Priſoner little regarding him, addreſſed himſelf to the Lord-Mayor, as the then Preſident of the Court, and gave him an exact Narrative of what delays he had had about the getting of the Copy of the Indictment; being delayed from two a clock in the afternoon upon Thurſday, till ten a clock in the forenoon that preſent Friday: and that as ſoon as he had got it, he had taken all the pains, and uſed all the induſtry, that it was poſſible to be expected from an ignorant man in the formalities and niceties of the Law of England. That he had ſent ſeveral meſſengers truly to acquaint the Court, that he could not poſſibly get the ſaid Exceptions deliberately perfected before the morrow morning, being Saturday. That they were weighty things, and the failing in one word, might coſt him his life. That he was (when Mr. Briſco came for him) but newly begun to read, examine, and compare the ingroſſed copy with the original, to ſee whether there was any faults in it or no; that he nothing nigh had read over one quarter of it, when he was called away to come to the Court. That he hoped they would not compel him, to put in uncorrected Exceptions for his life, eſpecially ſeeing the miſtake of one word might deſtroy him, and eſpecially ſeeing procraſtination of time was no part of his fault, but the Court's only and ſolely, who had cauſeleſly ſpent ſo much time, before they would give him that, the Copy of his Indictment, which was in Law (he having already made his verbal Exceptions) ſo eſſentially and legally his right, and without which he neither was bound, nor could make legally and formally in Law his Exceptions againſt the Indictment read unto him in Court. And therefore humbly prayed, that he might enjoy the honourable Court's favour till to-morrow morning, to make them ready, and put them in: which being granted, he the Priſoner departed to his lodging, and poſted away to ſeveral of his Counſel, ſome of which coming to him that night, he had a large diſcourſe with them, and they read much of his papers, and very highly approved of his Exceptions; but withal told him, he had fallen far ſhort in demanding his right and due.

So upon Saturday about eight a-clock in the forenoon, he was brought to the Bar again; and he was preſſed again by Mr. Lee, to plead, guilty, or not guilty, to the Indictment.

But Mr. Lilburn, the priſoner at the Bar, regarded not him, but addreſſed himſelf to the Lord-Mayor and the Court, acquainting them where they left off the laſt night; and that in obedience to their commands, he had brought in his Exceptions againſt the inſufficiency of the Indictment, read unto him in the Court, fairly ingroſſed in Parchment according to Law, and humbly prayed that it might be accepted, recorded and read: ſo handing it into the Court, the Recorder Mr. Steele took it his hand, looked upon it, and ſaid, Mr. Lilburn, this is not under your Counſel's hands.

Mr. Lilburn. No, Sir, it is not, I am ſure ſome of them tell me it needs not; but it is under my own hand, and I muſt and will juſtify, and make good thoſe Exceptions with my life.

Recorder. Wherefore did we aſſign Counſel? one cauſe was, that they might ſign your Exceptions.

Lilburn. My Lord, with your favour thus; be pleaſed to take notice, that in your aſſigning me Counſel, you have only done it to one individual point; which is not only a ſnare to me, but alſo to my Counſel. Firſt, to me, in cooping me up to one plea for my life; whereas the inſufficiency of the Indictment, and the illegal contradictory things upon which it is grounded, and my right in Law, leaves me ſufficiently at elbow-room, to have plurality of Pleas or Exceptions: and therefore in your aſſigning me Counſel in one point only; if they ſhould ſet their hands to any more but that one point alone, they tell me, they run themſelves into ſnares and dangers. But, my Lord, they likewiſe tell me, if you and this honourable Court, pleaſe to aſſign them of my Counſel at large, they will not only ſign my Exceptions, but will venture their all at the Bar of Juſtice to maintain them to be good Law. And not only ſo, but they tell me, and bid me tell the Court, if I pleaſed, that if they have any underſtanding in the Law, and that their Law-books ſpeak truth, they are very confident that all the Judges and Lawyers in England put together in one, ſhall never be able while they breathe, to draw up a legal Indictment upon the Act of Baniſhment, of the 30th of January 1651, and the Votes or Judgment (as it's called) of the 15th of January 1651, upon which it is grounded, if theſe printed copies of them, be true copies; becauſe, my Lord, they ſay, a judgment, and the execution of a judgment, ought to be like a pair of Indentures exactly even in all things, the one neither to be above nor below the other, but even with it in all circumſtances; but in the pretended judgment, and the Act for execution thereof, there are theſe three eſſential differences.

Firſt, The judgment (as it's called) ſaith, Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburn ſhall be baniſhed and depart out of England, within thirty days next after the ſaid 15th day of January 1651; but the Act for executing the ſaid judgment, expreſly ſaith, he ſhall not ſtay in England above twenty days next after the ſaid 15th day of January 1651. So that, my Lord, here is ten days difference betwixt the Judgment itſelf, and the Act for the pretended execution thereof; which makes an eſſential nullity in it, and all proceedings that are founded upon it.

Judgment

Secondly, The pretended Judgment baniſheth one Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburn out of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the Iſlands and Territories thereunto belonging, but baniſheth him not in the leaſt out of their Dominions; ſo that Wales being ſtiled, diſtinguiſhed, and denominated in Law to be a Dominion, the ſaid baniſhed Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburn, by any words contained in the ſaid baniſhing Votes or Judgment, might legally and ſecurely have lived in Wales all his days. But then comes the ſaid Act of January 30th, 1651, which is called an Act for the execution of the ſaid Judgment of the 15th of January 1651, given in Parliament againſt Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburn, and it baniſheth the ſaid Lieutenant-Colonel out of England, Scotland, Ireland, and the Iſlands, Territories and Dominions thereof: ſo that here is a main eſſential difference betwixt the pretended Judgment, and the Act for the execution thereof.

The third difference betwixt them is this; the pretended Judgment of the 15th of January 1651, ſaith, That if the ſaid baniſh'd Lieut. Col. John Lilburn ſhall return into England, &c. at any time after the expiration of the ſaid thirty days, he ſhall be proceeded againſt as a Felon, and ſhall ſuffer death accordingly.

But the ſaid pretended Act of the 30th of January 1651, made on pretence for the execution thereof, expreſly ſaith, by way of addition, that if the ſaid Lieut. Col. John Lilburn ſhall return into England, &c. after his baniſhment, he ſhall be, and is hereby adjudged a Felon, and ſhall be executed as a Felon without benefit of Clergy; ſo that, my Lord, they ſay it is impoſſible to draw up a legal Indictment upon the fore-mentioned contradicting Act, Votes, or pretended Judgment.

Mr. Recorder. Well then, Mr. Lilburn, ſeeing your Counſel are ſo willing, as you ſay they are, to ſign your Exceptions for good Law, the Court will give you time till ſix of the clock at night, to get their hands to it, and will aſſign you Counſel at large. Unto which Mr. Lilburn replied, My Lord, I am put upon a great ſtreight.

Firſt, In that the Seſſions are holden a week after they ſhould uſually have been held; by means of which length of time, moſt of the great and chiefeſt, able, and moſt learned Counſel of England, are gone out of Town.

Secondly, Your Honour, and the Court, hath exhauſted and ſpent from Wedneſday morning, till this hour, before you would fully grant me that which is my abſolute right by Law; by means of which delay of time, I am afraid, I have by this loſt all my Counſel, that you have aſſigned me, that I can fully reſt upon, that were in Town when I named them for my Counſel, and whom, if you pleaſed to have ordered it ſo, I could have often conferred with ſince, though now truly, I am afraid they are all gone out of Town upon the Circuit; and if they be, is't poſſible that I ſhould get their hands to my Exceptions by ſix a-clock? And therefore that we may delay no longer time in this Trial, I beſeech you without any more ado, accept of my own Exceptions under my own hand: I am ſure I am the moſt concerned in them, and my life muſt pay for the faults in them, if there be any. And therefore I pray accept of them without any more ado, under my own hand alone: I am ſure my Counſel tells me, you ought in Law to do it.

Recorder. Well, Mr. Lilburn, in ſhort, the Court tells you they cannot in Law, nor will not accept them, without your Counſel ſign them.

Lilburn. Really, Mr. Recorder, you drive me to very great ſtreights, in delaying me ſo long my right by Law, before you will fully grant it me; it is an apparent hazard, and a very great probability my Counſel are all already gone out of Town: and then after you have ſo delayed me, to tie me up to an unneceſſary and unrequired in Law Punctilio, for me to get my Counſel's hands to my Exceptions in ſo ſhort a time, when in probability it is impoſſible it ſhall or can be done.

Beſides, my Lord-Mayor, conſider of the inconveniency that Mr. Recorder would tie me to, which is this; I ſtand here to plead for my life, and I am commanded to put in my Exceptions againſt the illegality of an Indictment read unto me, and it may be it is evidently ſeen, known, or at leaſt believed, that I have ſeveral of the now preſent greateſt men in England, for my grand and chiefeſt adverſaries; and therefore to tie me up in my caſe at all, to bring in any thing under my Counſel's hands, is a ſnare and danger to me: for we all know by experience, my Lord, how eaſy it is for the great men in power, right or wrong, to cruſh and deſtroy any man that they in good earneſt ſet themſelves againſt; and it is apparent their indignation is heated ſevenfold againſt me, (but, I muſt avow it, without any the leaſt juſt ground or cauſe) and it cannot chuſe but burn in a very great degree againſt my Counſellors, that ſhall help me in Law to preſerve my life, againſt their inraged and big ſwoln malice. And, my Lord, I am ſure, almoſt all thoſe Counſellors that you have aſſigned me, are not only men of great eſtates, but alſo men of great practice, which is their livelihood; and it's poſſible my condition, before my Trial is done, will compel and neceſſitate me, to ſpeak that high and yet legal language, that may ruin and deſtroy my Counſel, either to plead it, or ſet their hands to it: and for me to expect or deſire that from them, that ſhall apparently tend to the ruin and deſtruction of them and their families; when I am in ſuch a mean, low, and poor condition, as that I am able in no meaſure, in the leaſt, to make them any part of amends, for that ruin or loſs, they ſhall or may ſuſtain, by too deep ingaging for my preſervation; I were an irrational, unjuſt, beaſtly man to do it. My Lord, it is my perſon at preſent now at the bar, that is in hazard and jeopardy, and none elſe. And, my Lord, I am long ſince robbed of all my eſtate, by the tyrannical will and arbitrary pleaſure of Sir Arthur Haſlerig; and have long ſince nothing left to buy me bread, but what I borrow. And, my Lord, I have now nothing to loſe but my Wife and tender Babes, and my ſkin; and to die to me is gain, ſo I be not felo de ſe, a murderer of myſelf: and therefore I beſeech you, my Lord, let me put in my Exceptions under my own hand.

Mr. Recorder. Mr. Lilburn, if you be ſo earneſt thus to do, wherefore do you ſo much preſs for Counſel learned in the Law to be aſſigned you?

Mr. Lilburn. I will tell you preſently, my Lord: In the Italian Hiſtory of a Nobleman of Italy, and otherwiſe, I have read and heard of Guſtavus Adolphus, that valiant and wiſe late King of Sweden; that although he was a moſt expert Soldier, yet in all difficult and knotty enterprizes that he did endeavour to undertake, he would call all his able, diſcreet and underſtanding Officers together. And becauſe, as Solomon ſaith, two is better than one, and a three-fold cord is not eaſily broken; he would adviſe and conſult with them all: but yet, being he was, and did apprehend himſelf moſt concerned, and had the far greateſt ſtock to adventure in the affair he went about, he would not abſolutely be tied up in every punctilio to their advice; but being a very wiſe, righteous, juſt, and withal valiant man, it is therefore ſaid of him, when he had heard with mature deliberation all their advices, he would after that with a ſerious conſultation with his own reaſon and underſtanding, draw his own inferences and concluſions, and with mettle and gallantry put them only in execution. Even ſo, my Lord, my Life being at ſtake, although I have a little competency of underſtanding, and mettle enough to execute a thing; yet being I am ignorant of the punctilio's, formalities or practick part of the Law; and being that the Scripture ſaith, Woe to him that is alone, for two is better than one, and a threefold cord is not eaſily broken; on thoſe conſiderations I am deſirous to conſult with learned Counſel in the Law, eſpecially ſince it is my right by Law ſo to do. But I do aſſure you, my Lord, ſeeing God hath endowed me with a good proportion of judgment and underſtanding to diſcern of things, and ſeeing my adventure is abundantly the greateſt, I will not abſolutely be tied up to follow my Counſel's advice in all things, neither will I do it, unleſs I like it very well; but in moſt knotty, difficult and high caſes, that is not ſafe for them too deeply to engage in, for fear of their own ruin, and my abſolute inability in any proportionable meaſure to requite them; I will therefore draw my inference and concluſions from their advice and counſel, and manage them myſelf in my own way, for the ſafety and preſervation of my own life. And therefore, my Lord, I pray you again to accept of my Exceptions under my own hand, without any more ado, that ſo we may ſpeedily come to ſome iſſue of this tedious jangling buſineſs.

Recorder. Mr. Lilburn, I tell you again, the Court will not, nor cannot receive your Exceptions without being ſigned by your Counſel; and therefore to enable you to procure their hands, we will give you an order at large, that ſo you may fully be ready by ſix a clock.

Mr. Lilburn. My Lord, I pray deliver the order ſpeedily to my father there in Court, leſt if it be never ſo little delayed, my Counſel be all gone out of Town: which being by the Court aſſented unto, the Copy of the order thus followeth;

" London. AT the Goal-delivery of Newgate,
" July 16, 1653. Mr. Serjeant Glynne,
" Mr. Serjeant Earle, Mr. Maynard, Mr. Hale,
" Mr. Twiſden, Mr. Wilde, Mr. Chute, Mr. Nor-
" bury, and Mr. Webb, are by this Court aſſign-
" ed of Counſel, with John Lilburn Gent. to per" fect his Plea in Law, and deliver the ſame under " the hands of them, or one of them, before ſix of " the clock this day in the afternoon."

Sadler.

Whereupon the Priſoner withdrew to his lodging, and being brought to the Bar about ſix a clock at night, Mr. Lee the Clerk of the Court preſſed very hard to him, to anſwer and plead to the Indictment, guilty or not guilty; beſides whom, ſtept up another Gentleman in the Court, and he in a mumbling manner preſt ſomething, as hard as his ſlender abilities would enable him. Whereupon Mr. Lilburn demanded to know of the Lord-Mayor, what that newly come Gentleman was, that was ſo far afraid to ſpeak out his mind, that he could not underſtand what he ſaid. Whereupon anſwer was returned, it was Mr. Hall the Attorney of the Dutchy, who was come thither to be a Proſecutor for the State or Commonwealth.

But Mr. Lilburn's chiefeſt buſineſs being with the Court, he accordingly applied himſelf to the Lord-Mayor:

My Lord, I deſire to give your honour a true and real account of all my tranſactions, ſince I was laſt before you, which is this: You may remember at my being laſt at the Bar, I told you, I did verily believe my Counſel were all upon the point of going out of Town; in which regard I earneſtly intreated you without more delay to deliver your order to my father, that ſo he might not fall ſhort of getting to my Counſel before they were gone; but, my Lord, at my departure from the Bar, as ſoon as I came to my lodging, I all on poſt haſte diſpatched my couſin-germans, George and William Lilburn, to Mr. Norbury, who they found juſt ready to mount on horſeback, to be gone out of Town, and acquaint him by word of mouth, with the order the Court had made, to aſſign him my Counſel at large: and he was pleaſed without any delay, in his riding-habit, to haſten to me, and ſeriouſly read over my Exceptions, and ſign them, and ſo bid me farewel, and is gone out of Town. But, my Lord, that which I deſire your honour to take notice of, is, That if I had ſtay'd till my father came forth of the Court with your order, I had totally loſt Mr. Norbury, and he had abſolutely been gone out of Town, a good while before he could have got to him.

In the ſecond place, having ſent my ſaid kinſmen poſt haſte before to my Counſel, as ſoon as my father came with your order, I poſted him and my brother-in-law away to Mr. Maynard; with whom ſpeaking at his own chamber, they found him ſickly and ill, and altogether unfit and unable to come to me, by reaſon of that little time he had to ſtay in Town, thoſe ſeveral things he had to do at his chamber during his ſtaying, and the weakneſs of his body, and the abſolute neceſſity of his being at a place by a fix'd hour, or to run the hazard of loſing ſix hundred pound upon his own ſcore: and if you doubt any thing of this relation, they are here in Court to declare the truth of it upon their Oaths themſelves. But, my Lord, though Mr. Maynard could not well come to me, yet he was pleaſed to ſtay at his chamber, till my father fetch'd my Paper and Exceptions from me; which with ſeriouſneſs reading, he hath alſo ſigned them, which I have now in my hand. But, my Lord, from both my Counſellors, eſpecially Mr. Maynard, I perceive I am very much blamed for my ignorance and folly, in not, when I demanded the Copy of my Indictment, as my right by Law, demanding Oyer, or hearing in open Court, of the Act of Parliament, the Judgment upon which it is grounded, and the Crimes upon which the Judgment is grounded; which, I underſtand from them, ſhould be exemplified under the Great Seal of England, and ought ſo to be here remaining in Court.

Mr.

Mr. Recorder replied, Mr. Lilburn, we know of no ſuch thing, the Records of the Acts of Parliament are at Weſtminſter, in the Clerk of the Parliament's hands, and there you may have them.

Mr. Lilburn. Good Mr. Recorder, interrupt me not, but let me go on; I ſay, my Counſel tells me, I ought, as my right by Law, to have demanded Oyer of the ſaid Act, Judgment and Crimes, and after I had ſeen them under the Broad Seal of England, and heard them read in open Court, I ought as my right by Law, to have demanded copies of them all three, and they ought not to have been denied me; that ſo I might have been fully enabled all at once to have returned Exceptions at large to the Indictment, the Act upon which it is grounded, the Judgment upon which the Act is grounded, and the Crimes, which is the original of all. And if no legal Act can be produced, they tell me the Indictment, and all proceedings upon it, are void and null. And they alſo ſay, if no legal Judgment can be produced, they tell me the Act for the execution of it is null, and falls to the ground. And they alſo ſay, if no Crimes in Law can be produced upon which the Judgment is legally founded, all is at an end, becauſe what is not good nor ſound in its original in Law, can never be made ſo by tract of time; and what is not ſound and ſubſtantial in its foundation, can never be made ſo in its fabrick or building. But yet, my Lord, they ſay it is not too late for me yet to inſiſt upon the Oyer as my right by Law: I confeſs, my Lord, their time would not permit either of them to ſtay in the Town, to draw me up the formal draught of ſuch a claim, much leſs would it permit them to ſtay in Town till it was ingroſſed in Parchment, that ſo they might ſet their hands unto it. But, my Lord, according to thoſe legal inſtructions that I have largely received from my Counſel; I have got ſuch a Paper formally in Law drawn up, and it is here ingroſſed in Parchment, and ſigned with my own hand. And, my Lord, I here tender it unto the Court, with two ſhillings as the Clerk's fee, to enter it upon Record at his peril. The Copy of which Parchment thus followeth:

At the Seſſions of Peace held for the City of London, at Juſtice-Hall in the Old-Bailey, now ſitting this preſent 16th day of July, 1653.

The Keepers of the Liberties of England, by Authority of Parliament, againſt John Lilburn, now Priſoner at the Bar.

THE ſaid John Lilburn, Gent. the now Priſoner at the Bar, ſuppoſed to be indicted by that name, brought to the Bar, and now appearing in perſon, having heard the ſaid Indictment read in theſe words, to wit,

London ſſ. The Jurors for the Keepers of the Liberties of England, by authority of Parliament upon their Oaths, do preſent, that in and by a Statute made in the Parliament of this Commonwealth of England, holden at Weſtminſter in the County of Middleſex, the 30th day of January, in the year of our Lord 1651, intitled, An Act for the execution of a Judgment given in Parliament againſt Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburn; it was enacted by the ſaid Parliament, and by the authority of the ſame, That the ſaid John Lilburn, ſhould (within twenty days to be accounted from the 15th day of January 1651,) depart out of England, Scotland, Ireland, and the Iſlands, Territories and Dominions thereof. And in caſe the ſaid John Lilburn, at any time after the expiration of the ſaid twenty days, to be accounted as aforeſaid, ſhould be found, or ſhould be remaining within England, Scotland, Ireland, or within any of the Iſlands, Territories, or Dominions thereof; the ſaid John Lilburn ſhould be, and was thereby adjudged a Felon, and ſhould be executed as a Felon, without benefit of Clergy.

And it was alſo enacted by the authority aforeſaid, That all and every perſon and perſons, who ſhould after the expiration of the ſaid twenty days, wittingly relieve, harbour, or conceal the ſaid John Lilburn, he being in England, Scotland, Ireland, or any the Territories, Iſlands, or Dominions thereof, ſhould be thereby adjudged acceſſary of Felony after the fact. And all Judges, Juſtices, Mayors, Bayliffs, Sheriffs, and all other Officers, as well military as civil, in their reſpective places, are thereby required to be aiding and aſſiſting in apprehending the ſaid John Lilburn, and in putting the ſaid Act in due execution, as in and by the ſaid Act of Parliament appeareth. And that the ſaid John Lilburn, late of London, Gentleman, the Statute aforeſaid not weighing, nor the puniſhments therein contained any whit fearing, after the expiration of the ſaid twenty days, to be accounted from the ſaid 15th day of January, 1651, as aforeſaid; to wit, the 15th day of June, in the year of our Lord 1653, was found, and was felonioufly remaining within England aforeſaid; that is to ſay, at London, to wit, in the Pariſh of Giles without Cripplegate, in the Ward of Cripplegate, London aforeſaid, againſt the form of the Statute aforeſaid, and againſt the publick Peace, &c.

Sadler.

Which being heard and read, he ſaith, that it appears by the ſaid Indictment, that he ſtands indicted by the name of John Lilburn of London, Genteman, by virtue of an Act of Parliament made the 30th day of January 1651; grounded upon a ſuppoſed Judgment given in Parliament againſt him the ſaid John, or one Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburn, for ſeveral crimes and miſdemeanors therein contained. And therefore he the now Priſoner at the Bar, doth humbly pray Oyer, or hearing of the ſaid Act, Judgment, and ſuppoſed Crimes mentioned in the ſaid Act, according to Law, and under the Great Seal of England, to enable him to plead thereunto. And he will ever pray for your Honours and Bench.

John Lilburn.

Which being handed into the Court, Mr. Recorder looked upon it, and ſaid Mr. Lilburn, this is not ſigned under your Counſel's hand; the thing that we expect is your exceptions ſigned by your Counſel: what call you this Parchment?

Mr. Lilburn. I know not, Sir, what more properly to call it, than my legal demand of Oyer, or hearing in open Court the Act of Parliament, upon which the Indictment is grounded, and the Judgment upon which the Act is grounded, and the Crimes which is the foundation of all. And, Sir, let me tell you, my Counſel commands me to inſiſt, and dwell upon the demand of Oyer as my right, and as the chiefeſt ſhield and buckler I have to defend my life: for they ſay, if no legal crimes can be produced upon which the Judgment was grounded, all is at an end, and there can be no more proceedings againſt me. And I am ſure, there can be no felonious crimes in Law produced againſt me, for I never committed any in all my days, never was any legally ſo much as pretended to be laid unto my charge: therefore, my Lord, as my Birthright, and Inheritance, I demand the benefit of the Law, which is Oyer, or hearing of the Act, Judgment, and Crimes. But the Recorder, the Lord-Mayor, and ſeveral others endeavoured to interrupt him.

Whereupon he cried out again and again, My Lord, rob me not of my Birthright, the benefit of the Law, but let me have Oyer; which again, and again, I demand as my right, and inheritance. But four or five in the Court again interrupting him, viz. the Lord-Mayor, Mr. Recorder, Mr. Attorney-General Prideaux, and mumbling Mr. Hall; My Lord, rob me not of my Birthright, the benefit of the Law, nor interrupt me not, but give me free liberty to ſpeak for my life. And, my Lord, if you will be ſo audacious and unjuſt in the face of this great auditory of People, to deny me, and rob me of all the rules of Juſtice, and Right, and will forcibly ſtop my mouth, and not ſuffer me freely to ſpeak for my life according to Law, I will cry out and appeal to the People, and do cry out, and appeal to all the People that hear me this day; how that my Lord-Mayor, and this Court, by violence rob me of my Birthright by Law, and will not ſuffer me to ſpeak for my life. At which the Court being in a great heat and rage, Mr. Recorder ſent the Priſoner his parchment, and money out of the Court again; but he would have none of it, but commanded the Clerk again to receive it, and enter it upon Record at his peril.

Mr. Attorney-General Prideaux being very buſy to hold the Priſoner to queſtions to inſnare himſelf, as whether he was that John Lilburn meant, and intended in the Indictment and Act or no, and to ſtave him off from purſuing his juſt demand of Oyer; which the Priſoner perceiving, falls upon the ſaid Mr. Prideaux to this effect:

My Lord,

I had thought the other day I had ſaid enough to have ſilenced that Gentleman at this place; but my Lord, ſeeing he will ſtill needs be doing, and ſpeaking, I beſeech you, my Lord, let me deſire to be ſatisfied, and to know in what capacity that Gentleman is here at this place; for I am ſure, my Lord, he is no Judge of the Law, nor no Citizen, and therefore cannot as a Juſtice of Peace ſit upon the Bench, as one of my Judges. And, my Lord, if he be my proſecutor, as he is Attorney-General, he can be no more; and if ſo, my Lord, it is an amazement to me, that your Lordſhip and the Court will ſo diſhonour yourſelves, as to ſuffer a bare proſecutor to ſit amongſt you upon the Bench, as one of the chiefeſt of you, with his hat on his head. My Lord, do that which becomes you, and thruſt him down to the Bar, and there let him (as I do) ſtand with his hat in his hand, and know his office and duty, and prate there. But, my Lord, whether he ſits as my Judge, or my Proſecutor, he is no competent man to be in either place; becauſe, my Lord, he is legally an impeached Traitor, by one Eſquire Elliot, now Priſoner in Newgate; who, my Lord, avows to me, that he hath long ſince before the Lord Chief-Juſtice Rolls, and the reſt of the Judges of the Upper-Bench, legally and formally in Law, exhibited a charge of High-Treaſon againſt him; which he avows the Court hath accepted of, and recorded as formal in Law, and required of him to enter into great bonds to proſecute it, and make it good: and, my Lord, here is a duplicate of the ſaid charge of High-Treaſon, which the Eſquire's own hand gave unto me as a true copy. And beſides, my Lord, he further vows to me, that the Attorney-General, by reaſon of his late power and greatneſs in Parliament; the ſaid Attorney-General ſtands out in contempt, and ſcorn of the Law, and neither will, nor dare anſwer his ſaid charge of High-Treaſon; in which regard of his contempt of the Law of England, through his own acknowledged guilt thereby, he hath almoſt brought him at Law, to be outlawed as a Traitor: which he avows, as ſoon as it is perfected, whenever he can meet the ſaid Attorney-General, and apprehend him, he will without any more ado execute him as a Traitor.

In all which regards, my Lord, I do avow Mr. Attorney-General in Law, to be altogether uncompetent, either for my Judge, or Proſecutor, or any man's elſe whatſoever; or ſo much as to be at liberty, to converſe with the honeſt and untainted People of England, till he hath yielded conformity to the Law, and anſwered to his ſaid charge of High-Treaſon. Unto which Mr. Recorder ſeemed to make ſome anſwer in the Attorney-General's behalf, (which the penman hereof not well hearing, cannot ſet down.)

But Mr. Recorder fell upon the Priſoner, and told him how he had trifled away the time of that Court, and had had more favour than any Priſoner ever had.

Mr. Lilburn endeavouring to reply, the Court over and over, again and again interrupted him; but he would go on, and crying out, ſaid to this effect: Mr. Recorder, I wonder you are not aſhamed to tax me with trifling away time, when it is only yourſelf, and the Court that are truly guilty of it; in making me ſpend my lungs, and my ſpirits for two or three days together, to plead and conteſt with you, before you would grant me that, which is ſo abſolutely my right by Law, as a Copy of my Indictment is: ſo that, Sir, with your favour, it is you that trifle away time, and not I. And whereas you ſay, I have had more favour than ever Priſoner had; I wonder, Mr. Recorder, you are not aſhamed ſo to ſay: for what favour at all have I had, when I have not yet enjoyed ſo much as the Law allows me? Sir, let me tell you, the learned men of the Law, the Lord Chief-Juſtice Rolls, and the Judges of the King's or Upper-Bench, allowed the Lord Macguire, that arch bloody Iriſh Rebel and Traitor, who was indicted before them for his life, a thouſand times more favour than you do me: for although his crimes were notoriouſly wicked, even in the eye of the common or known Law of England, and obvious and perſpicuous almoſt to the ſight of every eye; yet when he made, as my information hath often told me, but one ſingle exception in a punctilio, or formality about his Peerage, againſt his Indictment, the Judges aſſigned him learned Counſel in the Law to plead it, and time enough for him and them to ſtudy and frame their Arguments in Law upon it.

Mr. Recorder. Mr. Lilburn, you tell us much of the advice your Counſel has given you about the Oyer, can you ſhew us their advice under their hands?

Lilburn. Yes, Sir, that I can.

Recorder.

Recorder. Well, produce it.

Lilburn. Sir, do ye mean to the point of the Oyer?

Recorder. Yes.

Lilburn. Well then, Sir, it may be as to the punctilio of a word, I have miſtaken you, but I am ſure I have it under one of their hands, and two Witneſſes at the Bar to depoſe it upon Oath, that the other expreſly adviſed it, as the main eſſential thing to my life, and well-being.

Recorder. Mr. Lilburn, for all your pretence of integrity, the auditors may take notice, that you aver a falſhood in the open Court, that you are not able to make good.

Mr. Lilburn. In the midſt of thoſe many and eager interruptions that I meet with from three or four of you at a time, it is eaſy for a ſtronger memory than mine, to let a ſlip fall in the punctilio of a word; but, Sir, to the utmoſt of my diſparagement, and diſadvantage, make the worſt of it you can; and ſee what it can amount unto. For in the firſt place, I do avow with my life, that I ſaw Mr. Norbury, with his own hand write theſe very words, upon the back of the Copy of the Indictment, which is here in my hands, and are as followeth:

Mr. Lilburn ought to ſee the Certiorari, and the Return of the Certiorari; and if the Act be certified without the Judgment, which is recited therein, all is invalid for the Commonwealth.

Mr. Steele was pleaſed to ſpend ſome time upon cavilling at Mr. Lilburn's miſpronouncing the word Certiorari; although he had formerly told the Recorder, he neither underſtood Latin, nor French, nor could well read either of them. And then he told them, that moſt Lawyers hands were very ill to read, by perſons that were not well acquainted with them; but, Sir, ſaith he, here is Mr. Norbury's own hand, and I do avow it upon my life for a truth, that my eyes ſaw his own hand and pen write it.

Secondly, If my memory miſtake not, I have Mr. Maynard's hand to the ſame thing alſo: in thoſe inſtructions that Mr. Maynard under his hand ſent me, by my father and brother this day, both of whom are here preſent in Court, upon their Oaths to juſtify, that if it be not plainly expreſſed under his hand, that by word of mouth, it was the principal inſtruction he gave unto them, to give unto me to inſiſt upon, as my right, to demand the Oyer, &c. But, Sir, as for the paper itſelf, there it is, read it; which paper followeth in theſe words:

It ſaid, that John Lilburn the 15th of June 1653, was found, and was feloniouſly remaining in England. This is inſufficient, for it is not ſaid that he was feloniouſly found; ſo that the being found in England is not laid within the Indictment. Secondly, And was feloniouſly remaining; it ſhould be ſaid, was then and there feloniouſly remaining. So there is no Felony charged in his being found. There is no time charged of that which is laid as a Felony. John Maynard, the 16th of July 1653.

And by way of poſtſcript in the ſame hand, there are theſe words, That the Priſoner at the Bar is to deſire, that he may have Counſel to plead his Exceptions. And in the ſame paper, in ſomewhat a different hand, there are theſe very words, I pray the Oyer of the Act of Parliament the Indictment is grounded upon; pray enter it upon Record, accept of no Copy but the ſight of the Record under the Broad Seal. Which paper the Recorder reading, and ſeriouſly viewing, ſaid, Mr. Lilburn, this paper will not reach your purpoſe; for thoſe lines that ſeem to be Mr. Maynard's, are not home to the thing in hand, and thoſe lines that are for your purpoſe are in a quite different hand.

Mr. Lilburn. Well, Mr. Recorder, it matters not much, for I am ſure the paper is not in the leaſt of my writing; for I had it as it is from my brother, that I ſent to Mr. Maynard with my father about my buſineſs, and I am ſure it either all is Mr. Maynard's hand, or my brother's; who writ down from the words of Mr. Maynard's own mouth, thoſe inſtructions that he gave unto him and my father, for me to dwell and inſiſt upon, and to venture and caſt my life upon. There they both are, I pray adminiſter unto them both their Oaths, that they may freely ſpeak before the Court, what Mr. Maynard ſaid unto them in this particular point about the Oyer, &c.

Whereupon old Mr. Richard Lilburn the Priſoner's father, with his ſon-in-law Mr. Thomas Gore, began to ſpeak, and to juſtify what the Priſoner had alledged; but the Court interrupted them, and commanded them to be ſilent, and would not let them go on. But Mr. Recorder, taking liberty to ſpeak as long and as often as he pleaſed, took the liberty ſeveral times to calumniate, and render odious the Priſoner at the Bar, for averring a falſhood in the open Court; and ſo ſometimes did the Lord-Mayor alſo, although his Honour was pleaſed to ſhew Mr. Lilburn a printed Petition a day or two before, and did ſolemnly in the face of all the Court aver, that the Woman, pointing to Mrs. Dormer, then a Priſoner at the Bar, had avowed that ſhe had the ſaid printed Petition, and others of the ſame kind, from Mr. Lilburn. Upon which the ſaid Mrs. Dormer openly cried out, That's falſe, my Lord, I never ſaid any ſuch thing in my life.

Upon theſe furious hurley-burleys, that happened betwixt the Lord-Mayor, Mr. Recorder, the Attorney-General, and mumbling Mr. Hall the Attorney of the Dutchy, and Mr. Lilburn Priſoner at the Bar; Mr. Lilburn's father, and his brother-in-law Mr. Gore, and one Mr. Thomas Haws, but eſpecially Mr. Thomas Prince, preſſed to ſpeak; but could not be permitted, but were again and again interrupted and ſilenced.

But Mr. Prince preſſed hard on, and told the Lord-Mayor to this purpoſe; That it was the known Law of England, that any by-ſtander whatſoever might ſpeak for the Priſoner's benefit at the Bar, eſpecially when they apprehended the Priſoner was like to be wronged, and denied his birthright, the benefit of the Law; and this privilege, my Lord, by order of the Court, you have granted me, and other of Mr. Lilburn's friends as our right by Law, to ſpeak in his behalf, when we ſee things urged againſt him, againſt reaſon and right; and therefore, my Lord, the thing that Mr. Lilburn demands about his Oyer, or hearing read the Act of Parliament, upon which the Indictment is grounded, and the Judgment upon which the Act is grounded, and the crimes that ought to be the original of all, is ſo eſſentially his right, that it is an amazement to me to ſee it diſputed: and alſo it is a wonder to me, that any man that pretends ſo much as to know the very firſt Rudiments, or the very firſt footſteps of the Law, as Mr. Recorder doth, ſhould endeavour to deny ſuch a thing ſo commonly practiſed in every ordinary Court of Juſtice, in the caſe of every ordinary Bond and Bill that a ſuit is commenced upon.

The

The Court with violence and fury interrupting him, and silencing him; and Mr. Recorder commanding the Prisoner at the Bar at his peril to deliver in his Exceptions before it was too late to receive them, and Mr. Hall mumblingly pressing again and again to pass sentence of condemnation upon him; and the Attorney-General upon the Bench closely pressing to hold him to the point, and not let the Prisoner have any elbow-room to go from it; and Mr. Lee the Clerk of the Court, (like a most detestable Tyrant) pressing to gag the Prisoner at the Bar, that so he should speak no more, and immediately pass sentence of condemnation upon him, and take him away: the Prisoner clearly perceiving the violence and fury of the Court, with an extream earnest, ardent and fierce, and shrill, loud voice, cried out;

My Lord, will you murder me without right of Law, by robbing me of my Birthright, and denying me of Oyer, which is as much my right by Law, as the blood that runs in my veins? My Lord, are you afraid, and ashamed to produce that Act of Parliament, upon which you pretend to ground your Indictment; upon which you would take away my life? My Lord, if you thus proceed, you will give me and the people cause to believe, that there never was such an Act of Parliament as you pretend, nor such a Judgment as it pretends to be the executor of; nor no such crime ever committed or acted, as any Judgment of Felony can be imagined to be grounded upon; but that rather all your proceedings against me from first to last, is a malicious pack'd conspiracy against me, to murder me, and without ground or cause to take away my life? for whose life have I feloniously taken away, or endanger'd? And if none of all these things in the least can be laid unto my charge, or never were, where is the act of Felony that I have committed, upon which I am endeavoured to be hanged?

But the Officers crying out, Hear the Court, and the said mumbling Mr. Hall still singing his pitiful ill-tuned song of pressing for Judgment against the Prisoner; and so many of the Court fell upon him at once, to deliver in his Exceptions before it was too late, as made the proceedings of the Court full of confusion.

Mr. Lilburn. My Lord, I may not part with my Exceptions till my demand of Oyer be read; my Lord, my able and honest Counsel, both of them, in both of whom I have found a great deal of faithfulness and truth to me, have commanded me to dwell upon my demand of Oyer, as upon my life, and as upon a thing that is my undoubted right by Law, that cannot, nor ought not to be denied me. My Lord, the security of my life lies in it; and if it be granted me, I am for ever out of all danger of gunshot, because it is possible you cannot produce one line of a legal Act of Parliament, nor one syllable of a legal Judgment; nor, I am sure of it, so much as any shadow of pretence of a legal crime of Felony to be the foundation of all: and if so, they tell me absolutely all your proceedings against me are at an end, and I am safe and secure. Therefore, my Lord, I again and again press, to leave the Court without excuse, and do demand before all these people Oyer, or hearing of the Act, Judgment and Crimes, upon which your Indictment is grounded, as a thing that is as much my right by Law, as the blood that runs in my veins: therefore, my Lord, deny it me not.

Mr. Lilburn, saith the Recorder, it is late, and we cannot spend much more time about your business; and the Court hath already told you, they neither will nor can receive in your parchment for Oyer, without your Counsel sign it.

Mr. Lilburn. Alas, Sir, I have dealt faithfully, and truly with you, and told you, that it is drawn up by their instructions: but really and truly they were both gone out of London, before pen could be put to paper to draw the rough draught of it; and therefore it was impossible to get their hands to the ingrossed copy. Wherefore I beseech the Court to give me but time till Monday morning, and I will send after them for their hands; and engage not only to get their hands to the parchment, but to bring one or both of them to this Bar, to justify their instructions to me, and that their instructions are Law. Therefore, my Lord, be pleased to grant me but till Monday morning, and I will have them here, although I borrow money to send two Coaches with six horses a-piece to fetch them back.

Lord-Mayor. No, the Court breaks up to-night, and therefore we cannot give you till Monday.

Recorder. Mr. Lilburn, seeing you insist so stiffly upon it for your Oyer, I will tell you what we will do with you: put in your Exceptions to-night, which you have under your Counsel's hands, and the Court will assure you that in case your Counsel at our next meeting about your business, will avow that your parchment for the demand of Oyer is Law, we will grant it you; and your putting in your Exceptions now, shall be no prejudice to you in any kind.

Mr. Lilburn endeavouring to speak, to close with him, several of his honest and true friends that stood by him, cried out, there was a snare laid for him, and bid him rather die than go an inch from his Counsel's honest, just, and safe instructions. At which the Court grew very angry, and judgment again began to be pressed against the Prisoner at the Bar: and the Court required the Exceptions, without any more ado, to be delivered in.

Mr. Lilburn. Well then, my Lord, seeing I have done my utmost to obtain my right by Law, which is to have the Oyer of the Act, Judgment, and Crimes, upon which the Indictment is grounded, and it will not be granted me, but the Court hath over-ruled me; therefore, my Lord, to let all the world know that I am no baffler, nor procrastinator of time, nor have any thing of guilt, fear, or dread within me, although it be never so much to my wrong, and tend never so much to my apparent disadvantage or my ruin, I will close with Mr. Recorder, and immediately deliver in the Exceptions that I have in my hand already, signed by my Counsel, as a part of my Exceptions; provided he will distinctly repeat over the promise of the Court, and enter it upon record in the Court's Books, and order the Clerk immediately to draw up an order upon it, as large as it is in itself, and give it me legally signed before I stir from the Bar.

No, saith Mr. Recorder Steele, Mr. Lilburn, the doing of that that you require, would take up too much time, and therefore the Court cannot do it: but they will make good what I have said unto you.

Whereupon, Mr. Lilburn repeated what Mr. Recorder, (in the name of the Court) had promised, and said, Sir, is not this that the Court will stand to? Yes, saith the Recorder. Then, Sir, I beseech you, in the audience of all these people, (that they may bear witness) repeat it over again yourself.

Which

Which he did: and Mr. Lilburn cloſed with him, and accordingly delivered in his Exceptions.

And at his coming to his lodging, ſome of his friends drew up the promiſe of the Court in writing, and ſet their hands to it; which thus followeth:

That if Mr. Lilburn would deliver in the copy of his Exceptions; the not granting at this time his Oyer ſhould be no prejudice to him. And further, That the Court was to conſider of a time to have the Exceptions debated by Counſel: and if the Counſel of John Lilburn Gentleman, when they came to plead to the Exceptions, conceived it neceſſary and right to have the Oyer, that then it ſhould be granted him, before any proceeding upon the Exceptions ſhould be, as if the Exceptions were not delivered into the Court.

Witneſs, Richard Lilburn, George Wade, Thomas Webbe, George Lilburn jun. William Lilburn.

Mr. Lilburn. My Lord, I here deliver your Lordſhip and this honourable Court, part of my Exceptions under my own and my Counſellors hands: but, my Lord, I have many more to make, when I ſhall hear the Oyer, and have copies of the Act, Judgment, and Crimes according to my right, that your Indictment is grounded upon. And then ſpoke as follows.

My Lord,

I Have given into the Court my demand for Oyer, fairly ingroſſed in parchment under my hand, and part of my Exceptions againſt the Indictment, which are very difficult points in Law, and beyond my reading and skill fully to argue, and therefore I muſt depend upon my learned Counſel for that.

It was never denied the worſt of Traitors to have copies of their Indictments, and Counſel to argue the points of Law for them. The Lord Macguire, the great bloody Rebel of Ireland, indicted for Treaſon lately at the Upper-Bench, had his Counſel to argue before the learned Judges thereof, when he was indicted for High-Treaſon, and ſpent much time only about his title of Baron. Duke Hamilton, Lord Capel of late, and the Lord Caſtlehaven formerly were never denied it, nor the Earl of Straford: yet all theſe perſons were tried for facts that were crimes in the common Law, for treachery, and bloodſhed, and foul offences, ſuch as the Law of Nature forbids and abhors, (and had Laws made before their facts to be their guide.) But my only crimes are, that my name is John Lilburn, and that I am in England my native country; and the matter of Law that roſe in their caſes, was only upon the formality of the Indictment or charges againſt them, and conſequently leſs need of ſerious arguments in Law; yet the Law is ſo tender of blood and life, that it takes away no advantage from any man whoſe life is in queſtion or danger.

But, my Lord, I beſeech you conſider the difficulty of my caſe; the very crimes whereof I am accuſed, have no foundation in the Common Law, I am only accuſed for being in my native country; and the pretended Law againſt me lays no crime to my charge: I have wronged no man in his property; I have deſigned no evil againſt my country; I have hurt no man in his liberty, nor life, nor member.

The very crime laid to my charge, may be called a point of Law: it is ſuppoſed to ariſe upon the breach of a pretended Act of Parliament, ſo that it is not in matter of form, or in the formality, or nicety of proceedings againſt me, that the point in Law ariſes in my caſe: it is about the nature of the crime itſelf, whereof I am accuſed, and therefore Counſel learned in the Law is more neceſſary in my caſe, deliberately and maturely to argue it before all the learned Judges of the Law in England, than in any caſe that hath been tried in England this five hundred years; here is no light to lead my Judges in their judgment, but the very light of the Law itſelf, being a ſtrange kind of ſingle Act made in a ſtrange kind, or unknown and un-heard of manner. Here is no precedent, no example to help them: the like caſe, I dare avow it, was never tried in England before, and all England, and their poſterities, yea the babes in their mothers wombs, are concerned in the event of my Trial. Whatſoever is the iſſue of my Trial, will hereafter be drawn into a precedent, either for the good or evil of all the people of England. Beſides the ſhedding of my blood without cauſe or reaſon, muſt needs bring guilt, puniſhment, and miſery upon the cauſers and permitters thereof. Remember righteous Abel's caſe, Naboth and Uriah: therefore I hope much caution will be uſed in determining the difficult points of Law in my caſe. My Lord, not for my own ſake, for the ſparing of my blood, though I am bound to preſerve it if I can by the great Law of Nature; yet my Lord, if my life were only at the ſtake, I could contemn it, if I ſaw my contempt of it might ſerve my Country, and reſtore it to its liberty and freedom. But when the liberties of millions of perſons already in being, and yet un-born, which conſiſt and ſubſiſt in being ruled by written Laws and Rules; when theſe are at the ſtake, I hope the difficulties of the Law in this caſe, ſhall be ſeriouſly weighed, and ſolemnly debated by the moſt experienced men in the Law in the whole Nation.

The Copy of the fore-recited Exceptions thus followeth:

The Exceptions of John Lilburn Gent. Priſoner at the Bar, to a Bill of Indictment preferred againſt him, grounded upon a pretended Act, intitled, An Act for the execution of a Judgment given in Parliament againſt Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburn; which Judgment is by the ſaid Act ſuppoſed to be given the 15th day of Jan. 1651.

THE ſaid John Lilburn Priſoner at the Bar, ſaith, That the ſaid Indictment is inſufficient in the Law, in matter, ſubſtance and form. And he humbly offereth theſe Exceptions following againſt the ſame.

Exception 1. For that the ſaid Indictment is grounded only upon an Act intitled, An Act for the execution of a Judgment given in Parliament againſt Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburn. And it doth not appear, either by the title of the ſaid Act recited in the Indictment, or by any thing contained in the ſaid Act, that either the ſaid Act itſelf, is an Act of the Parliament of the Commonwealth of England, or of the Parliament ſitting at Weſtminſter; or that the ſaid ſuppoſed Judgment, for the execution whereof, the ſaid Act is ſuppoſed to provide, was given in the Parliament of the Commonwealth of England, or in the Parliament ſitting at at Weſtminſter; nor yet when the ſaid Parliament did commence or end, or whether the ſame was held by prorogation or otherwiſe. And it is evident in Law, that no Law could at that time be made, but by the Parliament of the Commonwealth of England; for by the Law then in being, the power of making Laws was only in thoſe perſons which were known and diſtinguiſhed by that title of the Parliament of the Commonwealth of England: and in that name only Addreſſes were made to them, both by the people of England, and by all foreign States and Princes, and all Addreſſes refuſed that wanted that title. Now for ought that appears in the ſaid Act, whereupon the ſaid Indictment is grounded, it may be as well an Act of Parliament in France, or Scotland, or Naples, as an Act of the Parliament of the Commonwealth of England; ſo that it doth not appear, that the ſaid Indictment is grounded upon any Law of England; or that John Lilburn Priſoner at the Bar, is indicted for any fact that is a Crime by any Law of England, and then the ſame is void in Law.

Exception 2. The ſaid Indictment is grounded upon the fore-recited Act, intitled, An Act for the execution of a Judgment given in Parliament againſt Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburn; and ſo relates only to ſome Judgment ſuppoſed to be given in Parliament againſt the ſaid Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburn; and if no ſuch Judgment were given, the Act were void, and the Judgment alſo. Now it doth not appear, that any Judgment for any Crime whatſoever, was given in Parliament againſt the ſaid Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburn. 1. Before any Judgment can be given in Law againſt any Engliſhman, for any Crime, there muſt be either an Indictment, Preſentment, or ſome Information or Accuſation againſt him, to that Court that judgeth him, for ſome Crime ſuppoſed to be committed by him. 2. The party accuſed muſt either appear before that Court, or be out-lawed for not appearing. 3. If the party appears, he muſt either confeſs the Crimes or Miſdemeanors, whereof he is accuſed, or elſe plead to the Indictment, Preſentment, or Information, or Accuſation againſt him, and come to Trial thereupon. And as ſome of theſe ought in Law to precede a Judgment againſt any Engliſhman, ſo alſo ſome of theſe afore-mentioned proceedings, in order to a lawful Judgment, ought to be entered upon ſuch Record, wherein any ſuch Judgment is entered; and unleſs it doth appear upon the Record, wherein any Judgment is entered againſt any Engliſhman for any Crime, that ſome ſuch proceedings as aboveſaid, have been made before the Judgment paſſed againſt him, the Judgment is to be holden for erroneous and void, and ought ſo to be reputed. Now it doth not appear either by the ſaid pretended Act, as it is recited in the Indictment, nor by any Record of the ſuppoſed Judgment produced, nor any otherwiſe, that there was any Indictment, Preſentment, or Information to the Parliament of the Commonwealth of England, againſt the ſaid Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburn; or if there were, it doth not appear, that he ever appeared to the ſame, nor that he was ever out-lawed for not appearing: neither doth any pleading by the ſaid Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburn, to any ſuch Indictment or Information appear, nor any Trial of him for the ſame. And therefore if any ſuch pretended Judgment be entered, as the ſaid ſuppoſed Act, and the Indictment of John Lilburn, Priſoner at the Bar, thereupon doth relate unto, the ſame is erroneous and void in Law; and by conſequence the ſaid Indictment is void.

Exception 3. The ſaid Indictment is erroneous and inſufficient in Law, for that it is only grounded upon, and recites an Act, which Act is declared to be made for the execution of a Judgment, paſſed in Parliament againſt Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburn, the 15th day of January 1651; when in truth there was no ſuch Judgment, either in matter or form, paſſed in Parliament on the ſaid 15th day of January 1651; as is enacted by the ſaid ſuppoſed Act, to be executed againſt the ſaid Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburn; and as is alſo recited in the ſaid Indictment, to be enacted by the ſaid Act, to be put in execution againſt him. Firſt, There was no Judgment paſſed in Parliament upon the ſaid 15th of January 1651; that the ſaid Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburn ſhould depart out of England within twenty days, after the ſaid 15th day of January 1651, as is mentioned in the ſaid Indictment. Secondly, There was no Judgment paſſed in Parliament, upon the ſaid 15th day of January 1651, that the ſaid Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburn ſhould depart out of England, Scotland and Ireland, or the Iſlands, Territories, or Dominions thereof, within any limited time whatſoever, or under any penalty whatſoever, as is mentioned in the ſaid Indictment. Thirdly, There never was any Judgment paſſed in Parliament, the ſaid 15th day of January 1651, that the ſaid Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburn ſhould be executed as a Felon, without benefit of Clergy, in caſe the ſaid Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburn ſhould be found, or be remaining in England, Scotland, or Ireland, after the expiration of twenty days, or any other time whatſoever, to be accounted from the ſaid 15th day of January 1651. And if no ſuch Judgment doth appear to have been paſſed againſt the ſaid Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburn, as is aforeſaid, and as is recited by the ſaid Indictment, to be enacted to be put in execution againſt him; then the original ground of the ſaid Indictment is null and void. Which is a Judgment ſuppoſed to be paſſed in Parliament againſt the ſaid Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburn, in matter, ſubſtance and form, as aforeſaid; upon the 15th day of January 1651, which is enacted by the ſaid Act, recited in the ſaid Indictment to be put in execution: whereas no ſuch Judgment ever paſſed; and therefore cannot be ſuppoſed or admitted by the Law, to be enacted to be put in execution. And upon theſe reaſons and cauſes the Priſoner at the Bar, conceives the ſaid Indictment to be inſufficient in the Law.

Exception 4. The ſaid John Lilburn further excepts againſt the ſaid Indictment, as inſufficient in the Law, in regard of the uncertainty of the ſame; the Law requiring all allegations againſt any man to be certain; for that the ſaid Indictment doth recite and ground itſelf upon an Act, made for the execution of a Judgment, paſſed in Parliament againſt Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburn. And then chargeth John Lilburn, late of London, Gentleman, to have been found in England; that is to ſay in London, contrary to the ſaid Act: but averreth not that the ſaid John Lilburn, now Priſoner at the Bar, indicted by the name of John Lilburn, late of London, Gentleman, is one and the ſelf-ſame perſon, with the ſaid Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburn, meant and intended by the ſaid Act; and not other or divers by reaſon: whereof, and for that there are ſeveral perſons known and diſtinguiſhed by the name of John Lilburn of London, Gentleman. And for that the ſaid John Lilburn, Priſoner at the Bar; doth not acknowledge that he now is, or at the making of the ſaid Act, or paſſing the ſaid ſuppoſed Judgment, was a Lieutenant-Colonel, or that he could be notified and diſtinguiſhed by that title; he the ſaid John Lilburn, Priſoner at the Bar, cannot join any certain iſſue with the Keepers of the Liberties of England, upon the ſaid Indictment. For the ſaid Indictment not averring, the ſaid John Lilburn, now Priſoner at the Bar, to be the ſame perſon, and not other, or diverſe from that John Lilburn, intended and meant in the ſaid Act, and diſtinguiſhed from all others of the ſame name, by the title of a Lieutenant-Colonel; if the Priſoner at the Bar ſhould plead the general iſſue of not guilty, he ſhould confeſs himſelf to be the ſame John Lilburn, intended by the ſaid Act; elſe he is not concerned to plead to the ſaid Indictment. And by conſequence, if the Priſoner at the Bar ſhould plead not guilty to the ſaid Indictment; the only iſſue to be tried in point of fact, between the Keepers of the Liberties of England, and the Priſoner, would be, whether John Lilburn, Priſoner at the Bar, was found in England, upon the 15th day of June 1653; and by conſequence, the Priſoner at the Bar, though he be not the perſon intended by the ſaid Act, might be enſnared and condemned as a Felon, only becauſe his name is John Lilburn: and if any other John Lilburn, ſhould in like manner plead to the ſaid Indictment, he ſhould ſuffer, becauſe he is called John Lilburn.

For all which errors and inſufficiencies in the Law, in the ſaid Indictment, Act, and ſuppoſed Judgment appearing, the ſaid John Lilburn, Priſoner at the Bar, humbly prayeth, that the ſaid Indictment may be quaſhed; and in caſe the honourable Court be not fully ſatisfied in the ſaid errors, and inſufficiencies of the ſaid Indictment, he prayeth that Counſel learned in the Law may be aſſigned him, and a competent time given for him to adviſe with them, and for them to prepare their arguments upon all the ſaid matters of Law. And that the caſe being of very great difficulty, and much concernment to the liberty of all the people of England; and being a caſe without any precedent; and the ſhedding or ſparing of innocent blood, depending upon a reſolution thereof: he humbly prayeth, that the ſaid difficult points of Law, ariſing upon the caſe, may be argued before the reverend Judges of the Law, as hath been accuſtomed in ſuch caſes, that their opinions may be had thereupon.

Signed John Norbury, John Maynard; and preſented to, and accepted by the Lord-Mayor, and the honourable Bench. July 16. 1653.

John Lilburn.

But the Court being eager to ſee the Exceptions, the Cryer commanded ſilence, and to hear the Court, who had commanded their Clerk with a low voice to read them the title of the Exceptions amongſt themſelves. Whereupon, as ſoon as the Priſoner at the Bar perceived the Court had heard the title, he deſired them to read them all over with an audible voice. But withal, my Lord, ſaid he, I beſeech you and the Court to take notice, that they are but part of my Exceptions, which the Court hath forced, and compelled me to deliver in.

At which, the Lord-Mayor was very angry, and ſaid, Mr. Lilburn, you are very much to blame, thus to abuſe and ſcandalize the Court, in ſaying we have compelled you: you may take your Exceptions again, if you are not free to deliver them in. Give him them again.

Lilburn. No, my Lord, I will have none of them; for ſeeing they are in, they are in; and I will ſtand to them, and maintain them with my life: and I hope and doubt not, but my honeſt and learned Counſel, will back them with ſtrong and unreſiſtible arguments of Law. But, my Lord, hereafter I ſhall endeavour to keep the Court cloſe to their promiſe, made unto me by their mouth, Mr. Recorder, about the Oyer: for, my Lord, here are witneſſes enough of it. But, my Lord, whereas you ſay I have abuſed the Court, in declaring that they forced and compelled me to deliver in my Exceptions; my Lord, I abſolutely deny it, that that averment is any abuſe at all to the Court. You know, my Lord, you have overruled me, in point of reading my parchment about the Oyer, and you have ordered me to deliver in my Exceptions to the Indictment, which you know I have averred by Law, I ought not to be compelled to, till I have legally the Oyer: ſo that, my Lord, I muſt yet aver, that in the eye of the Law you have committed a force and compulſion upon me. But, my Lord, I have done with it.

They ſpent ſome time in reading the beginning of the Exceptions; which (an obſervant man might eaſily ſee) did very much trouble both the Lord-Mayor and the Recorder. But the Priſoner withdrew; and by ſeveral of thoſe that ſat nigher the Lord-Mayor and Recorder than he ſtood, he was certainly informed that the Attorney-General Prideaux, who ſat upon the Bench, although he would not ſpeak much openly and publickly, yet he conſtantly, in a whiſpering or clandeſtine way, preſs'd the Court to keep the Priſoner cloſe to the queſtion; Whether he was the John Lilburn meant in the Act or no? and to give him no elbow-room to let him get off it: And that Mr. Alderman Atkins was in a pitiful frighted condition, when the Priſoner appealed to the people againſt their injuſtice. And that the pitiful Alderman moſt lamentably cried out to Colonel Okey, preſently to ſend for ſome troops of horſe, to ſecure his worſhipful perſon. And that Mr. Lee the Clerk was extreme earneſt to have the Priſoner gagged at the Bar, that he ſhould ſpeak no more; and privately preſs'd very hard, immediately to have him condemned and taken away. And that the Lord-Mayor, at the reading of the title, in which the Act is called, A pretended Act of Parliament, ſaid unto the Recorder, We are undone, if we receive in this; for we ſhall be adjudged betrayers of our truſt. And at their reading the firſt Exception, the Recorder was amazed, and ſaid, he wondered how Mr. Lilburn could get learned men in the Law to ſign ſuch Exceptions. And the Lord-Mayor asking him, what that Mr. Norbury was, whoſe hand was firſt to the Exceptions; the Recorder told him, he had lately been a Judge in Wales. My Lord, I do not ſo much wonder at his ſetting his hand to the Exceptions, (for I have known him for many years to be a man of principles ſomething in affinity to Mr. Lilburn;) but for Mr. John Maynard, one of the greateſt Lawyers of England, and one of the greateſt practitioners of the Nation, for him to ſet his hand to ſuch Exceptions, is that (my Lord) amazeth me. For if this very firſt Exception of Mr. Lilburn's be good in Law, then all the late Acts of Parliament are totally invalidated, as well as that which he ſpeaks againſt.

Then the Court broke up.

Notwithſtanding the ſtricteſt enquiry, we can't find that Lilburn, or his friends, or any one elſe, ever publiſhed the remainder of his Trial. Mr. Whitlock, in his Memorials of the Engliſh Affairs, p. 560. ſays no more than this;

July 13. 1653. Lieut. Col. Lilburn, was arraigned at the Seſſions in the Old-Bailey, upon the late Act for his Baniſhment.

July 14. Lieut. Col. Lilburn was brought again to his Trial, but he urg'd for further time in regard the Counſel aſſigned him refus'd to appear for him; only Serjeant Maynard, who was ſick, and he had an order for a Copy of his Indictment.

July 17, (16) Lilburn was brought to his Trial, but nothing done in his buſineſs; and page 563. ſays, Aug. 11. Lilburn's Trial proceeded at the Seſſions-Houſe.

16. Mr. Lilburn's Trial at the Seſſions-Houſe proceeded.

20. The Jury found Lilburn not guilty, he pleaded long for himſelf.

Nothing of theſe three laſt days Proceedings are printed.

In a Book, entitled, Lieut. Col. John Lilburn Tried and Caſt, or his Caſe and Craft diſcovered 4*to.* 1653. is recited ſome of his ſpeeches at his Trial and Animadverſions on them; which ſhews that the Colonel made a notable defence. His Speeches, as mentioned in that Book, page 125, &c. are as follow.

Concerning the Act whereupon he was indicted, this he ſaid; it was a lye and a falſhood; an Act that hath no reaſon in it, no Law for it: it was done as Pharaoh did; reſolved upon the queſtion, that all the male-children ſhould be murdered. That if he died upon this Act, he died upon the ſame ſcore that Abel did, being murdered by Cain. That the Act was a void Act, a printed thing, there being no one punctilio or clauſe in it, grounded on the Law of England, and that it was an unjuſt, unrighteous, and treacherous Act, and that he doubted not to ſhatter that Act in pieces. That they could not make an Act of Parliament, ſince the King's Head was cut off.

By the ſame Law they voted him to death, they might vote his honeſt twelve Jurymen.

He ſaid, The Parliament before the King's head was cut off, and the Members taken out, were in their purity, a gallant Parliament, who were tender of the liberties, and welfare of the Nation, and walked in the ſteps of their anceſtors, and fore-fathers; then were the days of their virginity, they made good and righteous Laws, and then they had no force upon them. But ſince 1640, and 1641, there have been no good Laws made.

He affirms, that it was no lawful Parliament, that made that Act. Again, the Parliament that made this Act of Baniſhment was no Parliament, I will prove it: And the Parliament were rather tranſgreſſors than I. Again, admit the Parliament legal, they had no power to ſend for me. If there were any Judicatory in Parliament, it was the Lords Houſe, not the Commons.

As for all Parliaments in general, he ſaid Parliaments were a delegated power, and ought to give a reaſon of all they do; and that it was not in their power, (as he had proved in his Plea at large, before the Lord Chief-Juſtice Rolls, and Mr. Juſtice Bacon, May 18, 1647;) nor had they the leaſt juriſdiction, to ſentence him, or any of the leaſt free-born Engliſhmen; unleſs it be their own Members. That all crimes whatſoever, were to be heard, determined, and judg'd at the Common Law, and no where elſe. Acts of Attainder were not lawful.

Speaking to the Lord-Mayor; This is the ſtrangeſt thing (ſaith he) that ever I ſaw, that a man muſt be cheated of his life. Good, my Lord-Mayor, you have made yourſelf a party in my caſe, and taken a wrong John Lilburn; and if you do not make me hang, you are afraid yourſelf. You make the Land groan under your burthens and oppreſſions; I deſire you will not deny me my right, that I may not loſe my life in the reſolve of a queſtion, That John Lilburn ſhall be hanged; which in time may come to murder your poſterity, and the poſterity of thoſe that hear me this day.

He told the Lord Keeble, that he had nothing to do to judge him, being a party, and had a ſalary of a thouſand pounds per annum from the State.

To Mr. Prideaux Attorney-General he ſaid, you are a blood-thirſty man, and you come here to juſtify your unrighteous Act; and I hope the Jury will take notice of all your violence. It is the admiration of my ſoul, that he ſhould be a Judge in his own caſe; to have a man ſit as my Judge, that thirſteth after my blood.

He ſaid, that the army (many of them) have been very good inſtruments, for the good of the Nation, to deliver us from Tyranny: I wiſh there is not a greater than they delivered us from.

For the Jury, he called them, his honourable Jury, and ſaid, they were the Keepers of the Liberties of England; and will make it appear that the Jury are the Judges of the Law, as well as of the Fact.

Moreover, he charged them to conſider whether if I die on the Monday, the Parliament on Tueſday may not paſs ſuch a ſentence againſt every one of you twelve; and upon your wives and children, and all your relations; and then upon the reſt of this City, and then upon the whole County of Middleſex, and then upon Hertfordſhire; and ſo by degrees there be no people to inhabit England, but themſelves?

I call Jehovah to witneſs (ſaith he,) and do here proteſt before God, Angels and Men, I am not the perſon intended to be baniſhed by that Act; ſpeaking of the Act whereupon he was indicted.

The Jury having acquitted him, were ſummon'd before the Council of State, on the 23d of Aug. 1653; in purſuance of an order of Parliament, of the 21ſt, to anſwer for their conduct.

The examination of which Jury is printed in State-Trials, Vol. I. page 81, 82. Edit. 1730. after his Trial at Guildhall in 1649, for High-Treaſon; to which the Reader is referr'd. But for what reaſon, the examination of his Jury in 1653, is there inſerted, (having no relation to that Trial) wou'd be difficult to tell.

XXVII. The Trial of Miles Sindercome alias Fish, at the Upper-Bench, Weſtminſter, Feb. 9. 1656. for High-Treaſon.

Before the Lord Chief-Juſtice Glynn, and Mr. Juſtice Warburton.

Anuary 10. 1656. Miles Sindercome was committed cloſe Priſoner to the Tower of London, for High-Treaſon; and Sir John Barkſtead Knight, Lieutenant of the Tower, gave order to Mr. Daniel Steer, one of the Warders of the Tower, to be his Keeper; with ſtrict orders from the Lieutenant, to be moſt careful of him. But Mr. Steer perceiving the deſperateneſs of his diſpoſition, by many violent and threatning ſpeeches, which he often uſed, acquainted Sir John Barkſtead therewith, and deſired more aſſiſtance, as well for the ſecurity of his own Perſon, as of the ſaid Priſoner. Wherefore, from that time forward, a guard of a Commiſſion-Officer and Soldiers, were ordered to aſſiſt the ſaid Keeper, and ſecure the Priſoner; ſo that Sindercome finding no means poſſible for him to make an eſcape by force, endeavoured afterwards to corrupt his Keeper, offering him two hundred pounds, or ſo much as his place ſhould be worth, to aſſiſt him in making his eſcape; and deſired him, if he would undertake the matter, to furniſh him with a black ſuit of clothes, a peruque, and a ſhort dagger, to paſs him through the water-gate, within the Tower, and ſaid, that then he would trouble him no further, but kill any man that ſhould oppoſe him in going. But his Keeper faithfully diſcharging his truſt, not only refuſed this proffer, but acquainted the Lieutenant therewith; who was therefore more vigilant and careful for his ſecurity. The Officers and Soldiers that daily attended in his chamber with him, would often adviſe him to make his peace with God, and to look after the eternal concernments of his Soul; which diſcourſe he would always divert by the ſpeaking of his own valour and courage, and how many he had ſlain, while he was a Soldier, boaſting greatly therein, and of his knowledge in the Law of this Nation: And would often ſay, That he doubted not to make a very good defence, if he might be tried by a Jury, according to the ancient Law of England, and to come off as well as John Lilburn.

February 6. 1656. Miles Sindercome had notice of his Trial, to be the next Monday following, and had liberty given to prepare himſelf for it; and for that purpoſe to ſend for, and converſe with, what perſons he would; and to have the uſe of pen, ink, and paper, and to write as he pleaſed: which he had, and did uſe accordingly.

February 9. 1656. Sindercome was brought to his Trial at the Upper-Bench Bar in Weſtminſter-hall, the particulars whereof are as follow.

The Indictment was for High-Treaſon, to this effect, viz.

THAT Miles Sindercome alias Fiſh, * and one William Boyes, with divers other Rebels and Traitors, againſt the Lord Protector, and Government of the Commonwealth; not having the fear of God in their hearts, but moved and ſeduced by the inſtigation of the Devil; on the 17th of September 1656, and divers other days and times, as well before as after at Weſtminſter, and divers other places in the County of Middleſex, falſely, maliciouſly and traitorouſly did conſpire, compaſs, and imagine the death of the ſaid Lord Protector; and to ſubvert and alter the Government of the Commonwealth, and to raiſe War within the ſame.

For effecting whereof,

1. They took a room in the houſe of one Edward Hilton, and divers rooms in the houſe of one James Midhope, in Weſtminſter; whither they brought Guns, Harquebuſſes and Piſtols, charged with leaden Bullets, and iron Slugs, to ſhoot, kill and murder him.

2. January 1. 1656. They provided Horſes and Weapons of War; and,

3. Took a houſe and banquetting-houſe at Hammerſmith, of one Henry Busby, for the ſame purpoſe.

4. January 9. 1656. They conſpired to burn Whitehall, where his Highneſs was in his own perſon;

* The principal Perſon employ'd in the traitorous deſign, for the deſtruction of his Highneſs's Perſon, was a notable deſperate Fellow, named Sindercome, one who heretofore had been a Quarter-Maſter under Sir John Reynolds in the Army, and was about two years ago caſhier'd by General Monk, among others in Scotland. He aſſociated to himſelf one Cecil, and many others were engag'd in the Buſineſs. For the carrying on their work, they held Correſpondence with ſome in Flanders, received directions thence from time to time, and for their Encouragement, Don Alonſo, the late Ambaſſador of Spain in England, return'd them over Sums of Money, with which they were enabled to proceed. See a Brief Relation of the late dangerous Plot. Printed in a further Narrative of the Paſſages of theſe Times in the Commonwealth of England: page 7.

ſon; and to that end brought a baſket filled with Match, Brimſtone, Gunpowder, and other combuſtible Stuff and Materials, and ſet the ſame on fire in the Chapel there; to the great danger and diſquietment of his Highneſs, and ill example of others, in contempt of the Law, againſt their due obedience to his Highneſs and Government, againſt the peace, and form of the Statute, &c.

Thus far the Indictment.

Whereupon being arraigned, he pleaded Not Guilty, and for his Trial, put himſelf upon his Country; and the iſſue being joined, there was immediately impannell'd a Jury of Gentlemen of worth and quality, to paſs upon his Life and Death: he challenged ſeveral of them; and twelve being ſworn (with his own conſent,) his Highneſs's Attorney-General (the Indictment being opened) proceeded to the Evidence, which was very full and clear, and two Witneſſes at the leaſt to all the points of the Indictment, with many aggravating cirumſtances: the particulars whereof are herein after mentioned.

The Evidence to prove the Indictment.

THere was one Toope of his Highneſs's Life-guard, who was drawn into the buſineſs; and he proved fully, 1. What perſon Sindercome is; how he inveigled him the ſaid Toope, with money in hand, and promiſes of more, and great preferment, to join with him to murder his Highneſs; ſaying, Spain could never obtain a peace with us, till he were taken out of the way. 2. The circumſtances of time, place, means and manner deſigned for this murder. 3. That he the ſaid Toope, was to give notice when his Highneſs went forth; and at what end of the Coach he ſat. 4. Their buying and keeping of fleet horſes. 5. Their intent to fire Whitehall, the fire-work placed in the Chapel; and other circumſtances. 6. Sindercome's reſolution, if the fire did not take, to kill the Protector, whatever came of it.

Alſo one John Cecil proved the whole deſign of Sindercome, and Boyes, how long it was in hand; that Sindercome engaged him the ſaid Cecil in it; what words were uſed, how it ſhould be done; what the conſequence of the murder would be; the money provided, and that when it ſhould have been done, he the ſaid Cecil was deſigned to go to Col. Sexby, and to ſhare with Sindercome in his honour and profit. That the firſt thing agreed on, was to provide good horſes. What moneys were paid by Sindercome; Sindercome's reſolution to aſſaſſinate his Highneſs when he went abroad; and the manner how. That they were upon the road five or ſix times on purpoſe; and in Hyde-park with ſwords, and piſtols charged, and had notice given them by Toope of his Highneſs's coming. That the hinges of Hyde-park Gate were filed off, in order to their eſcape. That they took an houſe with a banqueting-houſe at Hammerſmith, to ſhoot him with Guns, made on purpoſe to carry ten or twelve bullets at a time. That Toope was to give notice of his Highneſs's paſſing that way; and at which end of the Coach he ſat. That he the ſaid Cecil ſaw one of the Guns provided, which would carry twelve carbine bullets and a ſlug. He ſpake fully to the deſign of firing Whitehall; deſcribed the fire-work prepared, and the nature and intention of it, and other circumſtances. Moreover, that Boyes aſſur'd them, that when the Protector ſhould be diſpatched, forces would come from Spain and Flanders; and a great part of the Fleet would fall off. And that he believed Sexby to be the main agent herein at Bruſſels *. He proved alſo the diſcourſe Boyes had about ſeizing Portſmouth, or ſome other port in the Weſt, and of a great ſum for that purpoſe. That thirty or forty are engaged in this deſign to kill the Protector, and it was ſo ordered, that not above two ſhould know each other, until the matter ſhould be ripe for execution; and that Boyes knew the whole number.

He ſpake fully to that deſign to kill his Highneſs the firſt day of the Parliament; and their taking houſes for that purpoſe at Weſtminſter; and bringing arms thither, and other circumſtances †.

That Boyes goes by ſeveral names, and in ſeveral habits; ſometimes as a poor Prieſt in ragged clothes; ſometimes well clad as a Gentleman.

It was further proved by the ſaid John Cecil, and Col. James Midhope, that in order to the deſtroying of his Highneſs, he the ſaid Cecil, Sindercome, and Boyes, took the ſaid Midhope's houſe near the Abbey at Weſtminſter; and when they took it, Sindercome called himſelf John Fiſh, Clerk to one Mr. Havers, a pretended Gentleman of Norfolk; and Cecil went by the name of Mr. Havers's Coachman.

It was proved likewiſe, that the firſt day of the Parliament, after they had taken Midhope's houſe, he being there; Sindercome and Cecil went thither to him, from one Edward Hilton, a Sempſter's houſe in King-ſtreet, Weſtminſter, where they left a great trunk full of arms, brought from Flanders; and carried with them in a viol-caſe, one harquebuſs, and ſome piſtols, charged with leaden bullets, and ſlugs, about Sermon-time, to Midhope's houſe; which they found very convenient for their purpoſe, and reſolved to buy it, and to build a room in the yard next the ſtreet; there being ſeveral back yards and doors: and reſolved alſo to ſecure Midhope, or otherwiſe to deal with him that he might not diſcover them, nor hinder their deſign ‖.

It was proved moreover, by Cecil and Midhope, that Sermon being ended, all three of them, viz. he the ſaid Cecil, Sindercome, and Boyes, went into the yard of the houſe next the Abbey, to ſhoot his Highneſs, as he paſſed from the Abbey to meet the Parliament in the painted Chamber; and to that end

* In Col. Edward Sexby's Narrative, which he deliver'd to Sir John Barkſtead, Lieutenant of the Tower, Oct. 12. 1657. printed in A further Narrative of the Paſſages of theſe Times in the Commonwealth of England, page 21. he ſays, "Sir John, I ſent to "you to tell you, that I am guilty of the whole Buſineſs of Sindercome, as to the deſign of killing the Lord Protector, &c. "and to that purpoſe I furniſh'd Sindercome with about 500 l. in Money, and alſo with Arms, and tied him to an Engagement, "that he ſhould not reveal the deſign." And further he ſaid, "The Letters they have of mine, they could not prove them to be "mine; but by my own Confeſſion, which I now confeſs, and acknowledge that they are mine. And that I was with Charles "Stuart, and acquainted him, that I was an Enemy to the Lord Protector; and I alſo declare that I receiv'd a large Sum of Mo-"ney from the Spaniard, to carry on my ſaid deſign, and to make what Confuſion I could in England, by endeavouring the kil-"ling of the Lord Protector, and by what other ways I had in deſign; and to that end, the better to effect it, I came into Eng-"land in a diſguis'd Habit, and was the principal in putting on others in the ſaid deſign." And Page 22. he ſays, "That he was "the only Man, that ſet on Sindercome to kill the Lord Protector; and that Book, called, Killing no Murder, he owned: and ſaid "he was ſtill of that Judgment; yet ſaid, it was both fooliſhly and knaviſhly done in that Book, to charge the Lieutenant of the "Tower, touching Sindercome's Death." This Col. Sexby died a Priſoner in the Tower, Jan. 13. 1657.

† This Sindercome had engaged to kill General Monk in Scotland, and would have engaged the ſaid Mr. Cecil therein alſo.

‖ Hilton depoſed fully concerning the Viol-caſe and Trunk of Arms.

end, he the ſaid Cecil ſtood on the wall with his piſtol charged, and Sindercome walked in the yard; but other company coming in thither, they were prevented, and Boyes went out of the yard into the throng of people.

It was further proved by Cecil, that this enterprize not ſucceeding, they reſolved to murder his Highneſs ſome other way, to wit, to furniſh themſelves with fleet horſes, to kill him as he rode forth. That Sindercome engaged Toope, who conſtantly gave him notice of the Life-guards going abroad, or of the ſaddling of the Pad Nags.

That the firſt time they rode forth to kill him, was the latter end of September laſt, (viz.) the Saturday after he had left going to Hampton-Court.

That the ſecond time was when he rode to Kenſington, and thence, the back way to London.

The third time, when he went to Hyde-Park in his Coach.

The fourth time, when he went to Turnham-Green, and ſo by Acton home; at which time they rode forth to kill him, and reſolved to break through all difficulties to effect it.

The fifth time, when he rode into Hyde-Park, where his Highneſs alighting, aſked him the ſaid Cecil, whoſe horſe that was he rode on, Sindercome being then on the out-ſide of the Park; and then Cecil was ready to have done it, but doubted his horſe, having at that time got a cold.

That Sindercome rode forth once himſelf to kill his Highneſs, and told Cecil of it.

That all proving ineffectual, they reſolved to deſiſt till the Spring, and in the mean time to fire Whitehall.

That the ſaid Cecil put on a thin holland ſhirt, and thin clothes for his better eſcape, when he rode forth to kill his Highneſs; and prepared his horſe as if he had been to run a race.

To prove the taking of the houſe and banqueting-houſe at Hammerſmith, of Henry Busby, Coachman to the Earl of Salisbury; there was beſide Cecil, the teſtimony of Henry Buſby himſelf, William Page, and William Neal, Sindercome's ſervant.

To prove the baſket of ſtuff for firing the Chapel, there was the teſtimony of Cecil and Toope, and others who were perſons of quality.

To prove the buying and keeping of the horſes, there was the teſtimony of Henry Buſby, who ſold them one horſe for fourſcore pounds; alſo of William Page, and William Neal, Sindercome's ſervant.

To prove the hinges of Hyde-Park gate being filed off, and the pales cut, there was the teſtimony of John Cecil, and Thomas Shell.

The Priſoner ſeeing the Evidence ſo clear againſt him, had nothing material to ſay for himſelf by way of defence, yet carried himſelf very inſolent at the Bar; and when the Court asked him touching any of the matters proved againſt him, he would confidently deny what was laid to his charge. And after all the Evidence given, and the Priſoner heard what he had to ſay for himſelf; the Court ſum'd up the whole to the Jury of Life and Death, and declared, that by the Common Law, to compaſs or imagine the death of the chief Magiſtrate of the Land, by what name ſoever he was called, whether Lord Protector or otherwiſe, is High-Treaſon; he being the chief Magiſtrate, and the Spring of Juſtice, in whoſe name all Writs run, all Commiſſions and Grants are made: and that the Statutes of Treaſon made 25 Ed. III. as to this, did only declare what the Common Law was, before the making of that Statute, and was not introductive of a new Law *: and more to that effect; and then proceeded to Judgment againſt the Priſoner, in this manner.

The SENTENCE.

IT is conſidered by the Court, that the ſaid Miles Sindercome, alias Fiſh, be ſent from hence to the Priſon in the Tower of London from whence he came, and from thence be drawn upon a hurdle through the ſtreets of London to Tyburn; there to be hanged on the Gallows until he be half dead, and then to be cut down, and his intrails and bowels taken out, and burnt in his own ſight, and his body divided into four quarters, and be diſpoſed of as his Highneſs the Lord Protector ſhall think fit.

The ſame day, after he was brought back again to the Tower, he was much inraged, and in a great paſſion; his Keeper, and Elizabeth Herring, one of his Siſters, being in the chamber with him, he did ſwear, That they ſhould never have his life; and then deſired his Keeper to help him to ſome poiſon, that he might make away himſelf: which he refuſing, Sindercome then deſired his Siſter to buy him ſome, for the ſame purpoſe. But ſhe crying at that preſent, gave him no anſwer; but taking her opportunity (when the Keeper did not ſo much mind them) had ſome private diſcourſe with him, (which cannot be known what it was about.) Preſently after, his ſaid Siſter left him, and before her going, ſpake to his Keeper, ſaying, Lord, what ſhall I do? Did you hear what my Brother ſaid of the Poiſon? Thereupon, the Keeper charged her not to bring him any, telling her, if her Brother were poiſoned in his houſe, he would accuſe her for aſſiſting him in it.

The Lieutenant of the Tower then being fully acquainted with the deſperateneſs of Sindercome, commanded a file of Soldiers to watch in the room below his chamber, and a Guard of Officers to be with him in his chamber, that all means for the making his eſcape might be prevented.

Sindercome the ſame day endeavoured to corrupt his Keeper, as formerly, and with much earneſtneſs preſt him to be helpful to him in his greateſt diſtreſs; and asked if it were not poſſible for him to make an eſcape, telling him, if he would aſſiſt him in it, he would make good to him two hundred pounds that night; and if he would go along with him, he would make that two hundred pounds, ſeven hundred pounds, or what more he ſhould deſire: farther requeſting him to furniſh him with a black ſuit, peruque, and dagger, for that purpoſe. But by reaſon that the Officers aforeſaid, were in the chamber with him, he had not liberty ſo freely to diſcourſe with his Keeper about this buſineſs as he deſired, and therefore earneſtly deſired the ſaid Guard of Officers, and all in the chamber with him, to withdraw; in which time he wrote and deliverd privately to his Keeper a note, whereof the next following words is a copy,

Mr.

* Mr. Whitlock, in his Memorials, Page 654. Feb. 9. 1656. Sindercome was tried at the Upper-Bench Bar, found Guilty, and condemned to be hanged, drawn, and quartered: The Court declared, That by the Common Law, to compaſs or imagine the Death of the Chief Magiſtrate, by what name ſoever he was called, whether Lord Protector, or otherwiſe, is High-Treaſon, and that the Statute 25 Edw. III. was only declaratory of the Common Law.

Mr. Steer,

YOU ſee my condition, it is no time to daily with it; I have already provided two hundred pounds for you; and if you will let me make my eſcape, and that you will go with me, or ſet me forth, I ſhall give you, were it five hundred pounds more, I do not care: if you will do any thing, let me know your mind; I hope God will work my deliverance by your means; let me hear your judgment, that we may conclude; for if you and I do conclude, I will have other clothes brought into the room below, with a peruque, and I will take up a board (meaning, as is conceived, one of the boards of his chamber, to go down into the room below it, where his black clothes ſhould lie; though therein he would have been fruſtrated, by reaſon of the file of Soldiers, which the Lieutenant had commanded to watch there,) and I do judge that muſt be the way. For God's ſake do what you can, and do not diſtruſt my not performing to give you the money; for I can this night order you two hundred pounds to any body that you ſhall appoint: but if you ſhould——

You may obſerve, that the reaſon of his breaking off ſo abruptly, was, that the Guard of Officers whom he had for that time deſired to withdraw, finding that he made them ſtay ſomewhat longer than ordinary, preſt in upon him, ſo that he had not time to write further. His Keeper for anſwer, endeavoured to take him off from thoſe thoughts, telling him the impoſſibility of it, and deſired him to conſider his preſent condition, and prepare himſelf for another world: whereupon Sindercome finding he could no ways prevail, moved theſe things no more afterwards.

From which time, ſeveral pious and able Divines, ſome of which were appointed by his Highneſs, and others that were deſired by the Lieutenant of the Tower, daily came to him; as Mr. George Griffith, Mr. Thomas Brooks, Mr. John Hodges, Mr. Slater, Mr. Barker, and others. But before they or any others entered into diſcourſe with him, he would wave all queſtioning of him about the buſineſs for which he was condemned: they laboured much with him for his ſoul's good, but with no ſatisfaction to the greateſt part, and with very little to others of them; he having before declared his judgment, or rather opinion, by reaſon of his unconſtancy and unſettledneſs in them, ſometimes owning the univerſal point of Redemption; at other times, that the ſoul died with the body, or ſlept with the body till the Reſurrection, and then it may be it ſhould riſe; that by the grave Hell was meant; with ſeveral other deteſtable tenets. And indeed there is ſcarce any erroneous opinion known in our times, that he had not a general notion of, and would pretend unto. In ſeveral of his diſcourſes with thoſe Miniſters, he would not hear but that Judas was in as good a condition as Peter; and of that in the 17th of John v. 12. where Chriſt ſaith, While I was with them in the world, I kept them in thy name; thoſe that thou gaveſt me I have kept, and none of them is loſt but the Son of Perdition, that the Scripture might be fulfilled: he would ſay, it was meant to all men, who as they were ſinners, were Sons of deſtruction and perdition. And as to that Text, ſpeaking of the diſciples, which ſaith, one of them was a Devil; he would ſtartle and ſay, it was a rugged and harſh ſaying. He would often put it as a caſe to them, whether for any perſon to contrive the death of another, and not to act it, were puniſhable by man? and being as often reſolved, and told of the Laws made in that caſe; he would anſwer, that which they alledged was but the Law of man, and that Thoughts were not to be puniſhed by man, but God who alone knew them.

Friday 13th of February.

Afterwards he had notice given him, that the next day was appointed for his Execution; and about eight a clock that night, the Guard of Officers in his chamber were Captain Henry Sharp, Captain-Lieutenant William Foſter, Enſign Philip Brown, Serjeant Nicholas Stock, and his ſaid Keeper. And preſently after they came into the chamber, three Women came to him, two whereof were Sindercome's Siſters, and the other one ſaid to be his Sweetheart, who expreſſed trouble and ſorrow, lamenting his condition. And one of his ſaid Siſters, named Elizabeth Herring, told him, She had rather ſee him die before ſhe went from him, than he ſhould die ſo barbarous a death as was intended him, or to that effect: whereupon the Officers minding her expreſſions, took what care they could to prevent her, in giving him any thing; and as ſoon as the ſaid women were gone, carefully ſearched the room. Then Sindercome deſired the Officers and his Keeper to withdraw, that he might be private; in which privacy, he continued about a quarter of an hour, then came to the chamber-door, ſaying to the ſaid Officers that ſtood without, They might come in, for he had now done; which words being not uſual with him, were obſerved by moſt of them. The firſt that went in, found him rubbing his hands with his handkerchief, and wiping his noſe and mouth therewith; and he walked a turn or two about the room, and then took the Bible, and ſat down reading therein. A while after, he ſtarted up ſuddenly, ſaying, he muſt go to bed; and therewithal undreſt himſelf, and went into his bed. The ſaid Guard of Officers in his chamber, being then diſcourſing together, Sindercome (a quarter of an hour after he had lain ſtill) diſcourſed very freely with them, of what they were talking. About which inſtant of time, orders were ſent from Sir John Barkſtead, to the ſaid Officers, to be careful that he ſhould not make away himſelf * by poiſon, in regard it was the laſt night he was to be there; and they ſhould diligently ſearch all places of his chamber, and about his bed to prevent it. But preſently after, Sindercome fell aſleep (as was thought) and ſnorting ſomewhat unuſually, one of the Officers deſired his Keeper to take a candle and look upon him; which he did, and found him almoſt dead there, which prevented their further ſearch. Whereupon a Surgeon was immediately ſent for, who applied medicines to him; notwithſtanding which, after he had continued in that condition ſpeechleſs about two hours, he died †.

February

* Sindercome had been an Apprentice to a Chirurgeon, near St. Catherine's at the Tower, and ſo it was probable had more than ordinary knowledge of Poiſons.

† Lord Clarendon in his Hiſtory of the Rebellion, Vol. III. Part 2. (8vo Edition) Page 646, 647. ſays, Sindercome was a very ſtout Man, and one who had been much in his (Cromwell's) favour, and who had twice or thrice, by wonderful and unexpected Accidents, been diſappointed in the minute he made ſure to kill him, and (that Cromwell) had caus'd him to be apprehended; his behaviour was ſo reſolute in his Examination and Trial, as if he thought he ſhould ſtill be able to do it; and it was manifeſt that he had more Aſſo-

February 14. 1656.

The Coroner's Inqueſt conſiſting of Merchants, and other ſubſtantial Houſekeepers of the Tower Liberty, had in charge to inquire of the manner of Sindercome's death, which they diligently attended; and all ſuch witneſſes as could ſpeak materially thereunto, were examined by the Coroner. And although there were then very ſtrong preſumptions that he had poiſoned himſelf; yet in regard the Surgeons, who had then only opened his body, and finding no uſual ſymptoms accompanying the taking of ſharp poiſons, could not poſitively deliver their opinions, otherwiſe than hereafter is expreſſed, the Jury deferred the giving up their verdict, till Monday following.

The ſame day afterwards, at the deſire of the Lieutenant of the Tower, Sir Richard Napier, Doctor of Phyſick, and Doctor Fern, Reader of Anatomy at Greſham College; opened Sindercome's head, and gave their opinions thereof alſo. Which was likewiſe afterward viewed by Mr. Charles Stamford, Mr. Nicholas Brethers, Wardens to the Company of Surgeons; and Mr. Laurence Loe; all able and knowing perſons in their profeſſion, which remain with the ſaid Coroner under their hands.

February 14. 1656.

Being then deſired by Sir John Barkſtead. Knt. Lieutenant of the Tower, to ſee the head of Miles Sindercome opened, his body having been opened before our coming, by the Surgeons, and to give him our obſervations and ſenſe thereof:

WE found the Brain much inflamed, red, and diſtended with Blood, ſwollen as full as the Skull could well hold; beſides much grumous and clodded Blood out of the Veins, which muſt be the effect of ſome very violent and preternatural cauſe. Yet are we not able poſitively to determine what that is, or whence it did proceed, the motion being much more ſudden and violent than that of Apoplexies, and other known diſeaſes of the Brain, except when cauſed by contuſion and other the like extraordinary violences.

Richard Napier, Chriſtopher Fern.

WE, whoſe names are here ſubſcribed, being ordered to open the body of Miles Sindercome, Priſoner in the Tower of London, do hereby declare, according to the beſt of our judgments and experiences, That we could not find out or diſcover any, the uſual or common ſymptoms or effects, accompanying the taking of known and ſharp poiſons, cauſing ſudden death; but by the diſtenſion and ſwelling of the Brain, and Veſſels in the Head, with much coagulated blood which we found there, more than in ordinary diſeaſes, our opinions are, that the ſaid Priſoner hath cauſed the ſame by ſome extraordinary means, for the haſtening of his death.

February 15. 1656.

Being Sabbath-day, Sindercome's Keeper, with others, having removed the body out of the chamber where he died, into a more airy place, and taking ſeveral things out of that chamber, removed the Cloſe-ſtool, and under it was found a Paper ſubſcribed with his own hand, as followeth.

GOD knoweth my heart, I do take this courſe, becauſe I would not have all the open ſhame of the World executed upon my body: I deſire all good people not to judge amiſs of me; for I do not fear my Life, but do truſt God with my Soul. I did this thing without the privity of any perſon in the world: I do, before God and the World, clear my Keeper, my Siſters, Mother, or Brother, or any other of my Relations, but it was done alone by myſelf. I ſay by me,

Miles Sindercome.

February 16. 1656.

The Jury ſate again according to adjournment, to whom the aforeſaid teſtimonies of the Phyſicians and Surgeons, and alſo Sindercome's own note were apparent; ſo that they did then unanimouſly reſolve and agree, that he, by ſome extraordinary means, had cauſed his own death, and that they verily believed the ſame to be by poiſon. But for their further direction, as to the formal part of their verdict, they at that time deferred the giving of it, and adjourned till ſeven of the clock the next morning, at the Lord Chief-Juſtice's houſe, where they accordingly met; and having received his Lordſhip's direction, touching matter of form, did all unanimouſly agree on, and give up their verdict, to the effect following.

February 17. 1656.

Middleſex ſſ. WE find that upon the 13th day of February, in the year of our Lord, 1656, about the hour of nine in the night, Miles Sindercome, otherwiſe Fiſh, late of the Pariſh of Peter in Bonds, in the County of Middleſex; God not having before his eyes, but by the inſtigation of the Devil being moved and ſeduced, at the Tower of London, in the Pariſh and County aforeſaid, felonioufly, wilfully, and of his malice towards himſelf aforethought, as a Felon againſt himſelf, then and there felonioufly upon himſelf did make an aſſault. And that the ſaid Miles Sindercome ciates, who were undiſcover'd and as reſolute as himſelf; and though he (Cromwell) had got him condemn'd to die, the Fellow's carriage and words were ſuch, as if he knew well how to avoid the Judgment; which made Cromwell believe that a Party in the Army would attempt his reſcue. Whereupon he gave ſtrict charge that he ſhould be carefully look'd to in the Tower, and three or four of the Guard always with him day and night. At the day appointed for his Execution, thoſe Troops Cromwell was moſt confident of, were placed upon the Tower-hill, where the Gallows was erected. But when the Guard call'd Sindercome to ariſe in the Morning, they found him dead in his bed, which gave trouble exceedingly to Cromwell: for beſides that he hoped, that, at his Death, to avoid the utmoſt rigour of it, he would have confeſs'd many of his Confederates; he now found himſelf under the reproach of having caus'd him to be poiſon'd, as not daring to bring him to Publick Juſtice: nor could he ſuppreſs that ſcandal. It appear'd upon Examination, that the night before, when he was going to bed in the preſence of his Guard, his Siſter came to take her leave of him; and upon her going away, he put off his Clothes, and leap'd into his Bed, and ſaid, "This was "the laſt Bed he ſhould ever go into." His Body was drawn by a Horſe to the Gallows where he ſhould have been hang'd, and buried under it, with a ſtake driven through him, as is uſual in the caſe of Self-Murther: Yet this Accident perplex'd Cromwell very much, and though he was without the particular diſcovery which he expected, he made a general diſcovery by it, that he himſelf was more odious in his Army than he believed he had been.

dercome otherwiſe Fiſh, then and there, certain poiſoned powder, through the noſe of him the ſaid Miles, into the head of him the ſaid Miles, feloniouſly, wilfully, and of his malice towards himſelf aforethought, as a Felon of himſelf, feloniouſly did ſnuff and draw. By reaſon of which ſnuffing and drawing of the poiſon aforeſaid, ſo as aforeſaid, into the head of him the ſaid Miles Sindercome; he the ſaid Miles Sindercome, by the ſtrength and operation of the poiſon aforeſaid, himſelf did mortally poiſon; of which ſaid mortal poiſoning, he the ſaid Miles Sindercome otherwiſe Fiſh, within three hours after died. And ſo we find that the aforeſaid Miles Sindercome otherwiſe Fiſh, the ſaid 13th day of February, in the year aforeſaid, at the Tower of London aforeſaid, in the Pariſh and County aforeſaid, in manner and form aforeſaid, feloniouſly, wilfully, and of his malice towards himſelf aforethought, as a Felon againſt himſelf, feloniouſly himſelf did kill and murder. We find no Goods or Chattels, that the ſaid Miles Sindercome otherwiſe Fiſh had, at the time of the felony and murder aforeſaid, in manner and form aforeſaid, upon himſelf done and committed. In witneſs hereof, we have hereunto ſet our hands, this 17th day of February, 1656, &c.

And thereupon the ſaid Coroner iſſued forth his Warrant for the burial of Sindercome, the Copy whereof followeth.

Middleſex ſſ. WHereas the Jury impannel'd and ſworn to inquire of the death of Miles Sindercome otherwiſe Fiſh, did preſent upon their Oaths, that the ſaid Miles the 13th of this inſtant February, did feloniouſly poiſon himſelf: Theſe are therefore in the name of his Highneſs, the Lord Protector of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland, to require you to bury the Corps of the ſaid Miles Sindercome, according to Law, in the next common Highway. Hereof you are not to fail, as you will anſwer the contrary at your perils, dated the 17th day of February, 1656.

Thomas Evans Coroner.

To the Conſtables and Headboroughs within the Liberty of the Tower of London.

On the ſame day, February 17. Miles Sindercome aforeſaid, being found to have murdered himſelf, his Body was according to Law drawn to the open place upon Tower-hill, at a horſe's tail, with his head forward, and there under the Scaffold of common execution a hole being digg'd, he was turned in ſtark naked, and a ſtake ſpiked with Iron, was driven through him into the earth; that part of the ſtake which remains above ground, being all plated with Iron.

The Examination of Elizabeth Herring, the Wife of William Herring, of the Precinct of St. Katharine's, Mariner; taken upon Oath, the 14*th of* February, 1656.

SHE ſaith, that Miles Sindercome now dead was her brother, and that he was a Priſoner in the Tower of London, the ſpace of three weeks laſt paſt or thereabouts to her knowledge; and that for the ſpace of a fortnight ſhe was at the Tower ſeveral times to ſee the ſaid Miles, and could be admitted but once to ſee him, until the 5th day of February, ſhe this Informant was ſent for to come to the ſaid Miles. When ſhe came to the ſaid Miles, ſhe found two Gentlemen in the room with him; who, as ſoon as this Informant came in, did ſay unto the ſaid Miles Sindercome, that he was not to ſpeak any thing in private to this Informant; then this Informant came away. And that ſhe came ſeveral times after to the ſaid Miles; that on Monday the 9th of this inſtant February, ſhe came to the ſaid Miles after he had received ſentence to die; and lamenting his condition, ſhe ſaid, that he would bring his Mother's gray hairs with ſorrow to the grave, and what an open ſhame it would be to him and all his friends. The ſaid Miles Sindercome then did anſwer, ſaying, that before they ſhould have his life ſo ſhamefully (meaning his Highneſs the Lord Protector, as this Informant believeth) he would poiſon himſelf firſt, and deſired her, this Informant, to buy him ſome poiſon, which ſhe refuſed. And that at times when this Informant hath been with the ſaid Miles, ſhe did ſee ſome ſtrange faces which ſhe did not know, and that ſhe came every day ſince Monday, once a day or more, to the ſaid Miles; and ſaith, that he the ſaid Miles, did not ſpeak any more words to her of any poiſon, or any other words of diſcontent, as if he intended to deſtroy himſelf; and that he never did complain to this Informant of any ſickneſs or diſeaſes that he was troubled withal. And that on Friday the 13th of this inſtant February, ſhe being alone with the ſaid Miles Sindercome, did perſuade him to confeſs who had a hand with him in the plot, againſt his Highneſs the Lord Protector; that if he would confeſs, his Highneſs would grant him his life, and wiſhed him to truſt to God and man; and the ſaid Miles anſwered, he would have it under black and white, and that he would truſt no man. And that about eight of the clock at night ſhe parted from the ſaid Miles, and left him in good health, being prepared to die, as ſhe thought; and that he found in his own conſcience he had made his peace with the Lord: and this Informant denieth that ſhe ever brought him any poiſon, or did buy any other thing to deſtroy him; yet confeſſeth, that on Friday night ſhe did ſay unto the ſaid Miles, that ſhe deſired with all her heart, to ſee him die a natural death in that chamber. And further ſaith not.

SHE ſaith, that ſhe hath known Miles Sindercome for the ſpace of four years laſt paſt, and that he lodged at the houſe of Daniel Stockwel, Haberdaſher of Hats on London-Bridge, where this Informant lived; and that the night before he was taken into cuſtody, and impriſoned, he lay at his lodging in the ſaid houſe. And this Informant denieth, and ſaith, that ſhe doth not know any of the company that uſed to come to the ſaid Miles, while he lodged there; and ſaith, that ſhe hath been ſeveral times to ſee the ſaid Miles at the Tower of London, while he remained there; and ſaith, that ſhe doth not know of any poiſon, or any other violent thing, which was brought or ſent to the ſaid Miles Sindercome, to deſtroy himſelf; and further ſaith not.

SHE ſaith, that ſhe was ſeveral times to ſee Miles Sindercome, the time he was in the Tower; ſaith, that ſhe doth not know of any poiſon, or any other violent thing that was brought to the ſaid Miles to deſtroy himſelf; and ſhe did never hear the ſaid Miles ſpeak any words, as if he intended to deſtroy himſelf by poiſon, or any other way: and ſf urther ſaith not.

Middleſex ſſ. The Information of William Foſter, taken upon Oath the 14*th day of* February 1656, before Thomas Evans Gent. one of the Coroners of the County of Middleſex.

HE ſaith, that on Friday the 13th of February, about nine of the clock at night, he was in the chamber where Miles Sindercome, otherwiſe Fiſh, lodged, within the Tower of London; ſaith that the ſaid Miles Sindercome did deſire this Informant and four more that were with him, that they would withdraw out of the chamber whilſt he went to prayers; and within leſs than a quarter of an hour after, he called in this Informant, and thoſe that were with him, into the chamber again; and a quarter of an hour after that, the ſaid Miles did take a Book into his hands to read, and ſaid, that he would go to bed, and that that was the laſt night he ſhould go into a bed, and the laſt bed he ſhould go into. And then he lay down in his bed, and, to this Informant's thinking, fell aſleep, and ſnored. And this Informant deſired Daniel Steer, Miles Sindercome's Keeper, to take a candle, and to ſee how the ſaid Miles did lie in his bed; and the ſaid Daniel Steer did tell this Informant, that the ſaid Miles Sindercome alias Fiſh was almoſt dead as he lay in the bed; but the ſaid Miles Sindercome did lie in that condition ſpeechleſs the ſpace of two hours, and then died.

HE ſaith, that on Friday the 13th day of February, about ten of the clock in the forenoon, he was with Miles Sindercome, otherwiſe Fiſh, in his chamber, and ſtaid there at dinner; and in the ſame time, while that they were at dinner, the ſaid Miles Sindercome did ſay theſe words, that that was the laſt meal's meat that ever he ſhould eat, as he thought. And after, two of the ſaid Miles's ſiſters, a couſin, and another gentlewoman with them, came to ſee the ſaid Miles, and did then perſuade him the ſaid Miles, to confeſs to them, and to declare whom they were, who had brought him into thoſe troubles and ſorrows that he was like to undergo. And he anſwered them, ſaying, to whom ſhould he confeſs, he could not expect mercy from him, who was reſolved to give him none; ſaying, that Cromwell ſaid to him, when he was taken and brought before him, Sindercome, have I caught you? you that have ſought many ways to take away my life, I will have no conſideration at all of thy life. And when he had uttered theſe words, he was in a great paſſion, and ſaid, that he might go and declare againſt the Lord Fleetwood, the Lord Lambert, Sir John Barkſtead, Sir Thomas Pride, or any other member of the army, if he were minded to deſtroy innocent blood. And about ſeven of the clock that day, orders were brought to this Informant from the Major, that the ſaid Miles Sindercome might have ſome time allowed him a-part, to prepare himſelf, if he deſired it. And this Informant went out of the chamber, and left the ſaid Miles alone, and a quarter of an hour after, this Informant ſtanding at the chamber-door, did ſee the ſaid Miles kneeling on his knees on the ground by the bed-ſide, and preſently after one of the Centinels that ſtood at his chamber-door, did tell this Informant, that the ſaid Miles did cough and keck, as if he was a vomiting; and this Informant opened the chamber-door and went in, and found the ſaid Miles walking about the chamber. And Capt. Foſter, and Capt. Sharp, who were ordered to be there that night, then came into the room; and about nine of the clock at night, the ſaid Miles did deſire this Informant, and the other company that were there, to withdraw out of the room, and about a quarter of an hour after, he called them in again; and the ſaid Miles did then take a Book into his hand to read, and ſaid, that he would go to bed, and that that was the laſt night he ſhould ever go to bed, and the laſt bed he ſhould lie in; and then laid him down in his bed. And then Captain Sharp, did deſire Daniel Steer, the ſaid Miles's Keeper, to ſee how he did lie in his bed; and the ſaid Daniel Steer looking upon the ſaid Miles, did ſay unto this Informant, and the reſt there, that the ſaid Miles was almoſt dead: and yet the ſaid Miles Sindercome did lie in that condition the ſpace of two hours, and then died.

SAith, that about the end of January, Miles Sindercome, alias Fiſh, being a Priſoner in the Tower of London, under the cuſtody of Sir John Barkſtead, Knight, having ſome diſcourſe with this Informant who was his Keeper, did then ſay unto this Informant, that if he would be faithful to him the ſaid Miles, he would give him to the value of his place, what it was worth, were it a hundred or two of pounds; and deſired him, this Informant, if he would undertake the buſineſs, and accept of his proffer, to provide him the ſaid Miles a black ſuit of clothes, a peruque, and alſo a ſhort dagger, and to paſs him out of the water-gate, and he would kill any man that ſhould oppoſe him; and the ſame day that he was at his Trial, being the 9th of this inſtant February, after he came back again to the Tower; the ſaid Miles was in a great paſſion, his ſiſter Elizabeth Herring being then in his company; he the ſaid Miles then did ſwear, that they ſhould not have their ends (meaning, as this Informant believeth, that the Sentence pronounced againſt him that day ſhould not be executed.) And then the ſaid Miles Sindercome did deſire this Informant to help him to ſome poiſon, that he might make away himſelf; and this Informant refuſing to do any of thoſe things which he deſired, the ſaid Miles then did ſpeak to the ſaid Elizabeth Herring his ſiſter, who was there, to bring him ſome poiſon; but ſhe the ſaid Elizabeth crying, gave him no anſwer. And afterwards the ſaid Miles, and the ſaid Elizabeth, had ſome private diſcourſe together in the room, which this Informant did not hear.

hear. And the ſaid Elizabeth parting from the ſaid Miles, came down ſtairs, and did ſpeak to this Informant, ſaying, Lord, what ſhall I do, did you hear him what he ſaid of the poiſon? And this informant anſwered, that he did hear what he had ſaid, and wiſhed her not to bring him any; and further ſaid to the ſaid Elizabeth Herring, that if the ſaid Miles was poiſoned while he continued in this Informant's houſe; that he this Informant anſwered, he would charge her the ſaid Elizabeth with helping the ſaid Miles to poiſon. And then the ſaid Elizabeth went away from this Informant; and this Informant went up into the chamber to the ſaid Miles Sindercome; who asked this Informant, if it was not poſſible for him to help the ſaid Miles to make an eſcape now in his great diſtreſs; and further ſaid, that if this Informant would do it, he would make good to him 200 l. this night: and then ſaid, that if he this Informant would go along with the ſaid Miles, when he eſcaped, he would make that 200 l. 700 l. or what more he ſhould deſire; further requiring earneſtly, this Informant to help him to a black ſuit, and a peruque. This Informant then ſaid, to the ſaid Miles Sindercome, that it was impoſſible for him to make an eſcape, there being ſuch ſtrict guard kept about him; and had no further diſcourſe at that time. And that on Friday the 13th day of February, about ten of the clock at night, this Informant then was with the ſaid Miles in his chamber, together with Captain Henry Sharp, Captain-Lieutenant William Foſter, Enſign Philip Browne, Serjeant Nicholas Stock: and the ſaid Miles did deſire this Informant and the reſt of the company, to withdraw out of the room, which they did; and about a quarter of an hour after, he the ſaid Miles, did deſire them to come again into his chamber: he walking a turn or two about the room, did take into his hand a Bible to read in; and a while after he ſtarted up ſuddenly from the place where he ſat, ſaying, he would go to bed, that that was the laſt time he ſhould go to bed, and the laſt bed he ſhould lie in. And when the ſaid Miles had lain a while in his bed, he fell aſleep and ſnorted, and after that he had a rattling in his throat, and this Informant was bid to take a candle and ſee the ſaid Miles as he lay in his bed; and when this Informant had looked upon the ſaid Miles, he found him almoſt dead as he lay in his bed. And this Informant being further asked, if he knew of any poiſon, or other means, which the ſaid Miles did uſe to take away his life; ſaith, that he did not ſee any, neither doth he know any more, touching the ſaid Miles's death, but what he hath already declared in this Information.

Daniel Steer.

SAith, that between ſeven and eight of the clock on Friday night, being the 13th day of February, being in the chamber with Miles Sindercome otherwiſe Fiſh, three women whoſe names this Informant doth not know, came crying into the chamber to the ſaid Miles, lamenting his condition; the ſaid Sindercome then reading in a Bible, did ſo continue reading about half an hour, while the ſaid three women were there. One of the ſaid women ſaid to him the ſaid Miles, that ſhe would be glad to ſee him dead in the room before ſhe went from thence, rather than to have him die ſuch a barbarous death as was appointed for him to die. And after they were gone out of the room, this Informant cauſed Daniel Steer, the ſaid Miles's Keeper, to ſearch the bed and the room, leſt any thing might be left there for the ſaid Miles to hurt himſelf withal; and the room being ſearched, nothing was found. And alſo upon enquiry of the ſaid Steer, this Informant found that all inſtruments were taken from him; only the ſaid Steer brought him up a knife to cut his meat withal, and carried it away when he had done. And that about half an hour after, he the ſaid Miles deſired this Informant, and the reſt of the company that were with him, to withdraw out of the room; and about a quarter of an hour after, he called them into the chamber again, and took a Book into his hand to read in it, and after a little time, he ſaid he would go to bed, and lie down in his bed; and he hearing this Informant and Captain Foſter talking together, the ſaid Miles talked very freely with them, and in the time of their diſcourſe together, there came a meſſenger to this Informant, from Sir John Barkſtead, requiring this Informant to have a ſpecial care of the ſaid Miles Sindercome, otherwiſe Fiſh, that he did not poiſon himſelf. This Informant did declare unto the other that were there, what order he had received for the ſaid Miles; and about a quarter of an hour after, this Informant hearing him the ſaid Miles ſnore, deſired Daniel Steer, the ſaid Miles's Keeper, to ſee how the ſaid Miles did then. The ſaid Daniel taking a candle to look on the ſaid Miles Sindercome, did tell this Informant that he was almoſt dead; yet the ſaid Miles did live in that condition, ſpeechleſs, the ſpace of two hours after, and then died.

And that two Miniſters being then in the chamber with him, ſhe had no further diſcourſe with him, or did ſee him any more, until on Friday night, about twelve of the clock, ſhe did hear ſhe was ſent for; and did hear that he was very ſick and weak, of which ſickneſs he died preſently after; and further ſaith not.

the ſacred perſon of your dread Sovereign the King's Majeſty, or purpoſe of killing or putting him to death; and all adviſers, counſellors, ſiders, abettors or havers of any acceſſions thereto, are puniſhable as traytors.

Nevertheleſs, 'tis of verity, that you the ſaid Marquis of Argyle, having laid aſide all fear of God, loyalty to his Majeſty, and to his royal Father of ever-bleſſed memory, natural duty and affection to your native Country and Countrymen, and reſpect and obedience to the Laws of all well-governed Realms, the Common-Law, and the Laws, Statutes, Acts of Parliament, and Practices of this Kingdom, and having traitorouſly intended and purpoſed the eradicating and ſubverting the fundamental Government of this Kingdom; at leaſt the enervating, violating, derogating, or impairing the ſovereign Authority, royal Prerogative of his Majeſty, and Privilege of the Crown: You, for carrying on of your ſaid wicked purpoſe, having gathered and convocated together in a hoſtile manner, a great many of your Friends, Servants, Vaſſals, Followers and other of his Majeſty's Lieges, without any warrant, licence or command from his Majeſty; and therewith under pretext of oppoſing ſuch as by you were then nick-named Anti-Covenanters, and oppoſing the work of Reformation (but who indeed were faithful aſſertors of his Majeſty's lawful Authority) having marched to the ford of Lyon in Athol in the month of 1640, there did in your tent, and in preſence of a great many Gentlemen and others publickly declare, That it was the opinion and judgment of many Divines and Lawyers, that a King may be depoſed for deſertions, venditions and invaſions: And that howbeit that your words were in abſtracto from any King, yet that the ſenſe and meaning thereof might appear to be of the then King's Majeſty, your dread Sovereign, you did ſubjoin and ſay to the late Mr. John Stuart, of Ladiwel; And Mr. John, you underſtand Latin.

Likewiſe conſidering the condition of the Kingdom, and the oppoſitions that a great many of the people were in to his Majeſty; particularly you the ſaid Marquis, and your three Complices and Followers; it is clear that the ſaid words did not only treaſonably reflect upon kingly Government, as being ſubject to the people, who might in the cauſe aforeſaid depoſe a King; but alſo it is clear, that your meaning alſo and intention thereby was, that the King's Majeſty, your dread Sovereign, might be ſo deſtroyed: And the ſaid treaſonable ſpeeches were ſo vented by you, of deſign to uſher in your many treaſonable actions and practices done by you unto his ſacred Perſon, Dignity, and Authority; which doubtleſs did occaſion, and was mainly inſtrumental both in his depoſition and cruel murder: Which wicked and treaſonable ſpeeches, the ſaid Mr. John having thereafter reported, you moſt cruelly and tyrannouſly did proſecute him to death, as a Leaſing-maker betwixt the King's Majeſty and his good Subjects, howbeit you could not be but conſcious of the truth of what he had reported.

Secondly, In proſecution of your aforeſaid wicked and treaſonable purpoſes, you having marched with the ſaid forces to the houſe of Airlie, belonging to his Majeſty's right truſty and well beloved Couſin and chief Counſellor James Earl of Airlie, which was then kept for his Majeſty's ſervice and authority; after you had forced the rendition of the ſaid houſe, and deſtroyed the woods and plantings of the ſame, and wearied and deſtroyed the ſaid Earl's friends and tenants, his Majeſty's good Subjects, you did ſlight and demoliſh the ſaid houſe; and to expreſs your hatred to the ſaid Earl, meerly for his loyalty to his Majeſty, did ſeize, or by thoſe under you did ſeize upon the houſe of Forther in Glenyla belonging alſo to the ſaid Earl; and without any colour or pretence of offence did wilfully, moſt treaſonably, and contrary to the aforeſaid Acts of Parliament, raiſe fire in the ſaid houſe, and thereby burnt and deſtroyed the ſame, and all furniture therein.

Thirdly, In further proſecution of your treaſonable plots and machinations againſt his Majeſty's Perſon and Authority, contrary to the aforeſaid Laws and Acts of Parliament in Anno 1640; you in an hoſtile manner, did moſt treaſonably lay ſiege to his Majeſty's Fort and Caſtle of Dunbarton, then fortified and kept for his Majeſty's ſervice by Col. Henderſon, having his Majeſty's command and commiſſion for that effect, and forced the ſaid Colonel to render the ſaid Caſtle to you; out of which moſt treaſonably you cauſed to be tranſported and carried away a great many of his Majeſty's cannon and other ammunition, appointed for defence and ſecurity of the ſaid Caſtle.

Fourthly, Notwithſtanding that his then Majeſty had in Anno 1641 come himſelf in perſon to this Kingdom, and moſt graciouſly condeſcended to all ſuch Acts as were required of him (how unjuſt ſoever) for ſecuring and pleaſing the people, and ſettling a peace; and that he had paſt one Act of Oblivion, to indemnify all ſuch as had formerly been in oppoſition to his Majeſty within this Kingdom, and that he had conferred upon you the title and dignity of Marquis, as a mark of his royal favour, and put you in places of greateſt truſt in the Kingdom; and that you had ſworn and promiſed in the Abbey of Holyroodhouſe, that in caſe any trouble or commotions ſhould happen to be raiſed in England by any of his diſcontented Subjects againſt him, you would aſſiſt and defend him againſt all ſuch, to the hazard of your life and fortunes; and that his Majeſty had parted from this his ancient Kingdom, as was ſaid and acknowledged by all, a contented Prince from a contented People: yet nevertheleſs his Majeſty being forced and neceſſitated in anno 1642, to leave his Parliament in England then ſitting at Weſtminſter, and his royal Palace of Whitehall, and betake himſelf to defenſive arms, for maintenance of his royal perſon, dignity and authority, and to protect the ſame againſt an army of Sectaries, who maliciouſly, traitorouſly, cruelly and treaſonably did invade the ſame; you, contrary to your allegiance, obligations and recent Promiſe aforeſaid, did by your ſelf and complices, to fortify and ſtrengthen the ſaid Rebels and Sectaries, and in direct oppoſition to his Majeſty's perſon and dignity, call or cauſe to be called a pretended convention of Eſtates in anno 1643, without any ſhadow or colour of lawful authority; and you and they ſo convocated did take upon you the ſupreme authority of the Kingdom, enter in league with his Majeſty's enemies, impoſe ſubſidies and exciſe upon the people, and raiſe an army of his Majeſty's own ſubjects, and therewith entred his Majeſty's Kingdom of England, ſeized upon his Majeſty's Towns and Forts there; and killed, murdered, plundered and deſtroyed his good ſubjects, and in open and pitch'd fields fought for, with and in behalf of the ſaid Rebels, againſt his Majeſty's forces, which in effect was the riſe and cauſe of all our ſubſequent ruins and diſaſters that befel his Majeſty or his loyal and good ſubjects thereafter.

Fifthly, In anno 1645, after your return from England, to ſhew your implacable malice and hatred to all ſuch as had any dependance upon, or affection to his Majeſty, you by your ſelf, and others under your command, or at your direction, did moſt treaſonably raiſe wilful fire, and burn the houſe of miſtreſs Lyfvented, inhabited by the Counteſs of Sterling, and in her poſſeſſion, and all the moveables and furniture, they extending to a great value; notwithſtanding that the ſaid Counteſs was an honourable aged woman: and who, and her deareſt husband, the Earl of Sterling, by all obſervances and dutiful reſpects obliged you, ſo far as in them lay; thereby adding to the ſaid act of treaſon, the height of oppreſſion and ingratitude.

Sixthly, In the year 1646, you by yourſelf, or thoſe under your command, or for whom you were anſwerable, or whom you might have ſtopped or impeded, did take in the houſe of Taward, belonging to the Laird of Salmond, and the houſe of Oſcoge belonging to Lamond of Oſcoge, and after articles of capitulation drawn and ſubſcribed by the Laird of Ardkinglaſs, and other Officers under your command, did moſt treaſonably in manner aforeſaid, under truſt and aſſurance, as is ſaid, burn the ſaid houſe of Oſcoge, cruelly hang, kill and murther a great many of the ſaid Lairds of Salmond and Oſcoge's friends and followers; as is more fully expreſt in the Summons raiſed at their inſtance and mine, for his Majeſty's intereſt againſt you, and which is repeated in a part of this article.

Seventhly, You having traitorouſly intended the utter ruin and extirpation of all faithful and loyal ſubjects, who had given teſtimony of their faithfulneſs to his Majeſty's deareſt Father, of ever-bleſſed memory; and having with an army of your complices, aſſociates, vaſſals, ſervants, tenants and followers in anno 1646, marched to Kentire, where a great many of his Majeſty's well-affected ſubjects of the name of Mac-Donald, Mac-Cow, and others, whoſe names are not particularly known, to the number of 3 or 400, had fortified themſelves for their ſecurity, and againſt your oppreſſion and violence in the houſe of Lochebead and Donavertie: And you with the ſaid forces having marched to the ſaid houſe of Lochebead; the Gentlemen and others therein, without making the leaſt oppoſition, and declaring that they had refuged themſelves to the ſaid place for ſhelter and protection, did render up the ſaid houſe and themſelves, upon aſſurance, that they might really and quietly return and live at their own homes; according thereto, they were diſmiſſed and ſent home, where they remained in peaceable manner by the ſpace of days. Notwithſtanding thereafter, you and the forces aforeſaid having beſieged the Caſtle of Donavertie, during the ſaid ſiege, there were ſeveral rendezvous's appointed for the ſaid Gentlemen to make their appearance; which frequently they did, and were ſtill diſmiſſed, until ſuch time as thoſe who were within the ſaid houſe of Donavertie had rendred up the ſaid houſe and themſelves, to be diſpoſed of at the mercy of the Kingdom or pretended Committee of eſtates: And that notwithſtanding thereof, you and your ſaid complices had moſt perfidiouſly, treacherouſly and treaſonably, (and for which alſo you are here indicted) ſlaughtered and murdered, or cauſed to be ſlaughtered and murdered, the number of 260 of them or 300, they being under your truſt, aſſurance, credit or power; and did diſpoſe of the reſt of them at your own hand, without any lawful warrant, to Captains William Hay, and Archibald Campbel, to ſerve in the French wars. Then and hereafter you cauſed, and appointed a new rendezvous of the ſaid Gentlemen, who were in the houſe of Lochebead, and their followers; who having appeared in frequent manner, you cauſed to be ſingled out fifteen or ſixteen of the ſaid Gentlemen, who were that night ſent to the ſaid houſe of Lochebead, and the next morning brought forth by you, or ſuch as were under your command; and moſt perfidiouſly, cruelly, and inhumanly, without any order of Law, or form of Proceſs civil or military, hanged and murdered. And to aggravate the ſaid cruel and barbarous crime, 'tis of verity; That one of the ſaid Perſons being an old man, and having one ſon, of age not above ſixteen or ſeventeen years; the father immediately before his death did depone, that his ſaid ſon had never done any crimes offenſive all his life-time, but that he had ſtill been at Schools; and that ſome few days before, he had come from Glaſcow, the place of his education, to viſit his Parents; and therefore did earneſtly ſupplicate, in regard of his innocency, his life might be ſpared: Notwithſtanding you, and the bloody actors of your purpoſes, were ſo unmerciful, as not to hearken to the ſaid ſo juſt deſire of the ſaid dying old man, but forthwith the ſaid young innocent boy was cruelly alſo hanged to death. Likewiſe not content with the aforeſaid unheard-of horrid acts of cruelty, you in the month of 1640, or one or other of the months thereof, by your ſelf and followers, or ſuch whom you might have ſtopt or lett, cauſed to be tranſported from the Iſle of Ila, to the Iſle of Inwa, to the number of two hundred perſons of all ſexes and ages; where all means of livelihood and ſubſiſtence being withdrawn from them, they in a moſt miſerable manner were pined and ſtarved to death by famine, except ſome very few, who had outlived the reſt, and were relieved and carried out of the ſaid Iſle by boats, accidentally coming by: Likewiſe the perſon of Macdonald, alias Coalmac Gilleſpy, or Coawkittoche, being in anno ordained by the Parliament, or Committee of eſtates thereof, to have been brought from priſon out of the houſe of where he then was, and there had been kept by you and others in your time, many years before, to Edinburgh, that the cauſes for which he had been kept, and ſo detained in priſon, might have been known; and he having for that end been brought in a ſhip the length of the road of Leith: you, for preventing ſuch Information of your cruelty and oppreſſion exerciſed towards him, and many of his friends and relations, which he was able to have given and made out; you in manifeſt contempt and ſcorn of that committee of Parliament, under which you yourſelf acted, cauſed to take the perſon of the ſaid Coawkittoche forth of the ſaid ſhip, and after you had carried him to your own lands and bounds, cruelly cauſed to hang him to death.

Eighthly, Notwithſtanding of the manifold acts of mercy and favour, dignity, honour and truſt conferred upon you by your then dread Sovereign, for reclaiming of you from your diſloyal and treaſonable practices, plots and machinations, againſt his ſacred perſon, dignity and authority; he being ſore preſſed and reduced to great ſtraits and extremities by that army of Sectaries before mentioned, with whom you had formerly joined, as is ſaid; and having in that exigence and difficulty rather choſen from an innate principle of affections of his Countrymen, to caſt himſelf over in the hands of the army of his Majeſty's ſubjects of his ancient Kingdom of Scotland, for ſhelter and preſervation of his royal Perſon; nevertheleſs, you the ſaid Marquis being the chief ringleader of that factious party, who then ſwayed the eſtate and affairs both in council and armies in the ſaid Kingdom, did ſo contrive and complot, and by your influence ſo prevail, that after all fair offers made by his Majeſty, and his earneſt deſire to have come and lived in Scotland, until ſuch time as all differences in both Kingdoms had been ſettled; That a pretended Act of Parliament was made for abandoning and leaving his Majeſty in the diſpoſal and mercy of the inveterate enemies of his Majeſty and Government, the ſaid armies of Sectaries. And that your acting in, and acceſſions to the ſaid affair might be the more evident and clear; and to aggravate your eminent and ſingular guilt therein, you yourſelf went to London, where you baſely under pretext of ſatisfaction for the arrears of the ſaid army, raiſed by the pretended authority of the pretended convention of eſtates, in anno 1643, as is ſaid, treacherouſly and treaſonably gave up, at leaſt condeſcended to the up-giving of your dread Sovereign and maſter, and that as being impowered ſo to do by the Kingdom of Scotland; and thereby did rub an indelible mark of reproach and infamy upon the whole Nation to all generations, ſo far as in you lay. And further to clear your aforeſaid treaſonable dealings, acceſſions to, and correſpondency with that infamous party of the ſaid army, who carried on the ſaid abominable and deteſtable act, you being at the ſame time in a pretended joint committee of both Kingdoms, while-as the Engliſh therein did call in queſtion whether the Scots army would ſincerely concur with them in their ſaid treaſon and treachery; you after many arguments uſed in their favours, earneſtly deſired them to have patience for a little time, and it would appear by ſomewhat of the officers of the army, how far they intended to concur and go along with them. Likewiſe within few days after there was a vindication and declaration emitted in name of the ſaid armies, whereby it was held forth, that in caſe his Majeſty would not condeſcend to all the deſires of both Kingdoms, which was no leſs than the diveſting himſelf of all regal power, civil, eccleſiaſtical or military in ſtate, church, or armies, they would deliver him up; which immediately after the payment of 200,000 l. baſely and treaſonably was done by you and them.

Ninthly, In anno 1648, his Majeſty's royal father being contrary to all Laws, divine and human, moſt unchriſtianly, barbarouſly and treaſonably detained and kept priſoner within the caſtle of Carisbrock, in the Iſle of Wight, by a party of factious, diſloyal and rebellious Sectaries; the Eſtates of Parliament then convened by his Majeſty's authority, having taken the ſaid inhuman, treaſonable and cruel uſage into ſerious conſideration, they found this Kingdom engaged in honour and duty to reſent ſo horrid and unheard-of cruelty and leſe-majeſty, and obliged to uſe their utmoſt endeavours to relieve him out of the hands of ſuch wicked uſurpers, and to reſtore him to the exerciſe of his royal authority in freedom, honour and ſafety; for effecting thereof, after all other fair ways eſſayed, upon mature conſultation had, they found that the only probable means was the raiſing of an army of his Majeſty's good ſubjects, which was accordingly ſtatute and ordained by Act of the ſaid Parliament. Againſt the carrying on of which, ſo juſt, laudable and neceſſary a duty, you did moſt violently and eminently oppoſe your ſelf, not only by arguing, voting againſt, and uſing all other means in your power to obſtruct the ſame; but alſo after the ſame was paſt in an Act of Parliament, you did moſt contemptuouſly and treaſonably publickly diſſent from, and enter a Proteſtation againſt the ſame; and not being therewith content, after the ſaid army in purſuance of their duty and allegiance had marched into the ſaid Kingdom, you ſhortly after in the month of in contempt of the aforeſaid authority, and againſt the preſervation of his Majeſty's perſon and authority, did moſt treaſonably convocate an army of factious, ſeditious and rebellious ſubjects, in oppoſition to the ſaid army, and therewith committed divers and ſundry outrages, murders, ſlaughter, plunders and vaſtations upon the perſons and eſtates of divers of his Majeſty's good Subjects, and therewith invaded ſeveral of the cities and caſtles, ſeized thereupon, and upon the magazine with arms and ammunition therein: And at that time the ſaid rebellious army of Sectaries of England, being upon the borders, you fearing and apprehending that the force and power raiſed by you ſhould not be able to withſtand his Majeſty's good and loyal ſubjects who were then riſen and ready to riſe in arms for aſſerting and vindicating his Majeſty's juſt authority, you did moſt baſely, treacherouſly and treaſonably call in to your aid and aſſiſtance the ſaid armies of Sectaries. Likewiſe you your ſelf went in perſon to the houſe of Mordington, within a mile of the Engliſh borders, to the end aforeſaid; and you did meet with the vile uſurper Oliver Cromwel, commander of the ſaid army, with whom you had ſeveral private meetings and conſultations, and thereby perſuaded and ſo prevailed with the ſaid traytor, that he thereafter marched with the ſaid army to Edinburgh and the places thereabout; and which march and in-coming of the ſaid Oliver you might have undoubtedly hindered; in ſo far as it can be made appear by clear proof and teſtimonies of famous perſons, That it having been complained upon to him at the ſaid houſe of Mordington, that by reaſon of his being there with ſuch a great number of ſoldiers, the Lord Mordington's tenants would undoubtedly be ruined; he the ſaid Oliver made anſwer, That he could not help the ſame, for his ſtaying and going did depend upon you, and that he was ready, if you deſired, to march back to England. At leaſt, you did contrive, adviſe or conſent to the raiſing and convocating of the ſaid ſeditious, factious, and rebellious armies; at leaſt was one of the number your ſelf, and with, and aſſiſting to them in arms; at leaſt, did vote, counſel or perſuade the incalling of the ſaid army of Sectaries: And they being ſo brought in, you did countenance, aſſiſt, concur and conſult with them, or their commanders, or ſome of them, in publick or in private at Edinburgh, and in the Cannongate in the houſe called Lady Home's Lodgings, and in divers other places. As alſo, you did moſt villainouſly and traitorouſly contrive, counſel or vote for the drawing up of a Letter directed to the traitor and abominable uſurper; wherein you and your complices did engage your ſelves, in the name of

of the Kingdom of Scotland, to employ your utmoſt endeavours, that none who had been active in, or conſenting to the engagement againſt the ſaid Sectaries, or had been in arms at Sterling, or elſewhere, in maintenance or purſuance of that engagement, ſhould be employ'd in any publick place or truſt within this Kingdom whatſoever, without advice or conſent of the Kingdom of England; as the ſaid Letter dated the ſixth day of October, 1648, more fully bears. As alſo, you did draw up, at leaſt did counſel, adviſe or vote, to the up-drawing of certain Inſtructions given to Sir John Chieſly, who was ſent by you and your complices, as commiſſioner to the pretended houſe of Parliament of England, dated October 17, the year aforeſaid; wherein you deſire, that the noblemen, gentlemen of quality, and conſiderable officers of the army, that went into England, under the command of Duke Hamilton, and who were then priſoners, might be kept as pledges for the peace of that Kingdom; by which not only have you endeavoured moſt unnaturally to enſlave your fellow-ſubjects and countrymen to the power of ſtrangers, but moſt treacherouſly and treaſonably, as an unworthy ungrate patriot, done what in you lay to deſtroy the life of your own dread Sovereign, and the royal Authority in him and his ſucceſſion, and to ſubject the honour, liberty, power and government of this his Majeſty's ancient and free Kingdom, to the command, luſt and tyranny of foreign traitors and uſurpers. As alſo, you upon the 4th day of May thereafter, having taken upon you moſt treaſonably, the ſupreme authority of this Kingdom, gave warrant under your hand for iſſuing out a Proclamation, declaring that the wives, children and families of James Lord Ogilvy, Lord Rea, Lewis Marquis of Huntley therein deſignant, Lewis Gordon, ſon to the Marquis of Huntley, John now Earl of Middleton, therein deſignant, John Middleton of ſometime deſignant General-Major, ſhould be no longer under the protection of this Kingdom, and that ſuch courſe ſhould be taken for tranſporting them out of their country to foreign parts, as the Eſtates of Parliament or their Committee ſhould think fit.

Tenthly, After his Majeſty's deareſt and moſt royal father, of eternal and moſt bleſſed memory, had been moſt unchriſtianly, inhumanly, horridly and barbarouſly murdered, by the ſaid abominable traitor and uſurper Oliver Cromwel, and his wicked complices, the deviliſh and treaſonable courſes, plots, contrivings and actings of yours did not yet terminate: For there being ſome motions for addreſs to be made to his Majeſty, by ſome of his good ſubjects of this his ancient Kingdom, as undoubted and rightful ſucceſſor to his deceaſed royal father in the imperial crown thereof, that his Majeſty might come to his ſaid ancient Kingdom, for exerciſing his royal power and authority; the ſaid motion and purpoſe being ſo juſt and lawful, you, notwithſtanding of your great impudence, and daring, always fearing, that a direct oppoſing thereof would prove altogether ineffectual; you, in a moſt indirect way, procured the application made for inviting his Majeſty, to be ſo clogged with limitations, reſtrictions and conditions, to have been condeſcended to by his Majeſty, before his admiſſion to the exerciſe of his royal Government, as were moſt deſtructive to his Majeſty's dignity and authority, and moſt derogatory to monarchical Government; as are more fully expreſs'd in the ſeveral commiſſions, inſtructions and addreſſes ſent and made to his Majeſty to that effect, and publick proclamation of his Majeſty at the mercat-croſs of Edinburgh, by you and your complices, commiſſioners at Breda; all which are here repeated as a part of the Libel brevitatis cauſa. And his Majeſty upon conſideration, that the ſaid unreaſonable, unlawful and treaſonable conditions were exacted of his Majeſty by you, and a few number of factious ſubjects, who had by the aſſiſtance of the uſurper and tyrant Oliver Cromwel, thruſt your ſelf into the government of his Majeſty's ancient Kingdom; and truſting to the fidelity, the loyalty and good affection of his other good ſubjects, having, notwithſtanding the ſaid hard and unjuſt conditions, reſolved to caſt himſelf upon the loyalty and affections of his other good and faithful ſubjects; you, to obſtruct his Majeſty's purpoſe and reſolution, yea, and, ſo far as in you lay, to fright and terrify him therefrom by you and your complices cruel execution upon the Marquis of Montroſs, his Majeſty's commiſſioner, and who repreſented his perſon in his ſaid ancient Kingdom; cauſed to be moſt horridly and inhumanly murdered the ſaid Marquis, at the mercat-croſs, upon the 21ſt day of May 1650, with all the circumſtances of diſgrace and diſhonour: which ſo much reflected upon his Majeſty's perſon, dignity and authority, and upon the honour of all true nobility; and is ſo recent and freſh, with deteſtation, in the memories of all good ſubjects and generous ſpirits at home and abroad, that it is not fit to be mentioned or repeated here. But his Majeſty ſtill continuing in his former purpoſe and reſolution, and after a moſt tedious and dangerous voyage at ſea, having, by the providence of Almighty God, happily and ſafely arrived in his ſaid ancient Kingdom; ſhortly thereafter, the cruel bloody murderer and uſurper Oliver Cromwel, in purſuance of his Majeſty, with a powerful army of Sectaries, by ſea and land, invaded his ſaid Majeſty's ancient Kingdom. For oppoſing of whom, an army being raiſed, while both the ſaid armies were in the field, you moſt treacherouſly and treaſonably kept correſpondency, and had intelligence with the ſaid uſurper, by writing to, and receiving letters from him, without his Majeſty's private conſent or warrant; at leaſt by ſending to, and receiving meſſages from him by word of mouth. And further, to advance the deſigns of that abominable Regicide, after you had by your indirect means, plots, advices or contrivances, gotten his Majeſty removed from his army at Leith; you by your influence upon a few number of the commiſſioners of the general Aſſembly, your ſelf being one of the number, then met at St Cuthbert's church, commonly called the Weſt-Kirk, prevailed ſo, that for the weakning of the hands of friends, and ſtrengthening the enemies, there was in a moſt clandeſtine and ſurreptitious manner an Act, as of the ſaid commiſſion of the Kirk, made, printed and publiſhed; wherein beſides many reproachful and ſlanderous expreſſions of his Majeſty and his royal anceſtors, more fully expreſs'd in the ſaid pretended Act, bearing date Auguſt 13, 1650, it was declared, that you diſclaimed, and would not own his Majeſty's intereſt, becauſe of his refuſal to ſubſcribe and emit a declaration offered to him; and which declaration was contrived and drawn up by you, and contains many ſcandalous, ſeditious, imperious, reproachful and treaſonable expreſſions, not only againſt his Majeſty's authority and government, but alſo againſt his royal father and mother, and others his royal Progenitors, as is more at large expreſs'd in the aforeſaid Act of the date above-written, and declaration bearing date the day the ſame year: of which declaration there needs no more be ſaid, than that the circumſtances by which his Majeſty was enforced to ſign the ſame, are enough known to the world; and that the worthieſt and greateſt part of his Majeſty's ancient Kingdom did even deteſt and abhor the evil uſage of his Majeſty in that particular, when the ſame tyranny was exerciſed there by the power of you and a few evil men your complices, which at that time had ſpread it ſelf over his Majeſty's Kingdom of England, at leaſt you and your complices did ratify and approve the ſaid act of the Weſt-Kirk, and conſent thereto; and at leaſt you did deal with, and preſs and force his Majeſty to ſign and ſubſcribe the declaration aforeſaid; at leaſt you were author, or contriver, adviſer or counſellor, perſuader or voter, or aſſenter, aſſiſter, aider or abettor of the aforeſaid reſtrictions, limitations and conditions, and of the aforeſaid murder of his ſaid Majeſty's commiſſioner and manner thereof, and of the keeping of the ſaid correſpondence with the ſaid invader and uſurper, and of the ſaid Act and Declarations, or any or other of them, or all or part thereof, or one or other of them.

Eleventhly, After it had pleaſed God to ſuffer that monſter of men and cruel Regicide Oliver Cromwel ſo far to prevail againſt all his Majeſty's endeavours for recovering his juſt right and intereſt in this and in his other Kingdoms, and over all the armies and forces raiſed by him for that end, ſo that he was neceſſitated to refugeat himſelf with foreign Princes and Eſtates; howbeit, at his Majeſty's coronation, you in the preſence of God, and a great many of the nobility of this Kingdom, and others therein convened at Schoon, the 1ſt of January, 1651, did ſwear to be faithful to the crown, and true liege-man to his Majeſty: yet nevertheleſs contrary to the ſaid oath, and notwithſtanding the many favours, honours, benefits and acts of indempnity conferred upon you, and contrary to the Laws and Acts of Parliament, as is expreſs'd; you did moſt perfidiouſly, ungrateſully and treaſonably in anno 1653, or 1654, not only according to your bounden duty, not riſe in arms, and join with the Earls of Glencairn and Middleton, who were commiſſioned from his Majeſty for hindring the further progreſs of the uſurpers, and expelling them forth of this Kingdom; but did in open hoſtility join with the ſaid uſurpers their forces; eſpecially with the Colonels Overton, Cobbet and Twiſleton; at leaſt with the ſaid Colonels Cobbet and Twiſleton; at leaſt with Colonel Twiſleton when he was in the Highlands, in oppoſition to the ſaid Earl of Glencairn; at leaſt joined with one or other of them in counſel; did take and relieve priſoners, did furniſh ſeveral pieces of great cannon, to the number of fourteen, in anno 1653, or 1654, to Colonel Aldred then governor of Air: which cannon, or a great many of them, were taken out by you of his Majeſty's caſtle of Dunbarton, at the time and in the manner above expreſs'd. And likewiſe you did take pay from the ſaid uſurpers for a company of foot under them and in their ſervice, thereby openly and clearly making it appear what you did intend by all your more covered and private machinations, plottings and treaſonable actings againſt his Majeſty's deareſt father and himſelf. Likewiſe, to make it appear what intimacy and power you had with the uſurper, you not only did term and call the actings of his Majeſty's forces againſt you and the uſurpers, rebellion, but alſo you in anno 1654, did take upon you power to bring off ſuch as were in that ſervice, and to give remiſſions therefore under your own hand; particularly to John Mac-Dougaw of Dunolick, as the ſame under your hand the ſaid John will verify.

Twelfthly, The ſaid Oliver Cromwel, that monſter of men, vileſt of traitors, moſt cruel murderer, bloody tyrant and uſurper, having reached, as he thought, the end of all his deviliſh plots and treaſonable machinations, by uſurping the dominion and authority of his Majeſty's three Kingdoms, and ſettling the ſame, ſo far as in him lay, upon him and his family; you conceiving the ſame ſo fixed and riveted, that in human probability it was not poſſible to be removed or ſhaken; that you might avowedly reap the fruits of your former more covered vile and damnable plottings, contrivings and actings for the ſaid arch-tyrant and traitor, you then pulled off and laid aſide the maſk of pretended loyalty and religion, under which you had all along formerly lurked, thereby having deceived and cheated a great many of his Majeſty's good ſubjects from their due allegiance and loyalty under hypocritical fair pretences of your affection and zeal for Religion, Prince, and Country, to the utter ruin (if not of ſouls) of many of their bodies, eſtates and fortunes; and did openly in face of the world, diſcover yourſelf in your own colours, appearing in a thing profeſſedly and publickly in behalf of the ſaid uſurper againſt his Majeſty's perſon and authority; in ſo far as in the month of 1657, after the deceaſe of the ſaid uſurper, the ſucceeding uſurper his ſon, being moſt treaſonably and tyrannically proclaimed chief magiſtrate and ſole protector of all his Majeſty's dominions and territories thereto belonging, at the mercat-croſs of his Majeſty's cities of Edinburgh and Dunbarton, you having apparently, for ſuch like ſervices done or to be done, received from the ſaid uſurper Oliver one precept due upon the Exchequer of Scotland for payment to you of 12000 l. ſterling, or thereabout, did with your perſonal preſence countenance the ſaid tyrannical and treaſonable Proclamation; thereby, ſo far as in you lay, diveſting his Majeſty of his juſt and royal intereſt and right, and eſtabliſhing the ſame on the perſons and families of the ſaid uſurpers. Likewiſe not long after the ſaid uſurper, the more to eſtabliſh himſelf in his uſurped government, having called a pretended Parliament, conſiſting of a pretended new-coined houſe of Peers, and certain perſons of his Majeſty's three Kingdoms as a houſe of Commons to ſit in Weſtminſter; you did procure yourſelf elected commiſſioner for the ſhire of Aberdeen, at leaſt did accept of a commiſſion from them; albeit both by the nobility of your birth, and your non-reſidence within the ſaid ſhire, you was in law uncapable to be ſo elected; at leaſt ought and might have refuſed to accept any commiſſion. Nevertheleſs having voluntarily, and of your own accord, embraced the ſaid charge and employment; you thereupon took journey, and went to London, and moſt baſely, perfidiouſly and treaſonably, ſate, voted, and otherwiſe acted in the ſaid uſurper's pretended Parliament, by whom his Majeſty's right and intereſt was diſclaimed and abjured, and the ſame owned only in the ſaid uſurper's perſon, as a member of the ſaid pretended houſe of Commons, to the high indignity and contempt of his Majeſty's ſacred perſon and authority, the utter deſtruction of monarchical government, the diſhonour of this Kingdom, and the great diſgrace of your own family and poſterity.

Thirteenthly, You the ſaid Marquis, to make it further appear to the world, that it was always your purpoſe and intention to deſtroy his Majeſty's authority and government, and to oppoſe his reſtauration to his juſt right and intereſt to his three Kingdoms, at a provincial aſſembly holden at Innerarey, a little after the defeat of his Majeſty's army at Worceſter, the miniſters praying for his Majeſty after the accuſtomed manner, you did moſt villainouſly and treaſonably rebuke them, ſaying, That they were but fools to pray for a malignant and wicked King, whom God had rejected, and would never reſtore him again; or ſome ſuch like words to that purpoſe. And alſo, you being at London in the time of the uſurper Oliver, you ſaid in preſence of divers perſons of quality, That you wondered how people could be ſo mad, as to call home a family whom God had rejected, or ſuch words to that purpoſe: Likewiſe after your home-coming to Scotland, yea, openly in a publick meeting at James Mauſtertonne's in Niddres wind, in preſence of ſeveral noblemen and gentlemen, you boaſted, That you would own any thing you had done in theſe things by-gone; and that if it were to do, you would do it again; howbeit you had known that all that had, would have come: Thereby preſumptuouſly taking upon you, by outward ſucceſs, to give judgment upon the hidden and ſecret counſels and determinations of Almighty God, and thereby to alienate the affections, duties and allegiance of his Majeſty's good Subjects, and to harden and confirm others, ſuch as are otherways diſpoſed in their wicked courſes towards his Majeſty's Perſon and Authority.

Laſtly, That your monſtrous and execrable Treaſon may appear to all the world, it is of verity, that in the year 1648, at a private conference betwixt you, Oliver Cromwel, and Col. Ireton, the ſaid Oliver complaining of the many difficulties that attended their affairs, by reaſon of the divers deſigns which his Majeſty had on foot from time to time againſt them; you the ſaid Marquis made anſwer, That their danger was great indeed, in regard, that if any of theſe deſigns ſhould take effect, they were all ruined. And thereupon gave your poſitive advice, that they ſhould proceed to the queſtioning of the King for his life; aſſuring them, that they could never be ſafe until they had taken away his Majeſty's life. At leaſt, you did know of the horrible and treaſonable deſign of murdering his ſaid Majeſty; and did moſt treaſonably conceal, and not reveal the ſame till after the ſaid horrid deed was committed, and ſo paſt prevention or remedy. At which time, in anno 1649, publickly in the face of the pretended Parliament then ſitting, you ſaid, that the Uſurper Cromwel had told you, That England and Scotland would never be at peace, until the King were put to death. By all which particulars reſpectively, above rehearſed, it is clearly evinced, that you were, and are Author, Contriver, Deviſer, Conſulter, Adviſer, of all or part of all the aforeſaid crimes of Treaſon, and other above libelled, or other of them, in manner above declared. And thereby has incurred the pains and puniſhments of High-Treaſon, and others contained in the Laws and Acts of Parliament above-written: which muſt and ſhould be inflicted upon you with all rigour, in example to others in all time coming.

Sic ſubſcrib.

Ordered, that the above-written Dittay be given to the Marquis of Argyle, by a Herald or Purſuivant, and he to anſwer thereto, upon the 13th day of February, next to come.

The Marquis of Argyle's Petition, to the Parliament of Scotland, craving a Precognition of his Caſe; containing many weighty Reaſons urging the neceſſity thereof. Preſented to the Parliament, February 12. 1661.

To my Lord-Commiſſioner his Grace, and Honourable Eſtates of Parliament,

The Humble Petition of Archibald Marquis of Argyle;

Humbly ſheweth,

THAT for as much as the Petitioner can with a ſafe conſcience affirm, and ſolemnly proteſt, that whatever his actings or acceſſion has been in relation to publick buſineſs ſince the beginning of the troubles, till his Majeſty's departure hence in the year 1651, though he will not purge himſelf of errors, failings, and miſtakes, both in judgment and practice incident to human frailty, and common to him, if not with the whole, at leaſt with the greateſt part of the Nation; yet in one thing, though he were to die, he would ſtill avouch and retain his innocency, that he never intended any thing treaſonably, out of any pernicious deſign againſt his Majeſty's late royal father of ever-glorious memory, or his preſent Majeſty, (whom God may long preſerve) their Perſons or Government; but endeavoured always to his uttermoſt for ſettling the differences betwixt their Majeſties and the people. And as to any actings before the year 1641, or from the ſaid year, till his Majeſty's being in the Parliament at Perth and Sterling; your Petitioner did with a full aſſurance rely upon his gracious Majeſty, and his royal father, their treaties, approbation, oblivion, and indempnity for what was paſt, and firmly believed that the ſame ſhould never have riſen in judgment, or that the Petitioner ſhould have been drawn in queſtion therefore. And during his Majeſty's abſence, and being forced from the exerciſe of his Royal Government by the late Uſurpers, and long after that the Nation by their Deputies had accepted of their Authority and Government, and they in poſſeſſion, the Petitioner was forced to capitulation with them, being in their hands, and under ſickneſs, and the ſame was, after all endeavours uſed, according to the duty of a good Subject; and upon the Petitioner's part, ſo innocent and neceſſary for ſelf-preſervation, without the leaſt intention, action, or effect to his

Majeſty's prejudice; that albeit upon miſ-information (as the Petitioner humbly conceives) his actings and compliance both in their deſigns and quality have been miſ-repreſented, as particularly ſingular and perſonal, ſtating the Petitioner in a degree of guilt beyond others, and incapable of pardon; the ſame have ſo far prevailed upon his Majeſty, as to cloud and damp the propitious and comfortable rays of his Royal Grace and Favour, and have ſtrained his gracious Inclination beyond its natural diſpoſition of clemency expreſs'd to his other Subjects, to commit the Petitioner's perſon, and give way to the trial of his carriage and actings. Yet ſo firmly rooted is the Petitioner's perſuaſion of his Majeſty's Juſtice and Clemency, and that he intends the reclaiming, and not the ruin of the meaneſt of his Subjects, who retain their loyalty, duty, and good affection to his Perſon and Government; that upon true and right repreſentation of the Petitioner's carriage and actings; he ſhall be able to vindicate himſelf of theſe aſperſions, and ſhall give his Majeſty ſatisfaction; at leaſt ſo far to extenuate his guilt, as may render him a fit object of that Royal Clemency, which is of that depth, that having ſwallowed and paſt by, not only perſonal but national guiltineſs, of much more a deeper dye, than any the Petitioner can be charged with, or made out againſt him; and ſo will not ſtrain to paſs by and pardon the faults and failings of a perſon, who never acted but in a publick joint way, without any ſiniſter or treaſonable deſign againſt his Majeſty or his Royal Father; and againſt which he can defend himſelf either by acts of approbation and oblivion in verbo principis, which he conceives to be the ſupreme, ſacred, and inviolable ſecurity, or which he was forced to, much againſt his Inclination, by an inſuperable neceſſity. And albeit, his Majeſty's grace and favour is ſtrictly tied to no other rule but his royal will and pleaſure; yet his Majeſty's ſo innate, eſſential, and inſeparable a quality of his royal nature, that the Petitioner is perſuaded in all human certainty, that the leaving and committing to his Parliament (as is expreſs'd in his Majeſty's Declaration of October 12th laſt by-paſt) the trying and judging of the carriage of his ſubjects during the late troubles, as indeed it is in its own nature, and ought to be ſo accepted of all, as an undoubted evidence of his Majeſty's affection to, and confidence in his people; ſo no other trial or judging is therein meaned, but a fair, juſt, legal and uſual Trial, without any prejudice, paſſion, or prelimitation, or precipitation; like as by the ſaid Declaration there was a freedom for all the people intereſted, to make their application to the Parliament, or in the mean time to the Committee, from whom only his Majeſty is pleaſed to declare he would receive addreſs and information. And ſeeing it was the Petitioner's misfortune, during the ſitting of the ſaid Committee, to be priſoner in England; whereas if he had been priſoner here in Scotland, he would have made application to them, and would have craved, and in juſtice expected that precognition might have been taken by them, to whom the preparing and ordering of that affair (to wit, anent the Trial of the Subjects carriage during the troubles) was recommended, that the Petitioner's abſence, which was his puniſhment, not his fault, may not be prejudicial, ſeeing the Petitioner has lately received two ſeveral Dittays, wherein there be many crimes groſly falſe, with all the aſperſions and aggravations imaginable laid to his charge; importing no leſs than the loſs of his life, fame, and eſtate, and the ruin of him and his poſterity; which he is confident is not intended by his Majeſty. And that by the Law and Practice of this Kingdom, conſonant to all reaſon and equity, the Petitioner ought to have upon his deſire a precognition, for taking the depoſition of certain perſons, which being frequently and uſually practiſed in this Country, when any perſon is defamed for any crime, and therefore incarcerate before he was brought to a Trial. At his deſire, precognition was taken in all buſineſs relating thereto, which the Petitioner in all humility conceives, ought much more not to be denied to him, not only by reaſon of reſpect to his quality; and of the importance and conſequence thereof, to all his Majeſty's Subjects of all quality in all time coming; but alſo, in regard it has been ſo meaned and intended by his Majeſty's Declaration aforeſaid; like as the manner of the crimes objected, being actings in times of wars and troubles, the guilt thereof was not perſonal and particular, but rather national and univerſal, and veiled and covered with acts of indempnity and oblivion; and ſo tender and tickliſh, that if duly pondered, after a hearing allowed to the Petitioner, in prudence and policy, will not be found expedient to be toſſed in publick, or touched with every hand, but rather to be precognoſced upon by ſome wiſe, ſober, noble, and judicious perſons, for their and ſeveral other reaſons in the paper hereto annexed. Nor does the Petitioner deſire the ſame animo protelandi, nor needs the ſame breed any longer delay; nor is it ſought without an end of zeal to his Majeſty's power, and vindication of the Petitioner's innocency, as to many particulars wherewith he is aſperſed; and it would be ſeriouſly pondered, that ſeeing Cunctatio nulla longa ubi agitur de vita hominis, far leſs can this ſmall delay, which is uſual, and in this caſe moſt expedient, if not abſolutely neceſſary, be refuſed, ubi agitur non ſolum de vita, ſed de fama; and of all worldly intereſts, that can be dear or of value to any man.

Upon conſideration of the premiſes, it is humbly craved, That your Grace, and the Honourable Eſtates of Parliament, may grant the Petitioner's deſire, and to give Warrant to cite perſons to depone before your Grace, and the Eſtates of Parliament, upon ſuch interrogatories as your Petitioner ſhall give in, for clearing of ſeveral things concerning his intention and loyalty during the troubles. And for ſuch as are out of the Country, and Strangers, reſidentars in England, Commiſſions may be directed to ſuch as your Grace and the Parliament ſhall think fit, to take their depoſitions upon Oath, and to return the ſame.

Edinburgh, February 12. 1661.

This Petition being read, was refuſed.

Edinburgh, at the Parliament-Houſe, February 13. 1661.

THE Marquis of Argyle (being accuſed of High-Treaſon, at the inſtance of Sir John Fletcher, his Majeſty's Advocate for his Intereſt) was brought to the Bar. His Lordſhip humbly deſired but to ſpeak a few words before reading the Indictment;

Indictment; aſſuring to ſpeak nothing in the cauſe itſelf. Whereupon he was removed a little, and after ſome debate, the Houſe reſolved that the ſaid Indictment ſhould be firſt read. Then his Lordſhip deſired that a Bill which he had cauſed his Advocates to give in to the Lords of the Articles, (deſiring a precognition, with many reaſons urging the neceſſity of it) to which he had received no anſwer, might be read before the ſaid Indictment: which being likewiſe refuſed, the ſaid Indictment was firſt read; and after the reading thereof, the Marquis (being put off his firſt thoughts) was compelled to this extemporary diſcourſe following, as it was faithfully writ when his Lordſhip ſpoke.

May it pleaſe your Grace,

MY Lord-Chancellor, before I ſpeak any thing, I ſhall humbly proteſt my words may not be wreſted, but that I may have charity to be believed; and I ſhall with God's aſſiſtance, ſpeak truth from my heart.

I ſhall, my Lord, reſume Mephiboſheth's anſwer to David, (after a great Rebellion, and himſelf evil reported of) ſaith he, Yea, let him take all, for as much as my Lord the King is come home again in peace into his own houſe; 2 Sam. xix. 30. So ſay I, ſince it has pleaſed God Almighty graciouſly to return his ſacred Majeſty to the Royal Exerciſe of his Government over theſe Nations, to which he has undoubted right, and was moſt unjuſtly and violently thruſt therefrom, by the late tyrannizing Uſurpers.

It is, my Lord, exceeding matter of joy to us all, that the iron yoke of Uſurpation (under which we have theſe many years ſadly groaned) is now broke, and with much freedom this High and Honourable Court of Parliament are meeting together, under the refreſhing warm beams of his Majeſty's Royal Government: (ſo much longed for by our almoſt ſtarved expectations,) and I do earneſtly wiſh his Royal Preſence upon his Royal Throne amongſt us. But ſince at this time that great happineſs cannot probably be expected, I am glad that his Majeſty's prudence has ſingled out ſuch a qualified and worthy perſon (as my Lord-Commiſſioner his Grace) to repreſent himſelf; whoſe unſpotted loyalty to his Majeſty we can all witneſs.

I cannot, my Lord, but acknowledge that theſe two grand mercies, which comfortably attends my preſent condition; one is, the high thoughts I deſervedly entertain, of that tranſcendent and princely clemency wherewith his ſacred Majeſty is ſo admirably delighted; abundantly evidenced by many noted and ſignal teſtimonies in all the ſteps of his Majeſty's carriage; as thoſe moſt gracious Letters, Declarations, and that free and moſt ample Act of Indempnity, granted to all his Majeſty's Subjects, (excepting ſome of the immediate murderers of his Royal Father) to eradicate any timorous jealouſies of his Majeſty's gracious pardon, (which might haply ariſe by ſerious reflectings) convincing them forcibly of their own miſcarriages, in theſe unhappy times of diſtraction. The effects, my Lord, of which princely deportment (I am confidently hopeful) his Majeſty has experimentally and ſhall find, prove one effectual cement to conciliate the moſt anti-monarchick and diſaffected perſons (excepting ſome of thoſe barbarous phanaticks) in all his Majeſty's Dominions, moſt willingly to the ſubjection of his Majeſty's Royal Scepter; and with a perfect hatred abominate all diſloyal practices in themſelves or others, in all time coming.

The ſecond is, my Lord, when I conſider that my Judges are not ſuch as we had of late, ſtrangers, but my own countrymen; both which jointly (together with the real ſenſe and ſolid convictions I have of my innocency of thoſe calumnies moſt unjuſtly charged upon me) encourages my hopes the rather, to expect ſuch dealing, as will moſt ſympathize with that clement humour (to which his ſacred Majeſty has a natural propenſity) and ſuch equal adminiſtration of Juſtice (void of all biaſſing prejudices) as will be moſt ſuitable to ſuch a high and honourable meeting.

I ſhall therefore, my Lord, deſire to uſe Paul's anſwer for himſelf, (being accuſed of his Countrymen) he having a learned Orator, Tertullus, accuſing him, as I have in my Lord-Advocate; Paul's was hereſy, mine of another nature; but I muſt ſay with him, that the things they alledge againſt me cannot be proved: but this I confeſs, in the way allowed by ſolemn Oaths and Covenants, I have ſerved God, my King, and Country (as he ſaid) which they themſelves alſo allow.

I ſhall, my Lord, remember (not with repining, but for information) my hard uſuage, never having had my hearing, nor allowance of pen, ink, nor paper, nor the comfort of ſeeing my friends freely, until I received this Summons, which was in effect a load above a burden; enemies, both Scots and Engliſh, out of malice calumniating me for all the ſame things, excepting what relates to his Majeſty's moſt Royal Father of ever-glorious memory.

Therefore, my Lord, I beg charity and patient hearing, not doubting but the wiſdom and goodneſs of the Parliament will be ſo favourable, and not as the inconſiderate multitude (as a learned and able man writes, Sir Walter Raleigh, in his Preface to the Hiſtory of the World.) As we ſee in experience, that dogs always bark at them they know not; and that is their nature, to accompany one another in thoſe clamours; ſo it is with the inconſiderate multitude, who wanting that virtue which we call honeſty in all men, and that ſpecial gift of God, which we call charity in Chriſtian men; condemn without hearing, and wound without offence given, led thereunto by uncertain Report only; which his Majeſty King James only acknowledges to be the father of lyes. I ſhall not deſire to be in the leaſt miſtaken by any that hear me; but ſure I am, it is pertinently applicable to my caſe.

I intreat your Lordſhip likewiſe to conſider the words of another notable man, (Speed, in his Hiſtory;) who ſays, As the tongues of Paraſites are ill ballances to weigh the virtues of Princes and great men; ſo neither ſhould theirs, nor other mens blemiſhes be looked upon as they are drawn with the deformed pencil of envy or rancour; which do always attend eminency, whether in place or virtue. I ſhall not, my Lord, be ſo preſumptuous as to arrogate any thing to myſelf in this, only I want not the two companions, for I am but a weak man, ſubject to many failings and infirmities, (whereof I do not purge myſelf) for as we muſt confeſs to God Almighty, if he ſhould mark iniquity, who can ſtand? neither ſhall I ſay, that there cannot a hole be diſcovered (as the Proverb is) in my coat; and it cannot but be ſo with any, ſpecially ſuch as have labour'd in ſuch times and buſineſs. But I bleſs the Lord, that in theſe things which have been, and are are here caſt upon me, I am able to make the falſehood and miſconſtruction of them palpably appear.

My Lord, before I mention any thing in particular, I muſt ſhew this honourable meeting of Parliament, and all that hear me (who doubtleſs have various apprehenſions of my being preſent in this condition) that I am here rather as my misfortune, not my injury; wherein I deſire to explain the difference, as Plato and Ariſtotle do very well; calling injuries ſuch things as are done purpoſely with a wicked mind; and misfortunes, ſuch things as are done with a good mind, though the events prove bad, yet we could not foreſee them.

So, my Lord, I ſhall take God to record (who muſt judge me one day) upon my Conſcience, that what I did, flowed not from any injurious principle to any, though I acknowledge the events were not ſtill ſo ſucceſsful (which was my misfortune) indeed; but it has been my lot often in theſe times (wherein I and many others have been inevitably involved) to be by the malicious tongues of my calumniating enemies, miſconſtructed for the worſt; yea, even in many things that the Lord was pleaſed to make ſucceſsful. For the truth of this, I may, I hope, ſafely appeal to many in this honourable Houſe, who can abundantly witneſs, my faithful and loyal endeavours, for both my King and native Country: whereof I ſhould be very ſparing to be an Herald myſelf, were not the contrary ſo impudently affirmed. There are five main calumnies that I deſire, my Lord, to ſatisfy all that hear me a little in; to the end that the reſt of leſs moment may be likewiſe in their own due time heard, afterward abſtracted more from perſonal prejudice.

The firſt calumny is, my Lord, concerning that horrid and unparallelled murder of his late Royal Majeſty of eternally bleſſed memory; I do here publickly declare, that I neither deſire, nor deſerve the leaſt countenance or favour, if I was either acceſſary to it, or on the counſel or knowledge of it: which to make clearly appear, is under oath in the Parliament-Books 1649; whereof I was the firſt ſtarter myſelf, to the intent that we might both vindicate ourſelves, and endeavour a diſcovery, if any amongſt us had any acceſſion to that horrid and villanous crime; as alſo in my latter Will, which I made going to England, in Anno 1655, or 1656, fearing what poſſibly might hereafter be obtruded by any upon me or my family upon that account, I ſet it down to clear my poſterity; that I was altogether free of that deteſtable and execrable crime, or of any prejudice to his Majeſty, in either Perſon or Government. I left this with a very worthy Gentleman, I believe well known to your Lordſhip, and never ſaw it ſince; ſo your Lordſhip may be pleaſed if ye will to call for it, and try the truth. Whatſoever other thing may be in it, I hope, my Lord, this opportunity is a mercy to me, to have that vile calumny (amongſt many others) againſt me to be cleared.

And, my Lord, to make this particular yet more evident, I did ſtill, and do poſitively aſſert, that I never ſaw that monſtrous Uſurper Oliver Cromwel in the face, nor ever had the leaſt correſpondence with him, or any of that Sectarian Army, until the commands of the Committee of Eſtates ſent me, with ſome other Noblemen and Gentlemen to the border in anno 1648, to ſtop his march into Scotland, after thoſe who retired from Preſton fight; neither after he left the border, in the year 1648, did I ever correſpond with him, or any of that Sectarian Army; ſo unſatisfied was I with their way, after the wicked and ſiniſter courſes he and they were upon, afforded evident preſumptions for us to apprehend, that he and they intended prejudice to his Royal Majeſty. Only one letter I received from Sir Arthur Haſſerig, to which I returned anſwer, that he might ſpare his pains in writing to me, for I bleſſed the Lord, who had taught me by his word, to fear God, and honour the King, and not to meddle with them that were given to change. Though Sir Arthur be now dead, yet he acknowledged to ſeveral in the Tower, that he ſtill had my letter: and when I was there, I often deſired he might be poſed and examined about it; which I can preſently inſtruct. And during, my Lord, my being in England, neither in London nor Newcaſtle, in anno 1647, there was not any thing ſo much as mentioned concerning his late Majeſty's Perſon; all that ever I heard of, was in publick Parliament 1647. The Commiſſioners Papers at London, and Committee-Books at Newcaſtle, will clear this fully.

The ſecond calumny is anent the inhuman murder of Duke James Hamilton: my Lord, it's well known my great reſpect to that truly noble and worthy Perſon, whereof (upon all occaſions) I gave ample teſtimonies, and can yet convince any of his friends with the reality of it; and evidenced my true ſorrow for the wicked cruelty committed upon him. But indeed I cannot deny I refuſed to complement Cromwel on his behalf, (he having, my Lord, been immediately preceding, ſo inſtrumental, and ſo very active in that moſt horrid and lamentable murder of his late ſacred Majeſty;) and if I had done otherwiſe, undoubtedly it had been a more black Article in that Libel now read, than any that is in it.

The third calumny is, that which breeds a great part of theſe groundleſs clamours, (though it be not in the Indictment) is my Lord Marquis of Huntley's death; wherein I may truly ſay, I was as earneſt to preſerve him, as poſſibly I could, (which is very well known to many in this honourable houſe) and my not prevailing may ſufficiently evidence I had not ſo great a ſtroke nor power in the Parliament as is libelled. And, my Lord, for his Eſtate, I had nothing in that, but for my own abſolutely neceſſary relief, and was ever moſt willing to part with any intereſt I had therein, (getting his friends, who profeſſed much zeal for the ſtanding of the Family) engaged for warrandize to me, of any portion that ſhould happen to fall to my ſatisfaction. And to evidence that I was no means to harm the Family, I ſtood with my right betwixt all fines and forfeitures of Bonds, and accounted for any thing I could receive. And to manifeſt yet further, that the burden of that Family was not from any extrinſick cauſe to themſelves, I have under the old Marquis's own hand, and his Son, George Lord Gordon, (who was a very worthy young Nobleman) the juſt Inventory of their debts, amounting to about one million of marks, in anno 1640. It would, I fear, my Lord, conſume too much of the Parliament's precious time, to hear many other circumſtances, to make this particular more clear, which I ſhall at this time forbear.

The fourth calumny is, the death of the Marquis of Montroſs; there are many in this houſe, my Lord, who know very well, I refuſed to meddle either in the matter or manner of it: and ſo far were we from having any particular quarrels at one another, that in anno 1645, he and I were fully agreed upon Articles and Conditions contained in a Treaty paſt betwixt us: the Gentleman is yet alive who carried the meſſages both by word and writing betwixt us; and it was neither his fault nor mine that the buſineſs did not end at that time, which ('tis known to all) proved very obnoxious to the Kingdom thereafter.

The fifth calumny, is concerning my dealing with the Engliſh after Worceſter fight. It is well known, my Lord, to many, that myſelf, and the Gentlemen of Argyleſhire (my Kinſmen, Vaſſals, and Tenants) endeavoured cordially to engage all their neighbours about them on all hands, againſt the Engliſh, (which they did not prevail in,) but was moſt unhappily made known to the Engliſh Commanders for the time; which they cauſed immediately to be publiſhed (as a very notable diſcovery) in their News-books; which occaſioned two ſad diſadvantages to us. For they not only cruſhed our attempts in the infancy, but alſo determined the ſeverer reſolutions againſt us; whereby two ſtrong Regiments of Foot, (Overton's and Read's) and very near the number of one of Horſe (under the command of one Blackamoor) were ſent to Argyle; and when Dean came there, it pleaſed God to viſit me with a great diſtemper of ſickneſs, (as Dr. Cunningham, and many others who were with me, can witneſs.) What, my Lord, I was preſt to, when I was violently in their hands, may be inſtructed by the paper itſelf (written by Dean's man's own hand, yet extant to ſhew) which I did abſolutely refuſe, upon all the hazard of the uttermoſt of their malice; as alſo what I was neceſſitated to do, is likewiſe ready to be ſhewn, whereby I was ſtill continued their Priſoner upon demand.

I ſhall, my Lord, add one reaſon more to clear this (beſides many other weighty publick reaſons and conſiderations, which I ſhall forbear to mention at this time, it being more natural to bring them in by way of defences afterward) my own Intereſt, and of all Noblemen and Superiors in Scotland. It may rationally be preſumed, that I had been a very ſenſeleſs fool, if ever I had been for promoting ſuch an Authority and Intereſt over me, as levelled all, and was ſo totally deſtructive to all that differenced myſelf and other Noblemen, from their own Vaſſals, (which many ſay I was too earneſt in) yea, it being abſurdly derogative to all true Nobility; and my Anceſtors and I (as it is ſaid in that libel) having had ſo many titles of honour, dignity, and eminent places of truſt, conferred upon us by his Majeſty's Royal Predeceſſors and himſelf; (all for our conſtant Loyalty and Adherence to the Crown on all occaſions) as the Records and Hiſtories of this ancient Kingdom hold forth, beſides the narratives of all our grants, and aſſerting the juſt privileges thereof, againſt all oppoſers. I did, my Lord, ever (even when the Engliſh were at the intolerable height of Uſurpation) declare my true abhorrence to a Commonwealth Government, which was well known to them all. I was not indeed, my Lord, very diſſatisfied, when there were rumours ſpread abroad of Cromwel's being made a King, (as ſome here preſent can witneſs;) for I told them it was a moſt probable way for his Majeſty; and the more it were incouraged, would tend the more to Cromwel's, and their deformed Commonwealth's Government's ruin, and promote his Majeſty's juſt Intereſt the more. My Lord, I ſhall not much blame my Lord Advocate for doing his endeavour, (it being an eſſential part of his function to accuſe) but I muſt ſay, that it is very hard meaſure, that ſo able a man has taken near as many months, in taking pains to prompt as many enemies as his perſuaſions could poſſibly invite, to vent out the higheſt notes of their malice; and laying out ſearch by them for, and collecting all the bad reports, or rather (to give them their genuine term) I may call them a confuſed maſs of the common claſhes of the Country, thereby to adviſe miſconſtructions of all the publick actings of both Parliaments and Committees, during the late troubles: and with ſtrange and remote inferences to adduce all thoſe to the channel of my particular actings; he has taken, I ſay, my Lord, as many months, as I have had days, to anſwer them, being an exceeding diſadvantage. But, my Lord, that's not all, I am likewiſe extremely troubled, that he labours in that libel all along to draw an obſcure vail of perpetual oblivion over all my good ſervices; and ſpecially my faithful and loyal endeavours, in reſtoring of his ſacred Majeſty to the Crown of this his moſt ancient Kingdom of Scotland; and the exerciſe of his Majeſty's royal authority therein; with my cordial endeavours for his Majeſty's reſtitution to the reſt of his Dominions alſo: which his Majeſty both knows, and has been pleaſed often to acknowledge it to have been good ſervice. Yea, and many preſent in this honourable houſe know, that I extended both my zeal and affection to the utmoſt of my power for his Majeſty's ſervice in that particular; which I willingly acknowledge nothing, my Lord, but my duty, whereunto I was tied both by natural, civil, and chriſtian bands to my Sovereign; and ſpecially ſuch a King, of whom I may ſay well, (as I have often affirmed) That he is a King in whom the Lord has been pleaſed to take ſuch pleaſure, as to poſſeſs his Majeſty with ſo many ſuperlative degrees of excellency, that will certainly exalt his Majeſty's fame, both in our age, and to ſubſequent poſterity, above all the Monarchs in the world. So that, my Lord, we may conſequently diſcover a high demonſtration of the Lord's ſingular kindneſs and ſpecial providential care for us his Majeſty's Subjects, in preſerving ſuch a rich bleſſing as his ſacred Majeſty, (in whom the happineſs of theſe Nations is wrapt up) under the ſafe wings of his divine Protection; I may ſay, even when the extravagant malice of men would have ſwallowed him up.

After my Lord had ended this diſcourſe (being heard by all very attentively, without any interruptions) thus the Lord Advocate ſpoke to my Lord Chancellor:

My Lord, What can the Marquis of Argyle ſay to the oppoſition at Sterling, in anno 1648?

The Marquis replied, that he found my Lord Advocate endeavoured to bring him to debate the particulars, (which he hoped ſhould be cleared at another more convenient time) and waved anſwering the thing it ſelf, but inſiſted thus:

My Lord-Chancellor,

I have, (informativè only) hinted a little at the main things which I am often charged with, my memory cannot fully reach all, neither will time permit to circumſtantiate theſe particulars, which I have only touched in the general; nor is it my purpoſe at preſent to fall on the debate of any of that Libel (not having yet conſulted the proceſs) by by reaſon theſe advocates your Lordſhip was pleaſed to allow me, have not yet all embraced, and the excuſes of my ordinary advocates (in whom I had confidence) being admitted as relevant. And theſe Gentlemen, that have been pleaſed, (in obedience to your Lordſhip's command) to come here with me, not being much acquainted with matters of this weight, and not having unbraced till within theſe two or three days, ſo that they are ſtrangers altogether to my caſe; I ſhall therefore, my Lord, humbly deſire, that a competent time may be allowed me, that I may prepare my defences, and I ſhall, (God willing) abundantly clear every particular in that Libel. And alſo my Lord, I humbly deſire that theſe other advocates, who were ordained by your Lordſhips to aſſiſt me (and after the honourable Lords of Articles had heard them, rejected their excuſes) may be now re-ordained to conſult and appear for me.

The Marquis's advocates entered a proteſtation, that what ſhould happen to eſcape them in pleading (either by word or writ) for the life, honour, and eſtate of the ſaid noble Marquis, their client, might not thereafter be obtruded to them as treaſonable; whereupon they took inſtruments.

The Marquis aſſured my Lord Chancellor, that he knew not of any ſuch proteſtation to be preſented, and that it flowed ſimply of themſelves: Whereupon the Lord Chancellor deſired the Marquis and his advocates to remove, till the houſe ſhould conſider both of my Lord's deſire, and the advocate's proteſtation.

The Marquis and his advocates being removed, the houſe, (after ſome ſmall debate) reſolved, as to my Lord Marquis's deſires, his Lordſhip ſhould have till the 26th of February to give in his defences in writ, and ordained Mr. Andrew Ker to be one of his advocates.

As to the advocates proteſtation, the houſe reſolved, That they could not be allowed to ſpeak in caſes of treaſon either by word or writ, but upon their peril; only allowed them in the general, as much as in ſuch caſes was indulged to any.

The Marquis and his advocates being called in, my Lord Chancellor intimated the aforeſaid reſolutions of the houſe, both in reverence to my Lord Marquis, and to the advocates proteſtation.

When my Lord Chancellor had done, the Marquis ſpoke as followeth:

My Lord Chancellor,

THere is one thing that had almoſt eſcaped me, anent that oppoſition at Sterling, 1648, that my Lord advocate was ſpeaking of; that it may not ſtick with any of this honourable meeting, I ſhall ingeniouſly declare, That after the defeat at Preſton, I was deſired to come and meet with the committee of eſtates (meaning thoſe who were in the then engagement) and being come with ſome of my friends to Sterling, fearing no harm and ſuſpecting nothing, I was invaded by Sir George Munro, where ſeveral of my friends were killed, and my ſelf hardly eſcaped, which is all that can be ſaid I acted in arms, as many here know.

My Lord, not that I am any ways diffident, but I ſhall in due time clear every particular of that Libel; yet I am not a little troubled that ſome who have heard the calumnies therein, may let them have ſuch an impreſſion (being aſſerted with ſuch confidence) as to conceive a poſſibility, if not a probability of their being true; I ſhall therefore deſire ſo much charity from this honourable meeting, that there be no hard thoughts entertained till I be fully heard.

The Marquis therefore, with the joint concurrence of his advocates, humbly deſired, That the Bill (containing many pungent reaſons) for a precognition of his proceſs, given to the honourable Lords of articles, might be read and conſidered, in plain Parliament.

To which my Lord Chancellor replied, That it had been formerly refuſed at the articles, and that it would not be granted.

So his Lordſhip was carried back to the Caſtle.

Edinburgh, March 5, 1661, at the Parliament Houſe.

The Marquis of Argyle being called in, gave in a Bill, containing ſeveral weighty Reaſons, deſiring a continuation till the meeting of Parliament to-morrow. His Lordſhip being removed, after long debate it was carried againſt him by two or three votes; and his Lordſhip being called in, my Lord Chancellor told him it was refuſed, and ordered his Lordſhip to produce his defences, whereupon he ſpoke as followeth.

May it pleaſe your Grace,

MY Lord Chancellor, this buſineſs is of very great concernment to me, and not ſmall in the preparative of it to the whole Nation; yea, it may concern many of your Lordſhips who are ſitting here, and your poſterity: and therefore I deſire to have your Grace (my Lord Commiſſioner) and the remanent members of this honourable meeting, your patience to hear me a few words without prejudice or miſ-conſtruction, which any thing I can ſay is often obnoxious to.

I ſhall, my Lord, begin with the words of that Godly King Jehoſaphat, that good King of Judah, (after he was come back in peace to Jeruſalem;) in his inſtructions to his judges, he deſires them to take heed what they do, for they judge not for men, but for the Lord, who is with them in the judgment.

My Lord, I ſhall ſpeak another word to many young men, who were either not born, or ſo young that it is impoſſible they could know the beginning of theſe buſineſſes, which are contained in the Libel againſt me, (being all that hath been done ſince the year 1638) ſo that they might have heard by report what was done; but not why, or upon what grounds; and what ſome have ſuffered, but not what they have deſerved. — Therefore I deſire your Lordſhip's charity, until all the particulars and ſeveral circumſtances of every particular be heard, without which no man can judge rightly of any action: For as it is well obſerved by that incomparable Grotius, that Ariſtotle aſſerts, That there is more certainty in the mathematicks than morals; for as Grotius has it, the mathematicks ſeparates forms from matters, as betwixt ſtraight and crooked there is no midſt, but in morals, even the leaſt circumſtances vary the matter, ſo that they are wont to have ſomething betwixt them, with ſuch latitudes, that the acceſs is near ſometime to this, ſometime to that extream; ſo that betwixt that which ought to be done, and that which ought not to be done, is interpoſed that which may be done, but is nearer now to this than to the other extremity, or part, whence ambiguity often often ariſeth. The particular circumſtances are ſo obvious to every underſtanding man, that I need only to mention them.

Polybius, my Lord, makes much of his hiſtory depend upon theſe three, concilia, cauſa, & eventus; and there are likewiſe other three, tempus, locus, & perſonæ, the change whereof makes that which is lawful duty, unlawful, and on the contrary: So likewiſe in ſpeaking or repeating words, the adding or paring from them will quite alter the ſence and meaning; as alſo in writing, the placing of comma's or points, will change the ſentence to a quite other purpoſe than it was intended.

There is, my Lord, another maxim, which I do not mention as always undeniable; but when there is no lawful magiſtrate exerciſing power and authority in a Nation, but an invading uſurper in poſſeſſion, eſteeming former laws, crimes; in ſuch a caſe, I ſay, the ſafety of the people is the ſupreme Law.

There is another maxim which is not queſtioned by any, and it is, Neceſſity has no law; for even the moral law of God yields to it, and Chriſt's diſciples, in David's example: For this Seneca ſays, Neceſſity (the defence of human imbecility) breaks every law; Nam neceſſitas legum irridet vincula, neceſſity ſcorns the fetters of laws. So he that anſwers that Libel, The long Parliament revived, ſpeaking of this laſt Parliament (which his Majeſty calls a bleſſed healing Parliament) he ſays, the neceſſity to have it, may diſpenſe with ſome formalities: So Ravenella, (ſo much eſteemed in matters of Scripture) after he has divided neceſſity into abſolute and hypothetick, makes that of ſubmitting to Powers of abſolute neceſſity. Joſephus alſo, my Lord, that famous hiſtorian, when he mentioned David's ſpeech to his children, after he had made Solomon (being but younger brother) King, he exhorts them to unity among themſelves, and ſubmiſſion to him and his authority; for if it ſhould pleaſe God to bring a foreign ſword amongſt you, you muſt ſubmit to them; much more then to him who is your brother, and one of your own Nation.

There is another maxim, my Lord, Inter arma ſilent leges; and it is well known, that divers retours and other things in Scotland were done in conſideration of times of peace, and times of war.

Another maxim, Ex duobus malis minimum eligendum eſt, cum unum eorum non poteſt evitari; ſays Ariſtotle, Cicero, and Quintilian, cum diverſa mala inter ſe comparantur, minimum eorum locum boni occupat.

There is another maxim, No man's intention muſt be judged by the event of any action, there being oftentimes ſo wide a difference betwixt the condition of a work, and the intention of the worker.

I ſhall only add another maxim, It cannot be eſteemed virtue to abſtain from vice, but where it is in our power to commit the vice, and we meet with a temptation.

As I have named ſhortly ſome few maxims, my Lord, I ſhall humbly tender ſome weighty conſiderations to your Lordſhip's thoughts.

The firſt conſideration is, That there are different conſiderations to be had of ſubjects actions when their lawful magiſtrate is in the exerciſe of his authority by himſelf, or others lawfully conſtituted by him, and when there is no King in Iſrael.

The ſecond is, That there is a different conſideration betwixt the ſubject's actions when the lawful magiſtrate is in the Nation, and when he is put from it, and ſo forced to leave the people to the prevalent power of a foreign ſword, and the invader in poſſeſſion of authority.

Thirdly, That there is a difference betwixt ſubjects actions, even with the invading uſurper, after the repreſentatives of a Nation have ſubmitted to, and accepted of their authority and government, and they in poſſeſſion ſeveral years; the Nation acknowledging their conſtitutions, and all the lawyers preſſing and pleading them as laws.

Fourthly, The actions of ſubjects are to be conſidered, when aſſiſting the lawful magiſtrate to their power, and never ſubmitting to the invading uſurper until they were priſoners, and could do no better.

Fifthly, That there is likewiſe conſideration to be had of the actions of ſuch ſubjects, being ſtill priſoners upon demand under articles to that purpoſe.

Sixthly, It is to be conſidered likewiſe of the actions of ſuch a ſubject, who was particularly noticed and perſecuted by the invaders, for his affection to the lawful magiſtrate and his government.

Seventhly, It is to be conſidered, that there is a great difference betwixt actions done ad lucrum captandum, and thoſe done ad damnum evitandum; that is to ſay, actions to procure benefit, and actions to ſhun detriment.

Eightly, It is to be conſidered, that there hath ever been a favourable conſideration had, by any Prince, of any perſon coming voluntarily, and caſting himſelf upon a Prince's clemency.

Ninthly, It is to be conſidered, that his Majeſty himſelf hath a gracious natural inclination unto clemency and mercy, which hath been ſo abundantly manifeſted to his ſubjects in England, even to all (except to ſome of the immediate murderers of his royal father) that it cannot be doubted, that the ſame will be wanting to his people in Scotland, who ſuffered by them (whom his Majeſty hath graciouſly pardoned) even for their dutiful ſervice, and affection to his Majeſty.

Therefore without thought of any prejudice to the Parliament, or this honourable meeting, I muſt make uſe of my Lord Chancellor of England his words, though in another caſe, ſaying, There cannot too much evil befall thoſe who do the beſt they can to corrupt his Majeſty's good nature, and to extinguiſh his clemency: For his Majeſty's ſelf declared his natural inclination to clemency, in his ſpeech to both his houſes of Parliament in England, whom he hath, with all his people, conjured, deſired, and commanded, to aboliſh all notes of diſcord, ſeparations, and difference of parties, and to lay aſide all other animoſities, and the memory of paſt provocations, and to return to a perfect unity amongſt themſelves under his Majeſty's protection; which is hoped all your Lordſhips will concur in, having ſo worthy a pattern to follow: And as theſe are his Majeſty's inclinations expreſs'd, ſo it is ſuitable to the arms he bears as King of Scotland, which is the Lion, whoſe motto is known to all;

——Nobilis eſt ira Leonis,
Parcere ſubjectis, & debellare ſuperbos.

Which is to ſay, to vanquiſh and ſubdue the proud, and ſpare ſuch as are ſubmiſſive; of the which number I am one, and for that effect, in all humility, preſent this humble ſubmiſſion to his Majeſty, and your Grace, my Lord Commiſſioner, in his Majeſty's name.

To

To my Lord Commiſſioner his Grace, and High Court of Parliament, March 5, 1661.

FOraſmuch as I Archibald Marquis of Argyle, am accuſed of treaſon, at the inſtance of his Majeſty's advocate, before the high Court of Parliament; and being altogether unwilling to appear any way in oppoſition to his ſacred Majeſty; conſidering alſo that this is the firſt Parliament called by his Majeſty after his happy return to his Kingdom and Government, for healing and repairing the diſtempers and breaches made by the late and long troubles: I have therefore reſolved that their conſultations and debates about the great affairs and concernment of his Majeſty and this Kingdom ſhall have no interruption upon occaſion of any proceſs againſt me. I will not repreſent the fatality and contagion of thoſe times, wherein I, with many others in theſe three Kingdoms, have been involved; which have produced many ſad conſequences and effects, far contrary to our intentions. Nor will I inſiſt upon the defence of our actings in this Kingdom before the prevailing of the late uſurpers, which, if examined according to the ſtricteſt interpretation, and ſevereſt cenſure of Law, may be eſteemed a treſpaſs of his Majeſty's royal commands, and a tranſgreſſion of the Law: But, notwithſtanding thereof, are by his Majeſty's clemency covered with the veil of oblivion by divers Acts of Parliament, and others, to that purpoſe, for the ſafety and ſecurity of his Majeſty's ſubjects: And that my actings ſince, and any compliance with ſo prevalent a Power, (which had wholly ſubdued this, and all his Majeſty's other dominions, and was univerſally acknowledged) may be looked upon as acts of meer neceſſity, which hath no law; and it is known, that during that time I had no favour from theſe uſurpers.

It was inconſiſtent with, and repugnant to my Intereſt, and cannot be thought, (unleſs I had been demented and void of reaſon) that I ſhould have had freedom or affection to be for them, who being conſpired enemies to monarchy, could never be expected to befriend or tolerate Nobility. And whereas that moſt horrid and abominable crime of taking away the precious life of the late King of ever-glorious memory, is moſt maliciouſly and falſly charged upon me; if I had the leaſt acceſſion to that moſt vile and heinous crime, I would eſteem my ſelf unworthy to live, and that all higheſt puniſhments ſhould be inflicted upon me: but my witneſs is in heaven, and my record on high, that no ſuch wicked or diſloyal thought ever entered in my heart. But chuſing to ſhun all debate, rather than to uſe any words or arguments to reaſon with his Majeſty, whom though I were righteous, yet would I not anſwer, but would make my ſupplication to my judge. And therefore (without any excuſe or vindication) I do in all humility throw my ſelf down at his Majeſty's feet (and before his Grace his Majeſty's Commiſſioner, and the honourable Eſtates of Parliament) and do ſubmit and betake my ſelf to his Majeſty's mercy; and though it be the great unhappineſs of theſe times (the diſtempers and failings of theſe Kingdoms being ſo epidemick and univerſal) that his Majeſty ſhould have had ſo much occaſion and ſubject of his royal clemency; yet it is our great happineſs, and his Majeſty's high honour, that he has expreſs'd and given ſo ample teſtimony thereof, even to thoſe who did invade his Majeſty and this Nation, for no other cauſe than for their faithful and loyal adherence to his Majeſty, and his juſt royal intereſts: which renders his Majeſty's goodneſs incomparable, and without parallel, and gives me confidence, that his Grace his Majeſty's Commiſſioner, and the honourable Parliament, of their own goodneſs, and in imitation of ſo great and excellent a pattern, will compaſſionate my condition. And ſeeing it is a ſpecial part of his Majeſty's ſovereignty and royal prerogative, to diſpenſe with the ſeverity of the Laws, and that it is a part of the juſt liberty and privilege of the ſubjects, that in caſes of greateſt extremity and danger, they may have recourſe to his Majeſty as to a ſanctuary and refuge:

It is in all humility ſupplicated, that the Lord Commiſſioner's Grace, and the honourable Parliament, would be pleaſed favourably to repreſent my caſe to his Majeſty, and that the door of his royal mercy and bounty, which is ſo large and patent to many, may not be ſhut upon one, whoſe anceſtors for many ages, (without the leaſt ſtain) have had the honour, by many ſignal proofs of their loyalty, to be reputed ſerviceable to his Majeſty's royal progenitors in the defence of the Crown, and this his ancient Kingdom. And if his Majeſty ſhall deign to hold out the golden ſcepter of his clemency, as an indelible character of his Majeſty's royal favour, it will lay a perpetual obligation of all poſſible gratitude upon me and my poſterity, and will ever engage and devote us entirely to his Majeſty's ſervice. And the interceſſion of this honourable Parliament on my behalf to his gracious Majeſty, will be a real evidence of their moderation, and they ſhall be truly called a healing Parliament; and God, whoſe mercy is above all his works, ſhall have the honour and glory which is due to his great name, when mercy triumphs over juſtice.

The aforeſaid ſubmiſſion being read, the Lords of Articles would give him no preſent anſwer; but reſolved to report the ſame to the Parliament the morrow.

Edinburgh, Martii 6, 1661; at the Parliament.

MY Lord Chancellor having reported what had been done the former day before the Lords of Articles anent the Marquis of Argyle's proceſs, preſented his ſubmiſſion, which was immediately read; and after a long debate, the firſt queſtion was ſtated;

If it was ſatisfactory, or ſhould be accepted or not?

The ſecond queſtion was, Whether they ſhould proceed preſently in his proceſs, without regard to his ſubmiſſion, or not?

Both which were carried in the negative againſt him. Then he was brought to the bar, and the Lord Chancellor told him, that his ſubmiſſion was rejected, and that notwithſtanding thereof, the Parliament commanded him to give in his defences.

He replied, That his caſe was very hard, to be debarred from that which was his juſt privilege, and of all ſubjects, in ſuch extremities to refuge themſelves at his Majeſty's mercy and clemency; and that as it was the undeniable privilege of the ſubject, ſo alſo it was a ſpecial prerogative of his Majeſty, and the grandeur of it conſiſted much in the the eminency of the ſubject, whom his Majeſty ſhould graciouſly be pleaſed to extend his mercy unto: And beſides many other ſtrong perſuaſions that encouraged his ſubmiſſion, his Majeſty's own proclamation, (which he acquieſces in) wherein his Majeſty is graciouſly pleaſed to declare, That his juſt intereſt and royal prerogative being firſt aſſerted, and trial only taken of his ſubjects carriages, then he is moſt willing to paſs an Act of indempnity to ſecure them. And the like being already done in our neighbouring Nation, and his Majeſty having performed his royal promiſe there already, he deſired that their ſtudy might be to imitate his royal pattern; conſidering, that as it was a practice moſt agreeable to his Majeſty's clement inclination, ſo alſo, that as Solomon that wiſe King ſaid, That the King's throne is eſtabliſhed by righteouſneſs and mercy: He entreated therefore their Lordſhips ſeriouſly to conſider his condition, and not to ſingle him out, and aim at his ruin; and not only his, but alſo, he feared, both his family and name, their ruins alſo.

As for giving in his defences preſently, he ſaid, That the confidence and firm hope he had that his humble ſubmiſſion ſhould have been accepted, and ſo cut off totally all further trouble either to their Lordſhips or himſelf, made him the more ſecure and ſlack, not reſolving to lean to them, or any way (as he had expreſs'd in his ſubmiſſion) make uſe of them, though he were altogether innocent: and if he were neceſſitated to make uſe of his defences (as he declared he was moſt unwilling to do) it ſhould be ſimply in obedience to their Lordſhips commands, and no otherwiſe.

Not having fully ended,

The Chancellor told him, if his Lordſhip had them not in readineſs at that time, to have them ready to give in to the Lords of Articles the morrow.

So he was returned to the caſtle.

THE Marquis being called before the Lords of Articles to give in his defences,

He declared that he had ſeen their Lordſhips Order, that he might forbear his coming, if he would produce his defences; therefore he told their Lordſhips ingenuouſly, that if he had them in readineſs, he would neither have troubled their Lordſhips nor himſelf; for having a petition ready to deſire a delay, he thought it rather his duty to come and propoſe it himſelf, hoping their Lordſhips would conſider that his preſenting his defences either lame and wanting ſomething, or blotted, ſo as they could not be well read, was a very great prejudice to him; but a delay of a few days was no prejudice at all to any thing my Lord Advocate could ſay; and therefore hoped their Lordſhips would not refuſe him ſome competent time, whereby he might have them in readineſs.

Upon the which he was removed; and after ſome debate, being called in again, my Lord-Chancellor told his Lordſhip, That he was ordered to give in his defences before Monday at ten o'clock to my Lord Advocate, otherwiſe the Lords of Articles would take the whole buſineſs to their conſideration, without regard to any thing he could ſay.

The Advocate told his Lordſhip, that he muſt give in his whole defences:

To which he anſwered,

That that was a new form to give in peremptory defences before the diſcuſſing of relevances.

Whereupon Sir John Bychmore did riſe up, and told his Lordſhip, That he was commanded to inform him, that there was a different way betwixt a proceſs in writ, and the ordinary way before the Seſſion, or Chief Juſtice.

To which his Lordſhip anſwered, That he was very ill yoked with ſo able men; but he muſt tell them, that he had once the honour to ſit as Chief Juſtice in this city, and he knew the proceſs before them was in writ, and yet the relevance was always firſt anſwered, before any peremptor proponed; for relevance is moſt to be conſidered in criminals.

Sir John Thereſter ſaid, and ſo did the Advocate, That it was his Lordſhip's advantage to give in as ſtrongly his defences as he could, otherwiſe the Advocate might refer the whole buſineſs to the Judge, and make no other anſwer.

His Lordſhip replied, That he would do in that by advice of his lawyers, and hoped any Order of their Lordſhips at preſent, was without prejudice to his giving in more defences afterwards, ſince he was ſo ſtraitned with time, and commanded to give in what was ready: His Lordſhip likewiſe added, if their Lordſhips and the Parliament had been pleaſed to grant his deſire of a Precognition, which was agreeable, as he humbly conceived, both to Law and Practice, and his Majeſty's Proclamation, which he acquieſced in, it could not but have been the readieſt way for trying his carriage during the late troubles; where now of neceſſity he muſt in the proceſs, which he hopes will not be refuſed, crave one way for exculpation in many particulars; for he both was reſolved, and is reſolved to deal very ingenuouſly, as to matter of fact. And if that had been firſt tried, which he was moſt deſirous of, both from the Committee, and ſince from the Parliament, he is hopeful there would not remain ſo much prejudice againſt him in the moſt part of things of greateſt concernment in this Libel; and for his own part, he deſired nothing more than the truth to have place, and to do with his perſon what they pleaſed; for by the courſe of nature he could not expect a long time to live, and he ſhould not think his life ill beſtowed, to be ſacrificed for all that had been done in theſe nations, if that were all.

Thereafter he was returned to the caſtle.

The Marquis of Argyle's defences againſt the grand Indictment of High-Treaſon exhibited againſt him to the Parliament in Scotland.

THE defender profeſſes his ſenſe of the mercy and happineſs of the land, that we are delivered from the lawleſs arbitrary power of the armed force of cruel uſurpers, and have reſtored to us our only lawful ſovereign Lord, and in his ſacred perſon, the authority of law, the order of legal judgment, and in them the liberty of legal defences: thereupon depend the great ſecurity of the liberties, lives and eſtates of the ſubject; this gives the defender confidence to appear in judgment, nothing doubting of a fair proceedure and full hearing, compleat time being allowed in all the dyets of the proceſs, and all things therein ſo ordered, as may be ſuitable to the juſtice and gravity of this high and honourable court, and the importance of the cauſe; juſtice, not only as to the defender, but juſtice as to the preparative and conſequence. And he with much confidence expects all juſtice from his moſt gracious Sovereign the juſteſt of Princes, and who is repreſented and acting by ſo truly noble a perſon as my Lord Commiſſioner's Grace, alſo hoping the honourable court of Parliament will without all prejudice impartially conſider his legal and juſt defences; and that they will proceed ſo far without all ground of ſuſpicion therein, that any who is within degrees to perſons againſt whom he is libelled to have committed any of the deeds which are made the ground of his dittay; or if any are conſcious to themſelves of capital enmity, or has been any ways informer againſt the defender, or have predetermined by uttering the judgment already of his cauſe, conſcience and honour will make them abſtain ſitting and voting therein: ſo much the more, that they ſee how unwilling he is to propone any recuſatory againſt any member of the houſe upon theſe or other grounds in law; ſo confident is he of the vindication of his own carriage, ſo much he defers to the ingenuity or generoſity, and ſo high is the honour he bears to this honourable court.

Firſt it is alledged, that there be no proceſs, nor is the defender holden to anſwer, till the whole Libel and all the parts thereof be given him up to ſee: alſo it is the Commiſſioner's inſtructions and addreſſes ſent and made to his Majeſty by the defender, as is alledged, and the commiſſioners at Breda are expreſsly repeated, as a part of the libel brevitatis cauſa, in the tenth article, and yet the ſame has not been produced nor given to the defender to ſee and adviſe with; till which be done, he cannot be held in to anſwer: like as where points of the dittay are founded upon writ, the defender craves that he may have up the writs whereupon the ſame are founded, to ſee before he be holden to anſwer to the dittay, which is very conſonant to law, l. 1. Sect. 3. F. de edendo ubi edenda ſunt omnia quæ actor editurus eſt, apud indicem et l. 3. cod. eodem. Whereby the purſuer is ordained to ſhow to the defender all that he will uſe againſt the defender before the judge. Otherwiſe the defender cannot prepare himſelf for his defence, which is the reaſon given in theſe laws; Paulus lib. 5. cent. 16. and the doctors throughout the ſaid laws, & l. unius Sect. 9. F. do queſt. poſt alios to l. 2 Mun. 3. 4. 5. 6. eo dedendo Bart. ad leg. ubi min. 8. F. de queſt. But ſo it is, there are ſeveral articles in this dittay founded upon writ, not produced; as in the firſt articles in the proſecution of Mr. John Steward to death, as a leaſing-maker between the King and his ſubjects libelled, and yet neither libel nor ſentence againſt Mr. John produced.

Item, Colonel Henderſon's commiſſion for keeping Dunbarton caſtle is libelled, and the commiſſion not produced.

Item, In the ſixth article a capitulation alledged, made and ſubſcribed by the Laird of Arkinglas and other officers, under the defender's command with the Laird of Lamond and Eſcog.

Item, The aſſurance alledged given to the perſons within the houſe of Lochhead, mentioned in the ſeventh article, the defender craves ante omnia, it may be produced.

Item, That ordinance of Parliament or committee of eſtates, whereby it is libelled in the ſame ſeventh article that Cailkitoch was ordained to be brought from the priſon where he was for the time, &c. to the town of Edinburgh.

Item, In the ninth article the defender's proteſtation, Parliam. anno 1648.

Item, In the ſame article the letter written to Cromwell, libelled as being dated the 6th of October, 1648; whereby it is libelled, that the defender and his complices wrote to Cromwell, &c.

Item, In the ſame article Sir John Cheeſly's inſtructions libelled, as being dated the 17th of October, 1648, deſiring the perſons taken in the engagement to be detain'd as pledges of that Kingdom's peace.

Item, Eod. art. the warrant alledged to be under the defender's hand for a proclamation againſt the families of Ogilvie and Rea.

Item, Art. 10. the letter alledged written to Cromwell, anno 1650, after his invaſion.

Item, Eod. art. the act of the Weſt-Kirk, with the declaration whereunto it relates.

Item, Act 11. the remiſſion alledged given to John Mac-Dogal of Dimolich, under the defender's hand.

All which the defender humbly alledges ought to be given up to ſee, before he be held in to anſwer; eſpecially poſt tanti temporis intervallum, ſo long a time having intervened between the intention of this purſuit, and the dates of the ſaid Act and papers aforeſaid libelled on; ſome of them being twenty years ago, ſome fifteen, and the lateſt ten or eleven years; as has always been the practice in ſuch caſes, and may be inſtanced in my Lord Balmerino's proceſs, and was found by this honourable court in Mr. James Guthrie's proceſs.

Second, Under proteſtation that the former exceptation may be firſt diſcuſs'd, that the papers therein mentioned ante omnia be given up to the defender to ſee; it is alledged, that it has been always the princely care of his Majeſty's royal anceſtors, to keep the Laws of this Realm certain, Ne dum incerto utemur jure, fluctuaret reſpublica: and leſt Law, which is introduced for the lieges ſecurity, ſhould become their ſnare. Therefore King by James I. (that illuſtrious Prince,) Parliament 7. cap. 107. all the interpretation of his Majeſty's Statutes, otherwiſe than the ſame bear, is forbidden; and if forbidden, can be no ground of dittay: and in effect to found a dittay upon Statutes otherwiſe than they bear, were to found it upon ſuch Statutes we have not; but ſo it is in the propoſition of this libel. The Acts of Parliament whereupon the ſame is founded, are otherwiſe repeated than they bear: for, 1. The firſt part of the propoſition of the dittay founded upon the two firſt Acts of Parliament libelled, viz. the third Act of the 5th Parliament of King James I. and the firſt Act of King James VI. doth upon the ſaid Acts conclude the pain of Forfeiture and Treaſon. The ſame is moſt irrelevant, becauſe in the ſaid Acts, there is no mention made of any crimes of the nature and quality libelled: the ſaid third Act of the 5th Parliament of King James I. being anent the fees of Craftſmen, and the price of the work; and the firſt Act of King James VI. being anent the conſtitution of the Earl of Murray, Regent; and in neither of the ſaid Acts is there any pain or puniſhment inferred, and ſo far leſs can the pain of Forfeiture or Treaſon be from the ſaid Acts concluded againſt the defender. And if it ſhould be ſaid, the 5th Parliament of King James I. is miſtaken in the writing for the firſt Parliament; and in citing the firſt Act of King James VI. the citation of the number of the Parliament is alſo omitted, viz. the number 18: The dittay repeats theſe two Acts otherways than they bear, for the words of the ſaid 3d Act of the firſt Parliament of King James I. ſtatutes and ordains, That no man openly or notoriouſly rebel againſt the King's perſon, under the pain and forfeiting of life, lands and goods; which is not at all in the libel repeated. And as to the ſaid 1ſt Act of the 18th Parliament of King James VI. the words thereof are cited, yet with ſome difference and tranſpoſition libelled; but thereto is added the ſanction and pain, That whoſoever doth in the contrary, they are to be puniſhed as Traitors, and to forfeit their life, lands and goods; whereas there is no ſanction or pain in the ſaid Act, only it is declarative of his Majeſty's prerogative, and of his three Eſtates to maintain the ſame.

Item, In the ſecond part of the propoſition of the dittay, founded upon the 25th Act of the 6th Parliament of King James II. and 75th Act of the 9th Parliament of Queen Mary; is not repeated as it bears as to puniſhment, for therein they who attempt to do, or raiſe any bands of men of war, horſe or foot, without any ſpecial licence of his Majeſty, and his Succeſſors, are only declared puniſhable by death; whereas they are libelled to be puniſhable as Traitors, while it is the pain only of the ſaid 25th Act of the 6th Parliament of King James II.

Item, In the next Parliament of the propoſition of the dittay founded upon the 43d Act of the 2d Parliament of King James I. and the 134th Act of the 8th Parliament, and the 10th Act of the 10th Parliament, and 205th Act of the 14th Parliament of King James VI. none of theſe Acts are repeated as they bear, but confounded, both as to the crimes and pains therein contained, to a very far different ſenſe (as is humbly conceived) from that which the ſaid Acts ſeverally propoſe; transferring the pains of the ſaid ſeveral Acts and Crimes therein contained from one to another, as may appear by what follows. For the firſt of theſe Acts, being the 43d Act of the 2d Parliament of King James I. is only of leaſing-makers and tellers of them, which may engender ſtrife between the King and his People; and the pain of the Act is tinſel of life and goods to the King, as is clear both by the title and body of the Act. The ſecond Act, viz. the 134th Act of the 8th Parliament of King James VI. is alſo the ſame crime, viz. againſt thoſe that utter falſe, ſlanderous and untrue ſpeeches, to the diſdain, reproach or contempt of his Majeſty, his Council or Proceedings, or to the diſhonour of his Majeſty's parents and progenitors: adding alſo thoſe that meddle in the affairs of his Majeſty, and his Eſtates, and the pain is the pain contained in the Acts of Parliament, made againſt Leaſing-makers and tellers of them. The third is the 10th Act of the 10th Parliament of King James VI. againſt thoſe who ſpeak or write any purpoſe of reproach or ſlander againſt his Majeſty's Perſon, Eſtates or Government, or deprave his Laws or Acts of Parliament, or miſconſtrue his Majeſty's proceedings, whereby any misbelieving may be moved between his Majeſty and Nobility, and his loving Subjects: And the pain thereof is only the pain of death. And by the 205th Act of the 14th Parliament of King James VI. thoſe that hear the ſaid words Leaſings, and do not apprehend and reveal the Authors thereof, ſhall incur the like puniſhment with the principal offenders; and yet Leaſing-making, and telling, which is the crime puniſhable by the firſt of theſe Acts, viz. the 43d Act of the 2d Parliament of King James I. is puniſhable, but the loſs of life and goods to the King is omitted. And falſe ſlanders, which is the crime contained in the 134th Act of the 8th Parliament of King James VI. and only ſpeaking to the diſhonour of his Majeſty's Parents and Progenitors, and meddling with the affairs of his Highneſs's eſtate, is repeated out of the ſaid 134th Act; and joined to the crime contained in the ſaid Acts, 10th Parliament, 10 James VI. And to both, the pains added of loſing life, lands and goods, whereas the pain of the ſaid 10th Act, is only of death. And the pain of the ſaid 134th Act of the 8th Parliament of King James VI. is only the pain contained in the Acts againſt Leaſing-makers, which in the ſaid 43d Act of the 2d Parliament of King James I. is only the loſs of life and goods, and not of life, lands and goods; but allanerly the eſcheats of goods moveable: as may appear, Firſt, Becauſe whenever the pain of tinſel of life and goods, is found either in the Acts of Parliament or old Laws, goods are underſtood moveable, as is clear from the crimes that are ordained to be ſo puniſhed: As man-ſlaughter; by the 42d Statute of Robert III. is prohibited under the pain of tinſel of life and goods; where Skein explains, that the goods are to be underſtood of moveables. And by the 90th Act of the 6th Parliament of King James I. the receipt of him who is fugitive for ſlaughter, is forbidden under the pain of tinſel of life and goods. (Where Skein expounds goods to be goods moveable, in his Tractate of Crimes, tit. 2. cap. 6. Parl. 4.) And ſo it is clear in the other Acts of Parliament, that their whole pains are diſtinct, viz. tinſel of life and goods alike, is only extended to moveables; and tinſel of life, lands and goods, which latter pain in the ſtile of our Acts of Parliament is commonly thus expreſſed; That he who incurs it, ſhall die, and forfeit life, lands and goods, as the 31ſt Act of the 7th Parliament of King James II. & paſſim alibi forfeiture properly relating to lands; and in the common ſignification of our ſaid goods, to be underſtood of goods moveable.

More eſpecially it may appear, that the pain of the ſaid 43d Act of the 2d Parliament of King James I. given to the ſaid 134th Act of the 8th Parliament of King James VI. is only the pain of eſcheat of moveables, becauſe the pain of forfeiting of life, lands and goods, is the proper pain of the crimes that by our Laws are declared Treaſon. And therefore Skein, both in his Index of the Acts of Parliament on the word Treaſon, refers the crimes that are ſo puniſhable to the head of Treaſon, as alſo in his tract upon crimes in the end of Reg. Maj. but doth not at all mention therein the crime of the ſaid 43d Act of the 2d Parliament of King James I. nor of the 134th Act of the 8th Parliament of King James VI. nor of the other Acts whereupon this part of the propoſition is founded. But in his Index has the crime of Leaſing-making between the King and his People under a head by itſelf, and therein expreſly mentions both the ſaid 43d Act of King James I. and 134th Act of King James VI. like as in the ſaid tract of crimes after the chapters of Treaſon and points thereof, cap. 1. and pain of the ſame, which cap. 2. he expreſly ſays, is the tinſel of life, lands and goods; and declares, that he underſtands by goods, moveable goods. And anent the Proceſs and Judge of the crime of Treaſon, cap. 3. when he comes to other crimes capital, of all which the pains are either the tinſel of life and moveable goods, or life only, or of ſome leſs pain in body or goods, but never of life, land and goods, as is clear through the whole tract that follows. And in his 12 cap. anent the crime of falſity, he has the crime of Leaſing-making between the King and his people. And the ſame Acts of Parliament, viz. Act 43d, of the 2d Parliament of King James I. and the 205th Act of the 14th of King James VI. and in his 25th cap. has the crime of infamous and ſeditious libels; and the ſaid 10th Act of the 10th Parliament of King James VI. cited therefore.

Item, In the laſt two Acts of Parliament whereupon the propoſition of the dittay is founded, viz. the 37th Act of the 2d Parliament of King James I. and 144th Act of the 12th Parliament of King James VI. it is libelled, That all recepters, ſupplyers, or intercommoners, with any Traitors, are puniſhable by forfeiture, as the Traitors themſelves; which is not as the Act bears, for both the crime and pain libelled out of the ſaid 144th Act of the 12th Parliament of King James VI. the Act is not ſimply againſt thoſe who intercommon with Traitors and Rebels, but with ſuch as are declared Rebels and Traitors. From all which it follows, that the propoſition of the libel founded upon the Acts as they are libelled, is not relevant. And therefore the Defender ought to be aſſoilzed in hoc libello.

Tertio, As to the laſt part of the propoſition of the dittay, the Defender abhors ſo much the crime therein mentioned, that he thinks any perſon who will conceal any malicious purpoſe, wronging in the leaſt, far more in putting violent hands on the inviolable ſacred perſon of his Sovereign Lord, were unworthy to breathe in common air, let alone to be defended; and is ſo conſcious to himſelf of his own innocency in any ſuch things, that he needs no other defence, but the confident denial of any guiltineſs therein, either leſs or more. But before a practice paſs in this honourable Court of Parliament of founding a dittay of Treaſon upon common Law and Practice; it is under proteſtation aforeſaid, and with all humility alledged againſt the relievancy of that part of the propoſition, as founded upon the ſaid Common Law and Practice, That it is not relevantly founded thereon, in ſo far as by the 28th Act of Parliament 1640, it is expreſly found and declared Traitors, but after Trial by the Parliament or Judges ordinary; and finding that the ſaid perſons have contravened a Law and Act of Parliament, made under the pain of Treaſon: and therefore a perſon cannot be declared guilty of Treaſon on a Dittay founded on Common Law and Practice. 2. Pœna being legis ſanctio; and the Common Law is known with us, to have only vim rationis, non legis; and therefore no pain, but eſpecially the higheſt of pains can be founded thereupon. And 3. ſpecially as the practice beſide the reaſon aforeſaid; becauſe L. ſ. 4. fad. ſenat. Conſult. Turpilianum, facti quidem quæſtio in arbitrio eſt judicantis, pœnæ vero perſecutio non ejus voluntati mandatur, ſed legis authoritati aſſervatur. Whence Menochius lib. 5. Preſumpt. cap. 29. in principio ſaith expreſly, pœna indici non poteſt niſi expreſſo jure ſit cautum per l. at ſi quis divus fad. reli. & ſumptibus funerum. And it is the common opinion of the Doctors, That ever when puniſhment is not expreſly defin'd in the Law, but is permitted arbitrio judicis, it cannot be extended to death, far leſs to the pain of Treaſon. And the foreſaid Act of Parliament, 28th Act anno 1640, takes away the relevancy of founding Treaſon upon Common Law and Practice, as ſaid is.

If a Dittay to infer the crime of Treaſon might be founded on practice, either of the Juſtice Court, or Parliament, which are two Courts, before which crimes of Treaſon are judged; yet our practice is conſuetudo rerum ita judicatarum, as Craig defines it, lib. 1. de feudis dig. 8. And therefore to it, as to the introducing of all other conſuetudes, there muſt be actuum frequentia, reiterated acts and practices, per l. de quibus ff. de legibus & Cart. Jaſon, and other Doctors, on that Law; & per l. Cod. quæ ſit longa conſuetudo, & L. & in totum 3. c. de creſ. diſ. privat. 2. illud explorandum, an contradicto aliquo judicio ſit firmata; that is, it would be tried if decrees in foro contradictorio have been given thereupon. As alſo ſaith Craig dicta diſg. 8. in fine; and if in any caſe, that ought to be far more in crimes; and if in crimes, yet more in the higheſt of crimes; and in all concernments of one of the moſt eminent Peers of the land, which is clear. For in matters civil (how ſmall ſoever) before the ſeſſion, a practice will never be founded on ſome decrees given either for not-compearance, or on compearance where there is little or no diſpute, or it may be great inequality in Advocates of the two parties. And if in civils where the intereſt is only pecuniary, this ought to be much more in libels of Treaſon, as hath been ſaid; but ſo it is, neither in Juſtice-Court, nor Parliament will be found, that it hath been frequently judged, nor in foro contradictorio, on a diſpute where this defence hath been propounded. Yea, it may be well alledged, that there can be no practice ſhewed of either of theſe Courts, that any hath been found guilty of Treaſon but on ſome Act of Parliament under the pain of Treaſon, as is ſaid; but however the ſaid 28th Act of Parliament 1640, is moſt clear, which is moſt agreeable to reaſon, and the Law of England very laudable in that point; as Coke has it in his chapter of Treaſon, and therefore the libel as founded on practice is noways relevant, and the defender ought to be aſſoilzed therefrom.

Quarto, Every libel both of civil Law and our Law, ought to be clear, diſtinct and ſpecial; but eſpecially criminal libels, becauſe of the great importance of them, ought to be moſt clear, diſtinct and ſpecial, jure libellus in criminalibus debet eſſe clariſſimus, ſaith, Damhaud prax. crim. 3. num. 3. And therefore, Libellus Criminalis obſcurus parte etiam non excipiente extenditur favore rei, Baldus in lege addita, num. 10. c. de edendo, Alex. Conſil. 72. col. verſit. & licet volum. 1. hip. Conſil. 49. & Battander prax. Cran. Reg. 6. ſ. 3. & 4. nec enim debet accuſator cum exiſtimationis alienæ jactura, & diſcrimine vagari licet. L. ſi in rem. ff. de rei unum. So that any obſcure criminal libel is inept, and the defender ought to be aſſoilzed therefrom, though he did not oppone his defence for that effect. But ſo it is, this Dittay is moſt unclear and undiſtinct, in ſo far as in the propoſition of the Dittay, there are many Acts of Parliament libelled on, being Statutes anent diverſe crimes of very different natures, and inferring different puniſhments, according to the article of the crimes, and in the ſubſumption, the Pannel is indicted for ſeveral crimes alledged committed by him, contrary to the ſaid Laws and Acts of Parliament in general, without condeſcending on the particular Acts of Parliament that the Pannel has contravened by committing the particular deeds libelled, and ſo leaving him to great uncertainty. Whereas in all Law, Reaſon, and Form of proceſs, the Defender ought to be certified what Acts and Laws he has contravened, by committing ſuch deeds that are in a multiplicity of crimes. After propoſing all the Statutes relating to the ſame crimes, all the deeds immediately ought to be ſubſumed, falling under the compaſs of ſuch Statutes, and thereafter the Acts relating to another indifferent crime ought to be propoſed, and the deeds falling under the compaſs of theſe Acts immediately ſubſumed, and throughout the libel, which is no way done here; but firſt by many different acts accumulated together in the propoſition, and then the moſt different facts accumulated together indiſtinctly in the ſubſumption, not condeſcending on the acts by them contravened: and therefore the libel is inept, and the defender ought to be aſſoilzed therefrom.

This defence is further confirmed in law; 2. Becauſe a libel being ſillogiſmus quidem practicus, Jaſon and the Doct. inſtit. de act. in criminal dittays the propoſition conſiſts in jure conſtitutionis, in the laws whereupon the libel is founded: The manner is in the ſubſumption of the facts or crimes under theſe laws, and the concluſion inferring the pain: Becauſe of ſuch a crime, as falling under the law libelled, on a very eſſential part of every libel, is quo jure petatur; and a libel being uncertain in this, is unclear and uncertain in a very eſſential point, and inept. 3. In law, a libel ought ſo to be conceived as the defender may know actionis ſpeciem, otherwiſe it is inept. l. f. de edendo l. 3. c. eodem. and may alſo know actionis jus, and that he may deliberate how to defend; but in our caſe, that ariſes from the diſtinct application of the laws to the facts, ex quibus jus oritur. 4. If ſuch uncertain libel were admitted, the defender, becauſe of the obſcurity and uncertainty of the libel, ſhould be prejudged of a certain defence he could make againſt the relevancy of the ſame, becauſe the relevancy of it conſiſts in the ſubſumption of the facts and crimes libelled under ſome certain law: which being condeſcended on by a diſtinct ſubſumption, under each law, of the crimes that were libelled properly to fall under the ſame; the defender would alledge why ſuch crimes cannot be ſubſumed revelantly under ſuch laws and acts, which he otherwiſe cannot do in ſuch multiplicity both of different acts and crimes as are libelled in this dittay: there being not only in divers articles, but even in every article, a great diverſity of the crimes therein libelled, and yet the defender left in uncertainty under which of all the acts libelled on, the perſuer intends the ſubſumption thereof; and ſo in uncertainty altogether how to conceive his defence. And if this be not maxime vagari, cum maximo alienæ vitæ et fortunarum periculo; it is hoped, as it will be found very evident, ſo it was never the practice heretofore uſed in criminal libels; and which, that it ſhould not be now ſuſtained, is of univerſal concernment: and if ſuſtain'd, might prove of very dangerous conſequence. And the libel, as it is now conceived, is inept, and the defender ought to be aſſoilzed therefrom.

BEfore the defender come to his particular anſwer to the ſeveral articles of the dittay, to the effect the defender's caſe, in his acceſſion to the publick actings of this kingdom, during the unhappy troubles till the treaty at Breda, and his Majeſty's home-coming, may be truly ſtated; it is humbly craved that the Commiſſioner's Grace and honourable Eſtates of Parliament may be pleaſed to remember, that the Kirk and whole body of this Kingdom entred at firſt into the national covenant, for defence of religion and his Majeſty's perſon and authority, and mutual defence one of another in maintaining the ſame; wherein, and in what followed in proſecution thereof till the treaty with his late Majeſty, and act of oblivion, ſet down at length and ratified in the 6th act of the 2d Parliament, anno 1641; his late Majeſty did ſo far acknowledge and approve their loyalty, that in the ſeventh article of the ſaid large treaty his Majeſty was pleaſed to appoint, that at the cloſe of that treaty, their ſaid loyalty ſhould be made known at the time of publick thankſgiving in all places, particularly in the pariſh-churches of his Majeſty's dominions. And in the ſaid act of pacification and oblivion, is pleaſed to declare, that their conſtant loyalty in their intentions and proceedings, ſhould not be hereafter called in queſtion; and that whatſoever fell forth in thoſe tumultuous times, whether prejudicial to his Majeſty's honour and authority, to the laws and liberty of the church, or the particular intereſt of the ſubject, might be buried in perpetual oblivion; and whatever had enſued thereon, no mention ſhould be made thereof in judgment or without: like as his Majeſty for himſelf and his ſucceſſors promiſes in verbo principis, never to come in contrary to the ſaid ſtatute, nor any thing therein contained; but to hold the ſame firm and ſtable, and to cauſe it to be truly obſerved, and theſe preſents to have the full force and ſtrength of a perfect and true ſecurity. Like as thereafter in anno 1643, the league and covenant was entred in, with the two houſes of Parliament, upon the ground of the large treaty, by the church and whole body of this Kingdom, purporting the ſame ends of the covenant, for maintenance of Religion, King and Kingdom; which was thereafter approved by the Parliament, 1644, and fifth act thereof, and proſecuted by wars both within and without the Kingdom, by the authority of divers ſucceeding Parliaments; church and ſtate going unanimouſly along together, without any apparent publick difference till the year 1648. And even then that Parliament, 1648, ſo highly homologate the ſaid league and covenant, that they declare the breaches thereof to be the grounds of their reſolutions of that war, act 4, 7 and 8; and their deſires for preventing thereof to be the fulfilling of the ſame; Ibidem. The neceſſary qualification required in all with whom they would join either in their armies or committees, is, that they be ſuch who were of known faithfulneſs to the cauſe and covenant in the ſaid act 7. and that they would oppoſe, and endeavour to ſuppreſs the enemies to the cauſe and covenant on all hands, Ibid. Witneſſing to the world, that they ſwerved not from the principles contained in the national covenant, and league and covenant; and that they reſolved cloſely and conſtantly to adhere thereunto, and to all the ends thereof. So that at that time there was ſtill no difference as to the cauſe and covenant, any difference being only in the manner, and not in the matter of that engagement.

Thereafter what ſtraits this poor Kingdom was reduced to, by the defeat of that engagement, and how unable it was to make reſiſtance to that Engliſh liſh army, who, in proſecution of their victory, came to the borders and entred the ſame, is notorious to all; wherewith the whole Kingdom being ſurprized with amazement, and in evident hazard, it was hard in that juncture of affairs to reſolve upon any courſe for preventing the ſame, or rather incumbent hazard of the Kingdom. Whereupon a Quorum of the committee of eſtates appointed by the ſaid Parliament, 1648, were neceſſitated to take upon them the managing of affairs, and to ſue for conditions of peace, not being able to reſiſt by force (the flower and ſtrength of the Nation being broke by the ſaid defeat) and to accept the ſame upon the eaſieſt terms that could be had for the time; which as it was endeavoured upon no other intention, or for any other end but that which they were conſtrained to by inevitable neceſſity; ſo at that time it was generally looked upon as good ſervice, and which at that time was moſt neceſſary to evite very great, and otherwiſe inevitable evils, being either neceſſitate to condeſcend to their demands at that time, or otherwiſe to have delivered the perſons of all that did proſecute the ſaid engagements, according to the obleaſment of the large treaty, together with the forts and ſtrength of the Kingdom. The ſucceeding Parliament for the time, in the year 1649, after proclamation of his preſent Majeſty, did ſend commiſſioners to Holland, and afterwards, according to his Majeſty's deſire, to Breda, where there was a treaty concluded by his ſacred Majeſty; wherein he was graciouſly pleaſed to approve of the ſaid Parliament, in anno 1644, and remanent Parliaments, and their proceedings from the year 1641, preceding the ſaid treaty, which was thereafter ratified by his ſacred Majeſty and his Parliament at Perth and Sterling; and, after the royal example of his ever-glorious father, an act of oblivion was indulged, whereby all that might be ground of queſtion was buried in oblivion, and pardoned by a general act of oblivion in a moſt full and ample form.

This being the ſtate of publick affairs during the time aforeſaid, albeit by the firſt ten articles of the dittay, the defender is charged with deeds and publick actings, coming within the compaſs of the ſaid approbation and oblivion aforeſaid; yet ſuch firm reliance hath he of his Majeſty's perſiſting in his gracious clemency, which does in his royal heart ſo much abound, that albeit his Majeſty by his proclamation, dated the 12th of October, 1660, is pleaſed graciouſly to declare, that he has remitted to his Parliament, the trial of the carriage of his ſubjects in Scotland during the late troubles: That the late troubles have only reſpect to thet ime during the uſurper's poſſeſſion, and that trial ſhould be taken during that time of the ſubject's carriage: The defender in all humility conceiving, that it is no ways to be ſuppoſed, that his gracious Majeſty did thereby intend to rip up or revive, or to inſtitute any new trial of old offences, forgotten and forgiven, as is ſaid; eſpecially ſeeing it is not to be ſuppoſed that the bowels of his mercies ſhould be ſo ſtraitned to this his ancient Kingdom, to which he has upon all occaſions given ſo many ſignal and recent teſtimonies of his ſuperabundant favour, than they are, and have been to his ſubjects of his other dominions; to whom, according to his Majeſty's declarations, he hath granted a full and free pardon, from which few, and theſe only the unpardonable murderers of his royal father, are excluded; for whom, or any guilty thereof, no puniſhment can be ſufficient. And therefore the defender in all humility conceives the ſaid articles, though libelled, are not to be inſiſted on.

The ſolemnity of the oaths, both of covenant and league, will be, as the defender hopes, pregnant preſumptions to put an end to all controverſy, anent the ſincerity of his (as of the Church and Kingdom) their loyal intentions for the maintenance of the perſon and authority of our dread Sovereign, whereunto they were thereby ſo religiouſly engaged; and the conſtant tenour of his acting ſtill by virtue of publick orders and warrants of Parliament, and their committees, wherein his faithfulneſs in the execution was alſo in the like manner approved, will witneſs, that what he did was not for any private intereſt, but for the publick ends; whereunto he conceived himſelf engaged in manner aforeſaid. Nor was the defender for continuing of theſe unnatural civil diſcords, as he did witneſs by his inclination to an accommodation with Montroſs, in the year 1645, mentioned after in anſwer to the tenth article; which albeit fully agreed to betwixt him and the defender, yet he could not obtain the committee's approbation thereof: which is an evidence, that the defender had not the chief ſway of affairs, and was always inclinable to peace, religion being ſecured; like as the carrying on the engagement in the year 1648, though the defender differed in his judgment as to the way and manner, upon the grounds and reaſons thereafter expreſs'd in anſwer to the ninth article, does clearly evince, that he had not the chief ſway in publick actings. And what power and intereſt he had in the year 1649, he did faithfully, according to his bond duty, improve the ſame for removing theſe differences betwixt his Majeſty and his ſubjects, wherein he was paſſionately earneſt, as ſhall be made appear in anſwer to the ſaid tenth article. And after his Majeſty's home-coming, and during his being in this Kingdom; and thereafter, till the enemy had fully prevailed, and that by his articles of agreement he was there priſoner, he faithfully ſerved his Majeſty, and even during his Majeſty's abſence, did always, and ſtill ſhall, return loyal duty and good affection to his perſon, government, and poſterity.

And whatever theſe who are grown up may judge, who only ſee the unhappy and accidental events that are the effects of the corruption of men, but have not known the counſels and cauſes which are the two parts of theſe things neceſſary to be known to all who would judge of human actions aright; events being for the moſt part uncertain, and the worſt of events of times, through the corruption of agents, or other extrinſecal circumſtances following upon the beſt of actions, yet had they been intimately acquainted with the grounds, cauſes, and nature of the actings while a doing, the defender is confident that they would have concurred and been of the ſame judgment, as being clear, that theſe proceedings had no native connexion with the ſad and unexpected conſequences that have enſued.

And now to come to the particular defences to the ſeveral points of the ſubſumption of the dittay: And firſt as to the article of the ſubſumption, anent the words alledged, ſpoken at the Ford of Lions, which are libelled to have been, That it was the opinion and judgment of many lawyers and divines, that a King might be depoſed for deſertion, vendition, or invaſion; and which is alledged to have been meaned by the pannel of the then King's Majeſty; and the preſumptions adduced for inforcing that to have been the defender's meaning, are ſome words words alledged ſubjoin'd, to wit, Mr. John you underſtand Latin. It is alledged for the defender, no ways acknowledging to the beſt of his memory, that he uttered any ſuch words; 1. All criminal dittays ſhould contain in them at leaſt, year, month and place, otherwiſe they are inept; Bartol. & D.D. ad L. libellorum ff. de accuſatione, becauſe amongſt other reaſons, diverſitas loci varia argueret facinora, ſaith Battand. Reg. 6. prax. cum poſtangel. &c. But ſo it is, there is no month condeſcended on, when the defender ſhould have ſpoken theſe words, and therefore the dittay in this article is inept. 2. There is no particular act of Parliament in the act libelled upon in the propoſition condeſcended on, which is contravened by the words libelled; therefore the libel in this article of the ſubſumption is general and obſcure, and till the particular law contravened be condeſcended, one can receive no anſwer. 3. The ſpeeches as they are libelled, fall not under the compaſs of the acts libelled on in the propoſition of the Libel, to infer any of the pains therein contained; becauſe they are but libelled as the narration of the opinion of others, which is not relevant to infer ſo much, that the narrator is of the ſame opinion, except it were alſo libelled, that he did declare his homologation, and that he was of the ſame judgment, which neither is, nor can be libelled; far leſs then is it relevant to infer a crime, and ſo high a crime as treaſon. For ſuppone the defender had ſaid, that they are very learned both divines and lawyers, whoſe opinion it is, that the Pope is the head of the church, and that he has power to diſpenſe with the article of faith, to depoſe Kings, a horrid opinion, &c. and that it is their opinion alſo we may merit heaven by good works, and that all Hugonots or Proteſtants are damnable hereticks, and that he had related their words in Latin, as the Latin of that verſe of the gloſs of the common law, cap. ſicut de exceſs. prælat.

And had ſaid to Mr. John Stewart thereupon, Mr John you underſtand Latin; albeit theſe opinions of theſe divines and lawyers be execrably heretical, yet no body will ſay, that the defender's relation of him would have inferred him to have been guilty of the ſame; no more in our caſe can the relation libelled infer him to have been of that opinion with theſe divines and lawyers, or in any way thereby to have contravened any act of Parliament libelled. 2. The aforeſaid opinion is libelled only to have been related in abſtracto, (nothing of our King's Majeſty who then was.) And whereas it is libelled, that it appears the ſenſe and meaning thereof appeared to have been of the then King's Majeſty, in ſo far as the defender ſubjoined to Mr. John Stewart, the words aforeſaid, that he underſtood Latin: 1. The libel in this part is ambiguous; for this may be interpreted, either that it was the meaning of the opinion of theſe divines which he related, (this ſeems to be moſt conſonant to the words) or elſe that his own meaning was, That it was the judgment that the then King's Majeſty our Sovereign might be ſo dealt with, as is libelled in the latter part of this article, and ſo the article in this part thereof is ambiguous and inept, and there ought to be no proceſs thereupon. Nam libellus (in criminalibus præſertim) nihil ambiguitatis vel obſcuritatis continere debet, per cap. Conſtitut. 6. extr. derig. don. Bet. 3. If it be underſtood in the former ſenſe, it is but ſtill relative of the opinion of others; and if in this latter ſenſe, to wit, that it was his own judgment, the preſumption libelled of what he ſpake to Mr. John Stewart, is no way relevant to infer it. 1. Becauſe they held a more obvious meaning, viz. That it might have been, the opinion of theſe divines and lawyers; was related in Latin, and indeed Grotius and Barclaius, who writ of that ſubject, are both in Latin, and that he had ſubjoined to Mr. John Stewart, Mr. John, you underſtand Latin. 2. That ſuch opinions being rather the fancy of notional ſchoolmen, (otherwiſe not unlearned in their own art) or of ſuch as are Doctors notional in the law, if there be any of ſuch opinions, rather than of ſolid juriſconſult, who for moſt part do not ſo much as move theſe queſtions, not to be moved. 3. If any ſuch words had been ſpoken to Mr. John Stewart, they might have had this more proverbial ſenſe: Some lawyers and divines are of that opinion, but the ſubtilty of theſe queſtions or opinions is Latin to me, that is, I underſtand it not; as we ſay commonly of things we underſtand not, It is Latin to me. But Mr. John, you are a Scholar, and you underſtand it. Now it is a Rule in law, that where the meaning is doubtful or obſcure, that which is the moſt favourable ſenſe ſhould be followed. L. 9. ff. de reg. juris and Matheus de afflictis, deciſione 265. n. 68, 69. & deciſ. 307. n. 15. And when theſe words are ambiguous, the declaration of him who uttered them ſhould be acquieſced unto, Menochius, conſilio 197. And the defender is ready to declare, that if ever he had ſpoken ſuch words, he was very far from any ſuch meaning as is libelled againſt him. Nor, 4. is it any way preſumable, that any rational man, who had the honour to know his late Majeſty, could have made application of any of theſe three cauſes to ſo worthy and illuſtrious a Prince, ſeeing the ſaid Grotius, Barclay, and others that write upon that ſubject, acknowledge, yea, it is obvious to common ſenſe, that hardly can they fall out in the worſt of Princes, if he be but compos mentis. And as to the preſumption that follows, that the defender meaned by the late King's Majeſty, becauſe of the condition wherein the Kingdom was for the time; 1. It is far more preſumable that the Kingdom was in ſuch a condition of affection to his Majeſty's ſacred perſon and authority, at that time none durſt have uttered what might reflect thereupon, ſeeing it is libelled to have been ſhortly after the ſubſcribing of the covenant, wherein they had ſolemnly bound themſelves by the oath of God to maintain his Majeſty's perſon and authority. 2. His Majeſty by his royal judgment in the act of oblivion, 1641, has preſumed the loyalty of his ſubjects, both in their intentions and proceedings in theſe times, which is preſumptio juris, & de pre. As for the defender's proſecuting of Mr. John Stewart, 1. It was a judicial proceſs and legal act, and ſo can be no imputation to him wherein the proceſs was laid in ſo fair a courſe of law, that he was condemned not only upon clear probation, but his own confeſſion: and yet the words whereupon he was indicted and convicted, were far different from theſe words, as they are here libelled, otherwiſe the defender would never have purſued it.

Ultimo, Adhering always to the alledgance above propounded, humbly proteſting, that they may be firſt diſcuſs'd; and whereupon it is craved, he may be aſſoilzed in hoc libello, becauſe by act of Parliament, ment in anno 1641, amongſt the imprinted acts anno 70. the ſame ſervice is approved, and he exonered. It is alledged, that the Defender ought to be aſſoilzed from the whole crimes in the firſt article, becauſe after the time libelled of, the alledged committing of the ſame, his late Majeſty of glorious memory granted that never to be forgotten Act of Indempnity and Oblivion in anno 1641. Which did proceed upon the preceding Treaty with his Majeſty, and which is ſolemnly confirmed by his Majeſty himſelf in Perſon, and his three Eſtates in his Parliament 1641, 6th Act thereof; wherein his Majeſty, for himſelf and his ſucceſſors, does promiſe in verbo principis, never to come in the contrary of that Statute and ſanction, or any thing therein contained; but to hold the ſame in all points firm and ſtable, yea, and to cauſe it to be truly obſerved by all his Majeſty's lieges for ever. Hereupon the Defender doth confidently rely, for all that is libelled as committed by him in this article, or any other preceding that time, as being confident it is the greateſt imaginable ſecurity, that he and the reſt of the lieges of the land can have.

As to the ſecond article, and whole head thereof, 1. Neither day, month, nor year of God are condeſcended on; and therefore ſo general, that it is inept. Nam generalitas parit obſcuritatem, Marent. part. 6. ſpec. & de libel. oblat. quomodo Concip. & per textus ibi citatos. 2. It is not condeſcended which of the Acts of Parliament libelled, this article and the ſeveral heads thereof contravenes, which is a general ineptitude and nullity in this libel. 3. As to the firſt point; if that article anent the intaking of the houſe of Airly, cutting and deſtroying the planting, and demoliſhing the houſes; 1. It is not relevantly libelled, in ſo far as it was libelled that the houſe was kept for his Majeſty's ſervice, but doth not condeſcend that ſervice now. 2. Is it libelled that there was any in it had a commiſſion from his Majeſty, without which it has not any colour of relevance? 4. The Defender never had any private quarrel, nor perſonal prejudice againſt the noble Lord James Earl of Airly. But if his marching to that houſe be meaned of that which was in anno 1640, it was by virtue of, and in obedience to a commiſſion put upon him by the Committee of Eſtates for the time: nor was the ſaid houſe, at his arrival thereat, kept for his Majeſty's ſervice, as is (though wrongfully) libelled. But before that time was ſurrendred to the Earl of Montroſs, who had put Colonel Sibbald to keep the ſame for the King and Country's uſe; and which Colonel Sibbald, upon ſight of the Defender's commiſſion, did abandon the ſaid houſe. And if there was any planting cut, it was allanerly ſome few ſhrubs and buſhes, which the Defender could not hinder, for hutting to the ſoldiery; and though the Defender's commiſſion bare power and warrant to demoliſh the houſe, he was ſo far from ſtretching, or fully executing the ſame, that he did not only ſlight the houſe, and delayed a long time to do the ſame, in expectation that the Lord Ogilvy ſhould have procured a countermand from the Committee, and did ſlight it till he was paſt all hope of obtaining the ſame; and this, as is hoped, will be acknowledged by the ſaid noble Earl; neither did, ſo far as the Defender knew or could hinder, the Earl, his friends and followers ſuſtain any other prejudice than what was uſual, and what all places are ordinarily obnoxious to, where armies or parties of ſoldiers come: but however it is not relevant, as ſaid is.

Tertio, That part of the ſaid article, though it were true (as it is not) is no ways relevant to infer the concluſion of the Dittay, there being no Law nor Statute libelled on; that for cutting of timber, or demoliſhing the houſes of private perſons (though done upon private quarrels, as this was not) infers the pain of Treaſon.

As to that part of the article, anent the burning of the houſe of Forther, beſide the exceptions againſt both the points thereof, alledged before in the beginning, it is not relevant to ſay, that the Defender ſeized thereupon to infer any crime, except it were libelled he ſeized by force, for he might have entered in vacuum poſſeſſionem. 2. Non relevat to libel, that thoſe under him did ſeize thereupon, or raiſe fire therein, except it were libelled that the Defender had given expreſs order or warrant to raiſe that wilful fire: who, as he gave not order therefore, ſo he was not preſent nor near the place, nor knew any thing thereof, till after the houſe was burnt, and noxia caput ſequitur. 3. In the Acts of Parliament, libelled on, anent burning and wilful fire-raiſing, the ſame can only be underſtood of burning and raiſing of fire on private feuds, and for particular revenge in time of peace, and is not to be extended to ſuch deeds done in the heat and fury of wars, ſeeing inter arma ſilent leges.

And as to the aggravation of the Defender's hatred againſt the Earl, meerly for his loyalty to his Majeſty, it is gratis dictum, and againſt that preſumption qua unuſquiſq; præſumitur bonus, and againſt that loyalty to his Majeſty, that is hoped ſhall more and more appear in the Defender.

Laſtly, The Defender ought to be aſſoilzed from the ſaid article, and all deeds therein mentioned. Becauſe the ſame preceded the Act of oblivion in anno 1641, whereby all things that did fall forth in theſe tumultuous times, whether prejudicial to his Majeſty's honour and ſafety or to the Laws, and Practices of the Church and Kingdom, or to the particular intereſts of the ſubject, are buried in perpetual oblivion, as more fully is contained in the ſaid Act.

3. As to the third article, anent the beſieging of Dumbarton Caſtle, and tranſporting Cannon and Ammunition out thereof:

It is alledged for the Defender, that the aſſaulting of the ſaid Caſtle, is not relevant to infer the concluſion of the Dittay, becauſe, as is before alledged, none can be declared Traitors, but thoſe who have contravened a ſpecial Act made under the pain of Treaſon. But ſo it is, that none of the particular Acts of Parliament, whereupon the propoſition is founded, mentions any thing againſt thoſe who aſſault the King's Caſtle, nor does any of them infer the pain of Treaſon therefore. But only the 25th Act of Parliament, 6 Jac. VI. intitled ſundry points of Treaſon, by the which Acts they only are to be puniſhed as Traitors, who aſſault the Caſtle or Places where the King's perſon is, and that without warrant of Eſtates; but it is neither libelled, nor was the King's perſon in the ſaid Caſtle at the time of the alledged aſſaults thereof; nor did the Defender aſſault and lay ſiege to the ſame without warrant from the Eſtates, but by their expreſs order and commiſſion. And the truth is, the Defender himſelf did not appear before the ſaid houſe, till the ſaid Sir John Henderſon being ſtraitned with the ſiege, ſent for the Defender, and offered to ſurrender the houſe upon honourable conditions, which the Defender ſuffered him to make himſelf, and which were accordingly kept, not without ſome difficulty, the inhabitants of the town, by reaſon of prejudice done to them, being highly incenſed againſt the ſaid Colonel.

As to that part of the ſaid article, anent the tranſporting of the King's Cannon and Ammunition, none relevant to infer the concluſion, none of the Acts libelled on, concluding againſt any ſuch fact, the ſaid crime of Treaſon; and the truth is, the Defender did never tranſport any Cannon or Ammunition out of the ſaid Caſtle, but two Cannons, which the Duke of Richmond, heritable keeper thereof, gifted to the Defender, and which he would never have gifted, if they had not been his own, and not the King's. 2. The Defender ought to be aſſoilzed from the ſaid article, and all deeds therein contained, the ſame having alſo preceded the ſaid Act of oblivion, in anno 1641.

4. And as to the fourth article of the Dittay, anent the Defender's calling, or cauſing to be called a convention of Eſtates in anno 1643, entring in league with his Majeſty's enemies, impoſing exciſe and ſubſidies on the Kingdom, raiſing an army, entring England therewith, fighting for and with the Rebels there; it is anſwered, that the whole points of this article of the Dittay, are charged perſonally on the Defender, ſo contrary to the notoriety of the matter of the fact known to both Kingdoms, and to his Majeſty's Commiſſioner's grace, and to the whole Parliament; yea, to the fifth Act of Parliament 1644, relating and approving all the Acts that are made points of this article; that there needs no more but proponed as known to all, and to repeat out of the ſaid publick Law and Act of Parliament, what is therein libelled, to evince that they are not the Defender's perſonal deeds: but the Committees (commiſſioners eſtabliſh'd by his Majeſty) convention of Eſtates, and of the whole Church and Kingdom of Scotland, and approved by Parliament 1644, in the ſaid fifth Act thereof. Firſt then as it is notorious, ſo it is clear by that Act, that the ſaid convention of Eſtates, was called not by the Defender, as is libelled, but by his Majeſty's Privy-Council, Commiſſioners for conſerving the articles of the Treaty therein mentioned, and Commiſſioners of common burdens, all eſtabliſh'd by his Majeſty's authority in anno 1641, which conſervators concerning that article in the large Treaty, bearing the Kingdom of Scotland their deſire for unity in Religion, and conformity in Church-Government, as a ſpecial means for conſerving of peace betwixt the two Kingdoms; in anſwer thereto, his Majeſty, with advice of both houſes of Parliament in England, doth declare his approbation of their affection in their deſire of having conformity of Church-Government between the Nations; and as the Parliament had already taken to conſideration the reformation of Church-Government; ſo they would proceed therein in due time: and this was one of the main grounds whereupon both houſes entered the ſaid League. (2.) That the enacting and entring the League and Covenant, was an Act of that convention of eſtates, not the Defender's perſonal act. (3.) That the League and Covenant was entered in with the two houſes of the long Parliament, and aſſiſtance given to them in fighting with or for their army, or otherwiſe, which is libelled fighting with Rebels. The point of fact being thus cleared in oppoſition to the Dittay. 2. It is alledged, that the firſt two members of this article, are ſubſumed under none of the Acts of Parliament, libelled on in the propoſition; there being no Act of Parliament libelled againſt meetings, bands or leagues in general; or in ſpecial betwixt the two Nations or Eſtates thereof. 3. As to the remanent members of the article, they can no ways be relevant (with all ſubmiſſion) except it were qualified, that the two houſes of the long Parliament, to whom the aſſiſtance libelled was given, that they were Enemies and Rebels; but that the Defender is confident it will not be ſaid, becauſe by his Majeſty's Act of Oblivion, 25 April 1660. his Majeſty, after his happy Reſtoration, declares that what was acted even againſt his Majeſty, and his Royal Father, by his Subjects in England, during theſe times, thereafter ſhall not be called in queſtion at all, ſo much as to the prejudice of their reputation, in manner at length contained in that gracious Act. And how loyal the long Parliament was, did appear in that the Uſurper durſt never attempt any thing againſt his late Majeſty's Perſon, till they were broken; as alſo what loyalty the ſecluded Members of that Parliament have (as became them) ſhewed to his Majeſty in his juſt and glorious Reſtoration, is known to all Europe, to their eternal commendation and renown: No doubt as from conſcience of their oath of duty and allegiance, ſo of the oath of God whereunto they bound themſelves to maintain his Majeſty's perſon, authority and greatneſs, as well as Religion in that Covenant. 4. All the foreſaid deeds, which are the members of this article, viz. The calling the foreſaid convention of eſtates, as being the act of the foreſaid Council and Commiſſioners, the entring in the League and Covenant, raiſing of the army for aſſiſting the two houſes of Parliament of England, impoſing Exciſe, &c. as all being acts of the ſaid convention of Eſtates, together with the ſame convention of Eſtates, are all approved by the ſaid 5th Act of Parliament 1644. In reſpect whereof the Defender ought to be aſſoilzed from this whole article, and all the crimes contained therein. 5. Not only is the ſaid calling of the ſaid convention of Eſtates, and the ſaid convention entring in the League and Covenant, impoſing of Exciſe, raiſing of Forces for the Parliament of England, and remanent acts of the ſaid convention approved by the ſaid 5th Act of Parliament of 1644; but by his Majeſty's Treaty at Breda, and the Act of Oblivion, in the Parliament holden at St. Johnſton and Sterling, in anno 1650, and 1651, or either of them, all things done during theſe tumultuous times, intervening betwixt the ſaid Act of Oblivion 1641, and his Majeſty's homecoming 1650, whether prejudicial to his Majeſty's honour and authority, or to the Laws and Liberties of the Church and Kingdom, or to the particular intereſt of the ſubject, are buried in perpetual oblivion. And by the ſaid Treaty, and Act of Ratification of the ſaid Parliament, or one or other of them, the ſaid Parliament 1644, and all acts thereof are ratified; and ſo amongſt the reſt, this which is the 5th Act, which approves all the acts, whereupon this fourth article of the Dittay is founded, and therefore the Defender ought to be aſſoilzed therefrom.

5. As to the fifth article, anent the burning of the houſe of Menſtrie, in anno 1645. the Defender is ſo innocent thereof, that if it were libelled relevantly, he needed no other defence but a ſimple denial: but the truth is, that it hath been burnt by ſome of the ſoldiers, commanded by Major-General Bailey, for the time, upon the greateſt provocations that could be; two pariſhes, viz. Muckart and Doller, having been burnt the night before, and ſeveral, both men, women and children, cruelly killed by the concurſe of thoſe that were in that houſe. But it is no way relevantly libelled, in ſo far, as it is libelled, that the Defender or others under his command burnt it: 1. Becauſe there is no Act of Parliament, of all the Acts libelled upon in the propoſition, whereupon this can be ſubſumed; eſpecially the Acts, anent the raiſing of fire, upon which (if upon any) it ſeems it is particularly founded, there is no ſuch odd extenſion of that ſo high a crime, as to make any guilty of it, by committing of it by others, who are under their command. And this were a very univerſal, terrible concernment; and in the preſent caſe were moſt dangerous and unjuſt, that a Commander ſhould be holden to anſwer for all the illegal deeds done by his ſoldiers. 2. It is againſt common reaſon, the Common Law, by which this therefore is well eſtabliſhed, that delicta proprios tenent authores, & noxa caput ſequitur; and therefore is not relevant that the Defender burnt it by himſelf, or others by his ſpecial direction or particular order for that effect.

2. Though it were made relevant in manner foreſaid, yet the Dittay is inept as to this Article, and the Defender ought yet to be aſſoilzed therefrom, becauſe the year of God is only libelled, to wit, the year 1645; whereas not only the month, as in all criminal libels, per L. libellorum ff. de accuſationibus, and the Doctors treating thereupon, but the very day ought to be condeſcended on; for the omiſſion of the day prejudges the Defender of his defence; ſpecially his alibi, which he might and would propone, if the day were condeſcended on; that being required, the day ought to be condeſcended on, otherwiſe the libel is inept. Nam Libellus debet continere non tantum annum & menſem, ſed & diem ſi reus id requiſierit cum probaturus ſuum alibi. Damhaud. cap. 3. num. 4. 5. & Battander Reg. 6. num. 4. Maranta in ſpec. de bel. Obl. 3. num. 12. per bark. in L. Si quis reus Colum. 3. in fin. de publ. judic. & Jaſon. in L. Ubitraria 2. ſect. Si quis occiſi ff. de eo quod Crito loco. But ſo it is, as that if the day were condeſcended on of the ſaid burning, the Defender might, and, if need were, would offer to prove, that he was that day, during all the time of the burning, alibi, at a conſiderable diſtance from the ſame place.

3. Abſolvitur, becauſe Lieutenant-General Bailey, at that time when the houſe was burnt, had the command of the ſaid forces, (adhering always to the former defences againſt the aptitude and relevancy of this part of the Dittay, and expreſſing the ſame that may be diſcuſs'd ante omnia.) In reſpect whereof the Defender ought to be aſſoilzed ab hoc libello, at leaſt there can be no proceſs upon that part of the Dittay, as it is now libelled. 4. Albeit the Defender had burnt, or given direction only to burn the ſaid houſe, as he had not; yet by ſpecial act and commiſſion of Lieutenancy, granted to him by the Parliament 1644. he was impowered to purſue the Macdonalds, and their adherents and acceſſaries, with all kind of hoſtility, by fire and ſword, (with a diſpenſation,) with ſlaughter, mutilations, raiſings of fire, aſſailing of houſes, taking of priſoners, and other inconvenements whatſoever, that ſhould fall out in the execution of that Commiſſion in purſuing of them; as the ſaid Act and Commiſſion may at length bear, and which Commiſſion is ratified by his Majeſty in the Treaty at Breda, his ratification of that Seſſion of Parliament 1644, among the other Parliaments and Seſſions thereof ratified by his Majeſty; all after 1641, and preceding his return. But ſo it is, that the ſaid Macdonalds were at that time, at the burning of the ſaid houſe, joined with Montroſs; and it was in purſuance of both, that the ſaid houſe was burnt, as is notorious, (and if need be, the Defender will prove) and therefore though he had burnt, or gidirection for the burning thereof, he ought to be aſſoilzed.

5. By Act of Parliament 30th, Act 22. March 1647, it is ſtatute and ordained, that all his Majeſty's good Subjects ſhall be altogether freed, and liberate in all time coming, from being any ways called, convened, purſued, troubled or moleſted in judgment, civil or criminal, or out with the ſame, for any deed done or to be done by them againſt the perſons, lands or goods of ſuch as have, or ſhall be in the rebellion; (by which it is notorious, that the ſaid armed oppoſition, made by the deceaſed Marquis of Montroſs, and the ſaid Macdonald, and others under his command, to the Eſtates, is underſtood) during the time of their being in the ſaid rebellion, or have been, or ſhall be guilty with the rebels in their wicked courſes, or of any of them, who came under the firſt or ſecond Claſſes of delinquents contained in the 5th Act of the 5th Seſſion of that Parliament holden at St. Andrew's, in the month of January 1646. But ſo it is, the Defender offers to prove, if need be, that a ſon of the Earl of Sterling, named Charles or John Alexander, who had, or either of them had right to Menſtrie, had joined with Montroſs and thoſe under him; and ſo came under the ſecond Claſs of the ſaid 5th Act of the 5th Seſſion of Parliament 1646. Or at leaſt, went or ſent into their leaguer, or without compulſion entertained them in the ſaid houſe; and therefore the Defender ought not to be purſued, even though he had burnt, or given direction to burn the ſaid houſe, (as he in no ways did) and being purſued, ought to be aſſoilzed from this article; like as it is conjunctim alledged for the Defender in fortification of the ſaid act, That the ſame is ratified by his Majeſty's large Treaty at Breda, as being one of the Acts of that Seſſion of Parliament 1647, which amongſt the other Seſſions of Parliament, and Acts thereof, ſince the year 1641, and preceding his Majeſty's return in anno 1650, are ratified by the ſaid Treaty, as alſo by the Act of ratification, at St. Johnſton's or Sterling, in anno 1650, and 1651. By which ratification (or ratification of his Majeſty by the Treaty aforeſaid) the ſaid Act of Parliament 30. in anno 1647, comes, (as a moſt ſolemn remiſſion granted by his Majeſty, and whole Eſtates of Parliament, to the perſons therein contained;) and ſo like as if every one of them had got a particular remiſſion ſo ſolemn, it had been an uncontrovertable remiſſion for what were therein contained; ſo muſt it now be, being in effect of the ſame nature and virtue, albeit many be included in one.

6. By the Act of Oblivion at St. Johnſton's or Sterling, in the year 1650, or 1651, all acts of hoſtility, whether between the King and his Subjects, or between Subject and Subject, and what things fell out in theſe times, betwixt the year 1641, and his Majeſty's return, whether prejudicial to his Majeſty's honour and authority, or to the Laws of the the Kingdom, or the particular intereſt of his Subjects, are buried in oblivion. In reſpect whereof, though the Defender were acceſſary to the ſaid burning, as he is not, yet he ought to be aſſoilzed.

As to the ſixth article, anent the taking of the houſe of Towart, belonging to the Laird of Lamond, and the houſe of Oſcog, belonging to Oſcog; and after articles of capitulation drawn and ſubſcribed by Ardkinglas, and others under his command, truſt and aſſurance; murdering a great many of Lamond's and Oſcog's friends: As this is no way true, (the Defender being altogether innocent thereof) ſo it is no ways relevantly libelled. For, 1. Neither day nor month of theſe deeds are condeſcended on. 2. The alternity by others under his command, not relevant to infer a crime, far leſs Treaſon againſt the Defender, for the reaſon contained in the firſt anſwer to the former article, viz. That there is neither Act of Parliament libelled, nor Common Law, ordaining a man to be liable to a pain, far leſs the higheſt of pains, for deeds or crimes by thoſe under his command, except he gave them ſpecial direction. But every one is to ſuffer for his own fault, as at more length is contained in the ſaid anſwer, which is here repeated. 3. Non relevat thoſe for whom he is anſwerable, for the ſame reaſons, becauſe every one is anſwerable for his own fault and crime. 4. Non relevat, that others whom he might ſtop, did it; becauſe there is neither any Act of Parliament libelled on, ordaining any to be anſwerable for all the deeds of thoſe he might ſtop, (ſpecially the act againſt murder under truſt, bearing no ſuch thing.) Nor is there any Law nor reaſon for the ſame, but delicta proprios tenent authores, as hath been ſaid; and no ways granting the Defender could have ſtopped them: for the truth is, he could not, and was not near them, when what is libelled was done; and albeit indeed, it be contra officium charitatis, not to ſtop any doing of miſchief, if any one may ſafely do it, yet that it comes under the compaſs of Law to infer a crime, eſpecially Treaſon, cannot be affirmed. 5. Taking of the houſe of Towart and Oſcog, is not ſubſumed upon any of the Acts of Parliament libelled, there being none of them, anent the taking in of houſes belonging to the lieges, and ſo is not relevant to infer any of the crimes contained therein. 6. The alledged killing a great many of Lamond's and Oſcog's friends, after the aſſurance given by Ardkinglas, is no ways relevantly libelled, to infer the crime of ſlaughter under truſt becauſe by the Act of Parliament, Jac. VI. par. 11. cap. 51. of ſlaughter under truſt, upon the which it is founded, ſlaughter under truſt, is only when the party ſlain is under the truſt and aſſurance of the ſlayer, which is no way here libelled; but that the perſons who are libelled to have been ſlain by the Defender, were under the truſt of another, to wit, Ardkinglas; who if he, or any other under the Defender's command, have done any thing againſt their own aſſurance, they are to anſwer for it.

7. The Defender adhering to theſe defences, and craving that they being againſt the relevancy be firſt diſcuſs'd, repeats his former anſwer founded upon his Commiſſion of Lieutenancy therein mentioned; for they who are deſigned Lamond's and Oſcog's friends, were the Macdonalds, or their Adherents and Acceſſaries, (as is notorious, and the Defender, if need ſhall be, offers to prove it) whom whom by the foreſaid Commiſſion, he had power to proſecute with fire and ſword, with diſpenſation of ſlaughter, and raiſings of fire, in manner at length contained in the Commiſſion; which amongſt the other Acts of Parliament 1644, is ratified by his Majeſty in his Treaty at Breda, as is alledged in the ſaid anſwer, which is holden herein repeated: and therefore the Defender ought to be aſſoilzed from this article. And truly what cruelty was exerciſed, was by the Lord of Lamond himſelf, againſt the heritors and other inhabitants in the Sheriffdom of Argyle; for the which, upon a ſupplication given in to the King's Majeſty and Committee of Eſtates at Sterling, in Auguſt 1651. he was impriſoned within the Caſtle of Sterling; till after Trial, Juſtice ſhould have been done upon him: but was releaſed by the Engliſh when they took the Caſtle, with the other priſoners. However, the Defender is confident, as it is known, ſo he ſhall make it appear, if need be, in the other proceſs whereunto this relates, and wherein it will be more pertinent; and yet the day and time of the committing of the deeds mentioned in this article being condeſcended on, as it ought to be when required by the Defender, that he may propone his alibi, he offers to prove, if need be, that he was alibi the time of the committing of the ſaid deeds, at a very great diſtance, to wit, in England. Like as his Majeſty, by his Treaty at Breda, hath ratified and approved the Acts of Parliament; and his Majeſty, and Eſtates of Parliament, have ratified the ſaid Treaty, and paſt an Act of Oblivion, of all former deeds done by the Subjects, which ſecures and indemnifies them for any former actings, in reſpect whereof he ought to be aſſoilzed.

As to the ſeventh article made up of ſeveral members or parts; as, 1. Anent the men allegded murdered at Lockhead and Dunnaverty. 2. Anent the aggravation added thereto; anent an old man begging his ſon's life, and denied him. 3. Anent the ſending two hundred men from Ila to ſtarve in Jura. 4. Anent the taking of the perſon of Col. Kittoch, out of a ſhip in Leith road, wherein it is libelled, that he had been brought by order of Parliament.

It is alledged againſt the ſeventh article, that, 1. the firſt part thereof (anent the men alledged murdered at Lockhead and Dunnaverty) is no ways relevant, not only in reſpect that the particular month and days whereupon the ſame ſhould have been done, are not condeſcended upon, but alſo in reſpect there is not one particular perſon by name, and ſurname, whereby he might be known, condeſcended upon, againſt whom the deeds libelled ſhould have been committed; without the which, this part of the article cannot be ſuſtained as relevant: it being contrary to all Law and Practice, that murder in general, without naming the perſons murdered, ſhould be ſuſtained as a relevant Dittay againſt any. 2. The ſlaughter alledged, committed upon thoſe in the houſe of Lockhead, is not relevantly ſubſumed upon the Acts of Parliament libelled, in ſo far, as there is no aſſurance libelled to have been given to them, to bring it under the act of murder under truſt, and there is no other Act libelled under which it can fall. 3. It is alledged, that the Defender cannot be charged with any of the deeds libelled in the ſaid firſt part of the article (though they were true and relevantly libelled, as they are not) becuſe the expedition made againſt the Rebels in Kintyre, in the year libelled, was by David Leſley, and thoſe under his command, againſt ſuch, who contrary to his Majeſty's order ſent to them at that time, commanding them to lay down arms, and contrary to their own engagements, not to join with Aliſter. Macdonald did notwithſtanding continue in arms rebelliouſly, (as was then declared by the Eſtates of Parliament) reſiſted David Leſley in the execution of his ſaid commiſſion againſt them; who therefore after defeating of them in the field, who took them out of the ſaid houſes of Lockhead and Dunnaverty without any capitulation; and diſpoſed of them, as the Council of War then preſent with him thought fit, (which is notorious, and the Defender offers to prove, if need be;) for which, and other his ſervices, the ſaid David Leſley, got the Parliament's approbation in anno 1648, as the ſaid approbation and exoneration bears date: which will clearly prove any thing that is herein alledged. And therefore the Defender, nor any in his company at that time, cannot be charged with any deeds libelled in the firſt part of this article, but ought to be aſſoilzed therefrom. 4. The Defender repeats his third defence made to the fifth article founded upon his Commiſſion of Lieutenancy; the perſons mentioned in this article, againſt whom the deeds are libelled, to have been committed, having been the Macdonalds, or the Adherents and Acceſſaries, which is notorious, (and the Defender offers to prove, if need be) to proſecute whom he had the Commiſſion containing diſpenſation, and which was ratified in manner mentioned in the ſaid anſwer; like as he repeats the fourth and fifth anſwer made to the ſaid article, in reſpect whereof he ought to be aſſoilzed therefrom.

It is alledged againſt the ſecond, third and fourth members of this ſeventh article, that they are no ways ſubſumed, nor cannot be ſubſumed under any of the Acts of Parliament libelled, and therefore the Dittay herein is inept, and the Defender ought to be aſſoilzed therefrom, (and yet in point of fact they are but meer calumnies.) As to the ſecond part (anent the ſaid old man and his ſon) it is no ways relevant, not condeſcending on the perſons names, and therefore can receive no other anſwer; but that it is a mere fiction to make the Defender more odious, who ingenuouſly profeſſes, that he never heard of ſuch a thing till he ſaw it in the libel. The third part of this article hath no better ground than the ſecond; and the Defender deſires, that for clearing his innocency of the fact libelled therein (anent the ſending of two hundred men from Ila to ſtarve in Jura) that the Gentlemen in the ſaid Iſles may be examined upon the truth of the matter. It is alledged, that the fourth part of this article, anent Col. Kittoch, is of the ſame nature with the former two, and therefore the ſimple relation of the truth is ſufficient to refute the falſhood thereof; which is ſhortly this, viz. That Col. Kittoch was not brought to Leith, either by order of the Committee of Eſtates or Parliament; but being taken priſoner in Ila, by the forces under the command of David Leſley, and delivered to the Defender, the Defender put him aboard in Captain Brown's ſhip, who undertook to deliver him at Dunſtaffnage. But Captain Brown finding the opportunity of a fair wind to Leith, to which he intended, and not willing to loſe the ſame, did not go to Dunſtaffnage, but came ſtreight to Leith road; and immediately gave the Defender notice, that he had his priſoner aboard; whom therefore the Defender received from him, and ſent him to Dunſtaffnage. And the Defender deſires that Captain Brown, who lives at Weems, may be examined upon the truth of this matter; by whom he offers to prove this, if need were.

And whereas it is libelled that Col. Kittoch was hanged, it is true; but it is alſo true, that he was condemned to die in a Juſtice or Lieutenant-Court judicially, which is notorious, and the Defender offers to prove, if need ſhall be: ſo that this can be a ground of no Crime nor Dittay whatſoever; but however the Defender ought to be aſſoilzed therefrom.

8. To the firſt member of the eighth article, that notwithſtanding the manifold acts of dignity, favour and honour conferred upon him, by his then dread Sovereign; his Majeſty being reduced to great ſtraits by that army of Sectaries, and having caſt himſelf over in the hands of the army of his Scots Subjects for ſhelter and preſervation of his royal perſon: nevertheleſs, the ſaid Marquis being chief ring-leader of that factious party, who then ſwayed the eſtate of affairs both in Council and Army, did ſo contrive and complot, and by his influence ſo prevail, that after all fair offers made by his Majeſty, and his deſire to have come and lived in Scotland, till all differences in both Kingdoms had been ſettled, an Act of Parliament was made, for abandoning his Majeſty to the mercy of his inveterate enemies, the ſaid army of Sectaries.

It is anſwered, that as he muſt continually acknowledge the late King's and his preſent Majeſty's acts of favour, honour and truſt; ſo muſt he ſtill deny (as he ſafely may in the preſence of God, who is the ſearcher of all hearts, and of all men) that he never entertained any diſloyal thought, or contrived any treaſonable plot or machination againſt the ſacred perſon, dignity or authority of his late ſovereign, or of his preſent moſt ſacred Majeſty; and therefore with a clear conſcience may anſwer this Dittay,

1. That the ſame is not ſpecial nor clear, but very obſcure and general, how and in what manner he was chief ring-leader of any factious party.

2. Who that factious party were; nor,

3. By what deeds, and how he ſwayed the ſtate of affairs: nor,

4. Thoſe means, by which, and upon whom, he procured his influence to prevail.

5. The alledged offers, made by his Majeſty are not expreſs'd; and therefore the ſaid articles are altogether general and inept.

The Act of Parliament, which the Defender is alledged to have procured to have been made, is not produced, nor indicated by number or rubrick, nor does the Defender know any act of the tenor and title libelled.

And the Defender in humility conceives, that it is not conſiſtent with the act libelled on, in the oppoſition of the Dittay, diſcharging perſons to impugn the authority of the Eſtates of Parliament, to term the members thereof, eſpecially in making an act (which being carried by plurality of voices, as the deed of the whole; and ſpecially ſuch an act, as is mentioned in the libel, where there were none, or very few of a contrary judgment) a factious party.

13. The

13. The cauſe of the firſt member of the ſaid eighth article, anent the pretended act of Parliament, as is libelled, for abandoning and leaving his Majeſty to the diſpoſal and mercy of his enemies, the Sectarian army, does ariſe from the acts of Parliament, (as clearly appears) and can be ſubſumed on under none of the acts of Parliament libelled: For if the tenth act of Parliament, 1647, be underſtood and meaned, as the act libelled, that being an act of Parliament; the defender humbly alledges, That an Act of an acknowledged lawful Parliament ſhould be made a crime of acceſſion, whereunto a member of Parliament ſhall be indicted, eſpecially for ſo high a crime as treaſon, is without ground of law or practice, and is hoped the honourable Parliament will no ways ſuſtain it; and therefore, that he needs ſay no more now in confirmation hereof.

14. Likewiſe, all that is in that act and ſubſtance thereof, being the Eſtates of Parliament their declaring their concurrence for his Majeſty's going to Holmby-houſe, or ſome other of his houſes in and about London; and that expreſly to ſatisfy the deſire both of his Majeſty himſelf, and of his two houſes of Parliament in England; and there to remain, not under the power of Sectaries, but with ſuch attendance about him as both houſes ſhould think fit to appoint, with reſpect alſo had to the ſafety and preſervation of his royal perſon: And the Eſtates therein do alſo declare againſt all harm and prejudice, violence or injury to be done to the ſame, (as indeed it was horrid to think that any on earth ſhould have done) or prejudice to his Majeſty's poſterity: But thereafter it is clear from the fourth and ſeventh acts of the Parliament, 1648, that the Sectarian army diſobeyed, and threatned the houſes of Parliament, impriſoned and baniſhed faithful members, and by a ſudden ſurprize, violently ſeized upon the perſon of the King's Majeſty, carried him from his houſe at Holmby, againſt his own will, and declared reſolutions of both Kingdoms, and kept him under their guards; till at length, by their power and prevalency, he was committed, and kept cloſe priſoner at the Iſle of Wight: this being the true caſe out of the expreſs words of the acts before cited.

As to that declaration, Act 10. Parl. 1647, the defender alledges, 1. The act bears expreſs, that it was to ſatisfy his Majeſty's own deſire. 2. That it is homologate and approved by the Parliament, 1648, in ſo far, as by their fourth act, intitled, Anent their reſolutions concerning the breaches of covenant and treaties betwixt the Kingdom of Scotland and England, and demands for reparation thereof; finds the violent ſeizing on his ſacred Majeſty's perſon, and taking him away from Holmby-houſe, (as appears by Act 7.) by that army, againſt the reſolutions of both Kingdoms, a breach: And amongſt the Reparations, they deſire expreſly, that conform to the former deſires of this Kingdom, the King's Majeſty may come with honour, freedom and ſafety to ſome of his houſes in or near London, that the Parliaments of both Kingdoms may make applications to him. And in their ſeventh Act, intitled, A declaration of the Parliament of Scotland, to all his Majeſty's good ſubjects of this Kingdom, concerning their reſolutions for Religion, King and Kingdom, &c. after they declare, that violent ſeizing on his Majeſty's perſon, and carrying him away by that army, againſt the reſolutions of both Kingdoms, to be a breach: And they declare, they intend to ſend to the two houſes of the Parliament of England, the deſires following; which they call neceſſary and juſt deſires for Religion, his Majeſty's good, and peace of theſe Kingdoms: whereof this is one, That conform to the former deſires of this Kingdom, the King's Majeſty may come with honour, freedom and ſafety to ſome of his houſes in or near London; and declares, that thereafter they will endeavour it: And Act 8. in their deſires to both houſes of Parliament in England, the ſame deſire is repeated, conform to the former deſires of this Kingdom. By all which it is clear, that the ſeizing upon his ſacred Majeſty's perſon, was the violent deed of that wicked army, done with a violent ſurpriſal againſt the declared reſolutions of both Kingdoms. And that his Majeſty's coming to ſome of his houſes in or about London, where both Kingdoms might make application to him, conform to his Kingdom's deſire; which is, that wherein the Eſtates declare their concurrence with his Majeſty and both houſes of Parliament in England's deſire in the ſaid tenth Act, is approved as a juſt and neceſſary deſire for his Majeſty, and accordingly enacted among that Parliament, 1648, their deſires to the ſaid houſes; and declare it ſhould be endeavoured, if refuſed; ſo highly it is approved by the ſaid Parliament. In reſpect whereof, eſpecially of the ſtanding Acts of Parliament, 1648, the defender humbly craves, That albeit the article was relevantly, diſtinctly, and clearly libelled and ſubſumed on ſome of the Acts of Parliament in the propoſition condeſcended on (as he humbly conceives is not) yet he ought to be aſſoilzed therefrom.

And for further clearing what was the ground and occaſion of that Act, and the reaſons inducing the defender and the Parliament at that time to go along therein, and how little ground there is for challenging him thereon, it would be conſidered, That when the late King came to the army before Newcaſtle, the defender was in Ireland, by commiſſion from the Parliament, 1646; and that his Majeſty's declarations anent the grounds of his reſolution in coming to the Scots, was ſent both to the Committee of Eſtates in Scotland, and to the Parliament of England; ſo that the ſame being printed before the defender came to Newcaſtle, he neither did, nor could know, any other ground of his coming, nor what was contained in his declaration, viz. his gracious Reſolution to comply with his Parliaments in both Nations, and thoſe entruſted by them, in every thing, for ſettling of truth and peace; and that he would totally commit himſelf to their counſels and advices. Upon which terms, both the Committee of Scotland, and Officers of the army, declared to his Majeſty, and to the Parliament of England, that they received him, and all this before the defender came from Ireland to Newcaſtle; from whence his Majeſty ſent him with inſtructions to the Commiſſioners at London, (of which Commiſſioners the defender was one alſo) to haſten the Propoſitions, and privately commanded the defender to take the advice of the Duke of Richmond, and Marquis of Hertford, anent what might concern his Majeſty; and particularly, if it was fit that the Scots army ſhould declare for his Majeſty; whoſe judgment and opinion was (which they conjured him to tell his Majeſty) that ſuch a courſe was the only way at preſent to ruin his Majeſty: For that he himſelf knew, that neither the Nobility nor Gentry of England who attended him at Oxford, wiſhed him to prevail over his Parliament by the ſword, and much leſs would they endure the Scots army to do it; and that it would make all England as one man againſt him. And that it was their earneſt requeſt to his Majeſty, by any means to give way to the Propoſitions. Which advice he not only faithfully told to his Majeſty at Newcaſtle, and many others there, and to our gracious Sovereign who now is, when he was in Scotland; but alſo being in the Tower, he intreated the Lieutenant thereof to propoſe for him, that the Marquis of Hertford, who was then alive, might be examined in this matter; which was put off from time to time, becauſe of his Majeſty's great affairs. And as it is moſt certain, that neither Independent nor Sectary was able to carry one vote in the houſe at that time; ſo it is notorious, that they who tendered his Majeſty moſt in England, were for disbanding the Scots army, and his Majeſty's ſtaying in England: wherein the defender appeals to the particular knowledge of the Earl of Lauderdale, Loudon, Sir Charles Erskin, and the reſt of the Commiſſioners then there. And it is of truth, which all know, that ſo little fear, ſuſpicion and jealouſy, there was of what follow'd, that the great fear of his Majeſty's friends in both Kingdoms, was, that if he fixed on his ſubjects in Scotland, all England would be againſt him, and probably caſt off his Government and Intereſt for ever: So that under what repreſentation ſoever the matter may now appear, becauſe of the ſad ſequels, yet to them who know the matter, as it was there ſtated, what declarations and aſſurances there were from the Parliament of England, and how little fear of the prevalency of Sectaries; it did appear to be an act, if not of neceſſity, at leaſt an act very expedient and convenient for the time, otherwiſe many who did aſſent thereto, would never have condeſcended; and conſequently the defender's concurring therein, upon ſuch probable grounds, can be no ſuch crime as is libelled; nor is it relevant to anſwer the concluſion of the dittay.

To the ſecond member of this Article, bearing, that under pretext for ſatisfaction for the arrears of the army, he went to London; and there treaſonably gave up, at leaſt condeſcended to the upgiving of his dread Sovereign and Maſter, as being impowered ſo to do by the Kingdom of Scotland:

It is anſwered, 1. This member is not relevant, becauſe neither the time of his going to London, nor of his being there, or the perſons to whom he condeſcended to give up, are particularly mentioned and ſet down.

By which generality he is precluded from ſeveral defences which might ariſe to him if the dittay were clear; and it is a principle in common law, and of conſtant practice, That non eſt vagandum in crimine; ſed debet certum & ſpeciatim dici: for that dolus & error verſantur in generalibus.

2. No ways acknowledging the relevancy of the ſubſumption herein, upon any of the acts of the Propoſition, till the ſame be clearly condeſcended on; and craving the ſame may be firſt done, oppones the Act of Parliament: And the truth is, while the defender was at London, there was nothing ſpoken at all by him of leaving his Majeſty in England, except what he was expreſly commanded by his Majeſty to ſpeak to Richmond and Hertford, as aforeſaid.

To the third member of the eighth Article, bearing, That in a joint Committee of both Kingdoms, where the Engliſh queſtioned, whether the Scots army would concur with them in their ſaid treaſon and treachery; the defender, after many arguments uſed in their favour, earneſtly requeſted them to have patience for a little time, and that it would appear how far they intended to concur. And that within few days thereafter there was a declaration and vindication emitted in name of the ſaid army, holding forth, That in caſe his Majeſty did not condeſcend to all the deſires of both Kingdoms, which were no leſs than diveſting himſelf of all regal power, civil, eccleſiaſtial and military, they would deliver him up, which immediately upon the receipt of two hundred thouſand pounds the defender and they did:

It is anſwered, That adhering to the former defences anent the ſubſumption, and repeating it here, this member, although it were rightly ſubſumed, as it is not, is moſt irrelevant and general in time, place, perſon and ſpeeches; mention being made of many arguments, and never a one produced, and of a queſtion and anſwer, out of which, (even as libelled) treaſon cannot be inferred; viz. That the defender requeſted them to have patience a while, and it would appear how far the army intended to concur; but within few days after, the army declared themſelves in manner as aforeſaid: ſeeing theſe alledged words of the defender, as they are indefinite and general, ſo the moſt they could infer is, That in a ſhort time it would appear whether the army would concur or not. And what can from thence be inferred, as to any thing the army did? If they have outſhot their duty, as it was in regard of him, with the ſpeaking of theſe words, a future contingent, wherein the defender had no caſualty; ſo they muſt anſwer for themſelves, and not the defender.

And for aught he knows, there was never any ſuch declaration emitted; neither ſhould there be any captious uſe made of words, if there had been any ſuch words ſpoken, as there never was, eſpecially to infer his treaſon; for that lubricum linguæ, is oftner a frailty than a fault; and that by all Doctors of both Laws it is conſtantly held, that verba debent intelligi ne ſonent in delictum. And that in dubio they ſhould be interpreted à proferenti. And therefore no ways acknowledging the words and deeds libelled, except in ſo far as concerns the defender's vote to the declaration, and as the circumſtance libelled, That the delivery of his Majeſty was immediately after the payment of 200,000 l. it is clear that there was no reſpect to that money in what was done therein, by the Act of 7. Parl. 1648. wherein the Eſtates there declare, That money was never the cauſe nor motive of any of our undertakings and reſolutions, whatever our enemies had falſly ſuggeſted of that kind. And laſtly, adhering to his former defences, oppones to this whole Article, the treaty at Breda, and the Acts of Parliament of oblivion and ratification.

As to the ninth Article, and whole firſt member thereof, bearing, That the defender oppoſed the proceedings of Parliament, 1648, by arguing, voting, and after the reſolutions of Parliament were paſs'd in an Act, in proteſting againſt the ſame:

It is alledged for the defender, 1. It is not condeſcended, under which of the Acts of Parliament libelled on in the Propoſition, this Article is ſubſumed; and therefore the libel, as to that member of the Article, for arguing, voting and proteſting, is inept, and the defender hath juſt reaſon in ſuch an incertitude to deny it, that can be relevantly ſubſumed on any of the ſaid Acts of Parliament.

2. Arguing,

2. Arguing and voting is no ways relevant to infer the concluſion of the dittay; becauſe by divine law, law of Nations, ſtatutes and practices of this Kingdom, in deliberando, a Member of Parliament or other Council, ſhould give advice or ſuffrage, according to his perſuaſion of the good or ill of the ſubject debated on, and under conſideration; wherein if his reaſon cannot bring him up, nor his conſcience admit him the length of others in ſuch publick counſels, he ought to have charity for the one, and excuſe for the other.

Like as by the 5th Act, Parl. 2. K. Charles I. it is expreſly ſtatute, That every Member of Parliament ſhall faithfully and freely ſpeak, anſwer and expreſs themſelves upon all and every thing which is propounded, in ſo far as they think in their conſcience may conduce to the glory of God, the peace of the Church and State, and employ their beſt endeavours to promote the ſame. Under which oath, (read in the audience of the late King, and by him approved in the Parliament, 1641,) the defender, as a Peer of that Parliament, in anno 1648, was ſolemnly tied to the dictates of his reaſon, and preſcripts of his conſcience; and cannot be called in queſtion as a Member, having freedom therein: and conform thereto, is the oath of this preſent Parliament; bearing, that every Member ſhall faithfully and freely, according to their beſt judgment, give their advice and vote in Parliament.

To the ſecond part of the firſt member of the ſaid Article, anent the defender's proteſting and diſſenting from the ſaid Act, 1648; it is alledged for the defender, The proteſtation is not produced as it ought to be, whereby it will appear, that if any was, the ſame was before the Act of Parliament paſs'd; and that they did only proteſt and enter their diſſent againſt proceeding to the determination of the queſtion then in hand, which evinces the ſame to have been before the Act was made. Like as the defender offers himſelf to prove by the Members of Parliament then preſent, That being asked if they would renew the proteſtation after the Act, they ſhunned to do the ſame, the Act being now paſs'd.

2. Abſolvitur, (though the ſame were produced) becauſe it is offered to be proved, that the ſame was ratified in the fourth Act, Parl. 2. Seſſ. 2. Cha. 2. which was approved at the treaty at Breda, and confirmed at Perth and Sterling, as is ſaid. But for the honourable Parliament, their more full clearing, anent the defender's carriage in the ſaid particular, it is offered to be proved, if need be, That the defender, (before the Commiſſioner's return from the ſaid Iſle of Wight, in the ſaid year) when he heard that his Majeſty had ſatisfied his people's deſires concerning religion, in preſence of divers perſons of honour, he expreſs'd himſelf paſſionately earneſt to engage for his Majeſty's freedom. Like as the only difference of the opinion anent the engagement was in the manner the grounds of thoſe that were diſſatisfied; being as they are expreſs'd in the ſaid proteſtation, viz. That the Parliament ſhould not proceed till the commiſſion of the Church were conſulted, and adding alſo, (which is not therein expreſs'd) till advertiſement and three months warning were given, conform to the large treaty; until all means of peace had been firſt eſſayed, and while firſt the lawfulneſs and neceſſity of that war ſhould be found by the Parliament, conform to the 7th Act thereof. And it is humbly conceived, that many in this preſent Parliament do remember, how unanimous all were, that his Majeſty ſhould be brought out of the hands of the Sectaries, to ſome of his houſes in or about London: And all they differed in was, that the Church ſhould be conſulted anent the ſecuring of Religion, all means of peace ſhould firſt have been eſſayed, and warning given in manner aforeſaid, conform to the large Treaty; the breach whereof was made one of the grounds of that declaration, Act. 7. And it cannot be refuted, but that at ſeveral meetings, the diſſenters debated the dangerouſneſs of that war, (eſpecially if the army ſhould be defeated) from the ſad conſequences that might thereupon enſue to King, Kingdom and Religion; as immediately thereafter fell out. Whereas had the Nation been intire and whole in their power and force, that army of Sectaries, in probability, would not have dared to have attempted thoſe matters which afterwards they did. So that the caſe being truly ſtated, there will appear no malice againſt his Majeſty's perſon, authority, and reſtitution thereof; but an unclearneſs to enter into a war of ſuch danger and hazard, and the reſpect they had to the ſecurity of Religion, (as all then profeſſed) according to the covenant.

To the ſecond member of the ninth Article, whereby it is alledged, That in contempt of the authority of that Parliament, and againſt the preſervation of his Majeſty's perſon and authority, that the defender convocated an army of rebellious Subjects, and therewith committed divers and ſundry outrages, ſlaughters and vaſtations, upon the perſons and eſtates of his Majeſty's Subjects; invaded cities and caſtles, ſeized upon magazines, arms and ammunition, and called in an army of Sectaries to his aſſiſtance:

It is anſwered, firſt, That the ſame is not relevantly ſubſumed upon any act of the propoſition; at leaſt till the Advocate condeſcend upon which act thereof the ſame is founded, the defender is not bound to make anſwer.

Secondly, the defender denies that he did convocate theſe forces, or gave counſel or command therefore: And as to his being with them, he muſt be aſſoilzed.

1. Becauſe by a treaty at Sterling, betwixt the chief Officers in the army then alive, and out of priſon; and a Quorum of Members of the Committee by authority of Parliament, 1648; who had power to order the incident affairs of the Nation, the ſaid meeting, and all acts of hoſtility, and others thereby committed, are expreſly diſcharged, hinc inde, and a mutual oblivion and indempnity therefore.

2. Any meeting he had with them, was by a call of thoſe of the Committee of Eſtates, who joined with thoſe forces, and who in the Treaty is acknowledged the Committee of Eſtates.

3. The ſaid meeting and acting thereof, together with the Treaty and Articles thereof, is ratified and approved by the third Act, 2 Parl. 2 Seſſ. Cha. 2.

The third member of the ninth Article, bearing, That apprehending his power was not able to withſtand his Majeſty's good ſubjects, the defender called in to his aſſiſtance the army of Sectaries; and that he went into Mordington, and met with the commander of that army, had private conſultations with him, and prevailed with him to come to Edinburgh burgh with his army, whoſe coming he might have hindred; becauſe Oliver ſaid, That he could not help his lying upon the tenants of Mordington, for that his ſtaying and going depended upon the defender; and that he did countenance and conſult with the Sectaries and their commanders, in Edinburgh, or the Cannongate, in the houſe called the Lady Hume's Lodging:

It is anſwered, That as to ſpeeches and conſultations in general, not relevant except they were condeſcended on; and as to the words ſpoken by Cromwel, if ſpoken by him, it was a lye, and can infer nothing againſt the defender: and the occaſion of his ſtay was till he got Berwick and Carliſle, which could not be reſtored till the Treaty at Sterling was cloſed. And as to his meeting and treating with him, abſolvitur, becauſe he and others did the ſame by warrant of the Committee, and which Treaty was ratified in the aforeſaid Act of Parliament thereafter.

To the fourth member, That he concealed and voted to the drawing up of a letter, directed to Cromwel, wherein he and his complices engaged themſelves, in the name of the Kingdom of Scotland, to do their utmoſt endeavours, that none who had been acceſſary to the engagement, or in arms at Sterling, in purſuance thereof, ſhould be employed in any Place of Truſt, without the advice and conſent of the Parliament:

It is anſwered, 1. No ſuch letter produced.

2. Though it were produced, yet conſenting and voting not relevant; becauſe a vote in the Committee of Eſtates can infer no crime againſt the defender, nor any member thereof, nor any Act paſs'd in the ſaid Committee: eſpecially ſeeing,

3. The Acts of the ſaid Committee were ratified in the fourth Act of the Parliament aforeſaid; all ratified thereafter by the Treaty at Breda, and Acts of ratification at Perth and Sterling: and the neceſſity thereof would be alſo conſidered in reſpect of the large Treaty, both Kingdoms having given their publick faith, that the breakers ſhould be rendered up to the obſervers; and that the Engliſh army then upon the borders, required the performance thereof againſt the engagers, and for further ſecurity, pledges and places of ſtrength. It was at that time counted a great favour (conſidering their power to have made their own terms) when they might have impoſed and forced what they pleaſed more, yet they did accept this Act.

To the fifth member of this Article, bearing, That he did draw up, at leaſt did counſel the drawing of certain inſtructions, given to Sir John Chieſly, purporting, That the Noblemen, Gentlemen of quality, and conſiderable Officers, who went into England under Duke Hamilton, and were there priſoners, ſhould be kept as pledges for the peace of the Kingdom:

It is anſwered, 1. Not produced as it ought to be, that it may thereby appear whether he ſubſcribed the ſame or not.

2. Not relevant, (one of the Committee) except it were libelled preſent, and voted at that time; for, noxa caput ſequitur.

3. Not relevant, voted quia in ſenatu nemo tenetur de conſilio.

4. Oppones the authority of the Committee, Treaty, Acts of Parliament, and Ratifications aforeſaid.

To the laſt member of this Article, bearing, That he gave warrant under his hand, for iſſuing of a proclamation againſt the families of the Laird of Rea and Vyres:

It is alledged for the defender, 1. No ſuch warrant produced; if any ſuch warrant were produced under the defender's hand, it will certainly appear to be as Preſident of ſome Committee, and ſo not his perſonal deed; nor ſuch a deed as can infer any crime againſt him.

2. No ſuch proclamation enſued.

3. Although enſued, yet that took no effect, and ſo was minæ tantum, & animus ad effectum non perductus.

4. Oppones the Act of the Committee, and Act of Parliament, 1649, aforeſaid; which Parliament, and the whole Act thereof, is ratified in the Treaty at Breda, and approved in the Parliament at St. Johnſton's and Sterling; wherein was alſo made an Act of oblivion, oftentimes before alledged on: in reſpect whereof the defender ought to be abſoilzed from the ſaid ninth Article, and whole member thereof, and all therein contained. And becauſe the defender has in his defences ſo oft alledged the Act of Parliament, 1649, for his vindication, he deſires that it may be obſerved, (which is very obſervable) that by the printed Treaty at Edinburgh and Sterling, September, 1648, it is agreed and appointed by thoſe of the Committee at Sterling, 1648, that a Parliament ſhould ſit down before the 10th of January next; conform thereunto, they did convene and ſit down the fourth of the month of January, as by the ſaid Treaty, and the firſt and third Acts of the Parliament doth appear: whereby it is clear, that the ſaid Parliament, 1649, was appointed to ſit by the Committee of the Parliament, 1648; who had power by the laſt Act of the ſaid Parl. to convene the Parliament before the firſt Thurſday in March, 1650, if they thought fit: as alſo that Seſſion of the Parliament, 1649, by the laſt Act thereof continues the ſame to the firſt Thurſday in March, 1650. At which day they convened in the next Seſſions, and therein ratified the Act of Parliament made in the former Seſſion; and which day was the Dyet to which the Parliament, 1648, continued the ſame, with power to the Committee of Eſtates, to convene the ſame ſooner, if they thought fit, as is ſaid. Whence it is evident, that the ſaid Parliament, 1649, whether as appointed by the uncontroverted Committee, 1648, at Sterling, in the firſt Seſſion, or as is continued to the firſt Tueſday of March, 1650, in the ſecond Seſſion, (both conform to the laſt Act of the Parliament, 1648) muſt ſubſiſt and ſway the ſaid defender his juſt reaſon, to found his defences upon the acts thereof. It is alſo further conſiderable, as to the loyalty of that Parliament, that therein the murder of his late Majeſty was declared againſt, his preſent Majeſty proclaimed and brought home, his ſubjects of this Nation reconciled to him, and taken into favour, an army appointed to oppoſe his enemies, the crown ſet upon his head; and that Seſſion of Perth, wherein the whole preceding proceedings were approved, was dignified by the preſence of his royal perſon.

And to the tenth Article, and that part thereof where it is libelled, That the defender, in anno 1649, not daring to oppoſe in publick, or in a direct way, his Majeſty's home-coming, he procured the application made, to be clogged with ſuch limitations and reſtrictions, as were moſt derogatory to monarchical Government; as is alledged to be more fully expreſs'd in the Commiſſion, inſtructions and addreſſes, which are repeated as a part of the Libel.

It is alledged for the defender, 1. Seeing the ſaid commiſſion, inſtructions and addreſſes are libelled on, and repeated as a part of the dittay; in all law and form of proceſs, they ought to be produced with the libel, for the reaſon adduced in the defence, againſt the relevancy of the propoſition of the dittay; and till which be produced, it cannot be conſiſtent with the ſaid limitations and reſtrictions, and how far they are derogatory to monarchical Government; and therefore till then there can be no proceſs.

2. It is not condeſcended nor cleared, on which of the acts libelled on in the propoſition, this Article and Members thereof are ſubſumed; and therefore it is obſcure and inept: and in that incertitude, the defender has juſt reaſon to deny, that it can be ſubſumed on any of the ſaid Acts, to infer the crime and pain libelled againſt the defender, none of the ſaid Statutes making any mention of treating or inferring any pain therefore. Likewiſe after ruptures and differences betwixt a King and his ſubjects, all Lawyers and Politicians do agree, that the beſt and ſafeſt way of removing the ſame, is by Treaty; and that being concluded on, it is alſo their opinions, that the ſame are to be obſerved, at leaſt ſo far as to exempt the ſubjects from puniſhment, to whom indempnity has been thereby promiſed. And in this, Grotius de jure belli & pacis, lib. 3. cap. 19. is moſt clear; and many others who write on that ſubject. And therefore the ſaid Treaty being concluded, and after ratified by his Majeſty and his Parliament, the defender cannot be called in queſtion for his acceſſion thereto, nor the pain of treaſon thereupon inferred: For the ſaid treaty and conditions thereof, being accepted and agreed to by his Majeſty's voluntary contract, cannot be like as a crime, far leſs ſo high a crime as treaſon, againſt the defender.

3. Abſolvitur from that member of the ſaid Article; becauſe not only after the ſaid Treaty did his Majeſty tacitly remit any crime, if any was, in the ſaid Treaty, by admitting the defender to places of truſt, by receiving the crown from his hand at the coronation, and by admitting him to take the oath of allegiance, and to be a member of his Majeſty's privy Council; but alſo after the ſaid Treaty was ratified, there was an Act of pardon and oblivion by his Majeſty and Eſtates of Parliament, oftimes before alledged, and is here repeated.

Though the above-written defences be relevant in law, as to the ſaid member; yet for the defender's further vindication, the honourable Parliament would take notice, that all along the preceding Articles, all the publick actings from the year of God, 1640, to the year 1648, (wherein the Generality and Repreſentatives, both civil and eccleſiaſtick in the Kingdom, concurred) are charged upon the defender as his particular actings, or as if the defender had been the ſpecial author; whereas in this article anent the treating with, and bringing home of his Majeſty, therein it is known the defender, according to his bounden duty, was moſt active and zealous; and therein he wreſtled with all his might, and by his pains and God's bleſſing thereon, overcame many difficulties, and did effectuate the ſame. The libeller does ſo far detract from the defender's faithful diſcharge of his duty in this ſo glorious action, and without libelling the leaſt preſumption of any circumſtance to make the ſame probable; the defender is accuſed, as if he had in his judgment been againſt his Majeſty's home-coming; which becauſe he durſt not avow publickly, therefore he betook himſelf to underhand dealing, to clog the Treaty with limitations and reſtrictions, excluding the defender from all acceſſion to the ſaid duty, in ſo far as it was good, viz. to bring home the King; and making him to be the ſole author of all libelled to be evil therein, to wit, of the limitations and reſtrictions. Whereas the truth is, he was active in the King's home-bringing, and was paſſive in the other; having labour'd what he could, that there ſhould be as few conditions, and the ſame as ſatisfactory to his Majeſty as was poſſible at that time to obtain; which is known to all that did tranſact the ſaid affair, and which, if need be, is offered to be proved. And for further clearing hereof, if this Article ſhall be further inſiſted on, my Lord Advocate will be pleaſed to condeſcend to declare who the Parties were that made the motion for addreſſes to his Majeſty, of whom the defender ſhould have been afraid, if he had been of a contrary judgment, to have oppoſed openly. For if the defender had ſo great ſway in affairs, as all along the preceding Articles he is allowed to have had; and alſo if he had intended, (as is broadly and with foul mouth alledged) in the ſaid Libel all along alledged, to have extirpated and evacuated the King's Majeſty's authority, government and poſterity; and had ſuch correſpondence with thoſe abominable Regicides, as all are perſuaded by the ſaid libel to believe, in the ſaid year of God, 1649; when the ſaid traytors were ſtrong, and both this land through diviſions and otherwiſe, very low; and when the power was in the defender's and his complices hands, (as my Lord Advocate is pleaſed to libel and term them) who at that time had the managing of affairs: then was the fitteſt time and beſt opportunity, if they had any ſuch diſloyal thoughts, to have ſhaken off that Government. But ſo far did they abhor any ſuch treachery, that they not only proclaimed his Majeſty, and according to their duty owned his intereſt, even with the hazard of their lives and fortunes, there being none ſo ſhallow, but eaſily might have ſeen, that the diſcharge of the ſaid duty would bring upon themſelves and the Nation the power of England, (the only power of arms and armies being at that time in the abominable Regicides their hands) who did immediately thereafter invade this Kingdom.

As to the other member of the tenth Article, whereby it is libelled, That the defender, (to obſtruct his Majeſty's purpoſe, yea, in ſo far as in him lay, and to terrify him therefrom; by his and his complices cruelty executed upon the Marquis of Montroſs, who as his Majeſty's Commiſſioner did repreſent his Majeſty's perſon) cauſed to murder the ſaid Marquis, in anno 1650, in manner, &c.

1. It is no way relevantly libelled, that the defender in general cauſed to murder him, except it were condeſcended, quo modo he cauſed; and if thereby be meant his voicing in Parliament, 1649, in the ſaid matter; non relevat, becauſe a Vote, Act, or Sentence of Parliament, is no way relevant to infer a crime againſt any particular member therein, as hath been oft before alledged.

Likewiſe, 2. The ſentence of the forfeiture of the life and eſtate of the ſaid Marquis, was no decree of the Parliament 1649, but of the Parliament 1645, which was homologate by ſeveral other Acts of Parliament, excepting the ſaid Marquis among other excepted perſons, as ſpecially by and by the 22d Act of the Parliament 1648.

And yet, 3. the Defender did not vote in the buſineſs of Montroſs, as he can prove, if need be, by the members there preſent 1649. And as to the aggravations of the ſaid murder, the ſaid Marquis being his Majeſty's Commiſſioner for the time; it is no way a relevant circumſtance to aggravate the ſame, except it had been libelled, that the ſaid commiſſion had been ſhown to the Parliament, which no body can affirm; but on the contrary, the ſaid Parliament conceived they had juſt reaſon to preſume that there could be no ſuch commiſſion for his coming againſt them at that time; becauſe his Majeſty, after the murder of his royal father, very graciouſly had admitted their gracious applications to him.

Like as before Montroſs's coming at that time to Scotland, and always thereafter, his Majeſty had a Committee of the ſaid Parliament; under the name and title of the Committee of Eſtates of his Majeſty's Kingdom of Scotland.

As to the Defender, his alledged keeping correſpondency with Cromwel in the year 1650. as the ſame is irrelevantly libelled, no deeds nor acts of correſpondency being condeſcended on; ſo there was never any ſuch thing. And there was one named Hamilton, who vented this untruth, hanged at Sterling, and at his death did declare, That the ſame was a moſt unjuſt calumny; and it is not to be believed that at that time he would have charged his ſoul with a lye; and in Law, the words of a dying man are oraculouſly believed.

As to the Act of the Weſt-Kirk, the Defender (no ways acknowledging the relevancy of the ſaid article, as it is libelled) was ſo free from having the leaſt acceſſion to the ſaid Act or Declaration; that ſo ſoon as he got knowledge thereof, to evidence his fidelity to his Majeſty, it is offered to be proved by witneſſes (for their loyalty above all exception) that when the firſt news came, that the Commiſſioners were about the drawing of the ſaid Act, the Defender gave advice to his Majeſty, to draw a fair Declaration, and to go ſuch a length, as in freedom he could, that thereby he might prevent the ſaid Act, and obviate the preſſing thereof. But as for the other that was preſſed, he was altogether againſt the ſame, and dealt with the Miniſter who came from the Commiſſioners of the Kirk, to forbear preſſing his Majeſty therewith; which alſo, if need were, might be proved.

As to the eleventh article and ſubſequent articles, becauſe the ſame are for deeds of compliance after the Uſurpers had prevailed and were in poſſeſſion; before the Defender make particular anſwer, it is neceſſary to premiſe in general, that it being notoriouſly known to the world, (to the eternal honour of this Kingom) as for that damnable uſurpation of Oliver, not only we were not active in eſtabliſhing the ſame, but according to our bound allegiance to our Sovereign, were to the utmoſt poſſibility of our power in arms under his Majeſty; and other ways active againſt him, and in oppoſition thereto, many loſt their eſtates, many their lives, and all of us our liberties: and when we could do no more, being oppreſſed by the force of the ſaid Uſurper, (as a chaſte forced Virgin) we cried to God and Man, atteſting Heaven and Earth againſt Uſurpers, (even when their bloody ſwords were at our throats) he and his army, amongſt many other execrable miſchiefs, were alſo guilty of this uſurpation. We have ſuffered, and been only paſſive under that irreſiſtable force. And as this was the condition of the Kingdom, ſo ſpecially the Defender, who as he had been moſt active and inſtrumental in his Majeſty's home-bringing (which was the only ground of the quarrel, and for which he was looked upon by them, as one of their captial enemies) even ſo after it pleaſed God for our exerciſe and puniſhment, to ſuffer their power to prevail over all his Majeſty's forces, and over this Kingdom, ſuch averſion had the Defender, even ſo much as to live under their power; much leſs to comply actively with them: that after Worceſter fight, the Defender offered to Mr. David Dick, if he could get his company, or the company of any other honeſt Miniſter, that he would never capitulate with any Engliſhman, ſo long as he could ſubſiſt in any part of Scotland, either in his lands or iſles thereupon. It is humbly craved that Mr. David Dick may be examined. Neither did the Defender ever capitulate with them, in Auguſt 1652; having before that, endeavoured all that in him lay, to have perſuaded thoſe of Athol, Monteith, and others, his neighbours in the Highlands, to have concurred with him, that they might have jointly made ſome probable force, for reſiſting the over-ſpreading power of the Uſurper; but all in vain. Likewiſe, long before that time, the whole forces and ſtrength of the Kingdom were ſurrendred, yea, the whole Kingdom, by their Deputies and Repreſentatives, (who met at Dalkeith, with the Commiſſioners of the Parliament of England, ſo called) was forced to ſubmit to their power, and accept the tender of the Union of this Nation with England, proffered by them. Neither did he at the ſaid time in Auguſt 1652, voluntarily come in, and capitulate with the ſaid Engliſh; but was ſurprized, (ſeveral Regiments of their forces, horſe and foot, having ſuddenly come about his houſe where he was for the time, lying deadly ſick) as can be teſtified by Dr. Cunningham, who was with him for the time, and is humbly craved to be examined thereon. As alſo, notwithſtanding the ſaid ſurprizal, and the Defender's condition, though they threatned, (notwithſtanding his ſickneſs) to carry him away priſoner, yet all their threatning could not prevail with him, but he did abſolutely refuſe to ſubſcribe the articles firſt offered, which contained the tender of the union, and an obligement upon his part, to promote the ſame, and the Government as then eſtabliſhed, and to live peaceably; yea, ſuch jealouſy had they of the Defender, that by his capitulation, he was priſoner upon demand. Neither during all the time of their power over this Kingdom, had he ever any favour of the ſaid Engliſh, but was always look'd upon by them with a moſt jealous eye. And for evidencing hereof, the Defender humbly craves, that there be a commiſſion granted for examining of Lieutenant-Colonel Utter, (anent what was deponed by Macnachtan, and ſeveral others) viz. of the Defender's ſmall affection to the Engliſh, or any other authority but the King's. Likewiſe, it is notorious how unjuſtly he was perſecuted before the Exchequer here for the time, for payment of 4000 l. Sterling, alledged to be due for by-gone few duties. This being the Defender's true caſe, it is hoped, that that the honourable Court of Parliament, will take conſideration how the Defender ſtood out as long as he could, till he was priſoner; and will have a different conſideration of Subjects acting under the lawful Magiſtrate in exerciſe of his authority by himſelf, or others lawfully conſtituted by him; and of the actions under cruel uſurpation and tyranny, the lawful Magiſtrate being forced, for his own ſafety, to abandon his Dominions and People to the luſt and oppreſſion of the unjuſt Uſurper, (who was maſter not only of their fortunes and perſons, but their lives, and all that was dear to them;) and had for a long time detained the poſſeſſion of his unjuſt uſurpation, and devoured the lawful Magiſtrate. Which caſe is not only differenced by all who write on that ſubject, but alſo Coke in the third part of the Inſtitutes of the Laws of England, cap. 10. anent Treaſon, in expounding the Statute of the 25 Edw. III. upon the words of the Statute le Roy, puts ſuch a weight upon the King's being in poſſeſſion, or one of the ſame, that he expreſly affirms, the Statute is to be underſtood of a King regnant, and in poſſeſſion of the Crown and Kingdom; as alſo, that in ſuch caſes, a favourable conſideration is to be had of the actions of a ſubject, who was particularly noticed, and jealouſly looked upon by the Uſurper, for his affection to the lawful Magiſtrate and his Government. All which being remitted to the Commiſſioner his Grace, and the honourable Parliament their conſideration, he now comes to anſwer to the eleventh article: againſt which eleventh article, and all the members thereof, as libelled, it is alledged, the ſaid article is general, not condeſcending on the day or month, nor on the particular year of God, of the committing of the deeds therein libelled, but only alternative in anno 1653, or 1654, and therefore (as has been oft before alledged.) the ſame is inept, and there can be no proceſs thereon. 2. It is not condeſcended on, nor cleared, which of the Acts of Parliament libelled on in the propoſition, this article, and ſeveral members thereof, are ſubſumed; and therefore it is obſcure and general, and in that incertitude the Defender has reaſon to deny, that it can be ſubſumed on any of the ſaid Acts, to infer the ſaid crime and pain.

As to that which is firſt libelled in this article, That the Defender did not riſe in arms with the Commiſſioner his Grace, and the Earl of Glencairn, who were commiſſioned by his Majeſty; the Defender repeats the two exceptions aforeſaid, againſt the whole article, being confident this cannot be ſubſumed on none of the Acts libelled on. And further alledges, that it is not relevantly libelled, to infer (vel minimam culpam) againſt the Defender, far leſs ſo high a crime, except it were libelled, that your Lordſhip's commiſſion had been ſhewed him, and he required, which was never done. And herein he may refer himſelf to the Commiſſioner his Grace's Declaration; and if his Grace does not remember, that the Defender ſent him word, ſhewing his deſire to have met with his Grace, and to have ſpoke with him about the buſineſs; but had never the honour to have his Grace's anſwer or appointment.

2. For further clearing, that his not joining, except he had been required, is no crime, it is evident from the fourth Act of the firſt Parliament, Jac. I. that thoſe only are puniſhable, who do not aſſiſt the King's hoſt, being required thereto. And Craig. page 365. ſays, that becauſe the King has ſo many Vaſſals, they are not obliged, nor cannot be puniſhed; except the particular pain to be inflicted upon the away-ſtayer, be particularly expreſs'd in the edict, by which they are commanded to appear. And page 365, he ſays, that thoſe who come not, being warned by an edict, ſhall be puniſhed; and page 370, he ſays, that the Vaſſals ſhould not be obliged to appear at any ſuch ſervices, except they be deſired; which commands ſhall be proved by his Peers. Theſe edicts were particularly required by the fundamental Law, and were called heri bona, which is defined by Cujas, to be the calling and citation of the army, and is lib. 3. cap. 10. quart. leg. franc. to be the puniſhment of him who comes not to the King's hoſt, when he is called: and this aſſertion is clearly proved from Rague, in his Treatiſe de Jur. Reg. pag. 53. Likewiſe by the ſaid Act of the firſt Parliament of King James I. it is expreſly ordained, that thoſe who diſobey to defend the King againſt notorious Rebels ſhall be challenged:

1. If they be required by the King, as is ſaid;

2. And except they have for themſelves reaſonable excuſes. But ſure it is, the Defender not only was never required, as has been alledged, but there were even pregnant reaſons, as he humbly conceives, the which ſeemed very probable at that time. Albeit it be the duty of all his Majeſty's Subjects, to riſe for his Majeſty's Intereſt, in oppoſition to Uſurpers; yet it was not ſeaſonable, as affairs then ſtood, till either they had been defeated by ſea in the engagement, that they then had with Holland, (whereby both the forces might have been diverted, and the tranſportation of Victuals and Ammunition from England, Ireland, and the parts of Scotland under their command, and their army in Scotland, might have been intercluded;) or that Spain and France had concluded that peace, whereof there was then ſeveral reports: and thereupon his Majeſty's ſubjects in Scotland, might have had hopes of ſome probable aſſiſtance in the undertakings in his Majeſty's ſervice; or that diviſion, and in conſequence, confuſion, had fallen out in the Engliſh army amongſt themſelves; whereof there ſeemed to be but little hope, ſo long as the appearance for his Majeſty ſhould meet them as againſt a common enemy, as it was. Like as it would be thought it ſhould have no other effect; and as in effect the event proved, that that army never divided till they had no common enemy, againſt whom, mutual preſervation doth neceſſitate a mutual concourſe, but all at amity one with another. And albeit a particular command had not been abſolutely neceſſary, (if his Majeſty had been there in perſon) yet in a juncture of time, wherein ſuch a war was improbable for many ſtate reaſons (which induces the Defender to believe, that there was no commiſſion granted at that time) which preſumptions excuſant à dolo; and without dole (as has been ſaid formerly) there can be no crime. And though he had been required, yet could not have been puniſhed for his not obeying, ſeeing in effect he was the enemies priſoner upon demand.

But this is conceived only to be libelled as an aggravation of what followed, which is, That he joined in open hoſtility with the Uſurper's forces, eſpecially with the Colonels Overton and Twiſleton, at the leaſt Cobbet and Twiſleton, at the leaſt Twiſleton, when he was in the Highlands, and in oppoſition to the ſaid Earls.

It is anſwered, 1. This member is general, not condeſcending upon the particular deeds of hoſtility, and therefore inept; for criminal libelling ought to be moſt clear, as is affirmed by Dambaud, cap. 30. prax. Coron. num. 4. and ſhould contain all the qualities of the crime alledged committed. And as to the alternative, that he joined with one or other of them, it is moſt lax and obſcure, and therefore in that alſo this Dittay is inept. And for the alternative added (at the leaſt he gave counſel) non relevat (becauſe general) except the counſel were condeſcended on, and that it were ſuch as might fall under the Acts libelled on; and the moſt that can be alledged, if the time were condeſcended on of his alledged joining, is, that he was in company (it may be) with Twiſleton; and if it was, he was only going along with him to General Monk (being ſent for by him, and that when the Earl of Glencairn was under treaty with him; if not after the treaty was concluded, which he conceives will not be denied) and the Defender being their priſoner upon demand, by his capitulation with Major-General Dean.

It is alledged firſt, that a priſoner ſhould go in company (being commanded) with, and to thoſe whoſe priſoner he is, is nothing like a crime.

2. Though that had not been, yet he alledges in anſwer to that member of the alternative, anent his furniſhing of ſeveral pieces of great Cannon to Alured, Governor of Air, viz. That the Defender and all that was his, or in his poſſeſſion, being under the abſolute power of the Uſurper; they might command him to go, or call him where they would, with whom to go along, or to bring whatever he had to them, had it been on his back, had he been able to carry it: and that cannot be imputed to him for any crime (otherwiſe who ſhould be innocent) when ſubdued; muſt they not give to their enemy of their goods, whatever he will have? And who in Scotland ſhould be innocent? Behoved not all to bring them; that is, in effect, did they not take what they pleaſed? But as for voluntary going, or joining in action with Twiſleton, or any of the others named in their ſervice, the Defender abſolutely denies the ſame.

Item, For his taking and relieving priſoners, non relevat, except the priſoner were ſpecially condeſcended on: ſpecially relieving of priſoners, is not relevant to infer any crime, but on the contrary is a good office to the perſons and parties; except it is libelled that he, as an Officer under the Engliſh ſervice, took and relieved priſoners, which can never be made appear, whatever the ſame might import. But the truth is, the Defender meddled with no ſuch things; and the Defender ſhall truly relate the point of fact which he conceives hereby to be meant, which is as follows: The Defender hearing that his Iſle and County of Raiſnaith was pillaged, and going up the river Clydde, the boat wherein he was, being followed by another boat; and the Defender having asked what they were, they alledged they did belong to the Earl of Glencairn, but could ſhew no warrant; and thereupon the Defender having ſome ſuſpicion that they were rather robbers, than ſoldiers belonging to the Earl; and fearing that General Monk, whom the Defender was then going to, and whom he had never ſeen till that time, might get notice thereof, and make uſe of the ſame as a ſnare; the Defender adviſed them to ſecure their money and arms in the hands of one of his ſervants, upon aſſurance that the ſame ſhould be delivered to them, after he ſhould be certified what they were; and thereafter recommended them (fearing to incur the danger of a private priſon) to the Garriſon of Dumbarton, not under the notion of ſoldiers, under the Earl of Glencairn, but as common Delinquents for injury done to the Country. And at his return after a few days (being tender that they ſhould incur no danger) procured their releaſement, and their names were never enrolled as priſoners to be exchanged; and according to his promiſe, he cauſed to be re-delivered their money and arms.

As to the following member of that article, viz. That the Defender took pay from the Uſurpers, for a company of Scots under them, and in their ſervice:

Adhering to the ſeveral exceptions againſt the relevancy of the propoſitions of the Dittay, and exceptions againſt this whole article, in the beginning of the anſwer thereto; ſpecially that it is not condeſcended, under which of the Acts libelled on, this member is ſubſumed, till which be done, the Defender has reaſon to deny that it falls under any of them. Neither is it relevantly libelled to infer any crime, unleſs it had been libelled, that the Defender, having commiſſion for that pretended company for the Engliſh ſervice at that time, had levied that company, or inrolled their names as a formed company, under the Engliſh and their Regiments, and engaged them to the Commonwealth and their ſervice; becauſe theſe are required in a ſoldier in any ſervice,

1. That he be relatus in numeros, that is to ſay inrolled, per lex eod. 42. Y. de Teſt. milit.

2. Ut præſtet Sacramentum, that is, that they gave the oath, ex milit. 11. F. eod. & Veget. 2. cap. 6. or that the Defender had imployed them in the Engliſh military ſervice, or in execution of their orders, all which the Defender abſolutely denies; they never having been inrolled, given any oath or engagement, or imployed in their ſervice, as is ſaid.

But on the contrary, and the truth is, there uſed to be in the ſaid ſhire, and all other places in the Highlands in broken times, watches to keep off depredations, maſterful reifs, and other oppreſſions amongſt the country people themſelves and their neighbours in ſuch times. And accordingly, in the year of God 1653, or thereabout, the ſhire of Argyle not being able to entertain their watch, and pay ceſs alſo (not being as yet well planted after the burning) General Monk was prevailed with, to help to entertain the ſaid watch, (like as at the ſame time, alſo ſeveral other ſhires bordering upon the Highlands, as Inverneſs, Perthſhire, Aberdeenſhire, Sterling, Dumbarton, all of them had watches at the ſaid times, and allowance therefore from General Monk) who within two months did withdraw the ſaid allowance from the ſaid watch of Argyleſhire, becauſe they refuſed to engage againſt thoſe that were then in the hills, under the Defender's ſon and others, whom the ſaid General Monk alſo alledged they favoured; and thereupon withdrew his help and allowance for the ſaid watch, and ſpake of the Defender what his Grace pleaſed.

And to evince that this was nothing but a watch, the men were not in a formed company, but ſeveral Gentlemen in the ſhire had the ordering of ſeveral numbers of them at convenient and needful places of the ſhire, with proportionable entertainment, and without ſubordination as ordinary ſoldiers; all which is notorious, and, if need be, the Defender offers to prove. And the Duke of Albemarle it is hoped will remember, how much offended

he was, that the Defender would not engage the ſaid watch, againſt the ſaid Lord Lorne and his parties; and what prejudice he did ſtill entertain againſt the Defender upon the ſaid publick account. As alſo Colonel Robert Lilburn, when the Lord Lorne and Kenmure went to Kentyre, in the year 1653, the ſaid Lilburn, immediately upon the notice thereof, having come with a conſiderable party of the Engliſh army to Dumbarton; and ſent to the Defender to meet him, and to go along with him in Argyle towards Kentyre: if the ſaid Colonel does not know and perfectly remember, that the Defender ſhunned the meeting, and would not go; whereupon he returned back with the forces, after he was at the length of Lochlomond; whereupon the Defender humbly craves that he may be urged to declare. As alſo that the Counteſs of Balcarras may be examined, if the Defender did not aſſiſt her and her huſband, in their paſſage through Argyleſhire, as they were going to a meeting at Finlarig, for the buſineſs in the hills, in the year 1653. Neither can it be alledged, that the Defender or any of his people did the leaſt prejudice to any perſon or party that profeſſed to be for his Majeſty's ſervice; albeit if he had been ſo diſpoſed, he had and might have had ſeveral opportunities to have done the ſame.

As for the member following, That the Defender called the actings of his Majeſty's forces againſt the Uſurper, rebellion:

It is moſt general, neither condeſcending on time nor place, and therefore irrelevant and inept; but when condeſcended on, he nothing doubts, but that it ſhall appear he ſpoke no ſuch things, nor had he ever any ſuch conſtruction thereof.

As to the laſt deed in the ſaid article, That the Defender in anno 1654, took upon him power to bring off ſuch as were in that ſervice, and to give remiſſions therefore, and particularly to John Macdowgall:

It is general, neither condeſcended on time nor perſon brought off, and therefore inept, and irrelevant. And if it be meant only of the perſon named, viz. John Macdowgall of Dumolich; it will never be made out that he was in that ſervice, when the Commiſſioner his Grace and the Earl of Glencairn were in the field; nor that ever there was a remiſſion granted by the Defender to him, or any other, in relation to that ſervice.

As to the twelfth article and firſt member thereof, anent the Defender's countenancing and aſſiſting, by his perſonal preſence, the tyrannical and treaſonable Proclamation of Richard the Uſurper and Protector of his Majeſty's dominions, at the Market-Croſs of Edinburgh, and Dumbarton:

The Defender is ſo notoriouſly innocent of this member of the article, that he might with much confidence (in place of all other defence) ſimply deny it. But he will do no more for defence and clearing of his innocency, than where he is to propone his defence of alibi, that there month and day muſt be condeſcended on, whereof none is condeſcended on in this member of the article; and till this be condeſcended on, it is inept, and the Defender ought to be aſſoilzed therefrom. But the days of the ſaid Proclamation at Edinburgh and Dumbarton, being condeſcended on; the Defender offers him to prove, that during theſe days he was alibi, and neither at the city of Edinburgh nor Dumbarton all theſe days

As to the ſecond member, anent the Defender's procuring himſelf elected a Commiſſioner for the ſhire of Aberdeen; and accepting a Commiſſion from them, to Richard's pretended Parliament, and ſitting and voting therein, as a Member of his pretended Houſe of Commons:

That the Engliſh uſurpation, was one of the moſt horrid uſurpations that ever has been in Europe, againſt all divine and human Law, againſt the moſt uncontroverted right of the moſt illuſtrious of Kings, our dread Sovereign, and his moſt Royal Father of eternal glorious memory, which none of common ſenſe or honeſty will controvert. Next, the ſaid Uſurpers having nothing but an unparallelled, unjuſt detention of that power, whereunto no manner of way they had the leaſt right to, or any title whatſoever; but in place of a title, armed violence and force: the only mean (for title they had none) whereby they both de facto attained, and violently detained that poſſeſſion unjuſtly, of that power whereof the only right was, and poſſeſſion ought to have been our dread Sovereign's: Whoſoever by arms, counſel or otherways, aided or abetted that armed force, in eſtabliſhing de facto, of the power in the perſons of the monſters of men, and ſo in ſetting up of that abominable uſurpation; that he is guilty of the higheſt Treaſon, is heartily acknowledged. But the Uſurpers having treaſonably thruſt their and our Sovereign, his Majeſty, from all poſſeſſion of his juſt right, and having taken upon them the ſupreme power; and being poſſeſs'd (though moſt unjuſtly) yet moſt peaceably therein, and keeping the ſame by force, as they had taken it; the caſe then became moſt ſingular, as to what the poor oppreſſed ſubjects under their force might do, hoc rerum ſtatu poſito, in this ſtate of affairs, wherein the Uſurper had treaſonably put them. Lucklama a moſt acute Juris-Conſult. Ecclog. 6. membran. in L. 3. de Officiis prætorum obſerves learnedly, that Diſtinctio fieri debet inter perſonam ejus qui Magiſtratum gerit (cum tamen jus ad Magiſtratum non habeat) & ipſum Magiſtratum quam geſſerit; perſona enim ejus eſt privata, hic publicus; & in publicis non tanta perſonæ quam utilitatis hic publicæ habenda eſt ratio, ut enim tutela, ait Cicero, p. 1. Offic. Sic procurato reipub. ad utilitatem eorum qui commiſſi ſunt, non ad eorum quibus commiſſa gerenda eſt, & ſapientes deficiunt nihil aliud eſſe imperium niſi curam rei alienæ, ut ait Ammianus Marcellinus lib. 29. that is, ipſius reipub. So Lucklama diſtinguiſhes betwixt the perſon of him who unjuſtly de facto attains the Magiſtracy (whoſe perſon is ſtill but in effect private, and in the caſe of uſurpation, a Traitor) and the Magiſtracy which he carries, which is publick.

Likewiſe, it ſhould be diſtinguiſhed betwixt Acts concurring with the Uſurper, transferring de facto in his perſon the power he uſurps, (which are treaſonable againſt the lawful Sovereign) and acts, whereby the oppreſs'd ſubjects make uſe of the power now uſurped; wherein the utility, not of the Uſurper, but of the ſubjects is reſpected, as Lucklama obſerves, ubi ſup. And then Grotius, lib. 1. de Jure belli & pacis, cap. 4. num. 15. ſpeaking de invaſore imperii, of an unjuſt invader, while his poſſeſſion remains unjuſt, ſays, the act of power is binding for the good of the Commonweal; and becauſe it is probable the lawful Governour's will is, rather the Uſurper's command ſhould be obeyed, or take effect, than that Laws and Judgments ſhould fall in confuſion in their terms; Reſtat ut de invaſore imperii videamus nunc poſtquam longa poſſeſſione vel pacto jus nactus eſt, ſed quam diu durat in juſtæ poſſidendæ poſſidendæ cauſa, & quidem dum poſſidet actus imperii quos exercet vim habere poſſunt obligandi, non ex ipſius jure, quod nullum, ſed ex eo quod omnino probabile ſit, eum qui jus imperandi habet ſive eſt Populus ipſe, ſive Rex, ſive Senatus, te male interim rata eſſe quæ imperat quam legibus ſub tali ſummam induci confuſionem. And Leſſius, who is one of the Authors Grotius cites upon the place, ſays, in the place cited, viz. Lib. 2. de Juſtitia & Jure, cap. 29. dub. 9, F. 37. That Tyranni uſurpatione poteſtatis mandatis obtemperandum propter bonum commune; which is, that the Tyrant and Uſurper is to be obeyed, even from the law of nature, for the publick good, in ſuch a ſtate of affairs; and adds, alioqui omnia eſſent plena latrociniis & furtis; that is, all would be full of robberies, thefts and confuſion in that ſtate of affairs, becauſe of the Uſurper's force, the uſe of no other Government can be had. So that the neceſſity of the benefit of Government for the good of the ſubjects or common-wealth, eſpecially in what relates ad reipublicæ ſtatum, in things neceſſary for the ſtanding of the common-wealth, or to evite the ruin thereof; and the interpretative and preſumed conſent thereupon of the Prince, who has the right to the authority which the Uſurper has uſurped, but is excluded by the Uſurper from benefiting the ſubjects by it himſelf for the time, are the two grounds whereupon the making uſe of the power now in the hands of the Uſurper is founded, as is ſaid. Whereupon it is ſubſumed, that in our caſe, the Invader and Uſurper Oliver having violently taken upon him the power, after he had put his and our Sovereign from the poſſeſſion thereof, oppreſs'd by his armed force this Nation, and amongſt others the defender; and Oliver having kept the poſſeſſion all his time, and Richard continuing the ſame; the benefit of that power, which now he had uſurped, and whereof he was in poſſeſſion, was, as always it is, ſo neceſſary for the ſtanding of the common-wealth, that without it men become but as fiſh in the ſea, the leſſer a prey to the oppreſſion of the great: but eſpecially, the ſaid Richard having called a pretended Parliament, and commanded the Shires to ſend Commiſſioners thereto. Meetings and Repreſentatives of the Nation, as they are of great uſe at any time, for treating common affairs of common conſent, ſo tranſcendently at that time, for moderating the arbitrary tyranny of a Uſurper; and that not being able to expugn his force, they might by ſtrength of common-counſel, overcome and perſuade his reaſon to things abſolutely neceſſary for the ſubſiſtence, at leaſt for the preventing the ruin of the whole body of the Kingdom, and of his Majeſty's Lieges therein: as was the ſtopping that miſerable union, which the defender knew that it would be, as it had been before, at even other Parliaments, ſo, at that, ſtrongly attempted, as indeed thereafter it was. Which union was that Vorax wherein our Religion, our ancient Government monarchick in his Majeſty's perſon and family, and the intereſt of the nobility and our liberties, were wholly ſwallowed up; and under pretext of being united, we were really enſlaved to that pretended commonwealth. The eaſing, if they could not perſuade him to the taking off of the maintenance and ceſs, (which upon Scotland, was ſixtuple more than the proportion of England, and in it ſelf ſo heavy, with the exciſe and other publick burthens, laid by the Uſurper on it, that more was exacted in one month, than his Majeſty's royal Predeceſſors would have impoſed or taken of taxation for an age, ſo that the Country could not ſubſiſt under it;) as alſo taking off ſome of the forces under which we were kept in bondage, if that at leaſt could have been obtained: The prevention of the alteration and change of our whole laws, which was vehemently threatned, yea, and in general, the confounding, and, dolo optimo, circumventing and defeating of the counſels, by which the event proved, it was more hopeful and eaſy to overcome that force, than by might or power. And as the liberty of the election of the members in England, at that time of Richard's Parliament, made it ſerviceable to his Majeſty in it, and hopeful to all his Majeſty's friends and loyal ſubjects, ſo was it no ſmall encouragement to the defender to go there for the ſame end: And at the meeting in the Committee of Scots affairs, and ſeveral other meetings, when they were upon the debate of the ſaid union, the defender, on purpoſe to ſtop the ſame, did propone, that there could be no union, except it were agreed, that we might enjoy our Religion in Scotland without alteration, as it was eſtabliſhed by our own laws; and that we might be ruled and judged according to the ſame laws, and except our ceſs were proportioned according to theirs in England. All which Concerns the defender knew would never be granted, and were indeed ſo utterly improbable at that time, that the propoſition thereof was conſtrued for no other end, than for the end aforeſaid, to ſtop the ſaid union: likewiſe it did ſo well ſucceed, as in effect it did obſtruct it, as the ſeveral perſons of quality that were preſent, can, and if need be will declare. And at that meeting, the actings and uſurpation of the Uſurper Oliver, and the oppreſſions of that army were of purpoſe much called in queſtion, to make that Government and them odious, which accordingly happily followed; and ſuch a breach and confuſion amongſt them was made, that their affairs thereafter could never come to any conſiſtency, which made conſiderably and evidently, a way to his Majeſty's happy and glorious Reſtauration. To all which joining, that the call and command of the armed force has parentis neceſſitatem, a neceſſity of obeying lying upon perſons under their power; it will follow from what is alledged out of theſe above-cited Authors, founded ſtrongly on reaſon, the defender in that ſtate of affairs had neceſſity and ſome obligation to go and eſſay, what could be done by counſel, wiſdom and prudence, ſince now there was no ſtrength nor might left, effectuate for the ſtanding, at leaſt, to evite the ruin of the Country, in the particulars above mentioned, and others of that nature; at leaſt, the defender, as all of us, was under their force; and for eviting of his own and the Country's ruin, habuit parentis neceſſitatem: and by conſequence there was no deſign of treaſon therein, but by the contrary moſt loyal intentions, upon good ground of hope, and very probable appearance. And therefore it is hoped the Commiſſioner's Grace and the Eſtates of Parliament will not find this member relevant to infer ſo high a crime againſt the defender; hoc maxime attento, that beſide publick ends, it was even a neceſſary ſelf-preſervative act; for the Defender had ſeveral other things of perſonal intereſt; as that they had ordained him to pay to them about 4000 l. ſterling, for alledged few duties, (and in time coming ſo much, that both joined, he was not able to bear) and if need be be, it is offered to be proved, and that he was moſt rigorouſly perſecuted for the ſame ; not only threatning to uſe real execution againſt his Eſtate, but alſo to impriſon his perſon.

For eviting whereof, he was behoved to go at that time to London, and could not have his perſon ſecured from arreſtments there, but by going in commiſſion : And it is known that his Majeſty is ſo gracious, as in not a few, to excuſe what they did of that nature, to evite though but their own perſonal ruin, not imputing it to unfaithfulneſs in them at ſuch a time ; according to whoſe glorious and imitable example, it is with much confidence hoped, that the Commiſſioner's Grace and honourable Eſtates of Parliament will have a favourable conſtruction of what the defender did in that particular, being neceſſitated thereto, both for publick and private intereſt ; without any deceit or fraud, either in the intention or event, there being nothing at that time, while the defender was there, done, for confirming the uſurpation, or excluding his Majeſty's intereſt.

Likewiſe it may appear, that it was only the concourſe both of publick and private intereſts and neceſſities aforeſaid, that moved the defender to go at that time ; becauſe, though he was deſired oftimes before to go, yet he ſtill refuſed till then : He was one of the laſt that went to that, being the very laſt pretended Parliament under their power ; not till long after that commiſſioners had gone for the Nation for ſeveral years, and that all had ſubmitted to their conſtitutions, and were of neceſſity made uſe of as laws for the time.

As for the aggravations of this member, and to the firſt, That becauſe of the defendant's nobility, he was incapable to have been elected, at leaſt might have refuſed :

It is anſwered, that it is notorious, nobility was not then reſpected at all ; nor was any ground of excuſe, the meetings to the elections being commanded to all, as heretofore, (and ſo noblemen and others heretofore met promiſcuouſly through all the Nation) as is notoriouſly to all known.

And whereas it is libelled, That he had not his reſidence within the Shire ; it ought to be repelled as irrelevant, becauſe it is true, and was known to the uſurpers, and their miniſters and underlings, that he had land within the ſaid Shire, and that conſiderable. So that he could not decline the ſaid employment without prejudice, the will and luſt of the uſurper at that time being uncontroulable, and tied to no rules of law or juſtice.

And where it is inferred, That ſitting and voting in that pretended Parliament, he acknowledged his Majeſty's power and intereſt to be in the Uſurper's perſon : It is anſwered,

1. He acknowledged the ſame no otherwiſe but as all the Kingdom did, to wit, de facto ; for de facto the Uſurper had taken or poſſeſs'd himſelf of the power ; as his Majeſty is pleaſed to ſpeak of it in his proclamation anent commerce with Portugal, in October laſt, and had detained the ſame for a long time : But neither the defender, nor any other loyal ſubject, ever did, or will acknowledge, that de jure the ſame belonged to him, or that he had any juſt right or lawful title thereto : as alſo Leſſius ſays in the above-written place, ſpeaking of them that ſeek from Uſurpers that uſe of Government ; whereunto he ſays, they are holden in and obliged, once taking on them the Government, (though ſinfully and unlawfully) they ſeek the benefit of it, ſays he not abſolutely, but under a tacit condition, viz. if the uſurpers will take upon them the Government : Petunt, ſaith he, ſub tacita quadam conditione, ſi velit ſe pro principe gerere ; ſpeaking of the Uſurper. And that the Uſurper would not give the uſe of the power he had taken upon him, but in the way he pleaſed, was his crime which he continued during his uſurpation. In reſpect of all which, it is humbly craved, that the defender may be aſſoilzed from the crime of treaſon, libelled thereupon.

Like as for the defender's further clearing in this particular, it is humbly deſired, that certain miniſters and others above exception, whom the defender ſhall condeſcend on, may be examined, if after his return from England, in anno 1658, he did not expreſs with great joy his hopes, that buſineſs in England did tend toward his Majeſty's advantage.

Item, That a commiſſion be directed for examining Sir Anthony Aſhley-Cooper, and ſeveral other Engliſhmen above all exception ; how the defender expreſs'd himſelf in private anent his diſaffection to that uſurpation, during his being there the time of the ſaid Parliament, even though to his very great hazard at that time.

Item, That certain perſons, upon whoſe names alſo he ſhall condeſcend, may be examined, if the defender to their certain knowledge, at the time of Sir George Booth's riſing, (which fell out immediately after the defender's return from the ſaid Parliament) did not put himſelf out of the way, being informed that he was to be ſecured, and thereupon delay'd his journey to Caithneſs, and ſo be the readier to have laid hold of any opportunity that ſhould have offered for his Majeſty's ſervice and reſtitution ; that time being the moſt probable that ever offered after Worceſter fight.

As for the precept of twelve thouſand pound ſterling, which is alledged the defender got from the Uſurpers ;

It is anſwered, The defender did indeed obtain a precept, but not as a reward of any ſervice, (which he never did, nor deſired to deſerve from them) but for what they had wrongfully intromitted with, of the half of the exciſe of wine and ſtrong waters, whereunto the defender had right by Act of Parliament, before they had any power in Scotland.

And as to the thirteenth Article, firſt, for the whole Article, it is not conſented on what Act of Parliament, the ſame conſiſting of three different members, is ſubſumed ; and till it be condeſcended on, there can be no proceſs thereupon.

And as to the firſt member thereof, anent the words alledged ſpoken at Innerary :

1. No time is condeſcended on, and therefore the libel in that part is inept for the reaſons aforementioned, for which a criminal dittay ought to be ſpecial in the time, at leaſt year and month.

2. Whereas it is libelled, he rebuked the miniſters for praying for the King, in the words libelled, or ſome ſuch like words ; non relevat as to the miniſters, except the perſons were condeſcended on, whom he rebuked.

3. Non relevat, ſome ſuch like words ; ſome ſuch like being moſt general, except the words were particularly libelled, alledged to be ſuch like whereby the defender might adviſe his defences, and alledge why they were not ſuch like, as he would if any words ever he ſpoke were condeſcended on.

on. For the truth is, he never ſpoke any ſuch words: And was ſo far from rebuking any for praying for the King's Majeſty, that after the defeat at Worceſter, (which is the general time libelled, wherein he ſhould have rebuked the miniſters for praying for the King) he himſelf cauſed continual praying for his Majeſty both in his Pariſh-Church and Family, yea even in preſence and audience of the Engliſh when they came there, though it was to his great hazard ſo to do.

As to the ſecond member anent the words libelled and alledged to have been ſpoken by the defender at London, That he wondered how the people ſhould be ſo mad as to call home a family whom God had rejected, and would never reſtore; or ſome ſuch like words:

Firſt, This is alſo general; neither time, that is, year nor month, nor particular place, condeſcended on.

Secondly, it is libelled, That it was in the preſence of perſons of quality, they ought to be condeſcended on.

Thirdly, In ſo far as it is libelled the defender ſaid, The people were mad to call home his Majeſty; it is general and inept, not condeſcending what people, and what was the occaſion; if there was any motion made of calling home the King, whereupon that ſhould have been ſpoken, and among whom it was. And Damhaud. cap. 30. prax. com. num. 4. and others, ſay, A criminal dittay ſhould be moſt clear, and contain omnes criminis patrati qualitates, lib. 30. F. de accuſ. and Bart. and others, ibid. that it ſhould contain all the qualities of crimes alledged to be committed.

Fourthly, Some ſuch like words non relevat, except the words were ſpecially condeſcended on; which if they were, the defender would alledge and evince they were no wiſe ſuch like: for the truth is, he never ſpake any ſuch words, but on the contrary did all that he could there to make way for his Majeſty's happy reſtauration; as has been at length cleared before.

And was a very ſuſpected perſon, in ſo far as in the year one thouſand ſix hundred fifty ſeven, Oliver was ſo jealous of the defender, that he commanded him to ſtay at London, and not to return to Scotland, till his affairs, as he was pleaſed to expreſs, were ſettled. So that not without great difficulty, by the mediation of the Lord Broughil and Charles Fleetwood, he obtained his liberty: Whereupon the defender deſires the ſaid Charles Fleetwood may be examined, which he alſo deſired at London. And not only was ſuſpected, as odious to the Engliſh for his known affection thereunto, as is notorious, and has alſo before been expreſs'd.

As to the third member of the ſaid Article, anent the alledged ſpeech in Maſtertonne's;

1. Neither the year nor month condeſcended on, and therefore general as to the time, and inept.

2. As to the firſt member thereof, That he would own any thing he had done;

Firſt, It is exceedingly general, and not relevant; except what were the things he had owned were ſpecially condeſcended, and what time, year and month: It is an unparallell'd generality, and therefore till made ſpecial, no proceſs thereupon.

Secondly, It can import nothing in common ſenſe, wherein to own a thing is to acknowledge it for a man's own; but what he had acknowledged to be his own, whether word or deed, he would yet acknowledge; which is an expreſſion of ingenuity, and no crime: And this being the received ſenſe of owning, the word cannot be ſtrained to any other ſenſe; or if occaſion ſhould be taken ſo to do, and that another ſenſe could be put on that expreſſion, yet being more interpretatio capienda eſt, the moſt uſual interpretation is to be taken, Perd. ea quæ S. I. 1. F. de reg. juris, as being both juſteſt and ſafeſt by that law. And in ambiguous ſpeeches, or ſuch as may receive two ſenſes, every man is the beſt expounder of his own mind, and his interpretation ought to be admitted, per leg. in ambiguis F. de reg. juris and other laws. But the ſenſe aforeſaid is ſo plain, that there is no place for caption.

As to what follows in the ſaid member, That if what he had owned or done were to do, he would do it again, albeit he had known that all that has been would have come:

1. As to what is alledged againſt the firſt part of this member, That this is exceedingly general as to the time and month he ſhould have ſpoken it on:

2. As to what the things are that he would do if they were to be done, and that time the things were done or owned to be done, or that the ſaying that he would do if they were to do, is a crime.

3. What were thoſe things in particular that are underſtood, or may be ſubſumed under the general of all things that has come to paſs; whereupon it may be inferred, that that were a crime for the defender to have ſaid, that notwithſtanding of them he would do what he had done, if that were to do; and therefore the libel in this part of the member is alſo general, obſcure and inept. And to evince the ineptitude of this generality, ſuppoſe the defender were thus indicted; You are indicted for all that you have done the times by-gone, preceding your being in James Maſtertonne's houſe, after your coming for London; were not that dittay without all controverſy irrelevant? Then is it not alſo irrelevant to be indicted for owning in general that he had owned, or ſaying in general, That he would do that he had owned during that time, if that were to do again, without any further particular condeſcendance?

Like as, 4. There is a very clear, obvious and benign ſenſe theſe words may have, (if ever he ſpake, as he truly never remembers that he ſpake any ſuch words) that if it had been poſſible that times could have returned, and actions to be done under the ſame circumſtances and repreſentations they had then, it is probable theſe ſame might be the defender's actions again, though he had known what had come thereafter, not having connexion with, or neceſſary dependance on theſe actings, each does not ſo much as import his preſent thoughts or approbation thereof, but is very conſiſtent with a preſent diſapprobation of the ſame. And is it not ordinary to ſay, that if ſuch times were as has been, or ſuch motives or circumſtances of actions as has been, that it is very like I would be engaged in them as well as others, or as I have been my ſelf? And yet to ſay with great conſiſtence I ought not ſo to do, like as truly it is known, and if need be, is offered to be proved; that the defender, on the juſt contrary, had ſaid to one of Cromwel's Counſellors, and to many other famous Gentlemen, that things had been done wherein he would would have been very far from engaging in, if he had ſeen what followed, which was the product of the corruption of evil men, that had abuſed what was well intended, for accompliſhing of their wicked ends, and (till they brake forth and could not be reſiſted) unknown deſigns. And the defender hopes the ſenſe aforeſaid is very clear, and even though it were not ſo obvious, yet rapienda eſt occaſio quæ benignus præbit reſponſum, L. Rapiend. 168. F. de reg. juris: That is, any occaſion ſhould be even taken, as it were, though there were ſome violence done to the words, for a benign interpretation; and therefore by all means that interpretation of the words that may ſeem to infer a crime ought to be eſchewed. Or if the word might be drawn to any other ſenſe, yet in dubiis benigniora preferenda ſunt, as has been ſaid, in ſpeeches dubious, the moſt benign ſenſe is to be preferred, pret. ſemp. 56. F. de reg. juris; or where words are obſcure, or may ſuffer two ſenſes, the party's own interpretation is to be taken, as the beſt interpreter of his own mind; Per ea quæ ff. 1. F. de reg. juris. And odia ſunt reſtringenda, favores ampleandi; what is odious, (as that which may infer a crime againſt any) ſhould be reſtricted, and favour amplified; and in general, the Judge is always to be more inclined to abſolve than condemn, and ſo conſequently take the ſenſe that may abſolve, rather than that which may condemn, Leg. Corianus F. de oblig. & act. 47.

5. The Doctors ſay, that voluntas & propoſitum delinquentis diſtingunt facinora per legem expreſſam, leg. qui in jur. 53. F. de furtis in præ: that is, the will and purpoſe of him that commits a crime, diſtinguiſheth it; but velleitas, or voluntas inefficax, as it is called, not a will, but a would, is no purpoſe to do, and can be the cauſe of no crime; eſpecially being about things paſt, and qualified with an impoſſible condition, if things already done were to do, which is altogether impoſſible, that a deed done can return to have a new Being, and ſo to be done. And even there is ſome preſumption of that miſtake may be in this, from the place libelled, in which it is alledged to have been ſpoken, it being ſuch as it is not improbable, that men may be very apt to fail both in judgment and memory, and ſo both wrong themſelves and miſconſtrue others. And as for the aggravations that follow, that by ſpeaking theſe words the defender took upon him by outward ſucceſs, to give judgment upon the ſecret Counſel of the Almighty: 1. As it is in no wiſe true that the defender ſpoke any of the words libelled; ſo this does, as he humbly conceives, in no wiſe follow upon the words immediately going before, alledged ſpoken in Maſtertonne's, viz. That the defender owned what he had done or would do the ſame if it were to do again; for that is not any judgment given of any hidden counſels of the Lord's, but an expreſſion at moſt of his own actions. And as for the words before theſe, albeit he had been ſo preſumptuous as to ſay them, as he bleſſed the Lord he never was, yet it is not libelled, that any thing that is therein alledged to have been ſpoken, either at Innerrary or London, was ſpoken or inferred from providence and ſucceſs. For the defender bleſſes the Lord, he has been otherwiſe taught, than to uſe, or rather to abuſe ſo Turkiſh an argument, and which the Lord has by his Majeſty's happy reſtoration ſo ſignally refuted.

And as to the laſt aggravation, that the defender thereby hardned others, ſuch as otherwiſe were not ill diſpoſed, in their wicked courſes towards his Majeſty; it is indeed a ſad reflection upon others herein not called. However, 1. It is ſo general, both as to theſe others and their courſes, that it cannot, and the defender hopes it ſhall have no weight; eſpecially conſidering that, 2. The defender oppones his defences before alledged, againſt all the members of this Article; whereby it is clear, that as they are libelled, they can infer no ſuch thing, in reſpect of all which the defender ought to be aſſoilzed alſo from this Article of the Dittay.

As to the laſt Article, 1. It is not condeſcended under which of the Acts of Parliament libelled on, it is ſubſumed; and till then, it is ineptly libelled, and there can be no proceſs thereupon. Moreover, the defender has the teſtimony of his own conſcience, yea, and of an higher, that nothing libelled therein is true. Albeit if he had ſaid, that the Uſurper's hazard was great from his Majeſty, and if his Majeſty's deſigns took effect they were ruined, the ſame were notorious truths, and it ought to have been ſo; that is, it ought to be, and it was good, they were in hazard from his Majeſty's deſigns: and it was moſt juſt, that his Majeſty's deſigns ſhould take effect to their ruin. And what crime could be in ſo ſaying, he cannot apprehend; however, he never ſpoke any ſuch words to Cromwell or Ireton, which Ireton he never ſaw with his eyes; and did far more abhor the leaſt thought of giving counſel to challenge, or queſtion his late Majeſty upon his precious life; and his innocency ſhall reſt confident, abſolutely to deny the ſame.

And as to the laſt part of this Article, whereby it is libelled, that in anno 1649, in face of the Parliament then ſitting, he told, that the Uſurper Cromwell had told him, that England and Scotland would never be at peace till the King were put to death; the defender adheres, as to this part, to the general exception againſt all this Article.

That it is not condeſcended under which of the Acts of Parliament libelled on it is ſubſumed, till which be done, there can be no proceſs; and if it be intended that it be ſubſumed under the 43d Act, 2 Parl. Jam. I. and the 134th Act, Parl. 8. and 10th Act and 10th Parl. and 205th Act, 14th Parl. K. Jam. 6. all theſe Acts, as both by their titles and tenours, and by Skeine in his Index on the words leaſing-makers appears; and it ſeems by their conjunction in this libel, they are underſtood alſo therein of lying and ſlandering his Majeſty and his Progenitors: and the words libelled, though very horrid, yet ſeem to be of another nature. And 2. to that Act 205, Parl. 14. Jam. 6. whereon only any thing can be ſubſumed againſt him for concealing and not apprehending; 1. It is general as to the time when Cromwell ſhould have told it to him, and therefore inept till the time be condeſcended on, which muſt be; eſpecially ſeeing, if it be not condeſcended on to have been after the engagement was broken, nothing can be ſubſumed on the ſaid Act thereupon againſt the defender, nor on his not apprehending him; for he was not holden thereto by that Act expreſly, except (according to Law) it had been in his power. But ſo it is, it is known, that at that time it was not in the power of the whole Kingdom to apprehend him, whether his victory or ſtrength be conſidered, or the Kingdom's low and weak condition at that time, wherein they lay open to ruin by him, if the Lord had not reſtrained him more than their power could effectuate. And as to the concealing and not revealing, the defender ought to be aſſoilzed; becauſe by the expreſs words of the Act, that revealing is declared to be ſuch a revealing to ſome of his Majeſty's privy council, or ſome under-officer, &c. as that there-through the authors of ſlanderous ſpeeches, may be called, tried, and puniſhed: But that cannot be ſubſumed, except it were ſubſumed, that the ſpeeches were ſpoken before witneſs; otherwiſe could not have been proved, and without probation could not have been ſo urged, as that ſentence could have been given thereupon, and the Author puniſhed according to the words of the Act, which is alſo according to Common Law, and which is hereafter cleared. Like as if the words thereafter ſhould have been found treaſonable, and the defender not being found able to have proved them, he ſhould have brought himſelf under the crime of treaſon, for accuſing another of treaſon, and not being able to prove it, and therefore could not be holden ſo to do. As alſo albeit the defender had heard any ſuch words as is libelled, (which he altogether denies) and that before witneſs, yet through his revealing thereof, the Author could not be tried or puniſhed; for it is notoriouſly known, it was above the power of the Kingdoms at that time, as is ſaid, or for many years thereafter, to puniſh him. And therefore the defender's not revealing cannot be ſubſumed upon the ſaid Act of Parliament, to infer the pain contained therein, or related unto.

Laſtly, the pains of the ſaid Act, and other Acts before mentioned together therewith, is not the pain of treaſon, as has been oft before evinced; and therefore the defender cannot be convened for treaſon, or the pain thereof, upon the ſaid Acts, but ought to be aſſoilzed therefrom.

But if this member of this Article be intended to be ſubſumed under the laſt part of the propoſition of the dittay, whereby it is alledged, that by Common Law and Practice of this Kingdom, all concealers and not revealers of any malicious purpoſe of putting violent hands on the ſacred perſon of his Majeſty, or purpoſing of killing and putting him to death, are guilty of treaſon; the defender proteſting his innocence in never concealing any ſuch purpoſe, nor the words aforeſaid libelled, which he abhors, he is ſo far from juſtifying thereof, judging the horrid murder of his Majeſty to have been the very ruin of our peace and happineſs: Yet as to the relevancy of that part of the propoſition, in ſo far as is founded upon Common Law and Practice only, the defender, becauſe of the preparative, repeats what was before alledged in the anſwer to the propoſition, in that part thereof: And adds further, In crimine læſæ Majeſtatis, in the crime of leſe Majeſty, Num ſciens tractatum proditionis contra principem vel patriam, & illum non revelans, ſit puniendus pœna mortis; that is, whether he that knows a treaty about treaſon againſt his Prince and Country, be puniſhable by death. Clarus l. 5. S. fuſ. pract. crim. queſt. 57. ſays, that many hold he is puniſhable by death: And that Cognol. in his lib. Culpa caret F. de reg. juris num. 2. that it is the common opinion, citing Alciat. in lib. tacere F. de verb. ſig. & m. l. bona fide, num. 20. F. de poſſ. & in lib. 4. of Cato num. 30. F. de verb. oblig. related alſo by Gigas, de crimine læſæ majeſtatis fol. 180. num. 10 Roll. Conſ. 88. num. 10. lib. 2 Carol. prac. crim. fol. 253. num. 29. ſaith, that all others follow this opinion. And Baldus cries out in one certain counſel, that becauſe Bartol held otherwiſe, therefore his ſoul for that, as a crime, is tormented in hell. Where it is clear, that even by Clarus's acknowledgement, (which is very high treaſon) is not treaſon by the common opinion of the Doctors, according as is aſſerted by the famous Authors he cites, and whom he contradicts not therein. 2. And Clarus nothing contradicting, but this is the common opinion, albeit he be of another mind with Bartol, that it is capital to conceal, and not reveal, yet it is only in two caſes, to wit, In tractatu qui fiat contra ejus perſonam vel ſtatum; that is, where he has been conſcious to, and known any treaty or conſultation againſt the Prince's Eſtate or Perſon. But as for other cauſes, he holds expreſly, that the concealer, and not revealer, is not puniſhable by death, in theſe words; In aliis autem caſibus etſi ſint comprehenſi in crimine læſæ majeſtatis non putarem eſſe puniendum pœna mortis ſubditum qui non revelaveret: And that he counſels Princes, even in theſe caſes, to uſe clemency and humanity, rather than ſeverity; and to excuſe their ſubjects upon any probable cauſe, from the pain of death. Whence, 3. It is alledged, even according to Clarus's opinion, concealing not relevant to infer the pain of death; except where the concealer has been conſcious to, and heard ſome treaty, that is, deliberate conſultation againſt the Prince or his Eſtate. But ſo it is, the words libelled, eſpecially what is alledged to have been heard in Parliament, 1649, ſeems not to import that, being, as would appear, but volitantia verba, if any ſuch thing had been heard, which the defender abſolutely denies; and importing indeed the Author Cromwel's thought or opinion, that there would be troubles ſtill ſo long as his Majeſty, (horrendum dictum) were not put to death. But Clarus lib. 5. prax. crim. F. fin. num. 87. diſtinguiſhing betwixt cogitationem nudam, a naked thought, and tractatum, a treaty or conſulting; he affirms, that a naked or ſole thought is not puniſhable in any crime, no, not in Leſe-Majeſty, except only hereſy, when guilt is perfected in the mind. And thereafter num. 2. he moves the queſtion, Sed pone quis non ſteterit in meris terminis cogitationis, ſed ulterius etiam proceſſerit ad tractatum cum aliquo de ipſo maleficio committendo. But, ſays he, put the caſe that any has not contained himſelf within the bounds of a thought, but has proceeded further to treat with any for committing the crime, &c. thereby making a clear difference betwixt a clear ſole thought and a treaty, about committing the crime. Now the words, as they are libelled, do not import any treaty with any for committing that horrid murder; but the ſignification only of Cromwel's damnable thought, what might be the conſequence of not taking the life of our dread Sovereign.

And hence, 3. It will follow, that theſe words cannot be ſubſumed relevantly, under that part of the propoſition of the Libel; becauſe that any ſenſe theſe words ſeemed to have as they are libelled, would appear only to import his naked thought of what might be the conſequence of taking the life of our then dread Sovereign, but no purpoſe of his to take the ſame. Neither could any preſume, albeit his thought anent that conſequence had been true, (as it is moſt contrary to the truth) that yet any man, in whom there had been the leaſt ſparkle of common reaſon, or conſcience, would have purpoſed poſed to commit, or committed one of the higheſt evils of ſin, to evite, though very great evils of puniſhment, it being a received rule among men, at leaſt among chriſtian men, that the leaſt of the evils of ſin ſhould not be committed, to evite the greateſt of the evils of puniſhment.

4. Gomez, a moſt excellent Lawyer, is clear in his third tom. variar. Reſolv. de crimine læſæ majeſtatis, num. 8. that concealing even of treaſon, is only then puniſhable, when the concealer might prove it otherwiſe; not per text. leg. noſtris, in fine cap. de calumniat. & L. quæ accuſ. capite, cap. de edendo: whereby it is ſaid, that whoſoever counſels to accuſe, ſhould have his proofs ready, and who accuſeth falſly ſhall be puniſhed as the party accuſed would be if the accuſation were proved. Gomez citeth the canon law, Platia, Hippolatus, and others for their exception, which à fortiori holds in our law, whereby the 49th Act Parl. 11. Jam. 6. accuſing any of treaſon, not being able to prove, ſo that the party accuſed be acquit, being ſo far reprobate by our law, that it is declared, that thereby the accuſer ſhall incur the ſame crime of treaſon whereof he accuſed the other; is a ſufficient warrant to the defender not to have revealed that of Cromwell, if there had been any ſuch ſpeech, as the defender never heard any ſuch, except he had witneſs to have proved it; which neither is libelled, nor can be alledged, and therefore he ought alſo to be aſſoilzed therefrom.

5. All theſe laws anent concealing and not revealing, (as the defender humbly conceives) muſt be underſtood where the treaſon is privately plotted, and the execution thereof is carried on by ſecret conveyance, and which by revealing might be cruſhed and prevented. But it is notorious that the Uſurper, as he had the power of armed force, ſo he had the unparallelled boldneſs to carry on his execrable treaſon moſt openly; and that his power was ſuch, as it was impoſſible for his Majeſty's poor ſubjects of this Kingdom to reſiſt, (nor yet his Majeſty's other Kingdoms, though far more powerful, and that many thouſands of them from their ſouls abhorred the ſaid act) or prevent and impede the ſame. And if the defender had heard any ſuch words of the Uſurper (as he has juſt reaſon to deny he never heard) whatever they ſhould import; what probable reaſon might have been for not revealing it at that time, from the prevalency and power of that enemy, the condition of our poor Country, and utter impoſſibility to bring him to puniſhment, beſide the want of probation: And ſo what place there were to Clarus's counſel of humanity, the defender leaves to the commiſſioner's Grace, and the honourable Eſtates of Parliament to judge.

6. Whatever relevancy there were in the defender's concealing, yet his acknowledgment thereof in Parliament, 1649, as libelled non relevat, to infer or prove it. 1. Becauſe a confeſſion that prejudgeth a party muſt be judicial, that is, In judicio idque, utroque jure & civili, & canonico; as ſays Panormitan, C. ex parte decret. de confeſſ. num. 16. that it muſt be in judgment in a proceſs, wherein he who confeſſeth is convened, as is clear by Leg. 6. F. de confeſſ. where the words are, Si dum quis convenitur, confiteatur; that is, If any be convened, confeſs, &c. and Panormitan dicto loco ſaith, That to the end a confeſſion may prejudge him, who confeſſeth, it muſt be among other requiſites, ſuper re litigioſa, that is, on any thing litigious, or any thing in dependance or proceſs, per L. in confeſſionibus, F. de Interrog. ait; the words are, Confeſſionibus falſis reſpondentes, ita obligantur ſi ejus nomine de quo, quis interrogatus ſit, cum aliquo ſit actio; that is, any in making anſwer is oblig'd by falſe confeſſions, if there be any action or dependance againſt him, upon that whereupon he was interrogate and confeſſed: and Panormitan is expreſs, ubi ſupra, That non valet confeſſio, facta coram Judice, tanquam in judicio, niſi Judex ad hoc ſedeat, per Bartol. in lib. ſi confeſſus, F. de cuſtod. reor. That is, a confeſſion is not valid, though made before a Judge, as in judgment, except the Judge be ſitting on that buſineſs. Whence it is clear, that the acknowledgement libelled is no ways relevant to infer againſt the defender what is libelled to have been thereby acknowledged, except it were libelled that he had been in judgment convened thereupon; or that there was a proceſs depending againſt the ſaid defender, wherein he had confeſſed what was libelled in judgment, and the Parliament had been ſitting on that proceſs. But ſo it is, that neither is it, nor can be libelled, and therefore his naked acknowledgment not relevant; and in effect, if in any diſcourſe before the Parliament, any ſuch word had eſcaped the defender, (which he in no wiſe acknowledges) yet that ſuch a paſſing and indeliberate word ſhould infer or prove a crime, or ſo high a crime againſt him, he is hopeful the honourable Court of Parliament will bevery far from ever finding: For the very reaſon why confeſſion has ſo much weight, is becauſe it is preſumed, that no man will confeſs againſt himſelf in judgment, that whereupon he is convened and proceſſed, without great deliberation: which holds not, if the acknowledgment be given out of any proceſs, there being no dependant action or proceſs upon the matter thereof. And therefore the defender is confident that he need not trouble the honourable Court with more legal diſpute againſt the relevance of the alledged acknowledgment.

7. The words or acknowledgment libelled as ſpoken in Parliament, 1649, can never be obtruded to the defender; nor that he was conſcious to the Counſel of that horrid murder of his late Majeſty: becauſe it is notorious, and he offers to prove, if need be, that the whole members of the ſaid Parliament, 1649, and he himſelf, amongſt others, in plain Parliament, were purged by their ſolemn oaths of all knowledge of, or acceſſion to that wicked deſign in relation to the King's Majeſty and houſe of Parliament.

8. And yet he is ſo confident he never ſpake any ſuch thing in Parliament, that the day being condeſcended on, and dyet of ſitting of Parliament, as by all doctors is agreed it ought to be, then the defender offers to prove his alibi: He offers to prove, (if need be) he was alibi all that dyet, and ſo not in Parliament, where he is alledged to have ſpoken theſe words. And yet that the defender's innocency, as to the acceſſion or knowledge of that horrid murder, may yet further appear, it is known to many perſons, and to ſome of the Members of this preſent Parliament, that when Cromwel was in Scotland, in anno 1650, notwithſtanding it is known what malice he had to the defender at that time, in this particular he expreſſed himſelf concerning the Marquis of Argyle, That he thought him a man that had neither courage nor honour to have been upon ſuch a buſineſs: And the defender thanks God he had ſo much honour and honeſty, as in no wiſe to be acceſſary thereunto, and to abhor the ſame.

9. The defender ought to be aſſoilzed from the two laſt Articles, as from all the other, from the year 1641, to his Majeſty's coming home to Scotland, in anno 1650, becauſe of the ratification and oblivion contained in his Majeſty's treaty at Breda, and moſt full and ample Act of ratification and oblivion at St. Johnſton and Sterling, anno 1650, and 1651.

And in regard the deeds libelled are either ſuch as preceded the Treaty and Act of oblivion, in anno 1641, and were thereby pardoned and buried in oblivion; or ſuch as intervened after the year 1641, before his Majeſty's home-coming, in the year 1650. during which time he is in his libel charged with ſeveral deeds which are irrelevant, and whereof the defender is moſt innocent. And for ſuch publick actings as the defender is charged with and had acceſſion to, the defender is alſo ſecured and pardoned by his Majeſty's treaty, and gracious condeſcendance at Breda, which was alſo thereafter ratified in Parliament; or are deeds of neceſſary compliance both for the publick and ſelf-preſervation in that unhappy juncture. Which compliance, as it was ſore againſt his inclination, if it had been in his power to have helped it, ſo it is not more than whole Kingdoms did, and far leſs than many condeſcended to: It is in all humility expected, that the defender ſhould not be brought under the compaſs of law for the ſame, which were as to make him the ſingular ſufferer in ſo univerſal a guilt; ſo there can be no precedent therefore inſtanced, either out of Scripture, or Holy Writ, the Hiſtories of our own, or of other Nations, that a ſubject not having contributed to the ſaid uſurpation, but to his power reſiſted the ſame, when the ſaid unjuſt uſurpation prevailed, expelled the lawful Magiſtrate, detained the unjuſt uſurpation for many years, and tyrannized over the people when the lawful Magiſtrate could not rule for the time, or protect or help; that the ſaid ſubject for his compliance, and uſing endeavours for neceſſary, publick, and ſelf-preſervation, ſhould be indicted of ſo high a crime, is in all humility conceived without precedent or parallel, and quite contrary to the current of example and practice, that may be from Scripture and other Hiſtories adduced, and not ſo ſuitable to that goodneſs and natural clemency, whereof his Majeſty hath given ſo abundant proof to others, even the Uſurpers and Invaders, and who aided and abetted them, without envy be it ſpoken; and which is not only moſt agreeable to his Majeſty's gracious inclination, but very ſuitable to that advice given by his royal father to him: in whoſe words, in one ſection, there are as follows, Your Prerogative is beſt ſhewed and exerciſed, in remitting, rather than in exacting the rigour of the Law, than which nothing is worſe. In reſpect whereof, and of the defences above-mentioned, the defender ought to be aſſoilzed from this Libel, and the whole Articles therein contained.

See State-Trials, Vol. II. pag. 428, 429, 430, and 431. for Bp. Burnet's Account of the further Proceedings on this Trial; * and the Marquis's ſpeech on the Scaffold.

* The Author of an Apologetical Relation of the particular Sufferings of the faithful Miniſtry and Profeſſors of the Church of Scotland, ſince Auguſt, 1660, in pag. 78, 79, 80, 81, and 82. gives the following Account of the Proceedings againſt this Nobleman.

This his compliance with them, at that time, by ſitting in their Judicatories, and their concurring with his advice and counſel, for the good of the land that was now under their feet, is the only particular ground upon which his ſentence is founded; and the particular ſpecial cauſe pretended, for which he was condemned to loſe his head as a Traitor, and to have his head put up on the top of the Toll-booth as an eminent Traitor. A ſentence, which queſtionleſs, at firſt view, may make all men of underſtanding aſtoniſhed, and to wonder how ever it could have entered into the mind of the Parliament of Scotland, to ſentence unto death, ſuch a Peer of the Land, ſuch an uſeful Member of the Kingdom, and an Ornament; upon ſuch a ground, and for ſuch a cauſe. But if theſe four particulars be conſidered, the matter will yet appear more wonderful.

1. The matter of compliance with the Engliſh at that time, was ſo far from being accounted treaſonable, that ſeveral of the Lawyers, (among whom was one Sir John Fletcher, who was now advanced to be his Majeſty's Advocate, and did accuſe this worthy Nobleman of Treaſon) did ſwear and ſubſcribe an oath, to be faithful unto the Government, as it was then eſtabliſhed, without King and Houſe of Lords. Now if there had been treaſon really in this deed, either by the civil law, or by the municipal laws of the land, would not the lawyers have perceived it, whoſe daily work and ſtudy the laws are?

2. If this had been the deed of this nobleman alone, the matter had been leſs to have been wondered at; but it being ſuch a deed whereof few of the Nobles of Scotland were altogether free, yea, whereof many of the Members of Parliament his Judges were guilty, the matter is beyond a parallel. It is hard to make ſocios criminis ſit as Judges and condemn the accuſed, reaſon would require that the table ſhould be purged. Is it not ſtrange for a Parliament to condemn one for ſuch a fault, for which many of their own Members might with as much juſtice and equity be condemned? And is it not ſtrange, how they being by their own confeſſion Traitors in the higheſt degree, could ſit and judge others? It is true, it will be replied, That his Majeſty might pardon whom he pleaſed: But then it will abundantly appear, that not this, but ſomething elſe was the cauſe of this worthy nobleman's death. Whatever may be ſaid in point of law, yet it will be a diſpute in point of conſcience. If Kings may pardon ſuch crimes as do deſerve death by the law of God, or if ſuch crimes which Kings may pardon, of their own accord, and according to their own good pleaſure, do before the Lord deſerve death?

3. If the Parliament had thought this particular worthy to bear ſo much ſtreſs, why would they have ſpent ſo much of their time in ſearching for other grounds to go upon? And why did they not make uſe of this at the firſt? But it is like this had never once been mentioned, if they had been able to faſten treaſon upon any other of his actions. And this makes it ſo much the more to be wondered at, that they would condemn ſuch a nobleman for ſuch a particular, which they would never once have named, if they could have done their intended work otherwiſe.

4. Is it not ſtrange, that of all the compliers of Scotland, there was not one, except this nobleman, impannelled upon this account, much leſs put to death? yea, is it not ſtrange, that thoſe noblemen were never once queſtioned, who being deſired by General Monk, when he was entering England with his army to encounter Lambert, did abjure King Charles and his intereſt, and this nobleman muſt die? Yea, is it not yet more ſtrange that one William Purves, who by complying had occaſioned almoſt ruin to many noblemen, burghs and gentlemen, ſhould have been abſolved by Act of Parliament, (as might be cleared, if there were a table of the unprinted Acts ſet down after their Acts, as is done always in other Parliaments) and yet this nobleman muſt be ſentenced to death, for complying for the good of the Country?

But to ſpeak unto the buſineſs in point of law, let theſe four or five particular Quære's be conſidered, and then any ſhall be able to perceive the iniquity of this ſentence.

1. By what Act of Parliament is ſuch a deed as this condemned as treaſonable? By what municipal law can any Member of the Kingdom be challenged upon the account of treaſon, for treating with a conqueror for life and liberty; and for ſitting in his counſels for the good of the country, after that he, with the reſt of the body of the land, had fought in the defence of King and Country till no more could be done; after the whole land had been overcome in ſeveral battles, and wholly over-run: and had acted nothing for the advantage of the enemy, and diſadvantage of the King and Country, before the victory obtained; but in all points had carried as became a loyal ſubject, contributing all the help by arms and counſel which was required? What Act of Parliament declareth ſuch a deed as this treaſonable, and ſuch a ſubject to deſerve death as a Traitor?

2. Was

2. Was there ever ſuch a Practique in Scotland ſince ever there was a King in it? Several times was the Kingdom of Scotland over-run by the Kingdom of England, particularly in the days of Baliol, and at that time King Edward cauſed the Nobles of Scotland to ſwear allegiance unto him. But when Bruce came to be King, was there any of the Nobles queſtioned for treaſon upon that account? And ſeeing there can no inſtance be produced out of the Hiſtory of Scotland, ſince ever it was a Kingdom, that any ſubject, nobleman or other, was accuſed of high treaſon, for ſuch a cauſe, ſurely this nobleman's caſe was unparallel'd.

3. Is not this ſtrange, conſidering what the principle of Royaliſts is? They ſay, that Conqueſt giveth a juſt title to a crown; ſo ſayeth D. Ferne, Arniſæus, and Maxwell, in his Sacro-Sancta Regum Majeſtas, cap. 17. And by this principle, Cromwel was the lawful ſupreme Governor of the Kingdom of Scotland, and had juſt title and right to the crown thereof, having now conquered the ſame. And if this principle of theirs be true, (which is much queſtioned by their oppoſites) no compliance with him, could by any law in the world, be treaſon againſt any Prince whatſoever; for obedience unto, and concurrence with, a lawful ſupreme Magiſtrate, can be treaſon againſt no man living: How then could this nobleman be challenged upon the account of treaſon for compliance? Let all the Royaliſts anſwer this, without contradicting themſelves, if they can.

4. Is there any lawyer who can produce ſuch a definition of treaſon againſt a Prince, or a ſupreme Magiſtrate, out of the civil law, as will condemn the deed of this worthy nobleman, and make compliance with a Conqueror for the good and ſafety of the Country, after all means of defence are broken and loſt, an act of treaſon? And ſince the civil law can condemn no ſuch deed as treaſonable, the ſentence given out againſt this nobleman, muſt be without all warrant of law.

5. Are there not many Countries, Kingdoms and Cities that have been over-run by their enemies, and have had their own lawful Governors put from them, and ſo have been forced to live under the feet of ſtrangers? And hath it not been uſual for them to comply with ſuch as had the preſent power in their hand, for their own ſafety and the good of the place? And was it ever yet heard, that ſuch were accuſed and condemned of treaſon againſt their own lawful Governors, thruſt from them ſore againſt their wills, for any ſuch compliance? And is it not wonderful that this eminent nobleman ſhould become a preparative to all the world?

XXIX. The Trial of the Lord Morley, for Murder, April, 30. 1666. 18 Car. II. before the Houſe of Lords.

MEmorandum *, That upon Saturday the 28th of April 1666, Anno 18 Car. II. all the Judges of England, viz. myſelf, J. K. Lord Chief-Juſtice of the King's-Bench; Sir Orlando Bridgman, Lord Chief-Juſtice of the Common-Pleas; Sir Matthew Hales, Chief-Baron of the Exchequer; my brother Atkins, brother Twiſden, brother Tyrell, brother Turner, brother Browne, brother Windham, brother Archer, brother Raynſford, and brother Morton, met together at Serjeant's-Inn in Fleet-ſtreet; to conſider of ſuch things as might in point of Law, fall out in the Trial of the Lord Morley †; who was on Monday to be tried by his Peers for a murder: and we did all una voce reſolve ſeveral things following, par. 1. Firſt it was agreed, that upon the letter of the Lord High-Steward directed to us, we were to attend at the Trial in our ſcarlet Robes, and the Chief Judges in their Collars of SS, which I did accordingly. But my Lord Bridgman was abſent, being ſuddenly taken with the Gout; the Chief-Baron had not his Collar of SS, having left it behind him in the Country; but we all were in ſcarlet, but no body then had a Collar of SS, but myſelf, for the reaſons aforeſaid.

2. It was reſolved, that in caſe the Peers who are Triers, after the evidence given, and the Priſoner withdrawn, and they gone to conſult of their verdict, ſhould deſire to ſpeak with any of the Judges to have their opinion upon any point of Law, that if the Lord Steward ſpoke to us to go, we ſhould go to them; but when the Lords asked us any queſtion, we ſhould not deliver any opinion, but let them know we were not to deliver any private opinion, without conference with the reſt of the Judges, and that to be openly done in Court. And this, notwithſtanding the precedent in the caſe of the Earl of Caſtlehaven, was thought prudent in regard of ourſelves, as well as for the avoiding ſuſpicion, which might grow by private opinions, all reſolutions of Judges being always done in publick.

3. Although we were not all agreed in the precedent of the Lord Dacre's caſe, cited by Sir Edw. Coke, in the Pleas of the Crown, p. 29, & 30. that the Judges may deliver any opinion in open Court, in the abſence of the Priſoner; yet it was agreed, that if the Lord Steward ſhould, in open Court, demand any of our opinions in any thing, though in the abſence of the Priſoner, we were to give anſwer to the queſtion, the Lord High-Steward ſhould demand of us; we being call'd to aſſiſt the Court, and the demand of any queſtion in ſuch caſe being referr'd to the diſcretion of the High-Steward.

4. It was reſolved by us all, that in caſe any of the Witneſſes which were examined before the Coroner, were dead or unable to travel, and oath made thereof, that then the examinations of ſuch Witneſſes, ſo dead or unable to travel, might be read; the Coroner firſt making oath that ſuch examinations are the ſame which he took upon oath, without any addition or alteration whatſoever.

5. That in caſe oath ſhould be made, that any Witneſs who had been examined by the Coroner, and was then abſent, was detained by the means or procurement of the Priſoner, and the opinion of the Judges asked whether ſuch examination might be read; we ſhould anſwer, that if their Lordſhips were were ſatisfied by the evidence they had heard, that the Witneſs was detained by means or procurement of the Priſoner, then the examination might be read; but whether he was detained by the means or procurement of the Priſoner, was matter of fact, of which we were not Judges, but their Lordſhips.

* Kelyng's Reports, page 53.

† Vide Moor's Reports 621. Reſolved by all the Judges, that on a Trial by Peers, the Priſoner cannot challenge any of the Peers that are returned on his Jury.

6. Agreed, that if a Witneſs who was examined by the Coroner be abſent, and oath is made that they have uſed all their endeavours to find him and cannot find him, that is not ſufficient to authorize the reading of ſuch examination.

7. Agreed, that no words, be they what they will, are in Law ſuch a provocation, as if a man kill another for words only will diminiſh the offence of killing a man, from murder to be manſlaughter. As ſuppoſe one call another ſon of a whore, or give him the lye, and thereupon he to whom the words are given, kill the other; this is murder. But if upon ill words, both the parties ſuddenly fight, and one kill the other, this is but manſlaughter, for it is a combat betwixt two upon a ſudden heat, which is the legal deſcription of manſlaughter*: and we were all of opinion that the Statute of 1 Jac. for ſtabbing a man, not having firſt ſtruck, nor having any weapon drawn, was only a declaration of the Common Law, and made to prevent the inconveniencies of Juries, who were apt to believe that to be a provocation to extenuate a murder, which in Law was not.

8. Agreed, that if upon words two men grow to anger, and afterwards they ſuppreſs that anger, and then fall into other diſcourſes, or have other diverſions for ſuch a ſpace of time as, in reaſonable intendment, their heat might be cooled, and ſome time after they draw one upon another, and fight †, and one is killed, this is murder; becauſe being attended with ſuch circumſtances as is reaſonably ſuppoſed to be a deliberate act, and a premeditated revenge upon the firſt quarrel; but the circumſtances of ſuch an act being matter of fact, the Jury are Judges of thoſe circumſtances.

THE Lord-Chancellor being then Lord-Steward, came from Worceſter-houſe in his coach, having (beſides his uſual attendance) Sir John Eaton, his Majeſty's chief Gentleman-Uſher, carrying a white Staff nine foot long; and Sir Edward Walker Garter King at Arms in his Coat of Office, attending on him. And he was met at Weſtminſter-hall-gate with five Maces more, who all went before him into the Court, where he took his place in a Chair of State; the five Maces placed themſelves on each ſide of the State; and Serjeant Lee went into the body of the Court, and there laid down his Mace; and he ſupplied the place of Marſhal or Crier of the Court. Sir John Eaton with the white Staff, and Sir Edward Walker ſtood at the lower-end of the State; Sir John Eaton on the right-hand of the Lord-Steward, and Sir Edward Walker on the left.

The Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, ſtanding at the lower-end of the Court, with three obeiſances coming up to the Lord-Steward, on his knee preſented the Commiſſion unto him.

Sir Thomas Fanſhaw Clerk of the Crown in the King's-Bench with the like reverence, came and received the Commiſſion from the Lord-Steward, and returned to his place in the midſt of the Court.

Serjeant Lee after an O-yes, made Proclamation, viz. the Lord High-Steward of England, doth command all perſons to keep ſilence, while his Majeſty's Commiſſion is reading.

Sir Thomas Fanſhaw read the Commiſſion.

Then Sir John Eaton and Sir Edward Walker carrying the white Staff between them, on the knee preſented it to my Lord-Steward, and he delivered it it back to Sir John Eaton, who placed himſelf with it on the lower-end of the State, on the right-hand of the Lord-Steward, and Sir Edward Walker on the left, on a ſeat even with the body of the Court, having a ſpace between them for the Lord-Steward to ſee the Priſoner; on which ſeat alſo ſat the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, and Mr. Kips the Seal-bearer, the Seal being laid at the lower-end of the State before the Lord-Steward.

O-yes again, and Proclamation made; The Lord High-Steward of England, doth command all perſons whatſoever, except Peers, Privy-Counſellors, and Judges to be uncovered.

Serjeant Barcroft called to make return of the precept to him directed, who came into the body of the Court, and delivered it to Sir Thomas Fanſhaw, and he read the return on the backſide of the precept.

O-yes again, and the Lords required to anſwer to their names.

The Lords Triers called by the liſt, Mr. Waterhouſe aſſiſtant to Sir Thomas Fanſhaw reading their names, and Serjeant Lee calling, John Lord Roberts, Keeper of the Privy-Seal.

Edward Earl of Manchester, Lord-Chamberlain.
Henry Lord Arlington, Secretary of State.

Aubery Earl of Oxford.
William Earl of Bedford.
James Earl of Suffolk.
Richard Earl of Dorſet.
John Earl of Exeter.
John Earl of Bridgwater.
James E. of Northampton.
Henry Earl of Peterborough.
Earl of Thanet.
Nicholas Earl of Scarſdale.
John Earl of Bath.
William Earl of Craven.
Thomas Viſcount Faulconbridge.
John Viſcount Mordaunt.
Philip Lord Wharton.
William Lord Pagett.
William Lord Maynard.
Francis Lord Newport.
John Lord Lucas.
Charles Lord Gerrard.
John Lord Berkley.
Horatio Lord Townſhend.
Anthony Lord Aſhley.
John Lord Freſhevile.

O-yes again, and the Lieutenant of the Tower called, to make return of his precept, and bring in his Priſoner.

The Priſoner brought to the Bar, and the precept delivered to Serjeant Lee, and by him to Sir Thomas Fanſhaw, who read the return on the backſide of the precept.

Then the Lord-Steward made a ſpeech to the Priſoner, telling him the cauſe of his being brought thither.

The Indictment read by Sir Thomas Fanſhaw, and the Plea made in the King's-Bench, where he had pleaded not guilty, and put himſelf upon his Peers.

Then the Lord-Steward made a ſpeech (by way of charge) to the Peers.

O-yes, and Proclamation made; If any will give evidence for our ſovereign Lord the King, againſt Thomas Lord Morley and Mounteagle, they ſhall be heard; the Priſoner ſtands at the Bar upon his deliverance.

Lord-Steward ſaid, he heard the Lord Morley was lame, and therefore bid the Lieutenant of the Tower ſet a chair for him to eaſe himſelf.

Lord Morley deſired to be heard, but the Lord-Steward told him, that it was uſual to hear the evidence firſt, and after that he might and ſhould be heard any thing he had to offer; whereupon he ſat down.

Serjeant Glynn the King's eldeſt Serjeant opened the Indictment, then Mr. Attorney-General Palmer.

Several Witneſſes examined; the Priſoner asking them what queſtions he pleaſed.

Two Witneſſes ſwore, that the Lord Morley run him into the head.

One Witneſs ſwore a former grudge *.

Another, that when he had run Mr. Haſtings thro' the head, he ſwore God-damme, I promis'd thee this, and now I have given it thee. And that the quarrel begun at the Fleece-Tavern about an Half-Crown, that the Lord Morley ſaid, he had laid down.

Mr. Solicitor-General Finch deſired the depoſitions of ſome Witneſſes taken before the Coroner, (who were ſince dead) might be read; which the Priſoner oppoſed, deſiring that no evidence might be given againſt him, but face to face.

The Lord-Steward demanded the opinion of the Judges, who by the Lord Chief-Juſtice Kelying delivered their opinion; that upon proof made that the Witneſſes were dead, and oath by the Coroner, that the depoſitions were unaltered, they ought to be read; which was done.

The depoſitions of three Witneſſes read.

Serjeant Maynard deſired, that the depoſitions of a material Witneſs taken at the Coroner's Inqueſt, (who had now abſented himſelf, ſo that they could not find him) might be read.

The Priſoner oppoſed it, and the opinion of the Judges being required; the Lord Chief-Juſtice delivered the opinion, That if the Court upon any evidence were ſatisfied, the Witneſs was withdrawn by the procurement of the Priſoner, the depoſition ought to be read, otherwiſe not. Whereupon Thomas Harding ſworn, depoſed, that Thomas Snell his Apprentice was lately run away from him, and that his fellows ſaid, he told them, before he went away; that the Lord Morley's Trial was to be ſhortly, but he would not be there.

The Court not thinking this evidence ſufficient, the depoſition was not read.

Lord Morley, deſired ſome witneſſes might be heard on his ſide, on his behalf, who were admitted, but not upon oath.

Lord Morley heard to ſay what he pleaſed for himſelf.

Mr. Sollicitor ſumm'd up the evidence as follows, viz.

April

* Mr. Haſtings and his brother had ſome time before met Lord Morley in the ſtreet, and groſſly affronted him; whereupon Lord Morley complain'd to the Houſe of Peers, who order'd them firſt into Cuſtody, and then committed them to the Tower, from whence they petition'd the Lords, who diſcharg'd them upon their entring into Recognizances for their good behaviour. Vide Lords Journals of that time.

April 30. 1666.

The Speech of Sir Heneage Finch Knt. the King's Sollicitor-General, at the Trial of the Lord Morley, (the Earl of Clarendon, Lord-Chancellor, being then Lord High-Steward of England, pro tempore) who ſumm'd up the Evidence, &c *.

THAT a man is ſlain, is not denied by my Lord Morley: the manner how it came to paſs, we have prov'd for the King. His Lordſhip hath endeavour'd by his witneſſes, to difference the caſe in ſome circumſtances: the queſtion will now be reduced to this; whether this fact be murder, as it is charg'd upon him in the Indictment, or any leſs offence than that; in which I ſee, my Lord Morley placeth his hopes, that it will fall. My Lord, becauſe that this is a queſtion of Law, ariſing from fact; I will, with your Grace's permiſſion, and the favour of my Lords the Peers, preſume in the firſt place, to lay down ſome principles, or concluſions in Law, wherein, I think I am not deceived; and would be loth to prevaricate in a caſe of blood. And when I have laid down the concluſions, I ſhall proceed to apply them to the fact now in proof before you, and compare it to ſuch a proof, as his Lordſhip hath produc'd. There are in Law but three caſes imaginable, which are any way capable of excuſe for the death of a man. Theſe are, Firſt, when a man kills another in his own defence. Second, when he doth it upon miſadventure, and meer accident. Third, when he doth it in heat of paſſion, or any ſudden adventure, (for that which is done in proſecution of Juſtice, hath no affinity with the preſent queſtion.) The two firſt of theſe do excuſe à Toto, 'tis not ſo much as felony; the laſt à Tanto, 'tis felony, but within Clergy. But yet, my Lord, the Common Law, the antient Common Law of England, would not endure to hear of any excuſe at all for the death of a man. By the antient Law, before the Statute of Marlbridge, he that killed a man in his own defence; and after that, till the Statute of Gloceſter, he that had killed a man by the moſt innocent misfortune in the world (the glance of an arrow, or any thing leſs than that) muſt have died for it, as a murderer. For, murder is a ſin ſo contrary to the genius and temper of the Engliſh nation, that whatſoever looks but like it, hath ever been proſecuted by our Law, by a moſt ſtrict and ſpeedy vengeance. When the Law began to let in ſome kind of excuſes in theſe caſes, yet they were circled in with as wary cautions and obſervations; and bound and limited with as nice diſtinctions and differences, as could be. And therefore, he that kills a man ſe defendendo, muſt not plead, that he did it ſo; but he muſt plead not guilty: for it is a maxim in the Law, that the death of a man can never be juſtified; nay, the Jury cannot find him to be ſe defendendo, but they muſt find the ſpecial fact, and leave it to the Court to judge, whether it were ſe defendendo, as in circumſtances. For if the fact be ſo, that the man did not fly to the wall, or his laſt refuge, before he did give the mortal wound, he is a felon ſtill. He that kills a man by accident, or miſadventure, muſt take care, that the action he was about, were abſolutely lawful and neceſſary too: for if there were an unneceſſary meddling with edge-tools, or fire-arms; if there were unneceſſary recreation in the act, which produc'd this event, he is reſponſible to the Law for the utmoſt conſequence. And at this day if a man that kills another in the city, eſcapes out of the city, the city is to be amerc'd for letting a notorious malefactor eſcape. Hitherto your Lordſhips ſee, that in theſe two caſes, which are moſt pardonable of any, yet the Law is very ſevere; and therefore, in caſes of an higher nature, it is ſtill more rigorous. Now becauſe the hope of this caſe, is, that it will end in manſlaughter, and becauſe that manſlaughter is only diſtinguiſhed from murder, in that it is not deſign'd, but otherwiſe, it is in itſelf an act as wilful and as violent, (though not ſo malicious) and ſo borders upon murder: I ſhall proceed to ſhew your Lordſhips how the Law watches upon manſlaughter, with all the jealouſies and circumſpections imaginable; and therefore, it is an undoubted principle of Law (and all the men in England hold their lives upon very miſerable terms, if it were otherwiſe) if any man ſhall meet a man in the ſtreet, and kill him without any viſible provocation, the Law ſuppoſeth there was malice precedent, and judgeth this act murder. Secondly, as it is murder, to kill without any provocation, ſo if the provocation be ſlight and trivial, it is all one in Law, as if there were none. For the Law of England allows no man, to value himſelf at ſuch a rate, as if the blood of his neighbour were a fit ſacrifice to expiate every mean and ſlight affront. This was the caſe, that fell out in the time of the moſt reverend Chief-Juſtice, the Lord Popham: A Gentleman of Kent came by another, and made wry mouths and laugh'd, and made ſuch ſigns as uſually put men into paſſion; the other preſently fell upon him and killed him; and my Lord Chief-Juſtice Popham and his brethren, deliver'd their opinions, that it was murder: for this was not a competent provocation, and the man was hang'd upon an appeal of murder. Thirdly, as no provocation makes it murder, and a ſlight one, is all one with none; ſo if the provocation be great and high, and ſuch, as might be capable of excuſe in itſelf, yet if a man be not ſlain in the very heat and bent of paſſion; if there be any interval of time, as a night's reſt, and ſleeping upon it, the Law knows no ſuch period: but if there be ſuch an interval, that the Law ſuppoſes the blood might, and ought to have been cool'd again; that a man might have come to himſelf, and then he falls on the perſon that gave him the provocation, that which was paſſion at the firſt, is malice at the laſt; and that which would have been manſlaughter then, is murder now. This I ſubmit to your Lordſhips judgments, who hear me now; and if I did not think the Law were clear in theſe points, I would not preſume to affirm it in ſo great and ſolemn an aſſembly. To come to the matter of fact; I deſire your Lordſhips to conſider what Mr. Haſtings hath done, and what he hath ſuffer'd. Firſt, there appears to be ſo little of provocation, that the poor Gentleman, that is murder'd, offer'd any man five pound to tell him what the quarrel was. His Lordſhip makes his defence, that he hopes his Peers will conſider, that there is no other provocation than the half crown. I am ſorry for it. I am ſure the the Laws of England, allow no man to take away another's life for half a crown, without being guilty of murder. The firſt thing that is ſaid Mr. Haſtings ſhould do, is this: he is in a manner ſuſpected, and hears my Lord quarrel about an half crown, and ſaith, I wonder a perſon of honour ſhould make ſuch ado about an half crown, and then throws down four half crowns upon the table to make ſatisfaction; preſently ſwords are drawn, and Mr. Brommidge draws his firſt, and hectors it for my Lord: then they are put up again; there is one interval, and recollection of time. My Lord proceeds to quarrel with Mr. Haſtings, and calls his ſins to remembrance; and knowing that Mr. Haſtings had been guilty of killing a man not long before, preſently tells him, we come not here to ſtab folks; which was a bitter reply. Mr. Haſtings is griev'd to ſee himſelf ſo openly reproach'd by my Lord, and could not chuſe but tell him, he was a Gentleman, (and ſurely Haſtings is a confeſs'd Gentleman, and a noble name in this Kingdom, and always muſt be) but at laſt goes a little farther, and ſaith, as good a Gentleman as my Lord. This is not comparable to laughing at my Lord, nor to making wry mouths; and yet if Haſtings had done this, and his Lordſhip had killed him for it, he had ſtood guilty of murder. Obſerve, I beſeech your Lordſhips, how Mr. Haſtings is treated, he is four times drawn upon, twice by Brommidge in the houſe; in the ſtreet, Brommidge draws upon him again; and juſt under the arch in Lincolns-Inn-fields he draws the fourth time. Now ſaith Mr. Haſtings, I have no quarrel to you Captain, if there be any, it muſt be diſputed between me and my Lord. This is not ſuch a ſpeech to make a quarrel, but to prevent one; what could a Gentleman do leſs, that found himſelf four times aſſaulted? For if he would decline the quarrel, the beſt way was to put Brommidge out of the caſe, as a likely expedient; when that would not do, to the field they come. And here, my Lord Morley hath produced ſome witneſſes, who being not to be ſworn, have ſaid freely, that Mr. Haſtings preſs'd my Lord to fight, and ſaw him draw, and attack with the three on the other ſide. Street ſaid, he reſolv'd to fight my Lord; and another, that my Lord ſaid he would not fight. This they bring, to make my Lord Morley purely paſſive, and only drawn to fight. Under favour, we muſt ſubmit to the judgment of your Grace, and your Lordſhips his Peers. The thing, that is ſaid here, is not probable. 'Tis plain, Mr. Haſtings had ſaid, he would give any man five pounds, that would tell him what the quarrel was: would he that knew no quarrel, have the blood of my Lord Morley? But then, compare this with the witneſſes, which we have brought and ſworn; all three expreſly ſay, they ſaw the fight, and the beginning of it. But with ſubmiſſion to your Grace, a fight it cannot be called; in truth, it is a direct aſſaſſination: for three witneſſes ſwore there were two upon one all the while; viz. upon Mr. Haſtings. And Mr. Haſtings being thus preſs'd, ſteps back to get a little ground; then my Lord takes him at the advantage, and ſhortens his ſword, and run him in the head. Now they that ſay, my Lord Morley went away firſt towards his own houſe, have forgot that he came back again and killed the man. I preſs this caſe upon the bare want of provocation, becauſe the conſequence is great in Law: I preſs it, as if the proof were to be ſet here, and no more were to be ſaid; and do preſume to affirm, it is malice in the Law, and murder in his Lordſhip. But yet we ſhall not reſt here; but if we go a little farther, your Lordſhips will ſee, here is malice apparent, malice confeſs'd, and moſt evident. As ſoon as Mr. Haſtings was ſlain, my Lord Morley, with a moſt deſperate imprecation, throws the ſword upon him, God damn me, there you lie. Another ſwears his Lordſhip ſaid, I have promiſed, and now you have it. Can your Lordſhips doubt now, whether my Lord killed Mr. Haſtings with a deliberate hatred? You ſee, he confeſſeth, it was in diſcharge of a promiſe; and my Lord is to be believed againſt himſelf. And the brother of the Gentleman hath made a ſad comment upon theſe words, and tells us, how the promiſe aroſe, and how it came to be perform'd. Mr. Haſtings tells his brother, that he once had the unhappineſs to have a quarrel with my Lord, many years ago, almoſt ten; and that fighting with my Lord, he had the misfortune to give him an hurt; and though the witneſſes ſpeak only out of his brother's mouth, yet he teſtifies, that his brother told it him in the anguiſh of his ſpirit, as a ſecret that troubled him, and which he did not tell out of deſign, but by way of lamentation. And yet if Mr. Haſtings had been found bleeding in the field, and been ask'd who kill'd him, and had ſaid, my Lord Morley had ſlain him; it had been good evidence, though no other witneſſes were, and though it came out of his own mouth. The brother ſwears farther, that my Lord Morley coming by, and his brother paying his Lordſhip due reſpect, my Lord received it with ſo much contempt, that his brother ſaid preſently, he knew not what it meant, I doubt he bears me a grudge. This was a year and an half before his death; but within a quarter of a year before, the witneſſes ſay, his brother, his father, and my Lord, were at an alehouſe; no ſooner was his brother gone down ſtairs, but when he came up again he finds my Lord, with a ſword drawn, and ſwears that his brother then told him, that my Lord was always urging him to drink; and then would ſeek all occaſions he could to give and take offence. So then, it ſeems, it was my Lord's cuſtom, to urge Mr. Haſtings, and to give him frequent provocations, as if he had ſought an occaſion for manſlaughter, that he might kill him within the protection of the Law. This is the moſt deſperate complication of malice, that can be. To this purpoſe, I ſhall preſume to put a caſe (which our books ſpeak) and which will highly concern the point, in this caſe. If my Lord Morley had fled to the wall, and had ſlain Mr. Haſtings when he had fled to the wall, that would not have ſerv'd his turn, as this caſe is; for our books tell us of one, who bore malice to another, and then provok'd him to draw his ſword; ſeeing the ſword drawn, he fled away, to tempt the adverſary to purſue, and ſtill retir'd till he came to the wall; now ſeeing himſelf at his laſt refuge, he thought to kill him legally and ſafely in his own defence. But ſince the pretence of Law, was but an art to diſguiſe the malice of his heart, which he now executed freely, the book ſays it was murder: ſo 'twill be here. Your Lordſhips will give me leave on this occaſion, to tell you, that it is either the misfortune, or the juſt reproach of ſome Governments in foreign States, that there are places abroad, where murder is a cheaper ſin than theft; and the ſame people, that will riſe up in arms as one man, to purſue a pilferer, will yet make a lane through the midſt of them, them, for the manſlayer to eſcape. Hence it comes to paſs, that men are ſlain every day for any thing, for nothing; inſomuch that a learned Civilian writing of thoſe Republicks, tells us plainly, Frequentiores ſunt hominum cædes, quam nativitates. But however it be in theſe Commonwealths, yet we, who have the happineſs to live under a Monarchy (the beſt of Governments) and under a King (the beſt of Monarchs) have all our Lives ſecur'd to us, by his Majeſty's own royal and immediate protection; and therefore no corruption of manners will ever be able, to bring this ſin into faſhion and credit amongſt us, nothing will ever naturalize it here. I do acknowledge to your Lordſhips (for why ſhould I conceal any thing that makes for my Lord Morley's advantage?) I do confeſs that an affront, or indignity offer'd to a Peer, is much more heinous, than that which is offer'd a private Gentleman. But I muſt needs ſay withal, that the Law hath provided another manner of reparation for a Peer, than that which it gives a Gentleman. The ſame words that being ſpoken of a Gentleman, will bear no kind of action, when they are ſpoken to a Peer, become Scandalum Magnatum. The Peer recovers great damage; the King inflicts fine or impriſonment: ſo that upon the matter the offender is bound in chains, and brought and laid at my Lord's feet. Now for him, whoſe honour is thus guarded by the Law, to avenge himſelf by his ſword, is a moſt unpardonable excuſe: I do not pretend, I do not offer to ſay, that the killing of a man, is more capital in caſe of a Peer, than would be in the caſe of a private Gentleman: but I do preſume to affirm, that no provocation in the world, can make that to be but manſlaughter in the caſe of a Peer, that would be murder in the caſe of a Gentleman; that is this caſe. Will your Lordſhips therefore give me leave to turn the tables, and ſuppoſe Mr. Haſtings had killed my Lord Morley, upon ſo ſlight and groundleſs a pretence; as ſuppoſe, my Lord Morley, in his life-time, had with grief of heart complained to his brother, that Mr. Haſtings did bear him a ſecret hatred, becauſe in a former combat, his Lordſhip had worſted Mr. Haſtings, and given him an hurt: Suppoſe, my Lord Morley had long before this complain'd farther, that he ſaw the effect of Mr. Haſtings's malice upon every occaſion, and when his Lordſhip did but offer to ſalute Mr. Haſtings, and give him a reſpect, Mr. Haſtings receiv'd it ſullenly and unmannerly, and return'd it with contempt; ſuppoſe that his Lordſhip had complain'd farther, that Mr. Haſtings did nothing but ſeek occaſions and pretences of a quarrel; and ſuppoſe that within a quarter of a year of my Lord Morley's death, Mr. Haſtings had been found in an alehouſe, with my Lord Morley, and had there drawn his ſword upon my Lord; and then my Lord had complain'd to his brother, that he did believe Mr. Haſtings would do him ſome miſchief, ſome time or other: And ſuppoſe, after all this, that my Lord Morley had been ſlain juſt in ſuch a manner, as Mr. Haſtings hath been, would your Lordſhip; would the Kingdom have thought this a ſufficient account for noble blood, if Mr. Haſtings had been only found guilty of manſlaughter, and eſcap'd by his Clergy, and a burning in the hand? My Lords, the quality of an offender may ſerve to inhance the crime; but ſince the World ſtood, it never was counted any abatement. The ſame duty to the King, the ſame obedience to his Laws, the ſame reverence to human nature, the ſame effuſion of chriſtian blood is expected from a Lord, which is required from the meaneſt Commoner of England. 'Tis the caſe of all the people of England, who are highly concern'd in the preſent example; if they put their truſt in the Law, as the great avenger of blood in the world; and once find themſelves deceived, who knows the conſequenee that may follow? What feuds in private families? What maſſacres it may produce at laſt? And therefore, no doubt, but all the Kingdom will obſerve, and mark the iſſue of this day; and will be curious to know, what will become of a Lord, in whoſe eyes the blood of a Gentleman hath been ſo vile and inconſiderable, if it were poſſible; I ſay, if it were poſſible, that ſo great a Tribunal as this, ſhould either miſtake the fact, or miſunderſtand the Law, what Judicature is there left on this ſide Heaven, for mankind to rely on? I pretend not to aggravate the matter: this is the place where no deteſtation of the crime, no paſſion of the Proſecutor, and (no) compaſſion of your Lordſhips towards a Peer of the Realm, is to have any ingredient in the verdict. And therefore, having obſerv'd to your Lordſhips, that there is malice imply'd by the Law, and in a manner confeſs'd by the party, beſides the direct and formal malice, which hath been prov'd; I ſhall now ſubmit all to the Judgment, which the Law hath wiſely placed in your Lordſhips moſt noble breaſts; with this only conſideration, 'tis the voice of blood that cryeth, I know your Lordſhips will give it ſuch an audience as it ought to have; ſuch an audience as may quiet it, and keep it from crying any more; ſuch an audience as may cleanſe the land from blood, and be a means to continue to your Lordſhips that due veneration, which all men have to your Lordſhips moſt righteous and impartial proceedings.

After him Serjeant Maynard ſpoke.

Lord-Steward deſired the Lords to withdraw into the Court of Wards, and conſider of their evidence; but he did not ſum up the evidence.

Lieutenant of the Tower bid to withdraw his Priſoner.

The Lords and the Priſoner being withdrawn; Serjeant Lee brought wine and biſkets to the Lord-Steward, and then round the Court.

The Lords ſtayed about three hours, and then returned into the Court, and took their places.

Sir Thomas Fanſhaw firſt called them according to their precedence; and all being preſent, he then called them again, beginning with the loweſt, who anſwering to his name,

The Lord-Steward aſked him, ſaying, my Lord Freſhevile, is my Lord Morley, Guilty or not Guilty? who laying his hand on his breaſt, anſwered, Not Guilty of Murder, but Guilty of Manſlaughter.

And in the ſame manner aſking them all ſeverally, they all gave the ſame anſwer, except two, the Lord Wharton, and Lord Aſhley, who anſwered, Guilty of Murder.

The Lords having delivered their verdict, the Lieutenant of the Tower was commanded to bring in his Priſoner.

The Lord-Steward told him, his Peers had found him Guilty of Manſlaughter, and aſked him, what he could ſay for himſelf.

He anſwered, he deſired the benefit of the Clergy, and the benefit of the Statute.

Lord-Steward ſaid, he muſt have the benefit of the Clergy; and that he conceived the Statute was clear in his behalf, and aſking the opinion of the Judges, they all bowed in token of conſent.

The Lord-Steward making a ſhort ſpeech of admoniſhment to the Priſoner, told him he was diſcharged, paying his Fees; and then diſmiſs'd the Court, and broke his Staff.

Sir Samuel Barnardiſton againſt Sir William Soame, late Sheriff of Suffolk, in B. R.*

CASE, and declares that a writ iſſued out of Chancery to the defendant, then Sheriff of Suffolk, to elect a Knight of the County for the Parliament ; and that the plaintiff was choſen by the majority of Freeholders, and that the defendant returned the writ with an indenture of the ſaid election, but maliciouſly intending to deprive the plaintiff, de fiducia & officio præd' falſo & deceptive, una cum indentura præd' retornavit unam alteram indenturam in cancellaria præd' ſpecificant' quod aliæ perſonæ liberi tenentes vel major pars liberorum tenentium elegerunt quendam Lionellum Tolmach, ubi revera præd' Lionellus non fuit electus per majorem numerum liberorum tenentium ; ratione cujus, the plaintiff was kept out of the houſe of Commons, and put to great charge to prove his election in the houſe of Commons. The defendant pleaded non culp. and upon trial at bar, Twyſden, Rainsford, and Wylde held, and ſo directed the Jury, That if this double return was made maliciouſly, they ought to find for the plaintiff, which accordingly they did, and gave him 800 l. damages ; though the evidence, as to the malice and falſity, was very ſlender. For the poll was granted, upon which the matter ſeeming doubtful, whether ſome of them who voted for the plaintiff had ſufficient freehold to qualify them to give their votes, the Sheriff, by advice of counſel then preſent, and of ſome Members of Parliament there alſo, made this double return, to prevent an action for a falſe return, in caſe it ſhould appear that ſome freeholders that voted for the plaintiff had ſufficient freehold. And after upon examination in Parliament, the election of the plaintiff was adjudged good, and the defendant committed by them for making this double return : And now 'twas moved in arreſt of judgment by North, Attorney General, and Scroggs, King's Serjeant, that this Action lies not, and that no ſuch Action was ever yet maintained in this caſe ; for the caſe of Nevil and Stroud was never reſolved, but in reſpect of difficulty ſent to Parliament, where it never received a determination. And the reaſons they urged againſt the Action, were, Firſt, becauſe the falſity or verity of the return is only examinable in the houſe of Commons, who are the ſole judges, and will puniſh ſuch falſities ; and accordingly they have ſo done in this caſe, by committing the Sheriff, and he ought not to be twice puniſhed for the ſame fault. And before the Statute of H. 6. no action lay for a falſe return, and that only gives an action of debt for 100 l. Secondly, the right of the party is not conſiderable in this caſe ; for this is not an office of profit, but of truſt, concerning the State. Thirdly, what the Sheriff does in this caſe, he doth as a judge, for he is judge of the election, and therefore no action lies againſt him. Fourthly, what the Sheriff doth in this caſe is propter difficultatem, upon his doubtfulneſs of the matter, and judges of aſſize may, propter difficultatem, adjourn an aſſize : the Sheriff hath done no more in this caſe than laid the matter before the houſe of Commons, that the validity of the votes may be there deliberately examined. To which 'twas anſwered by Maynard, King's

* Levinz's Reports, Part 2. 114. Keble's Reports, Vol. 3. 365, 369, 389, 419, 428, 442, 664.

King's Serjeant, and Sir William Jones, Sollicitor; Firſt, That here was malice and falſity in the Sheriff, and thereby damage and charge to the plaintiff, and all this found by the Jury, which is ſufficient to maintain an action in all caſes, whether there has been a like action in ſuch caſe or no before; for actions upon the caſe are founded upon the particular caſe, which is moſtly new. And the caſe of Nevil and Stroud was not for a double return, but for making no return; for there two were elected, and the Sheriff made no return as to one, and for that he brought the action. Secondly, The commitment by the Parliament is only to puniſh the contempt of the Sheriff, as to them and the State, but not to repair the party for the damage he ſuſtained; and thus in ſeveral reſpects, one may be twice puniſhed pro uno delicto. As it falls out often in many caſes, particularly in criminal matters, wherein the party is puniſhed for the King by indictment, and by the party for the ſpecial damage he ſuſtained. Thirdly, The Sheriff is not a judge of the election in this caſe, but a miniſter to take the polls; of which, in point of ſufficiency, the houſe of Commons is judge. Fourthly, Though the Statute of 7. H. 6. gives to the party the 100 l. penalty, that will not prove this action does not lie at common law. The Parliament intended only to give a certain penalty to the party, which was conſiderable then, though not ſo conſiderable now, and not leave them to a Jury's diſcretion altogether for damages. Et adjornatur ad proximum terminum, when Hale being in Court, he, Twyſden and Wylde, for as much as the return is ſaid to be falſo & malitioſe & ea intentione, to put the plaintiff to charge and expence, and ſo found by the Jury; held the action lay, and gave judgment for the plaintiff; Rainsford doubting.

Upon this a writ of Error was brought in the chequer chamber, where ſix judges were for reverſing the judgment, and two for affirming it.

Their Arguments here follow.

Barnardiſton verſus Soame. In Caſe.

The Caſe.

ON the death of Sir Henry North, one of the Knights for Suffolk, a writ was iſſued forth for the election of a new Member; and Sir Samuel Barnardiſton, and my Lord Huntingtowre, were the two candidates; but Sir Samuel carried it by 78 voices, and was returned: And my Lord Huntingtowre having made an intereſt with the Sheriff, got the Sheriff to return him too; and he ſat in the Houſe till the Election was there determined for Sir Samuel. Whereupon Sir Samuel Barnardiſton, for this double Return, brought an Action upon the caſe againſt the Sheriff, and tried it at the King's-Bench bar, 12 Nov. 1674. before my Lord Chief Juſtice Hale, and recovered 1000 l. damages: and afterwards a writ of Error was brought in the Exchequer Chamber, and there the judgment in the King's-Bench was reverſed; only Atkins and Ellis were for affirming it.

Judge Ellis's Argument is as followeth.

Firſt, The Declaration does conſiſt of the writ to the Sheriff, his Return, and the Averment of the plaintiff's damage.

The writ does ſhew the great import of what was to be done, and what he ſhould do.

Now as to the Return;

1. It is impoſſible to be a true Return, but it is a falſe Return; for that ſimul & ſemel, both ſhould be choſen at the ſame time, that can't be: So then he hath not obſerved the writ.

2. The writ requires that the Houſe ſhould be full, and have a Member of Parliament, but by this Return neither can ſit in Parliament; for it appears, that from the 24th of February, 25 Car. 2. until the confirmation, he was kept out. So the end of the writ not at all obſerved, and the buſineſs of the Parliament retarded as much as could be.

3. It may be ſaid, This may be done by miſtake, he may miſtake the law; but when the plaintiff comes and ſays, That he knowing the plaintiff was duly elected, and on purpoſe to keep him out of the Houſe, did falſo & malitioſe make this Return; then here is a falſe and malicious Return, and made knowingly upon him: Then an Action lies.

Then to conſider the Caſe,

1. At Common Law; and I conceive it will lie.

2. The Acts of Parliament have not taken away the remedy which the Common Law gave.

1. That the Common Law gave remedy; for that it was falſly and maliciouſly done, we muſt not doubt it: It is a matter of fact, and the Jury have found it ſo, and that there was a wrong done to Barnardiſton, and it is of the Sheriff's own knowledge: Then,

1. When I ſuffer an injury, joined with a loſs, the Common Law gives me a remedy for it.

Cooper and Andrews's caſe, Hob. 43.

Then take it as done by an Officer of juſtice, and a ſworn Officer, one of the greateſt in the Kingdom: If it ſhould not lie in that caſe, there would be a failure of juſtice, but no failure of wrong.

2. That in caſes of far leſs concern, as to Officers, it will lie, and then we ſhall ſee in this caſe what it will do.

Powle and Godfrey's caſe, Rolls lib. 1. 63. Co. lib. 12. 128. In that caſe, becauſe there was a temporal loſs to the party, though for a ſpiritual wrong, the law gave him damages.

Rolls 1 lib. 1. 108. 24. Ford and Hoſchin's caſe againſt an Archdeacon, F. N. B. 47. and yet an Archdeacon is a ſpiritual Officer: So that if he do not induct the Parſon, he may have his remedy; for where he ſuffers a loſs, the Law gives him his remedy.

Now here is injuria & dampnum, he does complain about the nature of his election, and the undue return of an election; and to a Court that never yet did give damages to the party.

3. Then where there is a colour of juſtice, and a man does proceed in a legal way, yet falſo & malitioſe, an action lies, Hob. 266. Waterer and Freeman's caſe. If a man will arreſt one, and put him to ſpecial bail, a ſpecial action of the caſe lies againſt him.

Cro.

Cro. 3. 130. Windham and Clere's caſe againſt a Juſtice of Peace: Whereas in truth the Juſtice never had any complaint. An action will lie againſt him, becauſe he did falſò & malitioſè.

Id. 21 E. 4. 22, 23. If a miſ-information be in a Court of Juſtice, an action lies againſt him. Now here is a very great miſ-information given to the Chancery upon this return.

Obj. This is a new caſe, and a caſe of a great deal of danger, and therefore we muſt have a great deal of care of making new laws.

Anſw. It were endleſs to put caſes where there never was a caſe before, yet an action will lie, if damage: there was no precedent for an action of the caſe, for falſly and maliciouſly accuſing one of treaſon, before Smith and Craſhaw's caſe. Rolls Abr. l. 1. 1131.

Bulſtr. 2. 270. Jones 93. Cro. 1. 15. Tho' there it was objected, that never any precedents were, that this action was brought for maliciouſly and falſly accuſing one of treaſon, and the danger of that action would lie, yet the Judges reſolved otherwiſe, being falſly and maliciouſly; and tho' never any precedents could be ſhewn, yet they gave judgment expreſly that the action would lie.

2 Cro. 534. Moor and Blackwell's caſe: Objected, that no precedent could be found where inſufficient returns have been amended; yet the Court ſaid, If there never was a precedent, they would make a precedent thereof. The firſt precedent had a beginning, and there was none at firſt.

2. There is a great difference where the Law is ſilent in the caſe.

Before Slade's caſe they never could ſhew any action of the caſe upon an Indebitatus aſſumpſit; multitudes of actions of debt, but none of the caſe, yet adjudged it would lie: For where there is eadem ratio, there is eadem lex: and will any man doubt where there is a falſe return, whether an action will lie? In actions of the caſe there is leſs reaſon to expect precedents than in other things; they grow as the invention of man grows, according as new frauds and new deceits ariſe, ſo ſhould new remedies.

Obj. Never an action brought for ſuch a return; and Littleton's rule is, That if ſuch an action could be brought, it would have been brought before now.

Anſw. 1. My Lord Coke ſays, The not uſer of an action does not take away the action, but ye may bring the action if ye have cauſe.

2. May it not be ſaid as it was ſaid to the former caſes? there were accuſations of treaſon, and falſe ones too, and no actions brought; therefore no action ought to lie now. I cannot ſee, if ye reverſe this judgment, ye muſt reverſe many more of the ſame nature.

'Tis true, there is a great difference, that if the nature of the thing be ſuch as it cannot be falſly and maliciouſly, the adding theſe words will not change the nature; but if the nature of the thing be ſo, and the Jury do find falſò & malitioſè, the action will lie: as for the firſt part, as for a falſe accuſation of ſtealing an apple off a tree, an action will not lie, tho' the declaration is falſò & malitioſè, for the nature of the thing will not permit it; ſo Moor, 491. Palmer and Porter's caſe, there no action will lie upon that reaſon: But in our caſe, the nature of the thing is of ſuch a wrong, that an action may lie.

Then tho' the Acts of Parliament may give remedy, yet that takes not away the remedy at Common Law, which was his ancient remedy. Plow. 113. puts many caſes to that purpoſe; and the difference is plain, for if it were no crime and offence at Common Law, but given by the Act, then no action could lie but upon the Act; but where there was another remedy, he may take either that at Common Law, or the other upon the Act.

The Common Law gave an action of the caſe upon too little iſſues returned by the Sheriff, the Statute gives an averment, yet he may take the action ſtill.

Now conſider the remedy this Act gives, and ſee whether it be ſo good a remedy: For, firſt, he muſt bring his action within the time limited by the Act, or elſe he is out of the Act; now if there be a double return depending in the Houſe, no man will bring an action, depending that return undecided, and the Judges will not countenance ſuch an action; ſo the party is quite deprived of his remedy. Then, ſecondly, as this caſe is, the Sheriff is not within the Act at all, for he has returned the plaintiff. Now if this ſhould be ſuffered, there would be an evaſion out of the Statute, and the Statute would give no remedy at all. Thirdly, It is the ſame miſchief to the plaintiff if my Lord had been ſingly returned, he might have vindicated his election as much as in this double return, and have been in the Houſe as ſoon.

Obj. This is a general matter, and all the ſubjects of England are concerned in it; and Co. Rep. 5. William's caſe, where there is a general nuſance, every man ſhall not have an action.

Reſp. Where there is a general concern, and no particular damage, every man ſhall not have an action; but when there is particular damage, there he may. Here is a particular damage to the plaintiff, and ſo he is well intitled to his action. Rep. 9. Marie's caſe. 1 Inſt. 59. Powell's caſe. 3 Cro. 664. Fineux and Hoveden's caſe.

Obj. This matter is matter proper to be determined in Parliament, and a hard caſe the Sheriff ſhould be condemned for that he could not help.

Reſp. As to the right of election, that is determinable there, and it was ſo; but for his damage, it neither was, nor could be examined there. If the houſe of Commons had given damages, and the Parliament had broken up, how ſhould he have recovered them?

1. Here is no action brought againſt a Member.

2. No action brought for any thing done in Parliament.

3. The return is into Chancery; the Sheriff's work was ended in Chancery: It was filed in Chancery, and there remains, and there muſt remain. So that all the malice and falſity was done in Chancery; and the action is not brought for any right of election, but for what was done to put him to charges.

If there had been an equality of voices, he muſt have returned ſo; nor is here a little miſtake, but what is done, is done falſly and maliciouſly, and with an intent to put him to charges.

Obj. The Sheriff is not concerned himſelf for what was done in the Commons houſe.

Anſw. He was not charged with it there; this action is not brought purely for a double return: yet if ſo, and he does it knowingly, an action will lie, the return is plain, for the Sheriff is a great Officer, and the law does give that credit to him, that it will not ſuffer an averment againſt his return, but an action of the caſe will lie, Rep. 11. Bagg's caſe; and the Sheriff is a ſworn Officer, and the law impoſes this man upon me, and the law is my caution in that caſe, and gives me a remedy.

that

Obj. Here is no double return, for it is no return at all, it not being under ſeal; and the Statute ſays, all returns ſhall be under the ſeal of the Electors: So here is no harm at all, he might have gone into the Houſe if he had pleaſed.

Anſw. At the Common Law there was no neceſſity the return ſhould have been under the ſeal of the Electors: So it is a good return until avoided, and not a void return. If it were not good unleſs under the ſeal of all thoſe that elect, what will become of thoſe that ſit now? It was never done yet; if he makes a return without ſeal, it is good, primâ facie.

As to the exceptions taken to the declaration, it is well laid in ſtrictneſs of pleading; he ſays, ſecundum exigentiam brevis; and tho' he ſays per aliam indenturam factam, it was as much as factum indentatum, 1 Inſt. 103. Leo. 310. Maydwell and Andrews's caſe. How ſhould it be a return, unleſs it be as it ſhould be? and ye muſt intend ſo as it ſhould be, 3 Cro. 737.

The pleading of Buckley's caſe is the ſame with this, and no exception taken to it: But if it had been upon a demurrer, there might have been more ſaid for the exception; but now it is an exception upon a verdict, and it ſhall be intended, that they that tried it had the right of the return. 2 Bulſt. 41. Yelv. 247. after a verdict a vicious plea ſhall be made good, Allen and Naſhe's caſe, 3 Cro. 53. ibid. 371. Southwell and Brown's caſe, and Fulwood's caſe, 4 Rep. is a ſtronger caſe than has been cited, and yet adjudged good.

Though there be no ſeal, yet when he returns this, and a man ſuffers damage by it, and all the miſchiefs that may happen, who is the party would take advantage of it? he that has done the wrong? No, he cannot, 21 E. 4. 22. 15 E. 4. 18, 19.

So therefore, both becauſe the declaration is well laid, and the party well entitled to his action,

The Judgment ought to be affirmed.

An Argument in the great Caſe concerning Election of Members to Parliament, by Sir Robert Atkins, Knight of the honourable Order of the Bath, and late one of the Judges of the Court of Common-Pleas.

Trin. 26 Car. II. In the Court of King's Bench, Rot. 577.

Sir Samuel Barnardiſton, Bart. Plaintiff; Sir William Soame, Defendant. In treſpaſs upon the Caſe.

THat whereas the King, 8 Feb. 25. of his reign, by a writ out of the Chancery, directed to the then Sheriff of Suffolk, commanded that he ſhould cauſe an election to be made of another Knight for the ſaid Shire, in the place of Sir Henry North, lately dead; and that he ſhould certify the election under his own ſeal, and the ſeals of thoſe that were preſent at the election, into the Chancery.

Which writ, 12 Feb. 25 Car. 2. was delivered to the defendant then Sheriff.

And, 24 Feb. 25 Car. 2. in full County, by the people reſident in that County, the writ was read.

And altho' the plaintiff was duly elected to be Knight for that County, by the greater number of the people then reſident in the ſaid County, every one whereof could ſpend 40 s. per annum, within that County:

And altho' the defendant, then Sheriff of the ſaid County, præmiſſa ſatis ſciens, afterwards the ſame 24 Feb. 25 Car. 2. returned the ſaid writ into the Chancery; together with an Indenture between him the ſaid Sheriff, and the aforeſaid Electors of the plaintiff, of the aforeſaid election of the plaintiff, made according as the ſaid writ requires.

Yet the defendant, then Sheriff, Officii ſui debitum minime ponderans, ſed machinans & mattitioſe intendens ipſum Samuelem in hac parte minus rite prægravare, and to deprive the plaintiff of the truſt and office of one of the Knights of the Shire, to be exerciſed in Parliament; and to cauſe the plaintiff to expend great ſums of money againſt the duty of his office:

Falſly, maliciouſly and deceitfully returned into the Chancery, together with the aforeſaid Indenture, another Indenture annex'd to the ſaid writ, purporting the ſame to be made between him the ſaid defendant, then Sheriff, of the one part, and divers other perſons; containing, That the ſaid other perſons, as the greater part of the ſaid County, did chuſe one Sir Lionel Talmach, Bart. otherwiſe Lionel Lord Huntingtowre, as Knight of the Shire, to come to Parliament.

Whereas in truth, the ſaid Lionel was not choſen by the greater part.

By reaſon of which falſe return of the ſaid other Indenture, the plaintiff could not be admitted into the lower Houſe at the return of the ſaid writ, and a long time after.

'Till the plaintiff, upon his petition to the Commons, and till after he had ſpent divers great ſums of money about the proving of his election, and divers pains and labours in that behalf ſuſtain'd, afterwards, ſcil. 20 Feb. 26. Car. 2. he was admitted, and his election was declared to be good.

Judgment. Pro quer' Sir Samuel Barnardiſton, in the King's Bench, for the 800 l. damages, and for the 98 l. coſts.

The defendant, Sir William Soame, ſued a writ of Error before the Juſtices of the Common Bench, and the Barons of the Exchequer, in the Exchequer Chamber, to reverſe the ſaid judgment given by the Judges in the King's Bench.

And two of the Juſtices of the Common Bench, viz. Sir Robert Atkyns, and Sir William Ellis, upon argument, were of opinion, That the ſaid judgment was good in law, and were for affirming that judgment.

But the other two Judges of the Common Bench, and the four Barons of the Exchequer, holding the ſaid judgment in the King's Bench erroneous, were for reverſing the ſaid judgment.

And the ſaid judgment ſtill ſtands revers'd; but needs a redreſs by error in Parliament.

Sir Samuel Barnardiſton, Bart. Plaintiff, Sir William Soame, Defendant, in an Action upon the Caſe.

I Shall divide the Record into the ſeveral parts of it.

1. There is firſt, the occaſion, or, as we commonly call it, the inducement to the action; that is, Sir Henry North, who ſerved in Parliament as Knight of the Shire for Suffolk, died; and a new writ iſſued to chuſe another in his place.

2. In the next place, the right that accrued to the plaintiff Sir Samuel Barnardiſton, he was duly elected Knight of the Shire.

3. The injury done him by the defendant, with the aggravations of it, viz. Altho' the defendant well knew the plaintiff was duly elected, and tho' he did return him; yet, contrary to the duty of his office as Sheriff, and intending to oppreſs him, and to deprive him of the right he had, and on purpoſe to put him to great expence and charges,

He did falſly, maliciouſly, and deceitfully return another Indenture with the former; importing, that another perſon was choſen by the greater part of the County.

4. The damage ſuſtained by the plaintiff, after the writ was returned.

1. He could not for a long time be admitted to ſit to do his duty, and diſcharge his truſt.
2. He was put to great charges to prove his election.
3. He did ſuſtain great pains and labour.

5. The right done him at laſt, and the ſatisfaction and amends made him;

1. By the Houſe of Commons. His election was declared good, and he was admitted to ſit.
2. By the Jury. They have found the wrong done by the defendant, and the damage ſuſtained by the plaintiff; and they have repaired him with 800*l.* damages.
3. By the Court of King's Bench. They have given judgment for the plaintiff.

And the Queſtion before us, is, whether this judgement be erroneous? I hold the judgment not to be erroneous. I am for affirming of the judgment.

1. I conceive the matter ſet forth in the plaintiff's declaration, to be actionable. 2. That the wrong and injury complained of, is ſuch for which the Law gives him a remedy. And 3. That he has taken his proper remedy, by bringing this action upon the caſe.

All this being in the affirmative, the proof of it lies upon me.

My ground and foundation is this, That where one perſon does injury to another, and the perſon to whom the wrong is done, ſuſtains particular damage and loſs by the injury, there the Law gives a remedy by action, to the party injur'd.

But here is an injury done.
And here is a particular damage ſuſtain'd.
Therefore an action lies.

I ſhall firſt prove the ground or foundation, which is the major propoſition, That where a wrong or injury is done, and a particular damage ſuſtained, there the Law gives a remedy by action.

1. From the nature and quality of the Law; which is to do right to all, and to give relief and redreſs to thoſe that receive wrongs. And ſhould there be any caſe where a perſon might receive an injury and damage, and yet have no remedy nor redreſs, the Law would be defective; which would be a reproach to the Law and Government.

The Law has appointed ſeveral Courts, and given them ſeveral powers and juriſdictions; ſo that in the one or the other, every perſon that has ſuffered injury and damage may make his complaint, and have right done him.

Sir Edw. Coke in his Mag. Chart. fol. 405. in his Expoſ. upon the Stat. of W. 2. c. 14. ſays, It is an ancient maxim of the Common Law, Non recedant querentes a curia Regis ſine remedio. Whoever has juſt cauſe to complain, ſhall have their juſt remedy. And curia Regis non debet deficere in juſtitia exhibenda.

Both theſe rules and maxims, which have one and the ſame ſenſe, are remembred in that Stat. of Mag. Chart. c. 24.

In Pinchon's caſe, 9 Rep. fol. 88. b. adjud. That an action upon the caſe lies againſt executors for a debt, due by the teſtator upon a ſimple contract. And in the argument of that caſe it is ſaid, That by that reſolution, Juſtice and right is advanc'd, and the creditor paid his juſt debt; and if the debt ſhould be diſcharged by the death of the debtor, it would (ſay the Judges) be a great defect in the Law, that there ſhould be a right, and no remedy for it: And the Judges urge the maxim I mentioned but now, curia Domini Regis deficere non debet conquerentibus in juſtitia exhibenda.

In Meriel Treſham's caſe, 9 Rep. fol. 3. it is urged as an abſurd thing in law, that a man ſhould have wrong done him, and yet ſhould be without remedy: And the reporter does obſerve, that the Judges in all ages have endeavoured to put the rule of W. II. in execution, Curia Domini Regis non debet deficere conquerentibus in juſtitia exhibenda.

Nay, the Law has ſo great a zeal for redreſſing of wrongs, that as ſacred as the maxims and rules of the Law are, yet if there were any rules or maxims that ſtood in our way to hinder, the Law would break through thoſe rules and maxims, rather than ſuffer an injury to be without remedy. 4 Inſt. fol. 71. about the middle, No wrong or injury, either publick or private, can be done, but it ſhall be reform'd or puniſh'd in one Court or other, by due courſe of Law. And in the lower end of that folio, A failure of Juſtice is abhorr'd in Law.

Sir Fran. Bacon, amongſt the elements of the Law, fol. 51. delivers this as a principle, Receditur a placitis juris potius quam injuria & delicta remaneant impunita; which he himſelf expounds in this ſenſe, The Law will diſpenſe with ſome maxims, rather than wrongs ſhould be unpuniſhed.

2. My next argument to prove this poſition, That where an injury is done, and damage ſuſtained, the Law gives remedy, ſhall be taken from the nature of an action, which is the ordinary remedy the Law gives for the repairing of a private wrong.

Now what the nature and definition of an action is, we learn from the moſt ancient authors of the Law, as Bracton, and Fleta, and the Mirror of the Juſtices, as they are collected by Sir E. C. 2 Inſt. fol. 40. and they all agree almoſt in the ſame words:

Actio

Actio nihil aliud eſt quam jus proſequendi in judicio, quod alicui debetur, & quod naſcitur ex maleficio, vel quod provenit ex delicto vel injuria.

It is nothing elſe but a means or remedy for a man to have right done him, that has ſuffered wrong and injury.

It is the argument commonly uſed, and the reaſon given to maintain an action, and in particular an action upon the caſe, viz. That there is an injury done, and a damage ſuſtained.

Sir E. C. 12 Rep. fol. 128. reſ. p. tot. cur. If a Sumner return one ſummon'd, or cited into the Spiritual Court, where in truth he was never ſummoned, and he is pronounced contumax, and thereupon excommunicate; he ſhall have an action upon the caſe againſt the Sumner: And the reaſon given is, becauſe there is injuria & damnum. 'Tis the ſame caſe that is reported in Rolls 1 Rep. fol. 63. by the name of Powle and Godfrey; which I ſhall have further occaſion to mention before I have done: You have the ſame caſe reported by Sir Francis Moor, fol. 835.

This may ſuffice to prove the major propoſition, That where wrong and injury is done to any man, and particular damage ſuſtained by it, there the Law entitles him to an Action.

For the minor propoſition, That in the caſe before us, there is a wrong and injury done to the plaintiff, and a particular damage ſuſtained by him: To make this out, I ſhall need to do no more than barely to relate the very fact; and put it as a queſtion to any plain man, that has but a common capacity, and no learning, nor acquired Parts; and to ſtand to his judgment in the caſe.

And the caſe is no more than this: The plaintiff had the honour to be choſen to that great truſt and employment, of a Knight of the Shire, by his Countrymen, to ſerve in Parliament; by which he was juſtly entitled to ſeveral great privileges, and to wages for the time he ſerv'd. And 'tis an honour and employment we all know is highly eſteem'd, and generally deſired and ſought after; and he that deſires it, deſires a good office. The defendant having the office of a Sheriff, and being bound by his office and oath to do juſtly and truly, Et præmiſſa ſatis ſciens; that is, well knowing the plaintiff had the only right to be returned, and that no other had the leaſt colour for it, and where there was not the leaſt doubt or difficulty in the caſe:

Yet falſly, deceitfully, and maliciouſly to deprive him of his truſt and office, on purpoſe to put him to great charges, he returned another perſon with him.

And after all, the Queſtion is, Whether he has done him any wrong or no?

By occaſion of this, the plaintiff was hindred from ſitting in the Houſe, and was put to great expence, and underwent great trouble and labour. And the Queſtion is, Whether the plaintiff has been at any particular damage?

Shall I have my action for a half-penny treſpaſs, pedibus ambulando? Does the Law give me an action of aſſault and battery, if a man does but lift up his hand to ſtrike me? Or for a few ill words, that will break no bones? And ſhall I recover damage for theſe petty things, and ſhall no action lie for ſo notorious an injury as is done in this caſe?

But our greateſt work is to anſwer the many objections that have been made againſt this action; which yet I will be bold to ſay, have much more of wit than of weight in them.

And the difficulty rather lies in the great power and intereſt of the parties to the action, and of thoſe that concern themſelves in the example and conſequence of it, upon a politick account, than from any uncertainty of the Law: that is, there is a deſign to model the Parliament to the humour of the Court.

Sir Ed. Coke, in his preface to 10 Rep. fol. 6. in the beginning of the folio, affirms, That he never ſaw any caſe of great value proceed quietly, without many exceptions in arreſt of judgment.

Object. 1. This is a matter that concerns the Government, and is of a publick nature; the employment of a Parliament-man, conſiſting in negotiis regem, ſtatum, & defenſionem Regni & Eccleſiæ concernentibus: And therefore the puniſhment of an offence committed, in reference to this, ſhould be by a publick proſecution, and not to be appropriated to any particular private perſon; nor the amends and ſatisfaction made to any one man.

Anſw. It muſt be agreed, That publick injuries wherein all, or very many are concerned, are proper for a publick proſecution; as in the name of the King, or by a preſentment at a Leet, or Quarter Seſſions, &c. But if any particular man receive a particular damage by the publick offence or injury, he ſhall have his action; and this is conſiſtent enough with the proſecution for the publick. As the caſe of 27 H. 8. fol. 26, 27. Br. Abr. Act. Sr. Ca. Plac. 6. If a man make a ditch upon the King's high way, this is a wrong to every man that has a right to paſs that way; and he is preſentable at a Leet for this offence. But if I and my horſe happen to fall into the ditch, riding along the way, and ſo receive a particular damage, I may have an action upon the caſe againſt him that made the ditch. 9 Rep. 113. 5 Rep. 72, 73. It is the ordinary caſe, A. makes an aſſault and battery upon B. this is but one ſingle act, but it has a double aſpect; 'tis a breach of the King's peace, and for that A. is indictable, and may be fined to the King, and impriſoned. It is a particular wrong to B. for which B. may have an action of aſſault and battery, and recover damages; and both of them conſiſtent.

So in our caſe, this falſe and malicious double return, it was an injury to the King and Kingdom, and to the Houſe of Commons, in that while the election by this means was under diſpute, they wanted the plaintiff's ſervice and aſſiſtance. It was a wrong to the County of Suffolk, for the Knight of a Shire has plenam poteſtatem pro ſe & communitate comitatus ad faciendum & conſentiendum. But it was more particularly an injury to the plaintiff; in that he was for ſome time deprived of the honour done him by his Country; who by their electing of him, ſettle that character upon him, that he was magis idoneus & diſcretus; for the writ commands ſuch to be choſen.

He was hindred from diſcharging his truſt, committed to him by his own Country; hindred from doing ſervice to the King and Kingdom; hindred of his wages.

The Stat. of 27 H. 8. c. 26. which unites England to Wales, enacts, That for every Shire in Wales there ſhall be choſen one Knight to ſerve in Parliament, and one Burgeſs for every Borough; and that the Knights and Burgeſſes ſhall have like dignity, pre-eminence, and privilege, and ſhall be allowed ſuch fees as other Knights and Burgeſſes of the Parliament have, and are allow'd: by which it appears there are dignities, pre-eminences, privileges and fees, belonging to ſuch as ſerve in Parliament; of all which, the plaintiff, for a time, was hindred by this falſe return.

And in that it does concern the Government, it argues the greater injury done to the plaintiff; for every Member of Parliament, for the time he ſerves there, is inſtrumental in carrying on the Government: which is an high honour to him. Tu regere imperio populos, Hæ tibi erunt artes. 'Tis a noble employment.

And ſince it does ſo nearly concern the Government, we that are Judges ſhould be the more careful to diſcourage all abuſes committed by Sheriffs in elections: It is of vaſt concernment to the Kingdom that elections ſhould be fair, and returns duly made, without partiality and indirect means uſed. And we, by judgments, ſhould encourage all remedies againſt ſuch abuſes and practices.

Beſides all this, the plaintiff has been put to great expences, and undergone great labour and trouble; which is a private and particular damage, and therefore entitles him to his particular action.

A Juſtice of peace may have an action of ſlander in relation to his office, yet that was not an office at Common Law neither; and yet it concerns the Government.

The Stat. of 7 H. 4. cap. 1. recites, That the Commons made a grievous complaint to the King, of the undue elections of the Knights of the Counties, which (ſays the preamble) be ſometimes made by affection of the Sheriffs, to the great ſlander of the Counties, and hindrance of the buſineſs of the Commonalty of the ſaid Counties.

By which it appears, how great the miſchief was in thoſe days, and whence it came principally, viz. from the partiality of the Sheriffs: And that Stat. to prevent the abuſes, does appoint the return of Indentures under the ſeal of the Sheriff, and the ſeals of the Electors: But the defendant in our caſe has practis'd an abuſe even in the very remedy, by returning ſeveral Indentures, and ſo evading the good proviſion made by that Statute.

The Stat. of 11 H. 4. c. 1. obſerves, That no pain is ſet in ſpecial by that Stat. of 7 H. 4. upon Sheriffs, if they make returns contrary to that Statute, and gives power to Judges of Aſſize to puniſh them, and to inflict the penalty of 100 l. upon the Sheriff; and the Knights unduly returned are to loſe their wages: And all this depends upon the enquiry made by the Judges of Aſſize. At this time ſurely this matter of elections, and the examining and determining of the right, was not held ſo ſacred and ſo incommunicable a thing as ſome would have it now; for by this Statute 'tis referred to the Judges of the Aſſize.

But the principal Statute in this matter, is that of 23 H. 6. c. 15. which ſets out the great abuſes by Sheriffs committed in elections; it recites, That of late divers Sheriffs, for their ſingular avail and lucre, have not made due elections of the Knights. One would think by thoſe words (for their lucre) that there was money ſtirring upon theſe occaſions, even in thoſe times; and that ſome men paid dear to be choſen Parliament-men: Or elſe, how could a Sheriff make profit to himſelf by an election? And to be a Parliament-man, it ſeems, was a very deſirable thing in thoſe days.

And foraſmuch (ſays that Statute) as a ſufficient pain, and convenient remedy for the party in ſuch caſe grieved, is not ordained in the ſaid Statutes againſt the Sheriffs: It therefore provides a better remedy.

But let us, to our purpoſe, obſerve by the way, that it mentions the Party grieved; ſo that there is a Party grieved: It is not meerly a publick offence, but an injury to ſome particular perſon, and to ſome one perſon; for it ſays, the party grieved, but it does not mention who that party grieved is. So that it may be objected, that thoſe words, (the party grieved) refers to every Elector, as well as the Knight elected.

But the enacting Clauſe expounds the words, and declares whom the makers of that law meant; for it makes the firſt offer of the forfeiture to every perſon choſen Knight, and not duly returned: So then 'tis plain, that the Knight elected, and not returned, is the Party grieved. If he have a particular wrong done him, then it follows he ought to have a particular remedy and ſatisfaction: And he was a party grieved before theſe Statutes made, and this penalty and remedy given; for theſe Statutes do not firſt make him a party grieved, but mention him as being ſo before. If he were ſo before, ſurely the Law gave him ſome remedy, or elſe there was a Gravamen without Remedium; which would have been a defect in the ſame.

Object. 2. Is that which I think is moſt relied upon, and that has moſt weight laid upon it, viz. That this action concerns an election of a Knight to the Parliament, and therefore belongs to the juriſdiction of the Parliament, and ought to be determined there, and not by any Court inferior to it.

Anſ. To this it has been truly anſwered, That tho' in this caſe we have often occaſion to ſpeak of the Parliament, and to mention an election to Parliament, yet the right of election is not called in queſtion, nor was it to be tried in this action, but was determined by the Houſe of Commons; and this action is purſuant to that deciſion of the right of election by the Parliament, and grounds it ſelf upon it.

I ſhall, however, take this occaſion in the firſt place, to ſhew in what matters that concern the Parliament, the Judges of Weſtminſter-hall have in all times, and muſt meddle, and take cogniſance of them. And in the next place, what they have declined, and left to the Parliament.

1. They have debated and reſolved, what is a good Seſſion of Parliament, and what is not, and what makes a Seſſion, as in Tr. 12 Jac. in B. R. Rolles, Rep. 29. There were ſeveral Acts of Parliament that had paſs'd at a former Parliament, which were continued only to the firſt Seſſion of the next Parliament; and in that caſe they held thoſe Acts then ſtill in force: for tho' the Parliament had met, yet no Act paſſing, they therefore adjudged it was no Seſſion, and there was a neceſſity that the Judges ſhould determine this. For tho' the King and Parliament make Acts, yet the Courts in Weſtminſter-hall put thoſe Acts in execution, and therefore muſt firſt ſatisfy themſelves.

2. Whether they are in force or not ſo, in the Prince's caſe 8 Rep. whether the charter made by King Ed. 3 to the Prince, were an Act of Parliament or not, is here argued and reſolved. So 4 H. 7. 18. 6 and 7 H. 7. 14, 15.

3. In Rolls Ab. 1*ſt part, fol.* 93. ca. 19. under the Title of Action upon the Caſe, there is cited 17 E. 3. in B. R. Rot. 69. where an Action is brought by John Bokeland, Knight of Wiltſhire, againſt the Sheriff of that County, for not levying 10 l. 4 s. pro expenſis ſuis in attendencia ſua in Parliamento. Now in order to the recovery of this Action, many things relaing to the Parliament, as, When the Parliament began? How long his attendance was?

and divers other queſtions relating to the Parliament, muſt of neceſſity be incident.

10 Eliz. Dy. fol. 275. The very lower end of that folio, there is an Action brought againſt the Keeper, for letting a Burgeſs of Parliament to go at large by writ de privilegio Parliamenti, who was in execution. The Lord Dyer ſays nothing there, what became of it; but Sir Francis Moor, in his Rep. fol. 57. at the lower end of that fol. reports, that it was held by Dyer, that if one condemn'd in debt or treſpaſs, be choſen to the Parliament, and after taken in execution, that he ſhall not have his privilege of Parliament. And, as he ſays, it was ſo held by the Sages of the Law, in the caſe of Ferrers; and that tho' his privilege was indeed allow'd, yet, (as they held) it was minus juſte, which caſe of Ferrers was the ſame here mentioned before to be in Dy. fol. 275. as appears by Mr. Crompton in his juriſdiction of Courts, fol. 8. b.

So that ſome things relating to the Parliament, the Courts of Weſtminſter-hall muſt determine; and the Judges cannot avoid it, if they will do juſtice.

2. But ſome things there are concerning the Parliament, which the Courts of Weſtminſter-hall may determine if they think fit; or they may at the diſcretion of the Judges ſuſpend their further proceeding, and refer them till the Parliament meets to determine them.

33 H. 6. fol. 17, 18. It is there debated by the Judges, whether it were a perfect and legal Act that paſs'd in Parliament againſt Sir John Pilkington, for a rape committed by him; and it depended upon the courſe of the two Houſes, in their tranſmitting of bills from one to another, and of indorſing the bills; and they ſent for the clerk of the Parliament and conſulted with him about it; and there, Forteſcue, chief Juſtice, held the Act in queſtion to be a good Act of Parliament; but, ſays he, peradventure the matter, or queſtion, ſhall wait, till the next Parliament meet, and then we may be certified by them of the certainty of the matter. By this it appears, that the Judges did not diſown the juriſdiction of that cauſe, that was ſo nearly depending upon the uſage of Parliament, but that it belonged to them, and not to the Parliament; yet it was convenient to be adviſed by the Parliament, and to wait till then.

And Sir Ed. Coke, in his 2 Inſt. 408. tells us, that matters of difficulty were uſually adjourned to Parliament.

3. Some things there are that concern the Parliament, wherein the Courts of Weſtminſter-hall muſt not intermeddle, but the juriſdiction belongs to the Parliament only.

By the Statute of 4 H. 8. c. 8. tho' all in that Act that concerns one Richard Strode, is a private Act, yet there is one clauſe which is a general Act, and is declaratory of the ancient law and cuſtom of Parliament, viz. It is enacted, That all Suits, Accuſements, Condemnations, Executions, Fines, Amerciaments, Puniſhments, Corrections, Charges and Impoſitions, at any time from thenceforth, to be put or had upon any Member, for any Bill, ſpeaking, reaſoning, or declaring of any matter concerning the Parliament, to be communed or treated of, be utterly void and of none effect. This concerns none but Members of Parliament, and it provides for freedom of debates in matters that are proper to be treated of in Parliament.

The Lords, for themſelves only, and for their own Houſe, made claim of this privilege and juriſdiction, 11 R. 2 num. 7. Sir Robert Cotton's Abr. fol. 321. but it is limited only to matters moved in Parliament, and the King allowed it in full Parliament.

And Sir Ed. Coke, in his 2 Inſt. fol. 15. ſays, that pari ratione, the like belongs to the Houſe of Commons: * And this is the reaſon ſays Sir E. C. that Judges ought not to give any opinion of a matter of Parliament, becauſe it is not to be decided by the common Laws uſed in other Courts, but ſecundum legem & conſuetudinem Parliamenti.

So likewiſe in caſe of the privilege of a Member of Parliament, againſt ſuits and executions, ſitting the Parliament, the Judges have refuſed to give their opinion, tho' demanded by the Lords. As they did in the caſe of Thorp, Speaker of the houſe of Commons, who was taken in execution between two Seſſions of Parliament, of which the Commons made complaint to the Lords, and the Lords asked the advice of the Judges, whether the Speaker ought to be delivered by privilege of Parliament; the Judges anſwered, That they ought not to determine the privilege of the high Court of Parliament: the caſe is 31 H. 6. fol.— Rolls Ab. 2*d* part, 94. ca. 1. See 39 H. 6. Sir Robert Cotton's Abridg. num. 6.

Concerning departure from Parliament, (ſitting the Parliament) and not attending according to their duty; the caſe ſeems doubtful, whether any other Court than the Parliament can determine of that offence, it ſeeming to be of a middle nature. For tho' it be an offence committed by a Member, and that in Parliament-time, which argues for their privilege, and againſt the juriſdiction of any inferior Court, eſpecially while the Parliament ſits, who undoubtedly may take cognizance of it, and puniſh it: Yet on the other ſide, when the Parliament has not taken cognizance of it, and the Parliament is riſen, why ſhould not that offence, at the King's ſuit, be puniſhed in the Star-chamber, while that was a Court, and now in the King's Bench? And why ſhould privilege protect againſt non-attendance, when the true ground of privilege is by reaſon of attendance. And Mr. Plowden who was a very learned lawyer, ſubmits to the juriſdiction, but traverſes his departure; as the caſe of the Biſhop of Wincheſter, 3 E. 3. remembred by Sir Ed. Coke in his 2 Inſt. in his Chapter of Parliament, (as far as he reports it) ſeems rather to be an authority againſt the juriſdiction of any other Court beſides the Parliament it ſelf, in ſuch caſe of proceeding againſt a Member to puniſh him for non-attendance: For the Biſhop being impleaded by original writ at the King's ſuit, (which I ſuppoſe was in the King's Bench) quia receſſit à Parliamento ſine licentia Regis.

The Biſhop pleaded, quod ipſe eſt unus de paribus, & dicit, quod ſi quis eorum deliquerit in Dominum Regem in aliquo Parliamento, in Parliamento debet corrigi & emendari, & non alibi in minori curia. And ſo Sir E. C. ſeems to leave the victory on the Biſhop's ſide, and that his plea ſucceeded. But Sir Francis Moor, 779, 780. reports the caſe of the Lord Sturton, and the Lord Mordant, how they were deeply fined in the Star-chamber, 4 Jac. for abſenting from Parliament, at the complaint of the Attorney-General, ore tenus. And there were then preſent in the Star-chamber, the Lord Chancellor, Chief Juſtice Popham, Fleming, and Walmſly. And for precedents to juſtify the proceeding againſt them in that Court, they cite the caſe of the Earl of Cornwal, 4 H. 3. and the Biſhop of Wincheſter's caſe, (which I mentioned but now) 3 E. 3. how that for depart-departing from Parliament, without licence, their lands were ſeized.

* Sir John Elliot, and Denzil Holles, plead the like Plea to the juriſdiction of the King's Bench. Ante pr 242.

But the objection in our caſe is, concerning a matter of election of a Knight of a Shire to ſerve in Parliament: that no other Court but the Parliament muſt meddle in it, as the objectors would have it.

Anſw. It is not impertinent therefore, to enquire briefly of the true juriſdiction in this matter.

Sir Robert Cotton affirms, that writs of Summons for Knights of the Shire to ſerve in Parliament, began 49 H. 3. and that the admittance of Commoners into the Parliament, was purpoſely to leſſen and curb the power of the Lords, after the daring Earl of Leiceſter was ſlain in the battle of Eveſham, (which was that very year) and the Barons were totally routed by Prince Edward, (afterward King E. 1.) and K. H. 3. was reſcued out of their hands. And to back that opinion, it is obſerved, that the firſt writ to the Sheriffs, to ſummon two Knights out of every Shire, that is to be found upon record, is that of the cloſe Roll 49 H. 3. (the very ſame year) dorſo 10 and 11. Thus Mr. Prynne affirms in his preface to the abridgment of the Records of the Tower, fol. 11. in the beginning of that fol. and fol. 13 b. in the middle of that fol.

But we muſt not be governed by Hiſtorians in matters of law; and therefore notwithſtanding this obſervation of Sir Robert Cotton's and Mr. Prynne's, we muſt preſume that the Houſe of Commons, and elections of Knights of the Shire, are as ancient as the Common Law, and have been time immemorial; becauſe we find no written law that does firſt begin any ſuch inſtitution.

But to come cloſer to the objection, and to enquire who are the proper Judges of the right of elections.

Mr. Prynne, in the ſame preface, fol. 14. b. in the middle of it, (as I myſelf have folio'd it, for the print has no folio's to the preface;) "The King "and Lords (ſays he) were anciently ſole Judges "of the legality of elections of Members of the "Houſe of Commons, till the time of King "Henry 7."

And in Sir Robert Cotton's Abridgment, fol. 392. the year 1 H. 4. num. 80. at the prayer of the Commons, the King declares, that the Commons were only petitioners, and that all judgments appertain to the King and Lords, unleſs it were in Statutes, Grants, Subſidies, or ſuch like; the which order the King would from that time to be obſerved.

But we know that the Houſe of Commons is now poſſeſs'd of the juriſdiction of determining all queſtions concerning the election of their own Members; ſo far at leaſt, as is in order to their being admitted or excluded from ſitting there. But how far their judgment is concluding to all others to other purpoſes, I have now no juſt occaſion to examine; for, as has been obſerv'd, the plaintiff in this caſe grounds his action upon his original right of election, and mentions the determination of the houſe on his ſide; and not only alledges that he was duly elected, but ſo returned by the defendant himſelf: And that tho' he were for ſome time hindred from ſitting, by occaſion of the falſe return, made by the defendant on purpoſe, and the election was under queſtion by it, yet he prov'd it clearly to the houſe, and was admitted, and his election declared good; and taking it for granted that he was duly elected, he ſues in the King's Bench, by this action to recover damages for the injury done him by the defendant, for which the houſe of Commons could not have help'd him. For to that purpoſe they have no juriſdiction, for they cannot examine a witneſs upon oath, nor can they act the part of a Jury to give damages, nor have they any power to award a trial, or to cauſe the Sheriff to impannel a Jury.

Obj. 3. This is an action of a new invention, and primæ impreſſionis, and never any ſuch was brought before, ſave that of Nevil againſt Stroud; which never had any determination.

Anſ. 'Tis true, 'tis new, in the particular circumſtances, but not in the main, nor in the ſubſtance; 'tis new, in that 'tis brought by one elected Knight of a Shire againſt the Sheriff, for a falſe and malicious return of another Indenture, whereby the plaintiff was put to great expence and trouble; but 'tis not new in the general nature of the action. For nothing is more frequent than actions upon the caſe, where an injury is done and damage ſuſtained; nay, 'tis very frequent for actions upon the caſe to be brought againſt Sheriffs, for meer falſe returns, and that where there is no malice, nor any of thoſe great aggravations that appear in this caſe.

For this I refer you to the caſe in Rolls's Abr. 1. part, fol. 99. Getin, Palmer and Marſhal, in the King's Bench; where the bailiff of a franchiſe was newly removed; but tho' he were removed, took upon him to anſwer, but made a falſe anſwer to the Sheriff's warrant, to execute a Fieri fac' againſt an adminiſtrator, and the Sheriff made that return to the Court; and thereupon an action upon the caſe brought againſt the Sheriff, and adjudged it lies: And that the Sheriff at his peril muſt take notice who is the rightful bailiff of the franchiſe, and accept of no anſwer to his warrant from any other.

19 H. 6. 29. An action upon the caſe againſt a deputy Sheriff, for embezzeling a writ.

19 H. 6. 38. by Paſton. If a Sheriff upon a venire fac' return a Jury that is inſufficient to pay iſſues, the next Sheriff to whom the iſſues are eſtreated to be levied, muſt charge himſelf with the iſſues, and muſt not return a Nihil, but ſhall have an action upon the caſe againſt his predeceſſor, for his falſe return; yet here is no malice, but at the moſt a neglect, or a miſtake only.

39 E. 3. 7. Brook. action upon the caſe, 67.

An action upon the caſe againſt a Sheriff, for not ſummoning and warning a man in due time, upon a writ of Præmunire or attachment, whereby he ſuſtained damage, as judgment given againſt him, or the like. This is but a bare neglect or omiſſion, and ſeems to be the leaſt or loweſt ſort of injuries; and yet being accompanied with a particular damage to the party, tho' without any malice on the Sheriff's part, the action will lie.

3 E. 4. 20. Brook. action upon the caſe, pl. 91. by Danby and Pigot, for a falſe return only.

If a Nihil be returned againſt me who have land, F. N. B. 93. 31. E. 3. Fitz. Abr. Proces 55.

So for not returning a writ of ſecond deliverance, which is a meer neglect and non-feaſance, tho' there be no malice, 21 E. 3. 43. Br. Act. ſ. ca. pl. 48. 5 Rep. 32. b. 91. 7 Rep. 1.

So againſt a Biſhop, if he falſly return, that an executor has not refuſed the executorſhip, when re-vera he has refuſed it, 2 Leon. 221.

So againſt an eſcheator. 9 H. 6. 60. 21 E. 4. 23. 27.

Much more ſhall the action upon the caſe lie againſt the Sheriff, as the circumſtances of this caſe are, where the return is not only falſe, but he knew knew it to be falſe, and he did it maliciouſly, with a purpoſe to hinder the plaintiff from ſitting, and to put him to expence, and where the plaintiff has had ſo great a damage. And the Sheriff by his oath is oblig'd to do right as well to poor as to rich, in all that belongeth to his office. 2. To do no wrong to any man for favour nor hate. 3. To diſturb no man's right. 4. Truly to return, and truly to ſerve all the King's writs, as far forth as ſhall be within his cunning. And the Jury by their verdict in this caſe, have found the defendant to fail in every one of theſe clauſes of his oath. And tho' the circumſtances that do diverſify all caſes are new in this caſe; yet 'tis very frequent in actions upon the caſe, to have new caſes and new circumſtances; and there is nothing more frequent than this variety and novelty.

Sir Francis Bacon, in his Book of advancement of learning, ſpeaking of caſes omitted in law, fol. 38. ſays, That the narrow compaſs of man's wiſdom cannot comprehend all caſes which time hath found out; and therefore caſes omitted and new, do often preſent themſelves, but every new caſe does not require a new law; for then the legiſlative power muſt be continually exercis'd: But tho' it differs from former caſes in circumſtances, yet it may fall under a general rule, or be proceeded upon by parity of reaſon; ubi eſt eadem ratio, ibi idem eſt jus.

And the Statute of W. 21. cap. 24. has made ample proviſion for all ſuch new caſes that fall under a general rule, but have no form'd writ, or writ of courſe that fits it in all the particulars and circumſtances. In conſimili caſu, ſimili remedio indigente, fiat breve, ſays that Statute.

In the 8*th Rep. fol.* 48 Jehu Webb's caſe, there you have the diſtinction of writs; ſome are brevia formata ſeu de curſu, and from thence the Curſitors have their name, becauſe they have the drawing of thoſe writs.

Some are brevia Magiſtralia quæ nec ſunt de curſu nec formata, i. e. de aliqua certa forma, ſed ſæpius variant ſecundum varietatem caſuum, factorum & querularum; as are actions upon the caſe, &c. which have not any certain form, but are upon occaſion drawn by the Maſters of the Chancery, and from thence are called Magiſtralia; all this is by virtue of the words of the Statute of W. II. c. 24. Concordant clerici in Cancellaria de brevi faciendo. 2 Inſt. 405, 406, 407.

And many new caſes may be put, that have no parallel caſes to be found in our Books, if all the particulars and circumſtances be regarded, as the caſe 8 Car. Croke 291. in the King's Bench, where an action upon the caſe is brought againſt an Apparitor, for what he did in his office, viz. for falſely and maliciouſly preſenting one, and that in the Spiritual Court, for incontinency. This was againſt an officer for what he did in his office, and to which his oath obliged him; and this was for a thing done in the Spiritual Court, viz. the Conſiſtory Court at Exeter, and for a matter meerly of eccleſiaſtical cogniſance, viz. Incontinency, wherein the Common Law had nothing to do; and this caſe had no parallel nor precedent before it: and yet being an injury and damage to the party preſented, and done falſely and maliciouſly, and without colour, and for which the party injured could have no recompence in any other Court, but at Common Law, it was adjudged the action lay. This caſe, tho' it had no parallel before it in all the circumſtances, yet in many reſpects it is a parallel to the caſe before us. There is the like action againſt conſtables for making a falſe preſentment, Croke Car. 467. and the caſe I cited before againſt a Sumner. 12 R. 2. 128.

And for that objection and obſervation concerning the novelty of this action, this more may be ſaid in anſwer to it; That till of late years Sheriffs have given no occaſion for the like action as this; for double returns, upon elections to Parliament, have not been in ancient times.

Mr. Prynne, in his Brevia Parliamentaria Rediviva, fol. 137. obſerves, that there were not above two or three caſes of elections queſtioned from 49 H. 3. till 22 E. 4. for ought appears by the returns, or Parliament Rolls, and not ſo much as one double return or indenture.

And the common law does comply with and conform to the general opinion and genius of the Kingdom, and values what they generally eſteem and value, and diſeſteems what they value not.

Heretofore an election to ſerve in Parliament, was not a thing ſo deſirable, and ſo much fought after as now-a-days it is; and it is not the deſire or ſeeking after it, that is to be diſlik'd or condemn'd, for he that deſireth the office of a Biſhop (ſays the Apoſtle) deſires a good office; but it is the undue means uſed, or the ill ends for which it is deſired, that makes the ſeeking bad.

Mr. Prynne, ut ſupra, fol. 165. anno 1 E. 3. a writ iſſued to elect two Knights for the County of Northumberland, and the Sheriff returned this anſwer, communitas comit. Northumbriæ ſic reſpondet, quod ipſi per inimicos Scotiæ adeo ſunt deſtructi, quod non habent unde ſolvere expenſa duobus militibus proficiſcuris ad conſilium apud Lincoln. tenendum.

In his fourth part of his Regiſter of Parliamentary writs, is mentioned a Patent of exemption granted 42 E. 1. to the town of Torrington in Devonſhire; which Patent recites in its preamble, that the men of that town never uſed to ſend Burgeſſes to Parliament, till the Sheriff 21 E. 1. ſummonitos fuiſſe malitioſe returnavit.

So that a malicious return to Parliament, is no new thing, but has been formerly done; and as the plaintiff in this action has well ſued the Sheriff for returning another with him, ſo I make no doubt but as the caſe then ſtood with the general humour and opinion of the people, thoſe of Torrington might have had their remedy againſt the then Sheriff, for returning them ſummoned.

And the Law is ſtill the ſame, in that it ſtill ſets a price and eſteem upon that which the people generally eſteem and value.

And ſeveral caſes have been put to prove, that new Statutes have given occaſion to new actions upon the caſe, which actions could not have been ſued at the Common Law; and yet thoſe new laws and ſtatutes, do not give thoſe new actions, but only occaſioned them.

Barnes verſ. Carey 12 Jac. King's Bench, Roll's Rep. fol. 47.

The plaintiff there brought an action upon the caſe againſt the Sheriff of Briſtol, for ſuffering J. S. to eſcape out of his cuſtody. J. S. being committed by the Commiſſioners of bankrupts, for refuſing to anſwer Interrogatories, the plaintiff being one of the creditors, and J. S. a bankrupt; and after many exceptions taken to the declaration, the Court gave judgment for the plaintiff. And yet there was no ſuch thing as a commiſſion of bankrupt at the common Law; but the common Law takes occaſion ſion by the ſtatutes of bankrupt, to give ſuch an action upon the caſe, which before thoſe ſtatutes could not have been ſued.

In like manner the common Law takes occaſion by thoſe ſtatutes that give the action of waſte againſt tenant for life, or years, againſt whom it lay not by common Law, to give an action upon the caſe againſt ſuch tenants, if they will not permit their Leſſors to enter upon the thing demiſed, to view whether waſte be done or not. Croke 2 part 478.

Object. 4. That there is not one caſe in law parallel to this caſe, for a Sheriff to be ſued for returning the whole truth, and ſomething more than the truth: tho' actions for falſe returns are frequent.

Anſw. This is an action for a falſe return, and ſomething more. That it is for a falſe return, appears by that allegation, that he did falſly make his return, and the Jury have found it ſo, and we muſt believe it. And it was falſe in this, in that he returned an Indenture pretended to be under the hands and ſeals of divers perſons, as the greater part of the ſaid County, purporting the choice of another than the plaintiff to be Knight of the Shire. The plaintiff does not alledge, that there ever was any ſuch Indenture ſealed by any perſon; but that the defendant did falſly return another Indenture, purporting the ſame to be made by divers perſons, &c. So that we may reaſonably underſtand it, that in truth there never was any ſuch Indenture ſealed by any but the Sheriff himſelf, and not by any others that were preſent at the election. 2*dly*, Tho' the Sheriff have returned the whole truth, yet together with that truth he returned a falſehood; and till it was re-examined, it could not appear which was the truth, and in the mean time the plaintiff ſuſtained all his damage.

Object. 5. That the Sheriff acted herein as a judge, and therefore if he err, he is not to be ſued for it, but his error may be reformed; and the law will not ſuffer an averment tending to the diſcredit of a judge. Pl. comment. 491. b. and Dy. 89. b.

Anſw. All this is true, as to one that is a judge of Record, in reſpect of the greatneſs of his authority, and the great truſt the King and the law repoſes in a judge of Record. But the Sheriff is no judge at all in what he acts in the election of Knights for the Shire, but is only an officer upon Record, 9 H. 6. 53. and 60. Br. Ab. Tit. Act. ſ. ca. plac. 6. tho' in ſome particular caſes indeed, the Sheriff is a judge, as in a Juſticies, 6 Rep. 12. ad fin. and a judge of Record, as in a Re-diſſeiſin, by the Statute of Merton C. 13.

Object. 6. The Statute of 23 H. 6. c. 15. has provided a remedy againſt the Sheriff for any abuſe committed by him in elections, viz. the penalty of a hundred pound, in caſe of Knights of the Shire, to the Knight injur'd: And it does recite in the preamble, that a convenient remedy for the party grieved, is not ordained in the former ſtatutes; and from hence it is inferred, that there was no remedy for the party grieved at the common Law, nor before this ſtatute.

Anſw. I have already proved that there was a remedy at the common Law, and before this ſtatute; and this ſtatute is an argument to prove it, for this ſtatute mentions a party grieved, and there could be no grief without a remedy, otherwiſe the Law would have been defective. And it cannot be denied, but that if there were a remedy at the common Law, this ſtatute being in the affirmative, does not take it away, only it gives another remedy.

And for the words of this ſtatute of 23 H. 6. that a convenient remedy for the party grieved is not ordained by the former ſtatutes; this does not argue that there was no remedy at the common Law, nor does it argue that there was no remedy at all; but that there was no convenient remedy by thoſe former ſtatutes, and thereupon the ſtatute of 23 H. 6. gives an hundred pound to the Knight injured by an undue return.

I ſhall put ſome like caſes where Acts of Parliament give remedies, where yet there were other remedies before at common Law, and the party may ſue for either; Roll's Ab. 1 part fol. 93. caſe 20.

A Diſtringas is awarded to the Sheriff to diſtrain the defendant in an action, and the Sheriff returns too ſmall iſſues, tho an averment lies by the ſtatute of W. II. c. 43. yet the plaintiff may well have his action upon the caſe againſt the Sheriff, becauſe it appears by the words of the ſtatute, that it is a falſe return. Obſerve the argument there uſed, viz.

If the action upon the caſe did not lie, in ſuch caſe the plaintiff had not any remedy at the common Law, which was greatly miſchievous; and the ſtatute, (as is there obſerved) tho' it give a new remedy, and takes no notice of any remedy that was before in the caſe, yet it does not reſtrain the plaintiff from any remedy that he had at the common Law. 'Tis there indeed made a Quære; but Serjeant Rolls has this Note upon it, that Tr. 3 Car. one Mrs. Bennet, upon good advice, brought ſuch an action upon the caſe againſt the Sheriff of London, for returning too ſmall iſſues againſt the mayor and commonalty of London.

The ſtatute of W. II. c. 24. (Sir E. C. 2 Inſt. fol. 404, 405.) firſt gives an aſſize of nuſance againſt the Alienee of him that levied that nuſance; and that ſtatute ſeems (as Sir E. C. obſerves) to underſtand that the party grieved was without any remedy before; for it provides in theſe words, de cætero non recedant querentes a curia Regis ſine remedio: yet Sir E. C. takes notice, fol. 405. of his 2 Inſt. at the lower end of that folio, upon the words (a curia) That the makers of that Act knew well that the party injured by the nuſance, might enter upon the ground of the wrong-doer, not only when it was in his hands, but after it was aliened too, and abate the nuſance, and ſo prevent himſelf of the remedy by aſſize of nuſance given by this Act. And beſides this, he had another remedy by action, viz. If he had any particular damage (ſays Sir E. C.) he might bring his action upon the caſe, and recover damage, ne querentes recederent a curia ſine remedio.

Object. The ground of this action againſt the Sheriff is for making a double return. Now the declaration ſets forth only one perfect return, and that is of the plaintiff's election, which the declaration ſays, was ſecundum exigentiam brevis; and it was by Indenture, under the ſeal of the Sheriff and Electors: And tho' the plaintiff alledges, that the late Sheriff and the Electors returned another Indenture of the election of another perſon, (which is the gravamen that he complains of) yet that appears to be no return; for it was not ſaid, that that Indenture was under any ſeals. And the ſtatutes of 7 H. 4. c. 15. and 8 H. 6. c. 7. require Indentures enſealed by the Electors to be tack'd to the writ, which Indentures ſo ſealed and tacked, ſhall be holden for the Sheriff's return.

Anſw. This other Indenture laſt mentioned, muſt be underſtood an Indenture enſealed, in like manner as the former; for the declaration juſt before men-mentions the firſt Indenture, whereby the Plaintiff was returned to be choſen, and that it is ſaid to be ſo enſealed, as the Statutes require; and then the declaration ſays, that the Sheriff. together with that Indenture, return'd another Indenture: ſo that it muſt be reaſonably underſtood, to be an Indenture, in like manner enſealed.

And then 'tis ſaid by the declaration, of this laſt Indenture, that it was annex'd to the Writ; and ſo return'd by the Defendant the Sheriff, which muſt therefore be preſum'd to be an Indenture enſealed, or elſe to what purpoſe did the Defendant annex it to the Writ, and return it?

And further, the declaration ſays, that by reaſon of the falſe return, the Plaintiff could not be admitted into the lower Houſe, till he had made proof of his Election. Now, if that other Indenture were not enſealed, it could not be ſaid to be a falſe return; for it would indeed have been no return, and it could not have hindred the Plaintiff from being admitted, nor put him to the proof of his Election.

And that the Indenture muſt be underſtood an Indenture enſealed, by thoſe that were preſent at the Election, appears by the Writ; the form whereof you will find in Crompt. Juriſdiction of Courts, fol. 1. b. the Clauſe is this; Et nomina eorundem militum, ſic electorum, in quibuſdam Indenturis, inter te & illos qui hujuſmodi Electioni interfuerint inde conficiendis, inſeri. And in another Clauſe, Et Electionem illam ſub ſigillo tuo & ſigillis eorum qui Electioni illi interfuerint nobis in Cancellariam certifices, remittens nobis alteram partem Indenturar. predictar. preſentibus conſutam una cum hoc breve.

There is a verdict given for the Plaintiff, and damages found to the value of 800 l. and Judgment thereupon, and a Writ of Error is brought to reverſe that Judgment.

I have but little time left me, to ſay what I have to offer, it being very late; and yet I muſt deſire leave to produce thoſe reaſons, I have in maintenance of my opinion: I will be careful not to detain you longer than will be neceſſary.

And therefore, I will not trouble you with ſtarting the caſe again, nor will I ſpeak of any exceptions that have been made to the declaration, for I love not the niceties of the Law, in caſes where they do prevail: and in this caſe I have only conſidered the foundations of the action; which if I had found well-eſtabliſhed upon reaſon, or the grounds of the Law, I would have examined what has been objected to the forms of the declaration, which muſt have brought great weight to have over-turned thoſe Proceedings.

But as the point of the action, upon the moſt ſerious conſideration I could have of it, and weighing what has been before now, and alſo at this time, ſaid in ſupport of it; I am of opinion that the Judgment ought to be reverſed; for that no ſuch action as this, at Bar, does lie by the Common Law.

Becauſe this is a cauſe of conſiderable value, great damages being recovered; becauſe it is a Judgment of great authority, being upon a cauſe tried at the King's-Bench Bar, and given upon deliberation there; becauſe it is a caſe of an extraordinary nature, and of great import, each Party pretending benefit to the Parliament by it; becauſe it is an action Primæ Impreſſionis, that never was before adjudged, the report of which will be liſtned after: I have taken pains to collect and ſet down the reaſons that I muſt go upon in determining this caſe; that as the Judgment had the countenance of ſome deliberation in the Court where it was given; ſo the reverſal being with greater deliberation, may appear grounded upon reaſons that ought to prevail.

I can ſay with my brother Windham, that I love rather to affirm Judgments, than to reverſe them; but I can attribute nothing of authority to the Judgment, tho' it were given in a ſuperiour Court, and upon deliberation; I muſt judge of it as if the caſe came to be judged originally by me: the argument to ſupport a Judgment from the authority of itſelf, is, Exceptio ejuſdem rei cujus petitur Diſſolutio, which muſt not be admitted in caſes of Writs of Error. We are intruſted to examine and correct the errors of that Court, and for that purpoſe we are made ſuperior to it; we muſt proceed according to our own knowledge and diſcretion, or elſe we do not perform the truſt repoſed in us.

I muſt needs ſay, this is a cauſe that imports it more than any cauſe, I have known to come before us, for it is a cauſe Primæ Impreſſionis; and the queſtion is, whether by this Judgment a change of the Common Law be introduced. It is the principal uſe of Writs of Error, and Appeals, to hinder the change of the Law; therefore do Writs of Error in our Law, and Appeals in the Civil Law, carry Judgments and Decrees to be examin'd by ſuperior Courts until they come to the higheſt, who are entruſted that they will not change the Law.

Therefore do Writs of Error lie from Ireland, which is a ſubordinate Kingdom to England, by whoſe Laws it is governed; that they might not be able to change the Law by their Judgments, and not ſo much for the particular right of the party.

For otherwiſe it wou'd be very eaſy for Judges by conſtruction and interpretation to change even a written Law, and it would be moſt eaſy for the Judges of the Common Laws of England, which are not written, but depend upon uſage, to make a change in them; eſpecially if they may juſtify themſelves by ſuch a rule as my brother Atkins lays down to ſupport this caſe, viz. that the Common Law complies with the genius of the Nation. I admit that the Laws are fitted to the genius of the Nation; but when that genius changes, the Parliament is only entruſted to judge of it, and by changing the Law to make it ſuitable to it. But if Judges ſhall ſay it is Common Law, becauſe it ſuits with the genius of the Nation; they may take upon them to change the whole as well as any part of it, the conſequeuce whereof may eaſily be ſeen; I wiſh we had not found it by ſad experience.

If the caſe at the Bar be a change of the Law, it is happy that it comes to be queſtion'd in the firſt inſtance; for if this cauſe had been any way agreed and quitted, and a ſecond caſe of this nature had been queſtioned, there would have been a precedent urg'd, which cannot be ſpoke of here; for this caſe hath no fellow, there never having been the like Judgment before.

The method I ſhall take in what I have to ſay, ſhall be,

1*ſt*, To remove ſome prejudice the Caſe is under.

2*dly*, Give my reaſons againſt the Action.

3*dly*, Weigh what hath been ſaid to maintain the Action.

1*ſt*, The caſe is under this prejudice, that an action of the caſe lies for falſe returns of Sheriffs, and why ſhould it not lie in this caſe as well as any other?

To remove this prejudice, I ſhall ſhew ſome material differences betwixt the nature of ordinary returns and this return.

In ordinary returns the party is concluded, and abſolutely without remedy; for the Court muſt take the return as the Sheriff makes it. In ordinary caſes the Sheriff may, and frequently does, take ſecurity of the Plaintiff, or the Sheriff hath means by Law to be ſecure; as, if he doubts the property of the goods, he may return a Fieri facias, Nullus venit ad monſtrandum bona. In ſome caſes he may, for his ſafety, impannel a Jury, as upon an Elegit; or he may reſort to the Court, and pray reaſonable time to prepare his return, if the matter be difficult; and hath other ſhelters, that if he be wary, will ſave him from danger.

But in this caſe the party is not concluded, for upon a Petition to the Parliament, if they ſee it juſt, they will cauſe the return to be altered by the Clerk of the Crown, if the Sheriff be not in the way; in this caſe, the Sheriff may not take ſecurity, it were criminal in him to make ſuch a return by compact, nor can the Sheriff make a fruitleſs return, or obtain delay to conſult his ſafety.

Theſe differences are of that nature, that they change the caſe in the reaſon of it, as I ſhall hereafter make appear: and no man can infer, becauſe an action lies for falſe returns in ordinary caſes; therefore it lies in caſe of a return to Parliament, where the Sheriff is clearly upon terms.

My reaſons againſt this action are applicable to this caſe, and make it different from all the caſes, that have been put by my brothers that argued for the action: I obſerve they argued only upon generals, without any other application to this caſe than by the topick of concluding à Minori ad Majus, becauſe an action lies in caſes of inferior nature, therefore it will lie in this; which rule holds not in diverſe caſes, where there are particular reaſons to the contrary, as I ſhall by and by ſhew to be in this.

2*dly*, I ſhall give you my reaſons againſt this action, which are as follow.

(1.) My firſt reaſon is this, becauſe the Sheriff as to the declaring the majority is Judge, and no action will lie againſt a Judge, for what he does judicially, tho' it ſhould be laid falſo, malitioſe & ſcienter; as appears in Co. 12. Rep. fol. 24. They who are intruſted to judge, ought to be free from vexation, that they may determine without fear; the Law requires courage in a Judge, and therefore provides ſecurity for the ſupport of that courage. But,

1. Is the Sheriff a Judge in this caſe? And,

2. Is there the ſame reaſon he ſhould be freed from all actions?

As to the firſt, it is of neceſſity, that as to the declaring the majority, he ſhould be Judge upon the place: in other caſes, in the County Court, the Freeholders are the Judges, and he is the Miniſter. When we ſay the Freeholders, we mean the major part of them is to judge; but when the queſtion is, which is the major part, they cannot determine the queſtion; but of neceſſity the Sheriff muſt determine that, the nature of the thing ſpeaks it.

Therefore it was held rightly in Letchmere's caſe, 13 and 14 Car II. that as to the Election of Knights to the Parliament, the Court is properly the Sheriff's Court, and the Writ is in the nature of a ſpecial commiſſion, Elegi facias.

I know a Judge may have many miniſterial Acts incumbent upon him, as the Chief-Juſtices have to certify Records upon Writs of Error; therefore it is neceſſary for me to obſerve, that the ſuit here is for what he does as a Judge, and not for any thing miniſterial; which appears by the averment, that the Sheriff annexed another Indenture, ſpecifying it to be made by the major part of the Freeholders, and containing that the Lord Huntingtowre was choſen, ubi re vera the Lord Huntingtowre was not choſen by the major part of the Freeholders. If it had been ſaid ubi re vera the Freeholders ſuppoſed to ſeal the ſame, never did ſeal the ſame, there had been a falſity in his miniſterial part of ſending in the Indenture; but his ſending his two Indentures, which were really ſealed by the Freeholders, as they import; wherein the Freeholders of each Indenture (and not the Sheriff) ſay, that they are the major part, is no falſity in his miniſterial part, but only deferring to judge between them, which is the major part; or more properly judging that they are both equal in number.

They object, that the matter of this queſtion is not matter of Judgment, 'tis but counting the Poll, which requires Arithmetick, but not Judgment; but certainly if it be rightly conſider'd, it will be thought this queſtion of majority is not barely a queſtion of fact, but a queſtion of judgment, a queſtion of difficult judgment, there are ſo many qualifications of Electors.

1. They muſt have 40 s. per Annum, there the value muſt be judged.

2. It muſt be Freehold; there the Title.

3. It muſt be their own; there colourable and fraudulent gifts made many times on purpoſe to get voices, muſt be judged.

4. The Electors muſt be reſident; here the ſettlement of the party muſt be determin'd.

5. There are many things that incapacitate voices, as bribery, force, &c. and many other queſtions ariſe, that are of ſuch difficulty in debate of them, much time is ſpent in Parliament; and ſometimes a Committee determines one way, and the Houſe another. Is not this then a queſtion that refers to Judgment?

They object again, the Sheriff may give an Oath concerning all the qualifications, and he is to look no further.

I anſwer, the Statute has given the Sheriff power to give an oath in aſſiſtance of him; but the Statute does not ſay that whoſoever takes that oath ſhall have a voice: neither does the Statute 23 Hen. VI. ſay that the Sheriff ſhall not be charged with a falſe return, that purſues that way: ſo that altho' he may uſe thoſe means for his direction, yet he muſt conſider his own ſafety, and not make a falſe return. If a man, upon taking ſuch an oath, give the Sheriff a ſpecial anſwer, or if it ſhould be known to the Sheriff he ſwears falſe; the Sheriff muſt determine according to his own judgment, and not by what is ſworn.

It may hence be concluded, that the Sheriff, as to declaring the majority, is a Judge; and if ſo, my next aſſertion is, that there is the ſame reaſon he ſhould be free from actions, as any Judge in Weſtminſter-hall, or any other Judge. Does it not import the publick, that the Sheriff ſhould deal uprightly and impartially? Ought he not to have courage, and for that end ſhould not the Law provide him ſecurity?

Conſider his diſadvantages, what a noiſe and croud accompany ſuch elections; what importunity, nay what violence there is upon him from the conteſting parties.

We may ſay, no other Judge has more need of courage and reſolution to manage himſelf, and determine uprightly, than he. No other Judge determines in a caſe of greater conſequence to the publick, or difficulty, than he; expoſe him to ſuch actions, and in moſt Elections he muſt have trouble; for commonly each party is confident of his ſtrength, his conduct and his friends; that let the Sheriff return never ſo uprightly, the party that is rejected will revenge it by a ſuit, eſpecially if he may ſue at Common Law, to have boundleſs damages, without running any hazard himſelf, but of the loſs of his coſts.

If we Judges, that find ourſelves ſecure from actions, ſhould not be tender of others, that are in the ſame circumſtances; it may well be ſaid, Wo unto you, for you impoſe heavy burthens upon others, but will not bear the leaſt of them yourſelves.

2. My ſecond reaſon is, becauſe it is alieni fori, either to examine the right of the Election, or behaviour of the Sheriff; both which are incident, and indeed the only conſiderations that can guide in the Trial of ſuch cauſes, if they be allowed.

It is admitted, that the Parliament is the only proper Judicature, to determine the right of Election, and to cenſure the behaviour of the Sheriff. How then can the Common Law try a cauſe, that cannot determine of thoſe things, without which the cauſe cannot be try'd.

No action upon the caſe will lie for breach of a truſt, becauſe the determination of the principal thing, the truſt, does not belong to the Common Law, but to the Court of Chancery: certainly the reaſon of the caſe at bar is ſtronger, as the Parliament ought to have more reverence than the Court of Chancery.

They object, that it may be tried after the Parliament hath decided the Election; for then that which the Common Law could not try, is determined, and the Parliament cannot give the party the coſts he is put unto.

Then I perceive they wou'd have the determination of the Parliament binding to the Sheriff in the action, which it cannot be; for that is between other parties to which the Sheriff is not call'd: it is againſt the courſe of Law, that any Judgment, Decree or Proceeding betwixt other parties ſhould bind the intereſt of, or any way conclude a third perſon; no more ought it to do here: it may be eaſy for parties combining to repreſent a caſe ſo to the Parliament, that the right of Election may appear either way as the parties pleaſe. Is it fit the Sheriff, who is not admitted to controvert ſuch determination, ſhould be concluded by it, in an action brought againſt him, to make him pay the reckoning?

Did the Parliament believe, when they determined this Election, that they paſs'd Sentence againſt the Sheriff, upon which he muſt pay 800 l. Sure if they had imagin'd ſo, they would, nay in Juſtice they ought to have heard his defence before they determin'd it.

And yet that was the meaſure of this caſe, the Sheriff was not heard in Parliament, indeed he was not blamed there; and yet upon the Trial which concerned him ſo deeply, he was not allow'd to defend himſelf, by ſhewing any majority or equality of voices, the Parliament having determin'd the Election.

I do not by theſe reflections tax the Law of Injuſtice, or the courſe of Parliament, of Inconvenience; I am an admirer of the methods of both: it is from the Excellency of them, I conclude this Proceeding in this new-fangled action, being abſurd, unjuſt and unreaſonable, cannot be legal.

To anſwer the other branch of this objection, I ſay it does not follow, that becauſe the Parliament ment cannot give coſts; therefore this new-deviſed action muſt lie, to help the party to them.

For then ſuch an action might as well lie in all caſes, where there is a wrong to be remedied by courſe of Law, and no coſts are given for it.

At the Common Law no coſts were given in any caſe, and many caſes remain at this day, where the Statutes have given no coſts; as in a Prohibition, Scire facias, and Quare impedit, and divers other caſes; and yet no action will lie to recover thoſe coſts, and why ſhould it lie in the caſe at Bar?

In this caſe the Parliament have already had it under their conſideration in the Statute 23 Hen. VI. and have appointed what ſhall be paid by the Sheriff that offends, viz. 100*l.* to the party, 100*l.* to the King, and impriſonment; the Parliament have ſtated what ſhall be paid for compenſation, and what for puniſhment, and would have provided for coſts if they had thought fit.

3. My third reaſon is, becauſe a double return is a lawful means for the Sheriff to perform his duty in doubtful caſes.

If this be ſo, then all aggravations of falſo, malitioſe & ſcienter, will not make the thing actionable; for whatever a man may do for his ſafety, cannot be the ground of an action.

There is ſometimes Damnum abſque Injuria, tho' the thing be done on purpoſe to bring a loſs upon another, without any deſign of benefit to himſelf; as if a new houſe be erected contiguous to my ground, I may build any thing on purpoſe to blind the lights of that new houſe, and no action will accrue, tho' the malice were never ſo great; much leſs will it lie, where a man acts for his own ſafety.

If a Jury will find a ſpecial verdict; if a Judge will adviſe and take time to conſider; if a Biſhop will delay a Patron, and impannel a Jury to enquire of the Right of Patronage; you cannot bring an action for theſe delays, tho' you ſuppoſe it to be done maliciouſly, and on purpoſe to put you to charges; tho' you ſuppoſe it to be done ſcienter, knowing the Law to be clear: for they take but the liberty the Law has provided for their ſafety, and there can be no demonſtration that they have not real doubts, for theſe are within their own breaſts: it would be very miſchievous, that a man might not have leave to doubt without ſo great peril.

The courſe of Parliament makes out the ground of this reaſon to be true in fact, ſo that a double return is lawful when the Sheriff doubts; for if the Parliament did not allow a double return in doubtful caſes, they ought never to accept a double return: if it were in itſelf a void and unlawful return, they ought not to endure it a moment, but ſend for the Sheriff, and compel him forthwith to make a ſingle return. But we ſee where there is doubt, the Parliament ſends not for the Sheriff before they have examin'd the caſe, and given particular directions.

And it muſt of neceſſity be the courſe: for ſuppoſe the voices are equal; ſuppoſe the Election is void for force; ſuppoſe the Sheriff doubts upon the validity of ſome voices, ſhall he tranſmit his doubts, ſpecially to the Parliament? Was there ever any ſuch thing done? Was there ever any other way but to make a double return, and leave it fairly to the deciſion of the Parliament?

It was ſaid by my brother Ellis, that if the Sheriff had return'd, in the nature of a ſpecial verdict, the ſpecial matter, and had concluded in this manner, viz. if the Parliament ſhall adjudge Sir Samuel Barnardiſton to be choſen, then he returns him; and if the Parliament ſhall adjudge the Lord Huntingtowre to be choſen, then he returns him; that ſuch a return as this had been ſafe, and cou'd not have borne an action.

This is a pretty invention, found out for argument ſake, but methinks it furniſhes no force at all, to the part for which it is brought, but rather ſhews the right to be the other way: for let any man of reaſon ſay, whether a double return, as it is now uſed, be not the ſame thing in conſequence? Is not a double return, as if the Sheriff ſhould ſay to the Parliament, "The right of Election is between theſe "two, I am in doubt which of them I ſhall reject, and "expect your directions." This is the import of a double return, and is the ſame in effect, as if it had concluded like a ſpecial verdict; and ſo my brother Ellis's inſtance ſhould not be actionable, tho' he concluded otherwiſe.

That other new-fangled way could not be receiv'd.——For,

1. The Freeholders would never join in ſuch a return.
2. Such a return is not capable of being amended by the Sheriff.

But the judgment of the Parliament muſt be entered upon record, to make it any return; it concluding nothing of itſelf, as a ſpecial verdict concludes nothing, till the judgment of the Court be enter'd upon the roll with it.

3. The Parliament will not, as I believe, admit of new devices in the courſe of their Proceedings, whatever we do at Law.

But the double return is practicable in the Country, for the Freeholders of each part will tender their Indentures; and it is eaſily amended in Parliament, by rejecting the Indenture of thoſe Freeholders that were not the major part, which way has been practis'd in doubtful caſes for many years.

So that I apprehend the caſe at Bar, to be more regular and favourable, than that caſe, which my brother Ellis put as a caſe that would not bear an action.

Again, ſuppoſe the Sheriff had inform'd the Parliament of his doubts, and that he could not readily determine where the majority was, but it was betwixt two perſons, A. and B. and thereupon deſir'd their favour, either to grant him time to determine it, if they pleas'd to command him ſo to do, or elſe, that they would decide it themſelves, and he would obey what directions they ſhould make in it; and thereupon the Parliament had taken upon themſelves to determine it.

This moſt clearly had not been actionable, for it is not actionable to delay a return, to any Court of Juſtice, where the Sheriff hath leave from the Court ſo to do.

A double return, in my underſtanding, ſpeaks the ſame thing, to the Parliament; and upon it they may either direct the Sheriff to make a ſingle return, which is to cauſe him to decide it, or they may do it themſelves.

And here, I muſt needs reflect upon the ſecond reaſon I gave againſt this action, that the matter of it is alieni fori; I find myſelf and my brothers that argued for the action, engaged in a diſcourſe of the nature of a double return, and the courſe of Parliament upon it, which, as a Judge, I cannot ſo well ſpeak to. I had the honour to be of this Houſe of Commons, and whilſt I was there, I conſidered ſidered as well as I cou'd the courſe of the Proceedings of the Houſe, and am therefore able to ſpeak ſomething of them, and I am brought into this diſcourſe neceſſarily by this action: but I muſt needs ſay, it is an improper diſcourſe for Judges, for they know not what is the courſe of Parliament, nor the privilege of Parliament. When the Lords in Parliament, whom they are bound to aſſiſt with their advice, aſk the Judges any thing, concerning the courſe or privilege of Parliament, they have anſwer'd, that they know them not, nor can adviſe concerning them.

If in Parliament we do not know, nor can adviſe concerning theſe things; how can we judge upon them out of Parliament? We ought to know before we judge, and therefore we cannot judge of things we cannot know.

Our being engaged in a diſcourſe improper for Judges, ſhews the action to be improper, as much as any other argument that can be made; and this argument ariſes from my brothers that argued for the action.

But now I am in this diſcourſe, I muſt go a little farther; my obſervation from the courſe of Parliament has been, that they will not permit the Sheriff to delay his return, to deliberate, and he cannot take ſecurity of either party; and if a ſingle return be not juſtified by the Committee of Elections, he is in danger of the Statute of 23 Hen. VI.

It follows, that there is no way for an innocent Sheriff to be ſafe, where he conceives doubt, but in making a double return; and if that ſhould be actionable too, the ſervice of the Parliament would be the moſt ungrateful ſervice in the world.

It ſeems ridiculous to me, that it ſhould be objected, that this courſe of Law is neceſſary to prevent the great miſchief ariſing from double returns; whenas, if it be a miſchief, or diſlik'd by the Parliament, either in general or any particular caſe; they may reject them when they pleaſe, and command the Sheriff to make a ſingle return; ſo that they may remedy it by their practice, without their Legiſlative Power.

Their practice hitherto has been to receive double returns, which therefore in ſome caſes muſt be lawful, and in this very caſe the double return was accepted, and the Sheriff no way puniſh'd for it; which he ought to have been, if he had been blameable.

If double returns are accepted by Parliament, they are allow'd, and we muſt ſay they are lawful, which is the ground of my third reaſon; for which I hold this action not maintainable.

4. My fourth reaſon is, That there is no legal damages occaſion'd by the Sheriff. The damages laid in the declaration are,

1. Being kept from ſitting in the Houſe.
2. The pains and charges he was put unto, to get his admittance into the Houſe.

1. That of his being kept from ſitting in the Houſe, is as much every man's damage in the whole County. nay, in the whole Kingdom; and any man elſe, might as well have an action for it, as the Member choſen.

To ſit in Parliament is a ſervice in the Member, for the benefit of the King and Kingdom; and not for the particular profit of the Member.

It is a rule in Law, that no particular man may bring an action for a nuſance to the King's highway; becauſe all the men in England might as well have actions, which would be infinite: and therefore ſuch an offence is puniſhable only by Indictment, except there be ſpecial loſs occaſion'd by that nuſance.

For the ſame reaſon, the excluſion of a Member from the Houſe, being as much damage to all men in England, as to himſelf; he, nor any man elſe in England, can have an action for it; but it is puniſhable upon the publick ſcore, and not otherwiſe.

For this reaſon was the Statute 23 Hen. VI. wiſely conſider'd: by that Statute, the action is not given to the party for his particular damage; but the action given is a popular action, only the party griev'd hath a preference for ſix months: but if he do not ſue in that time, every man elſe is at liberty to recover the ſame ſum.

2. The other point of damage, is the pains and charges he was put unto, and that is not occaſion'd by the Sheriff, but by the deliberation of the Houſe. Why ſhould the Sheriff pay for that? It may be, if the Parliament had ſent for the Sheriff the firſt day, and blamed the double return, he would have ventur'd to determine the matter ſpeedily, and there ſhould have been no cauſe of complaint for delay: but the Parliament ſaw ſo much cauſe of doubt, that they think it not fit to put the Sheriff to determine, but to reſolve to examine the matter, and give him directions that may guide him in mending his return; thereupon they give a day to the parties on both ſides, and finding the matter of long examination, and withal difficult, they deliberate upon it.

It ſeems very unreaſonable the Sheriff ſhould be made pay for this, which he did not occaſion; but was a courſe taken by the Parliament for their own ſatisfaction, who found no fault in the Sheriff for putting them to all that trouble.

Suppoſe Sir Samuel Barnardiſton had been return'd alone, and the Lord Huntingtowre had petitioned againſt that return, there had been the ſame charge to have defended that return; ſo that it was the conteſt of the oppoſite party that occaſioned the charge, the deliberation of the Parliament that occaſioned the delay; but neither of them can be imputed to the Sheriff.

I cannot difference this caſe, from the caſe of bringing an action againſt a Jury, for maliciouſly, knowingly, and on purpoſe to put the party to charges, finding a matter ſpecially, whereby great delay and great expences were, before the party could obtain judgment; and yet I think no man will affirm that an action will lie in that caſe.

In this caſe the damages are found entire, ſo that if both parts, viz. the not ſitting in the Houſe, and the pains and charges are not actionable cauſes of damages; it will be intended the Jury give for both, and ſo the judgment is for that cauſe erroneous.

I ſuppoſe the wages of Parliament will not be mentioned for damages, for in moſt places they are only imaginary, being not demanded; but if there were to be any conſideration of them, it will not alter this caſe; for upon this return they are due as from the firſt day, and ſo no damage can be pretended upon that ſcore.

5. My fifth reaſon, is drawn from the Statute of 23 Hen. VI. which has been ſo often mention'd; that Statute is a great evidence to me, that no action lay by the Common Law againſt a Sheriff, for a falſe return of a Writ of Election to the Parliament; and this evidence is much ſtrengthned by the obſervation obſervation that hath been made, that never any action was brought otherwiſe than upon that Statute.

I muſt admit, that if an action lay by the Common Law, this Statute hath not taken it away, for there are no negative words in the Statute; but it is not likely that the Parliament would have made that Law, if there had been any remedy for the party before.

The Statute obſerves, that ſome Laws had been made before, for preventing falſe returns, but there was not convenient remedy provided for the party griev'd; and therefore gives him an action for 100*l.* If the Courts of Juſtice had by the Common Law, juriſdiction to examine miſdemeanors concerning the returns of Sheriffs to the Paliament; what needed the Parliament to be ſo elaborate, to provide Law after Law, to give them power therein, and at laſt to give the party griev'd an action? Can any man imagine but that the Parliament took the Law to be, that the party was without remedy? I know preambles, of Acts of Parliament are not always Goſpel; but it becomes us, I am ſure, to have reſpect to them, and not to impute any falſity or failing to them, eſpecially where conſtant uſage ſpeaks for them.

It has been objected, that in thoſe times it was reckon'd a damage, to be return'd to ſerve in Parliament, which is the reaſon that no man then did bring his action againſt the Sheriff, for returning another in his ſtead. This cannot be true, for the Statute calls him the party griev'd, and is careful in providing convenient remedy for him; and we ſee by the many Statutes about thoſe times, that it was a miſchief very frequent, and there wanted no occaſion for thoſe actions; which does extremely ſtrengthen the argument of the non-uſer of this pretended Common Law.

An action upon the caſe, where it may be brought, is a plaiſter that fits it ſelf for all times and all ſores; and if ſuch an action might then have been brought, there was no need for the Parliament to provide a convenient remedy.

By Littleton's rule, often mentioned by my brothers, we may conclude this action will not lie; for if ſuch an action had lain, it would have been brought before this time.

In the caſe of Buckley againſt Rice Thomas, in Plowden's Commentaries 118, which appears to be ſo elaborately argued both at Bar and Bench; if this Common Law had been thought upon, they might have prevented the queſtion, whether the Sheriffs of Wales were bound by the Statute 23 Hen. VI.

It ſeems plain to me, that the makers of the ſaid Statute were ignorant of this Common Law; and yet my brother Thurland obſerves, the Judges in thoſe times, uſually aſſiſted in the penning of the Laws.

The Judges and Council in the time of Buckley's caſe were ignorant of this Common Law, elſe it would have been mention'd in the argument of that caſe.

This Common Law was never reveal'd, that I find, until a time that there were divers other new lights: I mean thoſe times, when Nevil brought an action for a falſe return againſt Stroud, during the late troubles; but in thoſe times it could never obtain Judgment. I have heard that the Court of Common-Pleas ſent the Record to the Parliament, as a caſe too difficult for the Courts of Common Law to determine.

The Statute of 23 Hen. VI. is not only evidence, that no ſuch action lay at the Common Law; but, in my opinion, is not conſiſtent with any remedy at the Common Law, unleſs it be allowed that the party ſhould be doubly puniſhed.

If the party griev'd, has brought his action upon the Statute, and recovered, it was admitted by the Council, that no action can be brought at the Common Law; nor è contra, can he recover by the Statute, after he has recovered by the Common Law, becauſe Nemo bis punitur pro eodem delicto.

So far it ſtands well, but ſuppoſe the party griev'd, has let ſlip his time of three months, and then a third perſon brings a popular action, and recovers 100*l.* upon the Statute; there is nothing can bar the party griev'd, from his action at Common Law, for his ſitting ſtill will not conclude him; no Statute of Limitations extending to this caſe. And if it be ſo, then muſt the party, beſides his Fine and Impriſonment, be doubly puniſhed by this Statute; which was made, as the Letter of it imports, becauſe there wanted convenient remedy.

And now I am diſcourſing of this Statute, I muſt obſerve the great wiſdom of the courſe of Parliament in theſe caſes, which hath in great meaſure prevented the bringing actions againſt Sheriffs, even upon this Statute.

Where the Sheriff miſtakes the perſon in his return, he incurs the penalty of 23 Hen. VI. tho' it be without malice; and it may happen that any where there are 21 Electors of one ſide, and 20 of the other, the Sheriff returns him that hath 21, and the Parliament adjudging an incapacity in two of the 21, may determine he that had the 20 voices was duly choſen. In ſuch caſe the Sheriff hath made a falſe return, within the penalty of the Statute 23 Hen. VI. and no evidence ſhall be given againſt the determination of the Parliament.

This was a very hard caſe for the Sheriff; and if we were liable to ſuch a miſchief, many a paſt Sheriff might be awaken'd, that takes himſelf to be ſecure.

But the courſe of Parliament prevents this, as it is reaſon; for immediately upon their determination, they ſend for the Sheriff, and cauſe him to amend his return; and thenceforward the amended return is the Sheriff's return, and there is no Record that can warrant any action to be brought for a falſe return: as when the Marſhal of the King's-Bench, or Warden of the Fleet have made an improvident return, omitting ſome cauſes, wherewith the Priſoner ſtood charg'd in their cuſtody, whereby they became liable to action; they frequently move the Court to amend the return; and when the return is amended, all is ſet right, for there is no averring againſt a Record: in like manner, when the Sheriff hath amended his return, he is ſecure from any action upon that occaſion.

By this means, there has of late years been no recovery upon the Statute, becauſe all perſons chooſe rather to compel the Sheriff to amend his return, that they might be admitted to ſit in the Houſe, than to take their remedy upon the Statute; and no man can recover upon the Statute firſt, and have afterwards their return amended: for I have been told, that by the courſe of Parliament, unleſs the Petition be lodg'd within ſome few days after the return, it cannot be received afterwards. So that a man cannot upon that Statute have remedy at Law, and alſo in Parliament; which ſeems to be wiſely provided, to prevent any contrariety of determinations.

This ſtatute of 23 H. 6. furniſhed thoſe that argued for this action, with one argument, which doth now vaniſh: They ſaid that all the inconveniences that could be objected to this action, were the ſame upon the ſtatute of 23 H. 6. viz. That upon that ſtatute, the right of election muſt be examined upon a trial, where there might be a contrariety of determinations; for it appears by what I have ſaid, that there can be no contrariety of determinations.

And there are other inconveniences in this remedy by the common Law, which are not in the remedy given by the ſtatute, for by the ſtatute the ſum to be recovered is limited; the informer hath a time prefixed, ſo that there are bounds ſet which cannot be exceeded: but the remedy by the common Law is without limitation of time, which is conſiderable; for all Sheriffs that ever made any return otherwiſe than the Parliament determined, will be liable, during their whole lives, to them that will call them to account for it. I ſay this is without limitation of time, without meaſure of damages, or any rules contained in a written law: It depends upon a general notion of remedy, which may be enlarged by conſtruction, as it is now introduced without precedent.

To finiſh my obſervation upon this ſtatute, I ſay it is great wiſdom in the Parliament to call the Sheriff to amend the return, and ſo prevent any remedy againſt him upon the Statute 23 H. 6. for I do not ſee that the rules of law, concerning elections, are ſo manifeſtly clear and known, that it is fit that the Sheriff ſhould upon all returns that are corrected by the Parliament, pay the reckoning of the conteſt.

6. I have a ſixth reaſon againſt this action; which is, becauſe the Sheriff is not admitted to take ſecurity to ſave him harmleſs in ſuch caſes; I take this reaſon to be inſtar omnium, and there needs no other in the caſe.

It were the moſt unreaſonable and grievous thing in the world, that the Sheriffs ſhould be bound to act without any deliberation, and not to be allowed to take any ſecurity; and yet be liable to an action, which way ſoever he takes: There is no courſe can avoid it but this of a double return, as I have before ſhewn.

It has not been ſaid, by any that argued the other way, that the Sheriff may take ſecurity: and, I ſuppoſe, will not be ſaid; for it would be a dangerous Courſe for Parliaments, for then the moſt litigious man muſt be returned, and not he which is truly choſen.

If the Sheriff may not take ſecurity, the law muſt be his ſecurity. It was an argument uſed by my brother Ellis, That becauſe the law impoſes an officer, to wit, the Sheriff, therefore the law muſt give the party an action againſt that officer, if he miſdemean himſelf: The argument does not hold univerſally, for the law impoſes a Judge, and yet no action lies againſt him. But the reaſon of that argument, if turned the other way, is irrefragable; as thus, The law will not ſuffer the Sheriff to take a ſecurity, therefore the law muſt be his ſecurity, elſe it were a moſt unreaſonable law. This reaſon of it ſelf is ſufficient to bear the whole caſe; for no caſe can be put in our law, nay, no caſe can be in any reaſonable law, where a man is compelled to judge without deliberation, and cannot take ſecurity, and yet ſhall be liable to an action.

I have two more reaſons to add, upon which I lay great weight, tho' they depend not upon any particular circumſtances of this caſe, but the general conſideration of it.

1. That it is a new invention.

2. That it relates to the Parliament.

1. As it is a new invention, it ought to be examined very ſtrictly, and have no allowance of favour at the end; and it will have the ſame fortune that many other novelties, heretofore attempted in our law, have had.

Actions upon the caſe have ſometimes been received in new caſes, where it ſtands with the rules of law, and no inconvenience appears; but they have been more often rejected. I ſhall inſtance ſome caſes that have been rejected, becauſe it will be manifeſt by them, that all the arguments and poſitions laid down by my brothers that would ſupport the action, are as well applicable to ſeveral caſes that have been already rejected, as to the caſe at bar.

An action upon the caſe was brought againſt a grand jury-man, for falſly and maliciouſly conſpiring to indite another, and adjudged it would not lie.

Againſt a witneſs, for teſtifying falſly and maliciouſly; and an action was brought againſt a Judge, for acting falſly and maliciouſly; but adjudged that no action would lie in thoſe caſes.

Theſe three inſtances are applicable to every argument urged for this action. The arguments my brothers made in depreſſing falſity and malice, thoſe which they made from the compariſon of other actions upon the caſe à minori ad majus; the argument, that becauſe the law impoſes the officer, it will puniſh the malice, has the ſame force in the caſe of a Judge, Juror, or Witneſs; and yet my brothers admit in thoſe caſes, an action will not lie, which ſhews the invalidity of thoſe arguments.

Now I ſhall give other inſtances where actions upon the caſe have been rejected for novelty, and reaſons of inconvenience.

An action of the caſe was brought againſt the Lord of a Manor for not admitting a copy-holder, and it was adjudged it would not lie. Cro. Jac. 368.

There was a verdict found, and damages given by the jury in that caſe: the Lord is compellable in Chancery to admit a copy-holder; and what harm would it have been, if there might have been a remedy given by the common law, there being a cuſtom broken by which the Lord was bound? The reaſons of the book are, becauſe it was a novelty, and it would be vexatious if every copy-holder ſhould have an action againſt the Lord, when he refuſed to admit him upon his own terms.

It has been adjudged, that an action upon the caſe will not lie for the breach of a truſt, becauſe the common law cannot try what a truſt is; but if ſuch actions were allowed, the law might declare that to be a truſt, which the Court of Chancery, that properly judges of truſts, might ſay is none; and where the common law cannot examine the principal matter, the damages that were but dependant upon it, ſhall not be regarded.

Anthony Maddiſon brought an action againſt Skipwith, for maliciouſly killing Sir Tho. Wortley: the caſe was thus; The plaintiff was a young lawyer that had expended all his gains in the purchaſe of a rent that was determinable upon the death of Sir Tho. Wortley; Skipwith quarrelled with Sir Thomas Wortley, in the ſtreets, about a miſtreſs, and killed him, whereby Maddiſon loſt his rent. It was held the action would not lie, tho' it were laid to be done maliciouſly, on purpoſe to determine the plaintiff's rent.

that

I obſerved in that caſe, that altho' Mr. Maddiſon knew very well that there was a miſtreſs in the caſe, and that the rent was not aimed at, yet he would fain try his fortune in the ſuit; thinking, that a jury, perhaps out of compaſſion to him, or to diſcourage the like facts, might make the manſlayer pay him for his loſs: but the judges would not ſuffer it to go on, it being a meer device and a new-fangled action.

It hath been held, that an action will not lie againſt a Parſon for ſuing for tithes in kind, knowing that there was a modus, becauſe it might then be perilous for any Parſon to inſiſt upon his right.

It was held by the Court of Common-Pleas, that no action will lie for ſuing an Attorney, knowingly, in any other Court againſt his privilege: for his means to enjoy his privilege, is to claim it by writ of privilege; and he is not bound to claim his privilege, nor can his adverſary know he will claim it.

An action was lately brought in the King's Bench, (as I have heard) for delaying a poſt-letter maliciouſly, whereby the plaintiff wanted intelligence that might have been of great advantage to him. The Court diſcountenanced the action, ſo that it proceeded no further. It was then ſaid (as I heard) to this effect; That if ſuch precedents were admitted, there could hardly be any dealing or correſpondence but might be matter for actions at law; and altho' the caſe depended upon proof of particular malice, and the defendant will be acquitted if his caſe be not odious; yet we muſt conſider that there is both charge and vexation of mind that attends the defence of a juſt cauſe, and we muſt not ſubject men for all their actions to ſuch trouble and hazard.

Theſe inſtances ſhew, that altho' an action upon the caſe be eſteemed a catholicon, yet when actions have been applied to new caſes, they have always been ſtrictly examined, and upon conſiderations of juſtice or inconvenience they have been many times rejected.

For tho' the law advances remedies, as my brothers obſerved, yet it is with conſideration that vexation be not more advanced than remedy.

It is my opinion that no new device ever was, or can be introduced into the law, but abſurdities and difficulties ariſe upon it, which were not foreſeen; which makes me very jealous of admitting novelties. But,

2. In matters relating to the Parliament (which is my ſecond ground) there is no need of introducing novelties; for the Parliament can provide new laws to anſwer any miſchiefs that ariſe, and it ought to be left to them to do it.

Eſpecially in a caſe of this nature, concerning elections, which the Parliament have already taken care of, and preſcribed remedies by the ſeveral Statutes that have been made concerning them; I ſay, in ſuch a caſe, there is little need to ſtrain the law.

The Judges in all times have been very tender of meddling with matters relating to Parliament. I do not find that ever they tried elections, but where Statutes give them expreſs power; or that they ever examined the behaviour of a Sheriff, or any officer of the Parliament, in relation to any ſervice performed to the Parliament, but upon thoſe Statutes: And in Brounker's caſe, Dyer 168. the Statute was their rule in the Star-Chamber, and they inflicted the ſame puniſhment that is appointed by that Statute.

If we ſhall allow general remedies (as an action upon the caſe is) to be applied to caſes relating to the Parliament, we ſhall at laſt invade privilege of Parliament, and that great privilege of judging of their own privileges.

Suppoſe an action ſhould be brought in time of prorogation, againſt a Member of Parliament, for that he falſly and maliciouſly did exhibit a complaint of breach of privilege to the Parliament, whereby the party was ſent for in cuſtody, and loſt his liberty, and was put to great charges to acquit himſelf, and was acquitted by the Parliament.

If upon ſuch a caſe the jury ſhould find the defendant guilty, why ſhould not that action be maintained as well as this at bar? It may be ſaid for that action, that the judgment of the Parliament is followed, and the privilege is not tried at law, but determined, 1. In the Houſe; 2. It may be ſaid, the party has no other way to recover his charges.

It would be dangerous to admit ſuch an action, for then there would be peril in claiming privilege; for if the party complained of, had the fortune to be acquitted by the Houſe, the Member that made the complaint would be at the mercy of the jury, as to the point of malice and quantity of damages. Such a precedent, I ſuppoſe, would not pleaſe the Parliament; and yet it may with more juſtice be the ſecond caſe, than this at the bar the firſt.

Actions may be brought for giving Parliament protections wrongfully. Actions may be brought againſt the clerk of the Parliament, Serjeant at Arms, and Speaker, for aught I know; for executing their offices amiſs, with averments of malice and damage: and then muſt Judges and Juries determine what they ought to do by their officers? This is in effect preſcribing rules to the Parliament for them to act by.

It cannot be ſeen whither we ſhall be drawn, if we meddle with matters of Parliament in actions at law. Therefore, in my judgment, the only ſafety is in thoſe bounds that are warranted by Acts of Parliament or conſtant practice.

Suppoſe this action had been brought before the election had been decided in the Houſe, and the jury had found one way, and the Parliament had determined contrary; how inconſiſtent had this been?

But it was ſaid in the King's-Bench, that the Court would not try it before the Parliament had determined the election, and then that cannot be conteſted, but the judgment of the Parliament muſt be followed: And my brother Ellis but now ſaid, Surely no man will be ſo indiſcreet, as to bring ſuch an action before the Parliament hath determined it; and the Court will not try it, before ſuch time as the election be determined in a proper way.

In my opinion this was not rightly conſidered, for how can the Court ſtay any ſuit, to expect the determination of the Parliament? And what reaſon or juſtice is there, that the Sheriff, who is no party called to anſwer in the Parliament, ſhould be concluded in any thing by a judgment between other

other parties, to defend himſelf from a demand of damages in a Court of law, where witneſſes are examined upon oath, which they cannot be in the Commons Houſe?

There is no reaſon the ſuit of law ſhould ſtay till the Houſe have determined the election, if the determination of the Houſe be not concluſive in that ſuit.

And for the diſcretion of the parties that are like to bring ſuch actions, I cannot depend upon it; for I ſee in this Age, ſome men will inſiſt upon their private rights, to the hindrance of publick Affairs of higher conſequence than any that can come before the Courts in Weſtminſter-hall.

It may be, there will not want men that will preſs us to judge in ſuch caſes; and not only before the Parliament have determined, but againſt what the Parliament have determined; and will tell us that the Sheriff was no party, that witneſſes were not there examined upon oath, and produce Arguments from Antiquity which we ſhall be very loth to judge of.

I can ſee no other way to avoid conſequences derogatory to the honour of the Parliament, but to reject the action; and all others that ſhall relate either to the proceedings or privilege of Parliament, as our Predeceſſors have done.

For if we ſhould admit general remedies in matters relating to the Parliament, we muſt ſet bounds how far they ſhall go, which is a dangerous province; for if we err, privilege of Parliament will be invaded, which we ought not any way to endamage.

This I ſpeak of general remedies: Now I will conſider this particular caſe, which, in my opinion, would bring great danger and diſhonour to the Parliament.

It is diſhonourable to the Parliament that there ſhould be no protection in their ſervice; I have ſhewn that the Sheriff can be ſafe in no caſe, if he ſhall be ſued in ſuch a caſe as this: And can there be a greater reproach, than that there is no ſafety in their ſervice? no body can ſerve them chearfully and willingly at that rate.

It has been objected that the Sheriff is not their officer, but is the officer of the Court of Chancery, which ſends forth the writs, and receives the returns. The Argument is plauſible, but will not paſs in the Parliament; for they ſay the Court of Chancery is the Repoſitory for their writs, but will not allow them to iſſue without warrant from the Houſe: They will not ſuffer the Court of Chancery to meddle with the returns of the Sheriff. The Parliament ſends immediate order to the Sheriff; if the return be too ſlow, they direct the Sheriff to amend his return, and they puniſh the Sheriff where they find him faulty; ſo that it appears they exerciſe an immediate juriſdiction over the Sheriff. And I ſuppoſe they would judge it very falſe doctrine to ſay, that the Court of Chancery, or us, can any way meddle with the returns or the officer.

Admitting the Sheriff to act in returns as the officer of the Parliament, it concerns them that he ſhould be liable to no other puniſhment but what they inflict, otherwiſe they cannot expect to be obeyed.

To have others judge when their ſervants do well, will be to have others give rules to their ſervants and ſervice, which they will think inconvenient.

Let it be conſidered how hard a task Sheriffs have in the elections of Knights to the Parliament: The appearance commonly is very numerous, the parties conteſting very violent, the proceeding tumultuous, the polling ſometimes is at ſeveral places at once; ſo that the Sheriff can hardly be a witneſs of the action: and if the diſpute be in the houſe of Commons, he is no party to it. If after all this the Sheriff, who cannot indemnify himſelf by ſecurity, ſhall be liable to an action, the ſervice of the Parliament may be reckoned a miſerable ſlavery; which is not for their honour.

As this is diſhonourable, ſo it is dangerous to Parliaments; it concerns the Kingdom that returns to the Parliament ſhould be upright and impartial, and that they may be ſo, the Sheriff ſhould be ſecure from all fears.

Judges are not liable to actions, that they may proceed uprightly and impartially; if they were ſubject to ſuits for their judgments, there is that earneſtneſs and confidence on both ſides, that one ſide would be diſſatisfied and trouble them, and they could not diſcharge their duty without apprehenſions of diſquiet.

If the Sheriff be expoſed to actions thus, let us conſider what and whom he is to fear: He may fear the ſuit of the party, and he may fear the ſuit of the King. And it follows neceſſarily, that if an action lies, an information for the King will alſo lie for the miſdemeanor in his office: If it be not a caſe privileged by the complexion of it, as Parliamentary, from being examined in Weſtminſter-hall, but that he may be puniſhed at the ſuit of the party, he may certainly as well be puniſhed at the ſuit of the King: If ſo, where is the Sheriff's ſecurity? Will his own innocence ſecure him? That muſt be tried by a jury of the County where the Parliament ſits; who are, it may be, ſtrangers to him as well as to the matter, or by a jury of the Country where the election was; where, it may be, they will be of an oppoſite party; the plaintiff may wait his opportunity, and queſtion him twenty years after: And if he be condemned, his puniſhment is unlimited, a fine may be ſet to any height for the King, and damages may be given to any value for the party. Where is his ſecurity upon ſuch proceedings? Will he not be more afraid of ſuch puniſhment out of Parliament, than of any puniſhment in Parliament? Will not, nay may not his terror make him deſire to pleaſe them that can puniſh him out of Parliament, rather than to do right? Will not that be dangerous to the conſtitution of Parliaments?

As the puniſhment out of Parliament may be a terror to thoſe who mean well, ſo colourable puniſhments may be as miſchievous on the other ſide; for they may prevent any puniſhment in Parliament, for nemo bis punitur pro eodem delicto; they may ſerve for protection of men that do ill. When it is ſeriouſly weighed, of what conſequence this may be, the caſe at bar will not be thought a caſe fit to be received by the Judges without the countenance of a new law.

They object, here is malice found by the verdict, and that there can be no danger or inconveniency that malice ſhould be puniſhed.

This objection fortifies my opinion; for malice, upon which they would have the ſcales turn in this caſe, is not a thing demonſtrative, but interpretative, and lies in opinion; ſo that it may give an handle to any man to puniſh another by.

The inſtance of this very caſe ſhews, that a good man may reaſonably be afraid of the event of his defence in ſuch a caſe.

For altho' the matter was of great examination in Parliament, and at laſt decided but by few voices, and no obſervation of the Sheriff's miſcarriage there; tho' it appeared upon the trial (which I may ſay, being preſent there) that the Sheriff was guided by the advice of his friends, of counſel, and of Parliament-men, that told him the only ſafe courſe was to make a double return; yet the jury condemned him to pay 800 l. againſt the expectation of the Court: for the Judges that were preſent at the trial did all declare publickly, that they would not have given that verdict.

The Judges heard all the evidence the jury could go upon; for being of a remote County to the place of election, the jury could know nothing of their own knowledge, and yet the Judges concurred not with the jury in their opinion.

I know we are not to examine the truth of the verdict, we muſt take it for goſpel; neither doth any partiality in this particular lead me in judgment: but I ſhew it as an inſtance that malice is not demonſtrative; men's minds may be miſtaken, and innocent men may therefore have reaſon to be afraid, eſpecially in ill times, and may uſe ſuch means for their ſafety as may not be convenient for Parliaments.

But there can be no danger or inconvenience in the cenſure of the Parliament, that repreſents the whole Kingdom, who hitherto have alone exerciſed this power, and who may at any time reform the law, if the preſent practice be any way inconvenient.

Upon theſe reaſons which I have produced, I ground my opinion: Now it will be neceſſary to weigh what hath been ſaid in oppoſition to it.

The Arguments urged on the other ſide, related either to the ingredients or circumſtances of this action, or to the foundation or ſubſtance of it.

I call the ingredients and circumſtances of the action, that it is laid with theſe words, Falſo, malitiosè, deceptivè, & ſcienter: And that there is a verdict in this caſe, and damages are found.

The words falſo, malitiosè, & deceptivè, will ſometimes make a thing actionable, which is not ſo in it ſelf, without malice proved, tho' there be the ſame damage to the party.

As where a man cauſes another to be falſly indicted, yet if it be not malitiosè, no action lies; tho' there be the ſame trouble, charge and damage in one caſe as the other.

But it is only where a man is a voluntary Agent; for if a man be compellable to act, you cannot moleſt him upon any averment of malice: As if a grand jury-man cauſes another to be indicted, tho' you aver malice, you cannot have an action againſt him: ſo for a witneſs that doth teſtify, or a Judge that judgeth.

In the caſe at bar, the Sheriff is compellable to act, and not barely as a miniſter to ſend the Indenture, but as a Judge to ſay which is the major part of the due Electors; and if he miſtakes, there is no reaſon it ſhould ſubject him to an action upon an artificial averment of malice.

I remember in Shepherd and Wakeman's caſe in the King's Bench, Mr. Juſtice Wyndham ſaid well, that the words falſo & malitiosè were grown words of courſe, and put into every action: So that to his knowledge juries many times had no regard to them, that he looked upon them as words of form.

If we ſhould make the words falſo & malitiosè ſupport an action without a fit ſubject matter, all the actions of mankind would be liable to ſuit and vexation: they that have the cooking (as we call it) of declarations in actions of the caſe, if they be skilful in their art, will be ſure to put in the words falſo & malitiosè, let the caſe be what it will; they are here pepper and vinegar in a Cook's hand, that help to make ſauce for any meat, but will not make a diſh of themſelves.

Falſo & malitiosè, will not enable an action againſt a Judge.

Nor againſt an indictor or witneſs, nor where words are not actionable, tho' the plaintiff hath a verdict and damages found; nor for a breach of truſt, which is alieni fori.

The reaſon of every one of theſe caſes holds in the caſe at bar: Therefore it ought to have the ſame reſolution.

As to the word ſcienter, it hath weight ſometimes; as if an action be brought for keeping a dog that worried another's ſheep, ſciens canem ad mordend' oves eſſe conſuetud. or for detaining the ſervant or wife of another, ſcienter: In theſe caſes, if the defendant hath been told that the dog did worry ſheep, or that it was the ſervant or wife of another, tho' it may be he did not believe it, yet it was ſcienter; for the word implies no more than having notice: And in thoſe actions he muſt inform himſelf at his peril, and may if he doubts, avoid danger, by putting away thoſe things which give offence. But in this caſe he could receive information by none, and is not to believe or disbelieve any body, but is bound to judge of the thing himſelf, and to act according to his judgment; ſo that no proof could be made of the ſcienter, for one ſide tells him the election was one way, and the other ſide tells him it is the other way; but he being preſent to the whole action, muſt follow the dictates of his own judgment. Hence it appears, ſcienter in this caſe is an empty word, not referring to notice of a fact, but to matter of judgment, which cannot any way be proved.

It has been often urged, that this caſe is ſtronger by being after a verdict and damages found by the jury; and it has been ſaid, that perhaps upon a demurrer, it might have been found more doubtful.

The caſe is the ſame to me upon a verdict, that it would have been upon a general demurrer, and no ſtronger; for a demurrer is the confeſſion of the party of all that can be proved, or can poſſibly be found upon that declaration.

It is my Lord Coke's Advice in Cromwel's caſe, 4th part, 14. a. never to demur to a declaration, if there be any hopes of the matter of fact; for the matter in law will as well ſerve after a verdict as upon a demurrer.

It had been a very odious caſe, if the Sheriff ſhould have admitted all this fact to be true by a demurrer.

The finding the plaintiff's damages adds no ſtrength to the caſe; for we ſee every day upon actions for words, tho' the jury find the defendant guilty for ſpeaking words falſo & malitiosè, and find it to be to the plaintiff's great damages; yet if the words are not ſuch as will bear an action, the Court ſtays judgment: and if judgment happen to be given, it is reverſable for error; which ſhews that the finding damages by the jury cannot make an action better than if it were to be adjudged upon demurrer.

I ſhall now conſider what hath been ſaid to maintain this action upon the main ſubſtance and foundation of it. They ſay, this is a caſe within the general reaſon of the common law, for here is malice, falſity and damage; and where they concur, there ought to be remedy. And altho' this be a new caſe, yet it ought not for that reaſon to be rejected; for other kind of actions have been newly introduced, and this is as fit to be entertained as any.

My brothers that argued even now for the action, ſhewed great learning and great pains; and certainly have ſaid all that can be invented in ſupport of this caſe: But as far as I could perceive, they have ſpoken only upon general notions to that purpoſe I juſt now mentioned; but nothing that I could obſerve applicable to the reaſons and differences I go upon.

As for the rule they go upon, that where falſity, malice and damage, do concur, there muſt be remedy; I confeſs it is true generally, but not univerſally, for it holds not in the caſe of a Judge, nor an Indictor, nor a Witneſs, nor of words that import not legal ſlander, tho' they are found to bring damage, as I have ſhewn before. And the reaſons that exempt theſe caſes from the general rule, have the ſame force in the caſe at bar.

I muſt confeſs, the Judges have ſometimes entertained new kinds of actions, but it was upon great deliberation, and with great diſcretion, where a general inconvenience requir'd it.

If Slade's caſe were new (for my brother Thurland obſerved truly it was ſaid in that caſe, that there were infinite numbers of precedents) that caſe imported the common courſe of juſtice. Actions for words that are ſaid to be new, tho' they have been uſed ſome hundreds of years, are a neceſſary means to preſerve the peace of the Kingdom. The caſe of Smith and Craſchaw, Cro. Car. 15. was a caſe of general concern, being that proſecutions for treaſons may be againſt any man, and at any time.

But in the caſe at bar, neither the peace of the Kingdom, nor the courſe of juſtice is concerned in general, but only the adminiſtration of officers of the Parliament, in the execution of Parliamentary writs; and can never happen but in time of Parliament, and muſt of neceſſity fall under the notice of the Parliament; ſo that if the law were deficient, it is to be preſumed the Parliament would take care to ſupply it: Diſcretion requires us rather to attend that, than to introduce new precedents upon ſuch general notions that cannot govern the courſe of Parliament.

My brother Atkyns ſaid, the common law complied with the genius of the Nation; I do not underſtand the Argument: Does the common law change? Are we to judge of the changes of the genius of the nation? Whither may general notions carry us at this rate? For my own part, I think, tho' the common law be not written, yet it is certain, and not arbitrary. We are ſworn to obſerve the laws as they are, and I ſee not how we can change them by our judgments: And as for the genius of the nation, it will be beſt conſidered by the Parliament, who have power of the laws, and may bring us to a compliance with it.

In the caſe at bar, I look upon the Sheriff as a particular officer of the Parliament, for the managing elections, and as if he were not Sheriff: I look upon the writ as if it were an order of Parliament, and had not the name of a writ: I look upon the courſe of Parliament, which we pretend not to know, to be incident to the conſideration of it; ſo that it ſtands not upon the general notion of remedy in the common courſe of juſtice.

The Arguments of the falling of the value of money, whereby the penalty of 100*l.* provided by the 23 H. 6. is become inconſiderable; and the increaſe of the eſtimation of being a Member of Parliament; if they were true, are arguments to the Parliament to change the law by increaſing the penalty, but we cannot do it.

My brother Maynard, in his Argument, would embolden us; telling us, we are not to think the caſe too hard for us, becauſe of the name or courſe of Parliament; for Judges have puniſhed Abſentees: They may determine what is a Parliament, what is an Act of Parliament, how long an ordinance of Parliament ſhall continue, and may puniſh treſpaſſes done in the very Parliament.

I will not diſpute the truth of what he ſaid in this, but if his Arguments were artificial, he might have ſpared them; for they have no manner of effect to draw me beyond my ſphere.

I will not be afraid to determine any thing that I think proper for me to judge; but ſeeing I cannot find the Courts of Juſtice have at any time meddled with caſes of this nature, but upon expreſs power given them by Acts of Parliament, I cannot conſent to this precedent; I am confident when there is need, the Parliament will diſcern it, and make laws to enlarge our power, ſo far as they ſhall think convenient.

I ſee no harm that Sheriffs in the mean time ſhould be ſafe from this new deviſed action, which they call the common law; if they miſdemean themſelves, they are anſwerable to the Parliament, whoſe officers they be, or may be puniſhed by the Statute, made for regulating elections.

It is time for me to conclude, which I ſhall do by repeating the opinion I at firſt delivered, viz. That this judgment is not warranted by the rules of law; That it introduceth novelty of dangerous conſequence, and therefore ought to be reverſed. Sæpe viatorem nova, non vetus orbita, fallit.

North, Chief Juſtice, and five other Judges (againſt Ellis and Atkyns) reverſed the judgment upon the matter in Law, That the action lies not.

[Note, The Lord Chief Juſtice Vaughan, and Lord Chief Baron Turner, both deceaſed, who in their lives were eminent Members of Parliament, were of the ſame opinion.]

Soon after the Revolution, Sir Samuel Barnardiſton brought his Writ of Error into the houſe of Peers, to reverſe the reverſal of the judgment given in the Exchequer; but the houſe affirmed the reverſal of the ſaid judgment, as appears by the following Reſolutions.

Veneris, 24 Maii 1689.

THis day the Lord Chief Juſtice of the Court of King's Bench brought into this Houſe a tranſcript of a writ of Error, to reverſe a judgment given againſt Barnardiſton at the ſuit of Soame.

Sabbati, 25 Maii, 1689.

Whereas Sir Samuel Barnardiſton brought his writ of Error into this Houſe, and hath aſſigned errors thereupon, to which Sir William Soame was defendant; who left dame Catherine Soame, his widow, his executrix: And the Houſe being moved, that the ſaid Dame Catherine Soame may join iſſue:

iſſue thereupon; It is ordered by the Lords ſpiritual and temporal in Parliament aſſembled, that the ſaid Dame Catherine Soame be, and is hereby required to join iſſue to the ſaid writ, on or before Thurſday next, being the 30*th* inſtant, at 10 of the clock in the forenoon; whereof the ſaid Sir Samuel Barnardiſton is to cauſe notice to be given to the ſaid Dame Soame, to the end ſhe join iſſue accordingly.

Sabbati, 1 June, 1689.

The Houſe being moved, that they would be pleaſed to appoint a day for hearing the errors argued upon the writ of Error brought into this houſe, wherein Sir Samuel Barnardiſton is plaintiff, and Dame Catherine Soame, widow, executrix of Sir William Soame, defendant: It is ordered by the Lords ſpiritual and temporal in Parliament aſſembled, That this houſe will hear the ſaid errors argued by counſel on both ſides, at the bar, on Saturday next, being the 8*th* inſtant, at 10 of the clock in the forenoon; and in the mean time ſhe may join iſſue, if ſhe pleaſe: whereof the ſaid Sir Samuel Barnardiſton is to cauſe notice to be given to the ſaid Dame Catherine Soame, to the end ſhe attend accordingly.

Sabbati, 8 die Junii, 1689.

This day being appointed for hearing errors argued by counſel, upon the writ of error between Sir Samuel Barnardiſton and the Lady Soame, the counſel for the plaintiff appeared, but none appeared for the defendant: And upon oath made at the bar by Nicholas Baker, Sollicitor, that he ſerved the order of this Houſe at the houſe of the Lady Soame; thereby giving notice, that the cauſe was to be heard this day; whereupon the Houſe heard the counſel of the plaintiff, and made the enſuing Order, viz.

After hearing counſel this day, upon the writ of Error depending in this Houſe, wherein Sir Samuel Barnardiſton is plaintiff, and Dame Catherine Soame is defendant; It is ordered by the Lords ſpiritual in Parliament aſſembled, the giving judgment on this writ of Error be, and is hereby ſuſpended, until Monday next; and thoſe that are, or were Judges, and now in Town, do attend this Houſe that day, to inform the Houſe of their reaſons and grounds for their judgment for reverſal of the judgment in Sir Samuel Barnardiſton's caſe.

Ordered, That all the judges be preſent on Monday morning, to aſſiſt this Houſe in this buſineſs of Sir Samuel Barnardiſton.

Lunæ, 10 Junii.

William Mountague, Eſq; was called in, and the Speaker told him, That the Houſe deſired to hear from him, upon what grounds and opinions he gave his opinion for the reverſal of the judgments for giving eight hundred pounds to Sir Samuel Barnardiſton.

He taking notice that there was counſel preſent for Sir Samuel Barnardiſton, but no counſel for the Lady Soame, he ſaid, ſeeing the defendant did not appear with counſel, he deſired he might not be looked upon as counſel for the defendant; upon that the company was commanded to withdraw: And the Houſe ordered Mr. Mountague ſhould be admitted to come in alone; who being come in, ſaid, he would, for their Lordſhips ſatisfaction, (as well as he can remember) acquaint them with the grounds and reaſons which induced him to give his opinion for the reverſal of that judgment; and ſo he proceeded to give the heads of what he ſaid, which being ended, he withdrew.

And after conſideration thereof, it was moved that the counſel for Sir Samuel Barnardiſton ſhould be called in, and the Speaker to acquaint them with the effect of what Mr. Mountague had ſaid; that ſo the counſel might be able thereby to reply, for the better information of their Lordſhips and the Judges then preſent. And after ſome debate, the queſtion was put, whether the counſel ſhall be called in? It was reſolved in the negative.

Then it was moved to make uſe of proxies, which was oppoſed, as concerning their not to be admitted in preliminary caſes of judicature.

After hearing William Mountague Eſq; for his judgment in Sir Samuel Barnardiſton's caſe, and debate thereupon, it is ordered, That the clerk do inſpect the books concerning proxies; and whether they have been uſed in caſes of judicature; and give an account to-morrow morning what he finds therein: And that all the Judges do attend the Houſe to-morrow.

Martis, 11 Junii 1689.

The clerk of the Parliament, in purſuance of the order yeſterday, ſhewed ſeveral inſtances where proxies have been uſed in preliminaries to private cauſes: It is ordered by the Lords ſpiritual and temporal in Parliament aſſembled, That proxies may be uſed in ſuch preliminary caſes, but not in giving judgment; and this order be added to the Roll of ſtanding orders.

Ordered, That the counſel of Sir Samuel Barnardiſton ſhall be heard on Friday next, to reply to what Mr. Mountague gave for his reaſons for reverſal of Sir Samuel Barnardiſton's judgment; and that all the Judges do attend at the ſame time.

Veneris, 14 Die Junii, 1689.

After hearing counſel in Sir Samuel Barnardiſton's caſe this day, to reply to what Mr. William Mountague ſaid for his reaſons to reverſe the judgment given in the Exchequer; It is ordered, That this Houſe will hear all the Judges give their opinions in this caſe, on Tueſday the 25*th* of this Inſtant June, at 10 of the clock in the forenoon.

Martis, 25 die Junii, 1689.

The Houſe heard the opinion of all the Judges in the caſe of Sir Samuel Barnardiſton, upon his writ of Error depending in this Houſe.

And the queſtion being put, Whether to go on in the debate of this buſineſs now? It was reſolved in the affirmative.

After debate, the queſtion being put, Whether to reverſe the reverſal of the judgment given between Sir Samuel Barnardiſton and Sir William Soame? It was reſolved in the negative.

Leave is given to ſeveral Lords to enter their diſſent to the aboveſaid queſtion, and accordingly do enter their diſſent for the reaſons enſuing.

1. Becauſe it is a denying Sir Samuel Barnardiſton the benefit of law, which gives relief in all wrong and injury: And tho' this be an action of the firſt impreſſion, yet there being a damage to the plaintiff, the common law gives him this action to repair himſelf; and if it were not ſo, there would be a failure of juſtice, which cannot be admitted.

2. Be-

2. Becauſe the allowing this reverſal, tends towards the giving the power and encouragement to Sheriffs to make falſe and double returns; by which means the right of elections will be avoided, and it tends thereby to the packing of a houſe of Commons, which may overturn the whole frame of the Government, and eſtabliſh what religion and governments a pack'd Parliament ſhall think fit.

XXXI. Proceedings in the Houſe of Commons, on an Appeal being brought in the Houſe of Lords, by Dr. Shirley, againſt Sir John Fagg, and others their Members; May 1675. 27 Car. II.

Martis, 4 Maii 1675.

SIR John Fagg Bart. this day informing the Houſe, that he was ſummon'd to appear to a Petition in the Houſe of Lords, a Committee was thereupon appointed to ſearch for precedents to that purpoſe.

Mercurii, 5 Maii.

Reſolved, That a meſſage be ſent to the Lords, to acquaint them, that this Houſe hath receiv'd information, That there is a Petition of Appeal depending before them, at the ſuit of Thomas Shirley Eſq; againſt Sir John Fagg a Member of this Houſe; to which Petition he is, by order of the Houſe of Lords, directed to anſwer on Friday next: and to deſire the Lords to have a regard to the privileges of this Houſe; and that Sir Trevor Williams do go up with the meſſge to the Lords.

Sir Trevor Williams reports, that he had attended the Lords with the meſſage of this Houſe, concerning Sir John Fagg; and that the Lords will return an anſwer by meſſengers of their own.

Veneris, 7 Maii.

A meſſage from the Lords by Sir William Beverſham, and Sir Samuel Clarke.

Mr. Speaker,

The Lords have conſider'd of the meſſage received from the Houſe of Commons, concerning privilege in the caſe of Sir John Fagg, and do return this anſwer, That the Houſe of Commons need not doubt, but that the Lords will have a regard to the privilege of the Houſe of Commons, as they have of their own.

Sabbati, 8 Maii.

A Committee was appointed to inſpect the Lords Journals, to ſee what entries are therein made againſt Sir John Fagg, a Member of this Houſe, and to report the ſame.

Mercurii,

Mercurii, 12 Maii.

Dr. Thomas Shirley ordered to be ſent for in cuſtody, to anſwer his breach of the privileges of this Houſe, in proſecuting a ſuit by petition of Appeal in the Lords houſe, againſt Sir John Fagg, a Member of this Houſe, during the ſeſſion and privilege of Parliament.

And a Committee is alſo appointed to inſpect the Lords Journals, to ſee what hath been done in like caſes; and the ſaid Sir John Fagg is ordered not to proceed, or make any anſwer to the ſaid Appeal, without the licence of this houſe.

Veneris, 14 Maii.

Sir Thomas Lee reports from the committee appointed to inſpect the Journals of the houſe of Lords, and the entries therein, in the caſe between Dr. Thomas Shirley and Sir John Fagg, a Member of this houſe, That the committee had peruſed the journals of the Lords houſe, and found the entries to be as follow.

April the 30*th*.

Thomas Shirley Eſq; preſented a petition to the Lords.

Ordered, That the ſaid Sir John Fagg may have a copy of the ſaid petition, and put in his anſwer thereunto, in writing, on Friday the 7th day of May next, at ten of the clock in the forenoon, if he thinks fit.

May the 5*th*.

The Commons ſend a meſſage by Sir Trevor Williams:

The Knights, Citizens, and Burgeſſes of the Houſe of Commons, in Parliament aſſembled, have been informed, that there is a petition of Appeal depending before their Lordſhips, at the ſuit of Thomas Shirley Eſq; againſt Sir John Fagg, a Member of their Houſe. To which petition he is, by their Lordſhips order, directed to anſwer, on Friday next, and deſire their Lordſhips to take care of their privileges.

Anſwer. That this Houſe have conſidered of their meſſage, and will ſend anſwer by meſſengers of their own.

Ordered, That the committee for privileges do meet this afternoon, to conſider of the meſſages received from the houſe of Commons this day, concerning Thomas Shirley Eſq; and Sir John Fagg, a Member of the Houſe, and ſearch precedents in the caſe, and report to the Houſe to-morrow morning.

May the 6*th*.

The Earl of Berks reported, That the committee of privileges having met and conſidered of what was referred to them in the caſe between Thomas Shirley, Eſq; and Sir John Fagg, a Member of the houſe of Commons; and the meſſage from the houſe of Commons thereupon; have ordered him to report, That the committee have found that the Houſe did refer the buſineſs of Mr. Hale and Mr. Slingsby, upon the like meſſage of the houſe of Commons, to the committee of privileges; who did report to the Houſe, That it is the undoubted right of the Lords in judicature, to receive and determine in time of Parliament, Appeals from inferior Courts, though a Member of either Houſe be concerned, that there may be no failure of juſtice in the land; and the Houſe did agree with the committee therein: And thereupon the committee do humbly offer to their Lordſhips, upon this occaſion, to take the ſame courſe, and to inſiſt upon their juſt rights in this particular, which their Lordſhips will be pleaſed to ſignify to the houſe of Commons, in ſuch manner as they ſhall think fit.

The Houſe agreed with the committee in this declaration, and ordered the ſame to be entered into the journal-book of this Houſe, as their declaration, viz.

" That it is the undoubted right of the Lords in " Judicature, to receive and determine in time of " Parliament, Appeals from inferior Courts, " though a Member of either Houſe be concerned, " that there may be no failure of juſtice in the " land."

Then it was moved, that the former anſwer ſent to the houſe of Commons, in the caſe of Mr. Slingsby and Mr. Hale, might be given now to the houſe of Commons, in this Caſe of Sir John Fagg; and that the declaration and report agreed to this day, might be added to it.

The declaration aforeſaid was read, and the queſtion being put, Whether this ſhall be as a part of the anſwer to be given to the houſe of Commons? it was reſolved in the negative.

The anſwer returned formerly to the houſe of Commons, in the caſe of Mr. Slingsby and Mr. Hale, was in theſe words; That the houſe of Commons need not doubt but that their Lordſhips will have a regard to the privileges of the houſe of Commons, as they have of their own.

The queſtion being put, Whether this anſwer ſhall be now returned to the meſſage from the houſe of Commons? it was reſolved in the affirmative.

May the 7*th*, it was ſent accordingly.

Maii 7.

Whereas this day was appointed for Sir John Fagg to put in an anſwer to the Petition and Appeal of Thomas Shirley Eſq; depending in this Houſe, if he thought fit; the ſaid Sir John Fagg appearing perſonally this day at the bar, and deſiring longer time to put in an anſwer thereunto;

It is thereupon ordered, That the ſaid Sir John Fagg hath hereby further time given him for putting in his anſwer, till Wedneſday next, being the 12th day of this inſtant May, at ten o'clock in the forenoon.

Maii 12.

Sir John Fagg put in his anſwer to the petition of Mr. Shirley.

A debate ariſing thereupon, touching the privilege of their Houſe;

Reſolved, &c. That the Appeal brought by Dr. Shirley in the houſe of Lords, againſt Sir John Fagg, a Member of this Houſe, and the proceedings thereupon, are a breach of the undoubted rights and privileges of this Houſe.

The Houſe being informed, that the warrant of this Houſe for taking of the ſaid Dr. Shirley into cuſtody, was forcibly taken away and detained from the Serjeant at Arms his deputy, attending this houſe, by the Lord Mohun: And the Serjeant's deputy being called in and examined as to the matter of fact, gave this teſtimony;

That he found Dr. Shirley in the inner lobby of the houſe of Lords, and that he came to him, and deſired to ſpeak with him, and acquainted him that he had a warrant from the houſe of Commons to apprehend him, and deſired to know, whether he could ſhew him any reaſon to excuſe him, that he might not ſerve the the warrant on him : And that he likewiſe told him, that he would not execute the warrant on him in that place, but deſired of him, that he would go along with him freely : And that in caſe he would not, he would take his opportunity in another place.

And that the ſaid Lord Mohun coming in, in the mean time, required him to ſhew his warrant, which he producing, the Lord Mohun laid hands on it, and held it ſo faſt, that it was in danger of being torn; and that therefore he was forced to part with it, and deſiring to have it again, the Lord Mohun refuſed it, but carried the warrant into the houſe of Lords. That Dr. Shirley afterwards refuſed to go along with him, ſaying, that he was not then his priſoner; and that ſeveral perſons interpoſing, the Doctor eſcaped from him. And a debate ariſing thereupon, Reſolved, That a meſſage be ſent to the Lords to complain of the Lord Mohun, for forcibly taking away and detaining the warrant of this Houſe, from the Deputy Serjeant at Arms, for taking of Dr. Shirley into cuſtody; and to demand the juſtice of the Lords houſe againſt the ſaid Lord Mohun.

And that the Lord Antram do go up to the Lords with the meſſage.

Ordered, That Mr. Speaker do iſſue forth a new warrant to the Serjeant at Arms attending this houſe, for apprehending Dr. Thomas Shirley, to anſwer his breach of privilege, for proſecuting a ſuit by petition of Appeal in the Lords houſe, againſt Sir John Fagg, a Member of this houſe, during the ſeſſion and privilege of Parliament.

Sabbati, 15 Maii 1675.

The Lord Antram reports from the Lords, that he had, in obedience to the commands of this houſe, attended the Lords, and delivered the meſſage concerning the Lord Mohun's taking away and detaining the warrant for apprehending Dr. Shirley, and that the Lords had returned this anſwer;

Gentlemen of the houſe of Commons,

The Lords have conſidered of your meſſage, and of the complaint therein; and they return you this anſwer, That they find the Lord Mohun hath done nothing but what is according to his duty.

The houſe then reſumed the debate of the matter concerning the privileges of this houſe; and the matter being debated,

Reſolved, &c. That the Appeal brought by Dr. Shirley in the houſe of the Lords, againſt Sir John Fagg, a Member of this houſe of Commons, and the proceedings thereupon, is a breach of the undoubted rights and privileges of the houſe of Commons; and therefore the Commons deſire, that there be no further proceedings in that cauſe, before their Lordſhips.

Ordered, That a conference be deſired with the Lords concerning the privileges of this houſe, in the caſe of Sir John Fagg; and that Sir Thomas Lee do go up to the Lords to deſire a conference.

A meſſage from the Lords by Sir Mondeford Bramſton, and Sir William Glaſcock;

Mr. Speaker,

We are commanded to let this houſe know, that the Lords ſpiritual and temporal aſſembled in Parliament, have received a warrant, ſigned Edward Seymour, which they have appointed us to ſhew you; and deſire to know, whether it be a warrant ordered by this houſe?

The matter of the meſſage being debated, the queſtion being put, That the word unparliamentary, be part of the anſwer to the Lords meſſage,

It paſſed in the negative.

Reſolved, That the meſſengers be called in, and that this anſwer be returned, That this houſe will conſider of the meſſage.

The meſſengers being called in, Mr. Speaker does acquaint them, that the houſe will conſider of the meſſage.

Reſolved, That the meſſage laſt received from the Lords, is an unparliamentary meſſage.

Reſolved, That a conference be deſired to be had with the Lords upon the ſubject matter of the laſt meſſage received from the houſe of Lords.

Reſolved, That it be referred to Mr. Garraway, &c. to draw up reaſons to be offered at the ſaid conference.

Then the houſe being informed, that there is a cauſe upon an Appeal brought up by Sir Nicholas Stoughton, againſt Mr. Onſlow, a Member of this houſe, appointed to be heard at the bar of the Lords houſe;

Reſolved, That a meſſage be ſent to the Lords to acquaint them, that this houſe has received information, that there is a cauſe upon an Appeal brought by Sir Nicholas Stoughton againſt Mr. Onſlow, a Member of this houſe, appointed to be heard at the bar of their houſe, on Monday next; and to deſire their Lordſhips to have regard to the privileges of this houſe: And that Sir Richard Temple do go up with the meſſage to the Lords.

Ordered, That Mr. Onſlow do not appear any further in the proſecution of the Appeal brought againſt him by Sir Nicholas Stoughton, in the houſe of Lords.

Ordered, That Sir Nicholas Stoughton be ſent for in cuſtody of the Serjeant at Arms attending this houſe, to anſwer his breach of privilege in proſecuting a ſuit in the houſe of Lords, againſt Arthur Onſlow, Eſq; a Member of this houſe, during the ſeſſion and privilege of Parliament.

Reſolved, That whoſoever ſhall appear at the bar of the Lords houſe, to proſecute any ſuit againſt any Member of this houſe, ſhall be deemed a breaker and infringer of the rights and privileges of this houſe.

Lunæ, 17 Maii, 1675.

Sir Richard Temple reports, That the perſon appointed had attended the Lords, and delivered the vote of this houſe, concerning the Appeal brought by Dr. Shirley againſt Sir John Fagg.

Sir Thomas Lee reports from the committee appointed to draw up reaſons for the conference to be had with the Lords, Reaſons agreed by the committee; which are as follow, viz.

For that the meſſage is by way of interrogatory upon the proceedings of the houſe of Commons, in a caſe concerning the privilege of a Member of that houſe, of which they are proper judges.

For that the matter of the meſſage carries in it an undue reflection upon the Speaker of the houſe of Commons.

For that the matter of the meſſage doth highly reflect upon the whole houſe of Commons, in their Lordſhips queſtioning that houſe concerning their own orders; which they have the more reaſon to apprehend, becauſe the day before this meſſage was brought to them, the warrant was owned by the complaint of the houſe of Commons to their Lordſhips, ſhips, that the ſame was taken and detained from a ſervant of theirs, by a Peer; which imports, that the queſtion in that meſſage could not be for information only, and ſo tends to interrupt that mutual good correſpondency, which ought to be preſerved inviolably between the two houſes of Parliament.

Martis, 18 Maii, 1675.

Sir Richard Temple reports from the Lords, That he had attended their Lordſhips, according to the command of this houſe, with the meſſage in the caſe of Mr. Onſlow, to which the Lords returned an anſwer, which being in writing, was delivered in at the clerk's table, and read; and is as followeth.

The Lords do declare, That it is the undoubted right of the Lords in judicature, to receive and determine in time of Parliament, Appeals from inferior Courts, though a Member of either houſe be concerned, that there may be no failure of juſtice in the land: And from this right, and the exerciſe thereof, their Lordſhips will not depart.

The matter of the Lords anſwer being debated, Reſolved, "That it is the undoubted right of this "houſe, that none of their Members be ſummoned to attend the houſe of Lords, during the ſitting or privilege of Parliament."

Reſolved, That a conference be deſired with the Lords, upon the privileges of this houſe, contained in the Lords anſwer to the laſt meſſage of this houſe, in the caſe of Mr. Onſlow.

Ordered, That Sir Henry Ford do go up to the Lords, to deſire a conference upon the ſubject matter of their meſſage, concerning the warrant for apprehending Dr. Shirley.

Jovis, 20 Maii, 1675.

Sir Thomas Lee reports, from the committee appointed to draw up reaſons to be offered at the conference to be had with the Lords upon the privileges of this houſe, contained in the Lords anſwer to the laſt meſſage of this houſe, in the caſe of Mr Onſlow; which reaſons were twice read, and with ſome alterations at the clerks table, (upon the queſtion ſeverally put) agreed to; which are as follow, viz.

1. That by the laws and uſage of Parliament, privilege of Parliament belongs to every Member of the houſe of Commons, in all caſes, except Treaſon, Felony, and breach of the Peace; which hath often been declared in Parliament, without any exception of Appeals before the Lords.

2. That the reaſon of that privilege is, that the Members of the houſe of Commons may freely attend the publick affairs of that houſe, without diſturbance or interruption; which doth extend as well to Appeals before the houſe of Peers, as to proceedings in other Courts.

3. That by the conſtant courſe and uſage of Parliament, no Member of the houſe of Commons can attend the houſe of Lords, without the eſpecial leave of that houſe firſt obtained, much leſs be ſummoned or compelled ſo to do.

4. If the Lords ſhall proceed to hear and determine any Appeal where the party neither can, nor ought to attend, ſuch proceedings would be contrary to the rules of juſtice.

5. That the not determining of an Appeal againſt a Member of the houſe of Commons, is not a failure of juſtice, but only a ſuſpenſion of proceedings in a particular caſe, during the continuance of that Parliament, which is but temporary.

6. That in caſe it were a failure of juſtice, it is not to be remedied by the houſe of Lords alone, but it may be by Act of Parliament.

[Here Sir Thomas Littleton reported from the committee appointed to prepare the further addreſs of this houſe to his Majeſty, for the recalling ſuch of his ſubjects as are in the French King's ſervice; which the houſe deferred the further conſideration of, till Wedneſday next.]

Then Sir Trevor Williams reports from the Lords, That he had attended, and deſired a conference with the Lords on the privilege of this houſe, contained in the Lords anſwer to the meſſage of this houſe, in the caſe of Mr. Onſlow: And that the Lords will return an anſwer by meſſengers of their own.

Mr. Powle reports, from the conference had with the Lords upon the ſubject matter of the former conference, concerning the warrant for apprehending Dr. Shirley, That the Lords had returned an anſwer to the reaſons of this houſe, delivered at the former conference, and are as follow:

"The Lords have appointed this conference, "upon the ſubject matter of the laſt conference, "and have commanded us to give theſe anſwers "to the reaſons and other matters then delivered "by the houſe of Commons.

"To the firſt queſtion, the Lords conceive, "that the moſt natural way of being informed, is "by way of queſtion; and ſeeing a paper here "which did reflect upon the privileges of the Lords "houſe, their Lordſhips would not proceed upon "it till they were aſſured it was owned by the houſe "of Commons: But the Lords had no occaſion at "that time, nor do they now think fit to enter into "the debate of the houſe of Commons being or "not being proper judges in the caſe concerning "the privilege of a Member of that houſe; their "Lordſhips neceſſary conſideration upon ſight of "that paper, being only, how far the houſe of "Commons ordering (if that paper were theirs) "the apprehenſion of Dr. Shirley for proſecuting "his Appeal before the Lords, did entrench upon "their Lordſhips both privilege and undoubted "rights of judicature in the conſequence of it, excepting all the Members of both houſes from "the judicature of this the higheſt Court of the "Kingdom; which would cauſe a failure of that "ſupreme juſtice, not adminiſtrable in any other "Court, and which their Lordſhips will never admit.

"As to the ſecond reaſon, the Lords anſwer, "That they do not apprehend how the matter of "this meſſage is any reflection upon the Speaker "of the houſe of Commons.

"To the third reaſon, The Lords cannot imagine how it can be apprehended in the leaſt to "reflect upon the houſe of Commons, for the "houſe of Peers, upon a paper produced to their "Lordſhips, in form of a warrant of that houſe, "whereof doubt was made among the Lords, "whether any ſuch thing had been ordered by "that houſe, to enquire of the Commons, whether ſuch warrant was ordered there or no? "And without ſuch liberty uſed by the Lords, it "will be very hard for their Lordſhips to be "rightly informed, ſo as to preſerve a good correſpondence between the two houſes, which their "Lordſhips ſhall endeavour; or to know when "warrants in the name of that houſe, are true or "pretended: And it is ſo ungrounded an apprehenſion, that their Lordſhips intended any re-

"flection

" flection in asking that queſtion, and not taking " notice in their meſſage of the complaint of the " houſe of Commons owning that warrant, that " the Lords had ſent their meſſage concerning that " paper to the houſe of Commons, before the " Lords had received the ſaid Commons complaint.

" But their Lordſhips have great cauſe to ex- " cept againſt the unjuſt and ſtrained reflection of " that houſe upon their Lordſhips, in aſſerting " that the queſtion in the Lords meſſage could not " be for information, as we affirm, but tending to " interrupt the mutual correſpondence between the " two houſes; which we deny, and had not the " leaſt thought of.

" The Lords have further commanded us to " ſay, That they doubt not when the houſe of " Commons have received what we have delivered " at this conference, they will be ſenſible of their " error, in calling our meſſage ſtrange, unuſual, " or unparliamentary. Though we cannot but " take notice, that their anſwer to our meſſage, " That they would conſider of it, was the firſt of " that kind that we can find to have come from " that houſe."

The queſtion being put, Whether the houſe be ſatisfied with the reaſons delivered by the Lords at the laſt conference? it paſſed in the negative.

Reſolved, That a free conference be deſired with the Lords upon the matter delivered at the laſt conference; and that the former managers do attend, and manage the free conference.

Friday, May 21. The houſe reſolved on Wedneſday next to proceed in the further conſideration of that part of the meſſage relating to Appeals from inferior Courts. Sir Trevor Williams ordered to go up to the Lords, to deſire a conference upon the privileges of this houſe, contained in their anſwer to the meſſage touching Mr. Onſlow's caſe, which he accordingly did; and reports, That the Lords will return an anſwer thereto by meſſengers of their own.

May 27. A meſſage ordered to be ſent to the Lords to remind them of the former meſſage; and again to deſire a conference upon the privileges of this houſe, in the caſe of Mr. Onſlow. And ordered the matter of the juriſdiction of the Lords, in caſes of Appeal, be taken into conſideration to-morrow morning.

Veneris, 28 Maii, 1675.

Sir Thomas Lee reports, from the committee to whom it was referred to draw up reaſons to be offered at a conference to be had with the Lords, upon the ſubject matter of their anſwer to the laſt meſſage of this houſe, in the caſe of Mr. Onſlow, ſeveral reaſons agreed by the ſaid committee; which he read in his place, and afterwards delivered the ſame in at the clerk's table; where the ſame being twice read, were, upon the queſtion, ſeverally agreed unto, and are as follow, viz.

" For that the Commons deſired a conference " upon their privileges concerned by the Lords " anſwer to a meſſage ſent to the Lords the 18*th* " of May, in the caſe of Mr. Onſlow; their Lord- " ſhips have not agreed any conference in the caſe " of Mr. Onſlow; but have only agreed a confe- " rence concerning their privileges in general, with- " out reference to the caſe of the ſaid Mr. Onſlow; " which was the only ſubject matter of the deſired " conference.

" The limitation in the Lords agreement to a " conference, with proviſo that nothing be offered " at the conference that may any way concern " their Lordſhips judicature, is in effect a denial " of any conference at all, upon the ſubject on " which it was deſired: which ought not to be; " the judicature which their Lordſhips claim in " Appeals againſt a Member of the houſe of Com- " mons, and the privilege of that houſe being in " that caſe ſo involved, that there can be no con- " ference upon the latter, without ſome way touch- " ing upon the former.

" That this manner of agreeing to a conference " with any limitation or proviſo, is againſt the " courſe of Proceedings betwixt the two Houſes " of Parliament, in coming to conference; and " doth ſeem to place a power in the managers of " ſuch conferences, to judge whether ſuch provi- " ſo's be broken or not; and accordingly to pro- " ceed, or break off the conference upon their own " judgments."

Lunæ, 31 Maii 1675.

Sir Leoline Jenkins reports, that he had attended the Lords, with the meſſage of this Houſe, for a conference upon the ſubject matter of the Lords anſwer to the laſt meſſage of this Houſe, in the caſe of Mr. Onſlow; and that the Lords had ſent anſwer, that they would return anſwer by Meſſengers of their own.

A meſſage from the Lords by Sir Mondeford Brampſton, and Sir William Beverſham.

Mr. Speaker,

" The Lords have commanded us to acquaint " you, that they deſire a conference preſently in the " Painted-Chamber, with the Houſe of Commons; " upon their not coming to the conference deſired " by them, on Thurſday laſt; and by the Lords " appointed to be at ten of the clock in the " Painted-Chamber, on Friday the 28*th* of this " Inſtant May."

The Meſſengers being withdrawn, and the meſſage debated, a preſent conference upon the queſtion was agreed.

And the Meſſengers being called in, Mr. Speaker acquaints them, that the Houſe had agreed to a preſent conference.

Ordered, That the former Members, that were appointed to manage the former conference in the caſe of Mr. Onſlow, do attend and manage this conference.

Sir John Trevor reports, from the conference, that the Lords had declared the intent of this conference; to the effect following, viz. " That the " Lords have appointed this conference, out of that " conſtant deſire and reſolution they have to con- " tinue a fair correſpondence between the two " Houſes; which is of the eſſence of Parliamen- " tary Proceedings.

" For this end their Lordſhips, have command- " ed us to tell you, that they cannot but take notice " of the Houſe of Commons failing to be on Fri- " day laſt, at a conference deſired by themſelves, " and appointed by the Lords at ten of the clock " in the Painted-Chamber.

" That they conceive it tends to an interruption " of all Parliamentary Proceedings, and to evade " the right of the Lords to appoint time and place " for a conference."

Ordered, That it be referred to the former Committee, who are appointed to draw up reaſons, to be offered at a conference to be had with the Lords, upon the ſubject matter of their anſwer, to the meſſage of this Houſe, in the caſe of Mr. Onſlow, to conſider of the matter delivered by the Lords at the laſt conference; and to prepare and draw up further reaſons, to be offered at another conference to be had with the Lords, upon the ſubject matter of the laſt conference. And that the Committee do meet this afternoon at five of the clock in the Speaker's Chamber. And Mr. Serjeant Maynard, and Mr. Sawyer, are to have notice to attend the ſame.

Martis, 1 Junii 1675.

Sir Thomas Lee reports, from the Committee appointed to inſpect the Journals of the Houſe of Lords, and to ſee what Proceedings have been entered, in the caſe of Mr. Dalmahoy, and Mr. Onſlow; that they had inſpected the Lords Journals, as to the caſe of Mr. Dalmahoy, and collected what Proceedings had been in that caſe; but had no opportunity or time, yet to do it in the caſe of Mr. Onſlow. Which Proceedings being reported, were read, and delivered in at the Clerk's table; and are as follow, viz. 19 April 1675.

The Appeal brought by Criſpe and Criſpe, complaining againſt a Decree in Chancery made, wherein Mr. Dalmahoy is recited to be one of the Petitioners; Cranbourne and Bowyer are ordered to put in an anſwer, and Dalmahoy if he pleaſe.

Maii 12. 1675.

Ordered, That this Houſe will hear Council at the Bar, upon the Petition and Appeal of Sir Nicholas Criſpe and others, againſt the Lady Viſcounteſs Cranbourne, the Lady Anne Bowyer, and Thomas Dalmahoy Eſq; and their anſwer thereunto, depending in this Houſe, on Wedneſday the 19th of this Inſtant May, at ten of the clock in the forenoon; whereof the Petitioners are to cauſe timely notice to be given to the ſaid Defendants, or their Agents in the ſaid cauſe, for that purpoſe.

Maii 19. 1675.

Whereas Sir Nicholas Criſpe Bart. having an Appeal depending in this Houſe, againſt the Lady Cranbourne, Lady Bowyer, and Thomas Dalmahoy Eſq; a Member of the Houſe of Commons; hath prayed that Counſel may be aſſigned him to plead his cauſe upon the ſaid Appeal, and hath named Counſel for that purpoſe:

It is ordered, That Sir John Churchill, Serjeant Peck, Serjeant Pemberton, and Mr. Porter, named by the ſaid Sir Nicholas Criſpe; be, and are hereby appointed to open, and manage the ſaid cauſe, on the part and behalf of the ſaid Sir Nicholas Criſpe; on Thurſday the 27th day of this Inſtant May, at ten of the clock in the forenoon; and at ſuch other times, as it ſhall be depending in this Houſe.

Upon reading the Petition of Sir Nicholas Criſpe Bart. Thomas Criſpe and John Criſpe Eſqs; ſhewing, that having an Appeal depending in this Houſe, againſt Thomas Dalmahoy Eſq; a Member of the Houſe of Commons, and others; they are in danger of being arreſted by an order of the Houſe of Commons; and therefore pray the protection of this Houſe, that they may have liberty to proſecute their ſaid Appeal with freedom:

It is thereupon ordered, That the ſaid Sir Nicholas Criſpe Bart. John Criſpe, and Thomas Criſpe, or any of them, their or any of their Counſel, Agents or Sollicitors, or ſuch other perſon or perſons as they ſhall employ, in proſecuting the ſaid Appeal before this Houſe, be, and are hereby privileged, and protected accordingly by this Houſe; until the matter upon the Appeal be determined by their Lordſhips. And all perſons whatſoever, are hereby prohibited from arreſting, impriſoning, or otherwiſe moleſting, the ſaid Sir Nicholas Criſpe, John Criſpe, and Thomas Criſpe, or any of them, their or any of their Counſel, Agents, or Sollicitors, upon any pretence whatſoever, during the time prefixed, as they or ſuch of them will anſwer the contrary to this houſe.

Maii 26, 1675.

The cauſe between Sir Nicholas Criſpe, &c. plaintiffs, and Thomas Dalmahoy, Eſq; defendant, appointed to be heard the 27th, was ordered to be heard the 28th Maii.

Maii, 27.

Upon reading the petition of Sir Nicholas Criſpe, complaining, that the counſel aſſigned him by this houſe, to plead his cauſe at the bar, wherein Mr. Dalmahoy is one of the defendants, do refuſe to plead for him in this caſe, in regard of a vote of the houſe of Commons; Sir Nicholas Criſpe was called in, and teſtified, that he ſhewed the order of this houſe to Serjeant Peck, Serjeant Pemberton, Sir John Churchill, and Mr. Porter.

Whereupon it is ordered, That whereas Sir John Churchill, Serjeant Peck, Serjeant Pemberton, and Mr. Porter, were by order of this houſe, dated on the 19th inſtant, aſſigned to be of counſel for Sir Nicholas Criſpe, John Criſpe, and Thomas Criſpe, in their cauſe depending in this houſe, againſt Thomas Dalmahoy, Eſq; a Member of the houſe of Commons, and other defendants, at ſuch time as the ſaid cauſe ſhall be appointed to be pleaded at the bar of this houſe; having appointed to hear the ſaid cauſe by counſel on both ſides, to-morrow at three of the clock in the afternoon:

It is this day ordered, That the ſaid Sir John Churchill, Serjeant Peck, Serjeant Pemberton, and Mr. Porter, be, and are hereby required, to appear at the bar of this houſe, to-morrow, at three of the clock in the afternoon, as counſel to plead in the ſaid cauſe, on the behalf of the ſaid Sir Nicholas Criſpe, John and Thomas Criſpe, as they will anſwer the contrary to this houſe.

Maii 28, 1675.

Counſel heard at the bar on both parts, upon the Petition and Appeal of Sir Nicholas Criſpe, &c. and the anſwer of Diana Viſcounteſs Cranbourne, &c. and Thomas Dalmahoy, Eſq; put in thereunto, concerning a decree in Chancery: Reſolved, the petition and decree be diſmiſſed.

Maii 28.

This day the houſe heard the counſel of Sir Nicholas Criſpe, John Criſpe, and Thomas Criſpe, upon their petition and appeal depending in this houſe; and alſo the counſel of the Lady Bowyer, and Mr. Dalmahoy, upon their anſwer thereunto; and after a ſerious conſideration thereof, the queſtion being put, Whether this Petition and Appeal ſhall be diſmiſſed this houſe?

It was reſolved in the affirmative.

Mr.

Mr. Serjeant Pemberton, Sir John Churchill, Mr. Serjeant Peck, and Mr. Porter attending at the door, in obedience to the order of the houſe of Commons; and being ſeverally called in, Mr. Speaker did ſeverally acquaint them, that they were ſummoned to give an account to the houſe, of their appearing as counſel at the bar of the houſe of Lords, in the proſecution of a cauſe depending upon an appeal, wherein Mr. Dalmahoy, a Member of this houſe, is concerned, in the manifeſt breach of the order of this houſe; and giving up as much as in them lies, the rights and privileges of the Commons of England: And they having anſwered and made their excuſes to the effect following; That they had no notice of the order or vote of this houſe, but what they have heard in common diſcourſe abroad; and becauſe they conceived Mr. Dalmahoy, a Member of this houſe, might be concerned, they refuſed ſeveral times to appear as counſel, or to accept their fees; but being aſſigned of counſel for Sir Nicholas Criſpe, and an order of the houſe of Lords being ſerved on them to attend at their peril, and that then attending, and Mr. Dalmahoy having put in his anſwer in the Lords houſe, and not inſiſting on his privilege afterwards, and the counſel for the Lady Bowyer, who was the principal party concerned, denying to be of counſel for Mr. Dalmahoy, they conceived they might ſafely appear as counſel without breach of the order, or invading the rights and privileges of this houſe, which was not intended by them; and Sir John Churchill, by way of further excuſe for himſelf, ſaid, that he had witneſſes ready to prove, that Mr. Dalmahoy was willing and deſirous to have the buſineſs go forward. And the ſaid Mr. Serjeant Pemberton, Sir John Churchill, Mr. Serjeant Peck, and Mr. Porter, did all of them humbly ſubmit themſelves to the pleaſure of the houſe, if they had in any thing misbehaved themſelves; and being withdrawn, and the matter debated: the queſtion being put, That Serjeant Pemberton be taken into the cuſtody of the Serjeant at Arms attending this houſe?

It was reſolved in the affirmative.

Ordered, That Serjeant Pemberton, Sir John Churchill, Mr. Serjeant Peck, and Charles Porter, Eſq; be taken into the cuſtody of the Serjeant at Arms attending this houſe, for their breach of privilege of this houſe.

Mercurii, 2 die Junii.

Ordered, That Sir Richard Temple, Mr. Vaughan, and Sir Thomas Lee do withdraw, and amend the reaſons upon the debates of the houſe, which was done; and the reaſons agreed to, are as follow.

" The houſe of Commons do agree with the " Lords, that conferences between the two houſes " of Parliament, are eſſential to Parliamentary " proceedings, when they are agreed in the uſual " and Parliamentary way; but the manner of the " Lords agreement to the conference, to have " been on Friday the 28th of May laſt, at ten of " the clock, in the painted chamber, with limi- " tation and proviſo, did neceſſitate the houſe of " Commons to forbear to meet at that conference, " and gave the firſt interruption to parliamentary " proceedings in conferences between the two hou- " ſes.

" For that the conference deſired by the Com- " mons, was upon their privileges, concerned in " the anſwer of the Lords to a meſſage of the " houſe of Commons, ſent to the Lords the 17th " of May, in the caſe of Mr. Onſlow, to the which " the Lords did not agree, but did only agree to a " conference concerning their privileges in general, " without reference to the caſe of the ſaid Mr. " Onſlow; which was the only ſubject matter of " the deſired conference.

" The limitation in the Lords agreement to a " conference, with proviſo that nothing be offered " at the conference that may any ways concern " the Lords judicature, is in effect a denial of " any conference at all upon the ſubject upon which " it was deſired; which ought not to be.

" The judicature which the Lords claim in Ap- " peals againſt a Member of the houſe of Com- " mons, and the privilege of that houſe in that " caſe, is ſo involved, that no conference can be upon " the matter without ſome way touching the former.

" That this manner of agreeing to a conference, " with any limitation or proviſo, is againſt the " courſe of proceedings between the two houſes of " Parliament, in coming to conferences; and doth " ſeem to place a power in the managers of ſuch " conferences to judge whether ſuch proviſo's be " broken or not, and accordingly to proceed or " break off the conference upon their own judg- " ments.

" The houſe of Commons doubt not, but that " when the Lords have conſidered of what is deli- " vered at this conference, the good correſpon- " dence which the Lords expreſs they deſire to " continue between the two houſes, (which the " Commons alſo are no leſs careful to maintain) " will induce them to remove the preſent interrup- " tion of coming to conferences; and therefore to " agree to the conference, as it was deſired by the " houſe of Commons, upon the privileges of their " houſe, concerned in the Lords anſwer to the meſ- " ſage of the houſe of Commons, in the caſe of " Mr. Onſlow: That the particular limitation, " that nothing be offered at the conference, that " may any way concern the judicature of the Lords, " appears unreaſonable; for that their Lordſhips " judicature in Parliament is circumſcribed by the " laws of the land, as to their proceedings and " judgments; and is, as well as all other Courts, " ſubjected to Parliament."

Jovis, 3 die Junii, 1675.

Mr. Vaughan reports, That the Lord Privy-Seal did manage the conference, and had delivered the intent and occaſion of the conference; which Mr. Vaughan did report to the houſe, to the effect following, viz.

" The Lords do take notice of the houſe of Com- " mons their ordering into cuſtody of their Ser- " jeant, Mr. Serjeant Peck, Sir John Churchill, " Mr. Serjeant Pemberton, and Mr. Serjeant Por- " ter, Counſellors at Law; aſſigned by their " Lordſhips to be of counſel in an Appeal heard " at their Lordſhips bar, in the caſe of Sir Nicho- " las Criſpe, againſt the Lady Bowyer, Mr. Dal- " mahoy, and others; the Lords in Parliament, " where his Majeſty is higheſt in his royal eſtate, " and where the laſt reſort of judging upon Writs " of Error, and Appeals in Equity, in all cauſes " and over all perſons, is undoubtedly fixed, and " permanently lodged.

" It is an unexampled uſurpation and breach of " privilege againſt the houſe of Peers, that their " orders or judgments ſhould be diſputed, or en " deavoured to be controlled, or the execution " thereof

" thereof obſtructed by the lower houſe of Par" liament ; who are no Court, nor have author ty
" to adminiſter an oath, or give any judgment.

" It is a tranſcendent invaſion on the right and " liberty of the ſubject, and againſt Magna Charta,
" the Petition of Right, and many other laws, which " have provided, That no Freeman ſhall be impri-
" ſoned, or otherwiſe reſtrained of his liberty, but
" by due proceſs of Law.

" This tends to the ſubverſion of the Govern" ment of this Kingdom, and to the introducing
" of arbitrarineſs and diſorder.

" Becauſe it is in the nature of an injunction from " the lower houſe, (who have no authority or
" power of judicature over inferior ſubjects, much
" leſs over the King and Lords) againſt the orders
" and judgments of the ſupreme Court.

" We are further commanded to acquaint you,
" That the Lords have therefore, out of that juſ-
" tice which they are diſpenſers of, againſt oppreſ-
" ſion and breach of laws, by judgment of this " Court, ſet at liberty by the Gentleman-Uſher
" of the black Rod, all the ſaid Serjeants and " Counſellours ; and prohibited the Lieutenant of " the Tower, and all other Keepers of priſons,
" and Goalers, and all perſons whatſoever, from
" arreſting and impriſoning, detaining, or other-
" wiſe moleſting, or charging the ſaid Gentlemen,
" or any of them, in this caſe : And if any per-
" ſon, of what degree ſoever, ſhall preſume to the " contrary, their Lordſhips will exerciſe the au" thority with them intruſted for putting the laws
" in execution.

" And we are further commanded to read to " you, a Roll of Parliament, in the firſt year of " the reign of King Henry the IVth, whereof we " have brought the Original with us."

And a debate ariſing thereupon,

Reſolved, That a conference be deſired with the Lords upon the ſubject matter of the laſt conference ; and that theſe Members following, be appointed to prepare and draw up reaſons upon the debates of the houſe, to be offered at the conference ; Mr. Secretary Coventry, &c.

Ordered, That the officer in whoſe cuſtody the Record of the firſt of Henry the IVth, mentioned at the conference with the Lords, do attend the committee appointed to draw up reaſons for another conference this afternoon : And they are to meet at three of the clock, in the ſpeaker's chamber, and to ſend for Perſons, Papers and Records.

Ordered, That no Member of this houſe do attend the Lords houſe, upon any ſummons from the Lords, without leave of the houſe.

Veneris, 4 Junii, 1675.

Ordered, That the thanks of the houſe be returned to Mr. Speaker, for cauſing Mr. Serjeant Pemberton, formerly committed by order of this houſe to the cuſtody of the Serjeant at Arms attending this houſe, for a breach of privilege, to be ſeized and taken into cuſtody in Weſtminſter-hall, for his breach of privilege.

The houſe being informed, that Sir John Churchill, Mr. Serjeant Peck, and Mr. Charles Porter, who were ordered to be taken into the cuſtody of the Serjeant at Arms attending this houſe, are now in Weſtminſter-hall;

Ordered, That the Serjeant at Arms now attending this houſe, do go with his Mace into Weſtminſter-hall, and do execute the order of this houſe, and the warrant of Mr. Speaker thereupon ; for ſeizing and bringing in cuſtody Mr. Serjeant Peck, Sir John Churchill, and Mr. Charles Porter, for their breach of the privilege of this houſe.

The Serjeant returning, gave an account, that he had executed the order of this houſe, and Mr. Speaker's warrant thereupon, and had brought the ſaid Mr. Serjeant Peck, Sir John Churchill, and Mr. Charles Porter, in cuſtody, into the Speaker's chamber.

The queſtion being put, That Sir John Churchill, Mr. Serjeant Peck, Mr. Serjeant Pemberton, and Mr. Charles Porter, be ſent to the Tower, for their breach of privilege, and contempt of the authority of this houſe ?

It was reſolved in the affirmative.

Ordered, That Mr. Speaker do iſſue his warrant to the Lieutenant of the Tower, to receive them into his cuſtody.

Ordered, That John Popham, Eſq; the now Serjeant at Arms attending this houſe, be protected againſt all perſons that ſhall any ways moleſt or hinder him from executing his office.

Sir Thomas Lee reports from the committee, the reaſons agreed to be offered at the conference to be had with the Lords, upon the matters delivered at the laſt conference ; which were twice read, and with ſome amendments made at the table, ſeverally agreed ; and are as follow, viz.

" Your Lordſhips having deſired the laſt con" ference, upon matters of high importance con" cerning the dignity of the King and the ſafety
" of the Government, the Commons did not ex" pect to hear from your Lordſhips at that confe-
" rence, things ſo contrary to, and inconſiſtent
" with, the matter upon which the ſaid conference
" was deſired, as were then delivered by your " Lordſhips.

" It was much below the expectation of the " Commons, that after a repreſentation of your
" Lordſhips meſſage, of matters of ſo high impor" tance, the particular upon which the conference
" was grounded, ſhould be only the commitment
" of four lawyers to the cuſtody of their own Ser-
" jeant at Arms, for a manifeſt violation of the " privileges of their houſe.

" But the Commons were much more ſurprized,
" when your Lordſhips had introduced the confe" rence, with an aſſurance, that it was in order to
" a good correſpondency between the two houſes,
" that your Lordſhips ſhould immediately aſſume
" a power to judge the orders of the houſe of Com-
" mons for impriſonment of Mr. Serjeant Pemberton,
" Mr. Serjeant Peck, Sir John Churchill, and Mr.
" Charles Porter, to be illegal and arbitrary ; and " the execution thereof a great indignity to the " King's Majeſty ; with many other high reflec-
" tions upon the houſe of Commons, throughout
" the whole conference ; whereby your Lordſhips
" have condemned the whole houſe of Commons
" as criminal, which is without precedent or ex" ample, or any ground or reaſon ſo to do.

" It is not againſt the King's dignity for the " houſe of Commons to puniſh by impriſonment,
" a commoner that is guilty of violating their pri" vileges, that being according to the known laws
" and cuſtoms of Parliament ; and the right of " their privileges declared by the King's royal Pre-
" deceſſors in former Parliaments, and by himſelf
" in this.

" But

" But your Lordſhips claiming to be the ſu-
" preme Court, and that his Majeſty is higheſt in " his royal eſtate in the Court of judicature there,
" is a diminution of the dignity of the King,
" who is higheſt in his royal eſtate in full Parlia" ment; and is derogatory to the authority of the " whole Parliament, by appropriating it to your-" ſelves.

" The Commons did not by this impriſonment
" infringe any privileges of the houſe of Peers, but " only defend and maintain their own: On the " other ſide, your Lordſhips do highly intrench
" upon the rights and privileges of the houſe of " Commons, by denying them to be a Court, or
" to have any authority or power of judicature;
" which, if admitted, will leave them without any " power or authority to preſerve themſelves.

" As to what your Lordſhips call a tranſcen-
" dent invaſion of the rights and liberty of the " ſubject, and againſt Magna Charta, the Petition of " Right, and many other laws; the houſe of Com" mons preſume that your Lordſhips know, that " neither the Great Charter, Petition of Right, or " any other laws, do take away the law and cuſ-
" tom of Parliament, or of either houſe of Parlia" ment, or elſe your Lordſhips have much forgot-
" ten the Great Charter, and thoſe other laws in " the ſeveral judgments your Lordſhips have paſ-
" ſed upon the King's ſubjects in caſes of privilege.
" But the Commons cannot find by Magna Charta,
" or by any other law or ancient cuſtom of Parlia" ment, that your Lordſhips have any juriſdiction
" in caſes of Appeals from the Courts of equity.

" We are further commanded to acquaint you,
" that the enlargement of thoſe perſons in priſon,
" by order of the houſe of Commons, by the Gen" tleman-Uſher of the black Rod, and the prohi" bition which threatens all officers and other per-
" ſons whatſoever, not to receive or detain them;
" is an apparent breach of the rights and privileges
" of the houſe of Commons: And they have there" fore cauſed them to be re-taken into the cuſtody
" of the Serjeant at Arms attending this houſe,
" and have committed them to the Tower.

" As for the Parliament-Roll of the 1ſt of King
" Henry the IVth, cauſed to be read by your
" Lordſhips at the laſt conference, but not appli-
" ed; the Commons apprehend it doth not con" cern the caſe in queſtion: For that this Record
" was made upon occaſion of judgments given by " the Lords, to depoſe and impriſon their lawful
" King; to which the Commons were not willing " to be made Parties. And therefore the Com-
" mons conceive it will not be for the honour of " your Lordſhips to make further uſe of that Re" cord.

" But we are commanded to read to your Lord-
" ſhips the Parliament Roll of 4 Ed. 3. N. 6. which
" if your Lordſhips pleaſe to conſider, they doubt
" not but your Lordſhips will find occaſion to ap-
" ply it to the preſent purpoſe."

Ordered, The thanks of the houſe be given to the Speaker, for his care in iſſuing the warrant for re-taking the perſons committed yeſterday into cuſtody.

The Serjeant at Arms ordered to be ſent to the Tower; and the other Serjeant at Arms attending, was ordered to apprehend him for betraying his truſt, in not executing his office, in bringing the perſons committed yeſterday to his cuſtody, to the bar of the houſe.

An Addreſs ordered to be prepared to be preſented to his Majeſty, to deſire a new Serjeant at Arms to attend the houſe.

Saturday June 5, 1675.

Mr. Secretary Coventry acquainted the houſe, that it was his Majeſty's deſire, that the houſe would adjourn till four of the clock in the afternoon, and that both houſes ſhould at that time attend him in the Banquetting-houſe at Whitehall.

A debate ariſing touching the removal of John Popham, Eſq; Serjeant at Arms in ordinary, attending the houſe yeſterday, the further debate thereof was adjourned till five o'clock in the afternoon. And then the houſe adjourned till four in the afternoon.

In the Afternoon.

The houſe then met at the time they adjourn'd to, and went in a body to his Majeſty at Whitehall; and the houſe of Lords being alſo preſent, his Majeſty made the following Speech.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

YOU may remember, that at the meeting of this Seſſion I told you, no endeavours would be wanting to make the continuance of this Parliament unpracticable. I am ſorry that experience hath ſo quickly ſhewed you the truth of what I then ſaid; but I hope that you are well convinced, that the intent of all theſe contrivances is only to procure a diſſolution. I confeſs, I look upon it as a moſt malicious deſign of thoſe who are enemies to me and the Church of England; and were the contrivers known, I ſhould not doubt but the diſlike of their practices, would alone be a means of bringing the houſes to a good underſtanding. But ſince I cannot preſcribe any way how to arrive to the diſcovery of it, I muſt tell you plainly my opinion, that the means of coming to any compoſure between yourſelves, cannot be without admitting of ſuch free conferences as may convince one another by the reaſons then offered; or enable me to judge rightly of the differences, when all hath been ſaid on both ſides which the matter will afford: for I am not to ſuffer theſe differences to grow to diſorders in the whole Kingdom, if I can prevent it; and I am ſure my judgment ſhall always be impartial between my two houſes of Parliament. But I muſt let you know, that whilſt you are in debate about your privileges, I will not ſuffer my own to be invaded. I have nothing more to ſay to you at this time, but to deſire, as I did when we met firſt, that you would yet conſider, and not ſuffer ill men's deſigns to hinder the Seſſions from a happy concluſion.

[The houſe of Lords preſented an Addreſs to his Majeſty, to remove the Lieutenant of the Tower; whereupon the Lord Treaſurer reported his Majeſty's anſwer, viz. " That his Majeſty hath con-
" ſidered the circumſtances of the matter, and is " not ſatisfied how with juſtice he can remove
" him."]

The houſe then took into conſideration his Majeſty's Speech, and reſolved, nemine contradicente, That the humble thanks of this houſe be returned to his Majeſty, for the gracious expreſſions in his Speech this day made to both houſes of Parliament; and ſuch Members of this houſe as are of his Majeſty's privy-council are deſired to preſent the humble thanks of this houſe to his Majeſty.

Reſolved,

Reſolved, That it doth not appear to this houſe, that any Member thereof, hath either contrived or promoted the difference between the two houſes of Parliament; or in aſſerting the Rights of the Commons of England, and the privileges of this houſe; or to have done any thing inconſiſtent with his duty, or the truſt repoſed in him. And then adjourned to Monday, June 7.

On Monday, June 7. the houſe reſolved, That what Serjeant Popham did in re-taking the four lawyers into his cuſtody, and conducting them to the Tower of London, was in purſuance of his duty, and by the order of the houſe; and the further debate concerning the ſaid Serjeant at Arms was adjourned till Wedneſday morning.

A copy of an order from the houſe of Lords for the hearing counſel in the caſe of Sir John Fagg, a Member of this houſe, to-morrow morning, was then read and debated: And,

Reſolved, That as to the caſe of Appeal brought againſt Sir John Fagg in the houſe of Lords, he ſhall have the protection and aſſiſtance of this houſe.

Reſolved, nem. con. That if any perſon or perſons ſhall be aiding or aſſiſting in putting in execution any ſentence or judgment that ſhall be given by the houſe of Lords, upon the Appeal brought by Dr. Shirley againſt Sir John Fagg, a Member of this houſe, ſuch perſon or perſons ſhall be adjudged and taken to be betrayers of the rights and liberties of the Commons of England, and the privileges of this houſe; and ſhall be proceeded againſt accordingly.

Ordered, That theſe Votes be made publick, by ſetting them up in Weſtminſter-hall, and in the Lobby of this houſe; and the clerk of the houſe to take care to ſee it done.

In the afternoon the houſe proceeded in the further conſideration of effectual means for the preſervation of their rights and privileges, and reſolved, nem. con. That no perſon committed by order or warrant of this houſe, for breach of the privileges or contempt of the authority of the houſe, ought to be diſcharged during the Seſſion of Parliament, without the order or warrant of this houſe.

Reſolved, nem. con. That the Lieutenant of the Tower of London, in receiving and detaining in cuſtody, Sir John Churchill, Serjeant Peck, Serjeant Pemberton, and Mr. Porter, hath performed his duty according to law; and for his ſo doing, he ſhall have the aſſiſtance and protection of this houſe.

Reſolved, That the Lieutenant of the Tower, in caſe he hath, or ſhall receive any writ, warrant, order, or command, to remove or deliver any perſon or perſons committed to his charge, for breach of the privileges, or contempt of the authority of the houſe of Commons, by order or warrant of the houſe; ſhall not make any return thereof, or yield any obedience thereto, before he hath firſt acquainted the houſe therewith, and received their order and direction how to proceed therein.

Ordered, That theſe reſolutions be immediately ſent to the Lieutenant of the Tower, and then the houſe adjourned.

Tueſday, June 8, 1675.

A meſſage ſent to the Lords to remind them of the laſt conference; and for a conference upon the ſubject matter delivered by the Lords at the laſt conference.

Sir John Robinſon informing the houſe, that he had received the four lawyers committed to his cuſtody by this houſe, and denied to deliver them to the Gentleman-Uſher of the black Rod; and that he was ſerved laſt night with four writs of Habeas Corpus, to bring the ſaid four lawyers before the King and his Parliament at Weſtminſter, this morning, and craved the advice of the houſe what to do therein:

Ordered, The thanks of the houſe be given to the ſaid Sir John Robinſon for his behaviour therein; and Mr. Speaker intimated to him, that he ſhould forbear to return the ſaid writs of Habeas Corpus, which were read and debated; and the further debate thereof was adjourned till to-morrow morning, and a committee appointed to ſearch the Lords Journals to ſee what hath been done in the caſe of the four lawyers, the writs of Habeas Corpus, and Mr. Serjeant Popham; and to ſearch for precedents on the writs of Habeas Corpus: and adjourn'd.

Sir Thomas Clarges reports from the committee to whom it was referred to ſearch for precedents touching writs of Habeas Corpus, returnable in Parliament; that the committee had found ſeveral precedents of writs of Habeas Corpus returnable in Parliament, and had conſidered of them: And that the committtee thereupon had agreed upon four Reſolves to be preſented to the houſe, which he read in his place, and afterwards delivered the ſame in at the clerk's table, where they being twice read, were upon the queſtion ſeverally agreed to, and are as follow.

" Reſolved, nem. con. 1. That no commoners of " England, committed by the order or warrant of " the houſe of Commons, for breach of privilege, " or contempt of the authority of the ſaid houſe, " ought, without order of this houſe to be by any " writ of Habeas Corpus, or any other authority " whatſoever, made to appear and anſwer, or re- " ceive any determination in the houſe of Peers, " during that Seſſion of Parliament wherein ſuch " perſons were ſo committed.

" Reſolved, nem. con. 2. That the order of the " houſe of Peers for the iſſuing out the writs of " Habeas Corpus concerning Mr. Serjeant Pember- " ton, Mr. Serjeant Peck, Sir John Churchill, and " Mr. Charles Porter, is inſufficient and illegal; " for that it is general, and expreſſes no parti- " cular cauſe of privilege, and commands the King's " Great Seal to be put to writs not returnable be- " fore the ſaid houſe of Peers.

" Reſolved, nem. con. 3. That the Lord Keeper " be acquainted with theſe reſolutions, to the end " that the ſaid writs of Habeas Corpus be ſuperſeded " as contrary to law, and the privileges of this " houſe.

" Reſolved, nem. con. 4. That a meſſage be ſent " to the Lords to acquaint their Lordſhips, that " Mr. Serjeant Peck, Sir John Churchill, Mr. Ser- " jeant Pemberton, and Mr. Charles Porter, were " committed by order and warrant of this houſe, " for manifeſt breach of the privilege, and con- " tempt of the authority of this houſe."

Ordered, That Col. Birch do go up to the Lords with a meſſage, that a conference be deſired upon the ſubject matter of the laſt conference.

A meſſage was this day ſent from his Majeſty in the houſe of Lords, by Sir Edward Carteret, Uſher of the black Rod, commanding this honourable houſe to attend his Majeſty forthwith in the houſe of Peers; and accordingly Mr. Speaker went up with the houſe, where his Majeſty was pleaſed to make the following Speech to them.

My

My Lords and Gentlemen,

I Think I have given ſufficient evidence to the world, that I have not been wanting on my part, in my endeavours to procure the full ſatisfaction of all my ſubjects, in the matters both of religion and property: I have not only invited you to thoſe conſiderations at our firſt meeting, but I have been careful through this whole Seſſion, that no concern of my own ſhould divert you from them.

Beſides, as I had only deſigned the matter of it to be the procuring of good laws, ſo for the gaining of them, I have already waited much longer than I intended; and ſhould have been contented ſtill to have continued my expectation, had there any hopes remained of a good concluſion. But I muſt confeſs, the ill deſigns of our enemies have been too prevalent againſt thoſe good ones I had propoſed to myſelf, in behalf of my people; and thoſe unhappy differences between my two Houſes are grown to ſuch a height, that I find no poſſible means of putting an end to them, but by a prorogation. It is with great unwillingneſs that I make uſe of this expedient, having always intended an adjournment for the preſerving of ſuch bills as were unfiniſhed. But my hopes are, that by this means the preſent occaſion of differences being taken away, you will be ſo careful hereafter of the public, as not to ſeek new ones, nor to revive the old.

I intend to meet you here again in winter, and have directed my Lord Keeper to prorogue you till the thirteenth day of October next.

October, 13, 1675, the King came to the houſe, and began thus;

My Lords and Gentlemen,

I Meet you now with more than an uſual concern for the event of this Seſſions; and I know it's but what may be reaſonably expected from the care I have for the preſervation of the Government. The cauſes of the laſt prorogation, as I for my part do not deſire to remember, ſo I hope no man elſe will, unleſs it be to learn from thence how to avoid the like occaſion for the future: And I pray conſider how fatal the conſequences may be, and how little benefit is like to redound to the people by it. However, if any of that kind ſhall ariſe, I deſire you would defer thoſe debates till you have brought ſuch publick Bills to perfection, as may conduce to the good and ſafety of the Kingdom.

[The reſt of the ſpeech, relates to his Majeſty's recommending the ſecurity of the Proteſtant Religion, the Supply for building Ships, and publick Debts, &c.]

Then the Lord Finch, by his Majeſty's order, made a ſpeech to both Houſes, recommending Unanimity, and making good Laws, and the care of Religion, &c.

The Earl of Shaftesbury's Speech in the Houſe of Lords, upon the Debate of appointing a Day for the hearing Dr. Shirley's cauſe, the 20*th* of October, 1675.

My Lords,

OUR All is at ſtake, and therefore you muſt give me leave to ſpeak freely before we part with it. My Lord Biſhop of Salisbury is of opinion, That we ſhould rather appoint a day to conſider what to do upon the Petition, than to appoint a day of hearing; and my Lord-Keeper, for I may name them at a Committee of the whole Houſe, tells us in very eloquent and ſtudied language, That he will propoſe us a way far leſs liable to exception, and much leſs offenſive and injurious to our own privileges, than that of appointing a day of hearing. And I beſeech your Lordſhips, did you not after all theſe fine words expect ſome admirable propoſal? But it ended in this; That your Lordſhips ſhould appoint a day, nay a very long day, to conſider what you would do in it: and my Lord hath undertaken to convince you, that this is your only courſe by ſeveral undeniable reaſons; the firſt of which is, That 'tis againſt your Judicature to have this cauſe, which is not proper, before us, nor ought to be relieved by us. To this, my Lords, give me leave to anſwer, that I did not expect from a man profeſſing the Law, that after an anſwer by order of the Court was put in, and a day had been appointed for hearing, which by ſome accident was ſet aſide; and the Plaintiff moving for a ſecond day to be aſſigned, that ever without hearing Counſel on both ſides, the Court did enter into the merits of the cauſe. And if your Lordſhips ſhould do it here in a cauſe attended with the circumſtances this is, it would not only be an apparent Injuſtice, but a plain Subterfuge, to avoid a point you durſt not maintain.

But my Lord's ſecond reaſon ſpeaks the matter more clearly; for that is, Becauſe 'tis a doubtful caſe, whether the Commons have not privilege; and therefore my Lord would have you, to appoint a further and a very long day to conſider of it: which in plain Engliſh is, that your Lordſhips ſhould confeſs upon your books, that you conceive it on ſecond thoughts a doubtful caſe; for ſo your appointing a day to conſider, will do; and that for no other reaſon, but becauſe my Lord-Keeper thinks it ſo. Which I hope will not be a reaſon to prevail with your Lordſhips; ſince we cannot yet by experience tell that his Lordſhip is capable of thinking your Lordſhips in the right, in any matter againſt the judgment of the Houſe of Commons; 'tis ſo hard a thing even for the ableſt of men to change ill habits.

But my Lord's third reaſon, is the moſt admirable of all, which he ſtiles unanſwerable, viz. That your Lordſhips are all convinced in your conſciences, that this (if proſecuted) will cauſe a breach. I beſeech your Lordſhips, conſider whether this argument thus applied, would not overthrow the Law of Nature, and all the Laws of right and property in the world: for 'tis an argument, and a very good one, that you ſhould not ſtand or inſiſt on claims, where you have not a clear right, or where the queſtion is not of conſequence and moment, in a matter that may produce a dangerous and pernicious breach, between relations, perſons, or bodies politick, join'd in intereſt and high concerns together. So, on the other hand, if the obſtinacy of the party in the wrong, ſhall be made an unanſwerable argument for the other party to recede and give up his juſt rights; how long ſhall the People keep their liberties, or the Princes or Governors of the world their prerogatives! How long ſhall the husband maintain his dominion, or any man his property, from his friend's or his neighbour's obſtinacy? But, my Lords, when I hear my Lord-Keeper open ſo eloquently the fatal conſequences of a breach, I cannot forbear to fall into ſome admiration how it comes to paſs, that (if the conſequences be ſo fatal) the King's Miniſters in the Houſe of Commons, of which there are ſeveral that are of the Cabinet, and have daily reſort to his Majeſty, and have the direction and truſt of his affairs; I ſay, that none of theſe ſhould preſs theſe conſequences there, or give the leaſt ſtop to the career of that Houſe in this buſineſs; but that all the Votes concerning this affair, nay even that very Vote, That no Appeal from any Court of Equity, is cognizable by the Houſe of Lords, ſhould paſs nemine contradicente. And yet all the great Miniſters with us here, the Biſhops and other Lords of greateſt dependance on the Court, contend this point, as if it were pro Aris & Focis. I hear his Majeſty in Scotland hath been pleaſed to declare againſt Appeals in Parliament; I cannot much blame the Court, if they think (the Lord-Keeper and the Judges being of the King's naming, and in his power to change) that the Juſtice of the Nation is ſafe enough; and I, my Lords, may think ſo too, during this King's time, though I hear Scotland, not without reaſon, complain already. Yet how future Princes may uſe this power, and how Judges may be made not men of ability or integrity, but men of relation and dependance, and who will do what they are commanded; and all mens cauſes come to be judged, and eſtates diſpoſed on, as great men at Court pleaſe.

My Lords, the conſtitution of our Government hath provided better for us; and I can never believe ſo wiſe a body as the Houſe of Commons, will prove that fooliſh woman which plucks down her houſe with her hands.

My Lords, I muſt preſume in the next place to ſay ſomething to what was offered by my Lord Biſhop of Salisbury, a man of great learning and abilities, and always verſed in a ſtronger and cloſer way of reaſoning, than the buſineſs of that noble Lord I anſwered before did accuſtom him to; and that reverend Prelate hath ſtated the matter very fair upon two heads.

The firſt, Whether the hearing of Cauſes and Appeals, and eſpecially in this point where the Members have privilege, be ſo material to us, that it ought not to give way to the reaſon of State, of greater affairs that preſſed us at that time.

The ſecond was, If this buſineſs be of that moment, yet whether the appointing a day to conſider of this Petition, would prove of that conſequence and prejudice to your cauſe?

My Lords, to theſe, give me leave in the firſt place to ſay, that this matter is no leſs than your whole Judicature; and your Judicature is the life and ſoul of the dignity of the Peerage of England; you will quickly grow burdenſome, if you grow uſeleſs: you have now the greateſt and moſt uſeful end of Parliaments principally in you, which is not to make new Laws, but to redreſs grievances, and to maintain the old Land-Marks. The Houſe of Commons buſineſs is to complain, your Lordſhips to redreſs, not only the complaints from them that are the eyes of the Nation, but all other particular perſons that addreſs to you. A land may groan under a multitude of Laws, and I believe ours does; and when Laws grow ſo multiplied, they prove oftner ſnares than directions and ſecurity to the people. I look upon it as the ignorance and weakneſs of the latter age, if not worſe, the effect of the deſigns of ill men; that it is grown a general opinion, that where there is not a particular direction in ſome Act of Parliament, the Law is defective; as if the Common Law had not provided much better, ſhorter, and plainer for the peace and quiet of the Nation, than intricate long perplex'd Statutes do; which has made work for the Lawyers, given power to the Judges, leſſen'd your Lordſhips power, and in a good meaſure unhing'd the ſecurity of the people.

My Lord Biſhop tells us, That your whole Judicature is not in queſtion, but only the privilege of the Houſe of Commons, of their Members not appearing at your Bar: my Lords, were it no more, yet that for Juſtice and the People's ſake you ought not to part with: how far a privilege of the Houſe of Commons, their ſervants, and thoſe they own, doth extend, Weſtminſter-hall may with grief tell your Lordſhips. And the ſame privilege of their Members being not ſued, muſt be allowed by your Lordſhips as well; and what a failure of Juſtice this would prove, whilſt they are Lords for life, and you for inheritance, let the world judge: for my part, I am willing to come to conference, whenever the diſpute ſhall begin again; and dare undertake to your Lordſhips, that they have neither precedent, reaſon, nor any juſtifiable pretence to ſhew againſt us; and therefore, my Lords, if you part with this undoubted right merely for asking, where will the asking ſtop? And, my Lords, we are ſure it doth not ſtop here, for they have already, Nemine Contradicente, voted againſt your Lordſhips power of Appeals from any Court of Equity! So that you may plainly ſee where this caution and reaſon of State means to ſtop; not one jot ſhort of laying your whole Judicature aſide, for the ſame reaſon of paſſing the King's money, of not interrupting good Laws, and whatever elſe muſt of neceſſity avoid all breach upon what ſcore ſoever; and your Lordſhips plainly ſee the breach will be as well made upon your Judicature in general, as upon this; ſo that when your Lordſhips have apointed a day, a very long day, for to conſider whether Dr. Shirley's cauſe be not too hot to handle; and when you have done the ſame for Sir Nicholas Stanton, whoſe Petition I hear is coming in; your Lordſhips muſt proceed to a vote, to lay all private buſineſs aſide for ſix weeks: for that phraſe of private buſineſs, hath obtained upon this laſt age, upon that which is your moſt publick duty and buſineſs; namely, the adminiſtration of Juſtice. And I can tell your Lordſhips, beſides the reaſon that leads to it, that I have ſome intelligence of the deſigning ſuch a vote. For on the ſecond day of your ſitting, at the riſing of the Lords houſe, there came a Gentleman into the Lobby, belonging to a very great perſon, and ask'd in very great haſte, Are the Lords up? Have they paſſed the Vote? And being ask'd, What Vote? He anſwer'd, The Vote of no private buſineſs for ſix weeks.

My Lords, if this be your buſineſs, ſee where you are; if we are to poſtpone our Judicature for fear of offending the Houſe of Commons for ſix weeks, that they in the interim may paſs the money, and other acceptable Bills that his Majeſty thinks of importance; are ſo many wiſe men in the Houſe of Commons to be laid aſleep, and to paſs all theſe acceptable things; and when they have done, to let us be let looſe upon them?

Will they not remember this, next time there is want of money? or may not they rather be aſſured by thoſe miniſters that are amongſt them, and go on ſo unanimouſly with them, that the King is on their ſide in this controverſy? And when the publick buſineſſes are over, our time will be too ſhort to make a breach, or vindicate ourſelves in the matter. And then I beg your Lordſhips, where are you, after you have aſſerted but the laſt Seſſion your right of Judicature, ſo highly, even in this point; and after the Houſe of Commons had gone ſo high againſt you on the other hand, as to poſt up their declaration and remonſtrances on Weſtminſter-hall doors; the very next Seſſion after, you poſtpone the very ſame cauſes; and not only thoſe, but all Judicatures whatſoever? I beſeech your Lordſhips, will not this prove a fatal precedent and confeſſion againſt yourſelves? 'Tis a maxim and a rational one amongſt the Lawyers, That one precedent where the caſe has been conteſted, is worth a thouſand where there hath been no conteſt. My Lords, in ſaying this, I humbly ſuppoſe I have given a ſufficient anſwer to my Lord Biſhop's ſecond queſtion; Whether the appointing a day to conſider what you will do with this Petition, be of that conſequence to your right? For it is a plain confeſſion, that it is a doubtful caſe, and that infinitely ſtronger than if it were a new thing to you, never heard of before: for it is the very ſame caſe, and the very ſame thing deſired in that caſe, that you formerly ordered, and ſo ſtrongly aſſerted; ſo that upon time, and all the deliberation imaginable, you declare yourſelves to become doubtful, and you put yourſelves out of your own hands, into that power that you have no reaſon to believe on your ſide in this queſtion.

My Lords, I have all the duty imaginable to his Majeſty, and ſhall with all ſubmiſſion give way to any thing he ſhould think of importance to his affairs: but in this point it is to alter the conſtitution of the Government, if you are ask'd to lay this aſide; and there is no Reaſon of State can be an argument to your Lordſhips to turn yourſelves out of that Intereſt you have in the conſtitution of the Government; 'tis not only your concern that you maintain yourſelves in't, but 'tis the concern of the pooreſt man in England, that you keep your ſtation: 'tis your Lordſhips concern, and that ſo highly, that I will be bold to ſay, the King can give none of you a requital or recompence for it. What are empty titles? What is preſent power, or riches, and a great eſtate, wherein I have no firm nor fixed property? 'Tis the conſtitution of the Government, and maintaining it, that ſecures your Lordſhips and every man elſe in what he hath: the pooreſt Lord, if the birthright of the Peerage be maintained, has a fair proſpect before him for himſelf or his poſterity; but the greateſt title, with the greateſt preſent power and riches, is but a mean creature, and maintains thoſe in abſolute Monarchies, no otherwiſe than by ſervile and low flatteries, and upon uncertain terms.

My Lords, 'tis not only your Intereſt, but the Intereſt of the Nation, that you maintain your rights; for let the Houſe of Commons and Gentry of England think what they pleaſe; there is no Prince that ever govern'd without Nobility or an Army: if you will not have one, you muſt have t'other, or the Monarchy cannot long ſupport, or keep itſelf from tumbling into a Democratical Republick. Your Lordſhips and the People have the ſame cauſe, and the ſame enemies. My Lords, would you be in favour with the King? 'Tis a very ill way to it, to put yourſelves out of a future capacity, to be conſiderable in his ſervice. I do not find in ſtory, or in modern experience, but that 'tis better; and a man is much more regarded that is ſtill in a capacity, and opportunity to ſerve, than he that hath wholly deprived himſelf of all for his Prince's ſervice. And I therefore declare, that I will ſerve my Prince as a Peer, but will not deſtroy the Peerage to ſerve him.

My Lords, I have heard of twenty fooliſh models and expedients to ſecure the Juſtice of the Nation, and yet to take this right from your Lordſhips, as the King by his commiſſion appointing Commoners to hear Appeals; or that the twelve Judges ſhould be the perſons, or that perſons ſhould be appointed by Act of Parliament, which are all not only to take away your Lordſhips juſt right, that ought not to be altered any more than any other part of the Government, but are in themſelves, when well weighed, ridiculous: I muſt deal freely with your Lordſhips, theſe things could never have riſen in mens minds, but that there has been ſome kind of provocation that has given the firſt riſe to it. Pray, my Lords, forgive me, if on this occaſion I put you in mind of Committee-dinners, and the ſcandal of it, thoſe droves of Ladies that attended all cauſes; 'twas come to that paſs, that men even hired or borrowed of their friends handſome ſiſters or daughters to deliver their Petitions: but yet for all this, I muſt ſay, that your judgments have been ſacred, unleſs in one or two cauſes; and thoſe we owe moſt to that bench, from whence we now apprehend moſt danger.

There is one thing I had almoſt forgot to ſpeak to, which is the conjuncture of time, the hinge upon which our reaſon of State turns; and to that, my Lords, give me leave to ſay, if this be not a time of leiſure for you to vindicate your privileges, you muſt never expect one. I could almoſt ſay, that the harmony, good agreement, and concord that is to be prayed for at moſt other times, may be fatal to us now; we owe the peace of theſe laſt two years, and the diſ-engagement from the French Intereſt, to the two houſes differing from the ſenſe and opinion of Whitehall: ſo at this time, the thing in the world this Nation hath moſt reaſon to apprehend, is a general peace, which cannot now happen without very advantageous terms to the French, and diſadvantageous to the houſe of Auſtria. We are the King's great Counſellors, and if ſo, have right to differ, and give contrary counſels to thoſe few that are neareſt about him: I fear they would advance a general peace, I am ſure I would adviſe againſt it, and hinder it at this time by all the ways imaginable. I heartily wiſh nothing from you may add weight and reputation to thoſe counſels, who would aſſiſt the French. No money for ſhips, nor preparations you can make, nor perſonal aſſurances our Prince can have, can ſecure us from the French, if they are at leiſure. He is grown the moſt potent of us all at ſea: he has built 24 ſhips this laſt year, and has 30 more in number than we; beſides the advantage, that our ſhips are all out of order, and his ſo exquiſitely provided for, that every ſhip has his particular ſtore-houſe. 'Tis incredible the money he hath, and is beſtowing in making harbours; he makes Nature itſelf give way to the vaſtneſs of his expence: and after all this, ſhall a Prince ſo wiſe, ſo intent upon his affairs, be thought to make all theſe preparations to ſail over land, and fall on the back of Hungary, and batter the walls of Kaminitz? Or is it poſſible he ſhould overſee his Intereſt in ſeizing of Ireland, a thing ſo feaſible to him, if he be maſter of the Seas, as he certainly now is; and which when attained, gives him all the Southern, Mediterranean, Eaſt and Weſt-India Trade, and renders him both by ſituation, and excellent har-bours, perpetual maſter of the Seas without diſpute?

My Lords, to conclude this point, I fear the Court of England is greatly miſtaken in it, and I do not wiſh them the reputation of the concurrence of the Kingdom: and this out of the moſt ſincere loyalty to his Majeſty, and love to my Nation.

My Lords, I have but one thing more to trouble you with, and that peradventure is a conſideration of the greateſt weight and concern, both to your Lordſhips, and the whole Nation. I have often ſeen in this houſe, that the arguments, with ſtrongeſt reaſon, and moſt convincing to the Lay-Lords in general, have not had the ſame effect upon the Biſhops bench; but that they have unanimouſly gone againſt us in matters, that many of us have thought eſſential and undoubted rights: and I conſider, that 'tis not poſſible, that men of great learning, piety, and reaſon, as their Lordſhips are, ſhould not have the ſame care of doing right, and the ſame conviction what is right, upon clear reaſon offered, that other your Lordſhips have. And therefore, my Lords, I muſt neceſſarily think, we differ in principles; and then 'tis very eaſy to apprehend, what is the cleareſt ſenſe to men of my principle, may not at all perſuade or affect the conſcience of the beſt man of a different one. I put your Lordſhips the caſe plainly, as 'tis now before us. My principle is, That the King is King by Law, and by the ſame Law that the poor man enjoys his cottage; and ſo it becomes the concern of every man in England, that has but his liberty, to maintain and defend, to his utmoſt, the King in all his rights and prerogatives. My principle is alſo, That the Lords houſe, and the Judicature and Rights belonging to it, are an eſſential part of the Government, and eſtabliſhed by the ſame Law: the King governing and adminiſtring Juſtice by his Houſe of Lords, and adviſing with both his Houſes of Parliament in all important matters, is the Government I own, am born under, and am obliged to. If ever there ſhould happen in future ages (which God forbid) a King governing by an Army, without his Parliament, 'tis a Government I own not, am not obliged to, nor was born under. According to this principle, every honeſt man that holds it, muſt endeavour equally to preſerve the frame of the Government, in all the parts of it, and cannot ſatisfy his conſcience to give up the Lords houſe for the ſervice of the Crown, or to take away the juſt rights and privileges of the Houſe of Commons to pleaſe the Lords. But there is another principle got into the world, my Lords, that hath not been long there; for Archbiſhop Laud was the firſt author that I remember of it; and I cannot find that the Jeſuits, or indeed the Popiſh Clergy have ever own'd it, but ſome of the Epiſcopal Clergy of our Britiſh Iſles; and 'tis withal, as 'tis new, ſo the moſt dangerous deſtructive Doctrine to our Government and Law, that ever was. 'Tis the firſt of the Canons publiſhed by the Convocation 1640. That Monarchy is of Divine Right. This Doctrine was then preached up, and maintained by Sibthorp, Manwaring, and others, and of later years, by a book publiſhed by Dr. Sanderſon, Biſhop of Lincoln, under the name of Archbiſhop Uſher; and how much it is ſpread amongſt our dignified Clergy, is very eaſily known. We all agree, That the King and his Government is to be obeyed for Conſcience ſake; and that the divine precepts require not only here, but in all parts of the world, obedience to lawful Governours. But that this family are our Kings, and this particular frame of Government is our lawful conſtitution, and obliges us, is owing only to the particular Laws of our Country. This Laudean Doctrine, was the root that produced the Bill of Teſt laſt Seſſion, and ſome very perplexed Oaths, that are of the ſame nature with that, and yet impoſed by ſeveral Acts this Parliament.

In a word, if this Doctrine be true, our Magna Charta is of no uſe, our Laws are but rules amongſt ourſelves during the King's pleaſure. Monarchy, if of divine right, cannot be bounded or limited by human Laws; nay, what's more, cannot bind itſelf: and all our claims of right by the Law, or conſtitution of the Government, all the juriſdiction and privilege of this Houſe, all the rights and privileges of the Houſe of Commons, all the properties and liberties of the People, are to give way not only to the Intereſt, but the will and pleaſure of the Crown. And the beſt and worthieſt of men, holding this principle, muſt vote to deliver up all we have, not only when reaſon of State, and the ſeparate Intereſt of the Crown require it; but when the will and pleaſure of the King is known, would have it ſo. For that muſt be, to a man of that principle, the only rule and meaſure of Right and Juſtice. Therefore, my Lords, you ſee how neceſſary it is, that our principles be known; and how fatal to us all it is, that this principle ſhould be ſuffered to ſpread any further.

My Lords, to conclude, your Lordſhips have ſeen of what conſequence this matter is to you, and that the appointing a day to conſider, is no leſs than declaring yourſelves doubtful, upon ſecond and deliberate thoughts, that you put yourſelves out of your own hands, into a more than a moral probability of having this Seſſion made a precedent againſt you. You ſee your duty to yourſelves and the people; and that 'tis really not the Intereſt of the Houſe of Commons, but may be the inclination of the Court, that you loſe the power of Appeals: but I beg our Houſe may not be Felo de ſe, but that your Lordſhips would take in this affair, the only courſe to preſerve yourſelves, and appoint a day, this day three weeks, for the hearing Dr. Shirley's cauſe, which is my humble motion.

Saturday, Nov. 13. 1675. An order from the Lords to hear Sir John Fagg's cauſe to-morrow morning, was this day read in the Houſe of Commons, and debated, and the farther debate thereof adjourn'd till Monday morning next.

Monday, Nov. 15. The houſe reſolv'd, that the proſecuting Appeals in the Lords houſe, by Dr. Thomas Shirley, againſt Sir John Fagg a Member of this houſe, is a breach of the privileges of this houſe; and that the ſaid Sir John Fagg do not make any defence at the Lords Bar, in the ſaid Appeal; and the further debate thereof was adjourn'd till to-morrow morning.

Tueſday, the 16th. Adjourn'd the further debate of Sir John Fagg's buſineſs till to-morrow morning; and on Wedneſday, adjourn'd the further debate till Thurſday; when Sir John Fagg's buſineſs was reſum'd, and reſolved that a conference be deſired of the Lords, for avoiding differences between the two Houſes, and then adjourn'd till Friday morning.

Veneris, 19 die Novembris.

Sir William Coventry reports from the Committee, to whom it was referr'd, to prepare and draw draw up reaſons to be offered at the conference, to be deſired with the Lords, for avoiding the occaſions of reviving the differences between the two Houſes; and a paper of reaſons agreed by the ſaid Committee, to be reported to the houſe, being read, and the ſame being agreed to, is as followeth, viz.

His Majeſty having recommended to us, at the opening of this Seſſions of Parliament, the avoiding this difference if poſſible; and if it cou'd not be prevented, that then we ſhou'd defer theſe debates till we had brought ſuch publick Bills to perfection, as may conduce to the good and ſafety of the Kingdom: The Commons eſteem it a great misfortune, that contrary to that moſt excellent advice, the proceedings in the Appeal, brought the laſt Seſſion againſt Sir John Fagg, by Mr. Shirley, hath been renewed, and a day ſet for hearing the cauſe; and therefore the Commons have judged it the beſt way, before they enter into the argument of defence of their rights in this matter, to propoſe to your Lordſhips, the putting off the proceedings in that matter, for ſome ſhort time; that ſo they may, according to his Majeſty's advice, give a diſpatch to ſome Bills now before them, of great importance to the King and Kingdom; which being finiſhed, the Commons will be ready to give your Lordſhips ſuch reaſons againſt thoſe proceedings, and in defence of their rights, as we hope may ſatisfy your Lordſhips, that no ſuch proceedings ought to have been.

Reſolv'd, That a meſſage be ſent to the Lords, to deſire a conference, to preſerve the good correſpondence between the two Houſes.

Reſolv'd, That whoſoever ſhall proſecute any Appeal before the Lords, againſt any Commoner of England, from any Court of Equity, ſhall be deemed a betrayer of the rights and privileges of the Commons of England; and ſhall be proceeded againſt accordingly: and the reſolution ordered to be affixed in the Lobby, Weſtminſter-hall-gate, and all Inns of Court and Chancery; and then adjourn'd till next morning, Nov. the 20*th*.

Die Sab. Nov. 20.

Order'd, That Dr. Thomas Shirley be taken into cuſtody by the Serjeant at Arms attending this houſe, as alſo Sir Nicholas Stanton, for ſerving Mr. Onſlow with an order to attend the Lords; and then adjourn'd to Monday, Nov. 22.

On Saturday, Nov. 20. 1675. Dr. Thomas Shirley appear'd at the bar of the Houſe of Lords, and his Counſel Mr. Wallop appearing, who wou'd have excus'd himſelf, but was order'd to appear again on Monday morning next, to plead the cauſe; and the other two Counſel (one being in the country, and the other ſick) were excus'd: and the ſaid Dr. Shirley, Sir Nicholas Stanton, and Mr. Wallop, were order'd to have the protection of the houſe: And upon debate of the Commons Vote made yeſterday, Order'd, That the paper poſted up in ſeveral places, ſigned by William Goldsbro Cler. Dom. Com. againſt the Judicature of the Houſe of Peers, in caſes of Appeals from Courts of Equity, is illegal, unparliamentary, and tending to the diſſolution of the Government. And then upon conſideration of the ſaid vote of the Commons, it was propos'd by Lord Mohun to make an Addreſs to his Majeſty to diſſolve the Parliament, and call another, and frequent Parliaments; and upon debate thereof, about eight o'clock at night they came this queſtion, and carried it by two votes only, That there ſhould be no Addreſs; the numbers being fifty and forty-eight: and then adjourn'd to Monday.

On which day the Houſe being met, a meſſage was ſent by his Majeſty, for the Houſe to attend him forthwith in the Houſe of Peers; which the Houſe accordingly did, when his Majeſty paſs'd three Bills, and the Lord-Keeper, by his Majeſty's order, prorogu'd both Houſes of Parliament, till the 15th day of February come twelvemonth, 1676; which ended the diſpute.

The Proteſtation, with reaſons of ſeveral Lords for the diſſolution of this Parliament, entred in the Lords Journal, November 22. 1675. the day the Parliament was prorogu'd.

WE whoſe names are under-written, Peers of this Realm, having propoſed, That an humble Addreſs might be made to his Majeſty from this houſe, that he would be graciouſly pleaſed to diſſolve this Parliament; and the houſe having carried it in the negative: for the juſtification of our loyal intentions towards his Majeſty's ſervice, and of our true reſpect and deference to this honourable houſe; and to ſhew that we had no ſiniſter and indirect ends in this our humble propoſal, do with all humility herein ſet forth the grounds and reaſons why we were of opinion, that the ſaid humble Addreſs ſhould have been made.

1. We do humbly conceive, that it is according to the ancient Laws and Statutes of this Realm, that there ſhould be frequent and new Parliaments, and that the practice of ſeveral years hath been accordingly.

2. It ſeems not reaſonable, that any particular number of men, ſhould for many years ingroſs ſo great a truſt of the people, as to be their Repreſentatives in the Houſe of Commons: and all other the Gentry, and the Members of Corporations of the ſame degree and quality with them, ſhould be ſo long excluded. Neither, as we humbly conceive, is it advantageous to the Government, that the Counties, Cities, and Boroughs, ſhould be confined for ſo long a time to ſuch Members as they have once choſen to ſerve for them; the mutual Correſpondence and Intereſts of thoſe who chuſe and are choſen, admitting of great variations in length of time.

3. The long continuance of any ſuch as are entruſted for others, and who have ſo great a power over the purſe of the Nation, muſt, in our humble opinion, naturally endanger the producing of factions and parties, and the carrying on of particular Intereſts and Deſigns, rather than the publick Good.

And we are the more confirmed in our deſires for the ſaid humble Addreſs, by reaſon of this unhappy breach fallen out betwixt the two houſes, of which the Houſe of Peers hath not given the leaſt occaſion; they having done nothing but what their anceſtors and predeceſſors have in all times done, and what is according to their duty, and for the Intereſt of the people that they ſhould do: which notwithſtanding, the Houſe of Commons have proceeded in ſuch an unprecedented and extraordinary way, that it is, in our humble opinion, become altogether unpracticable for the two houſes, as the caſe ſtands, jointly to purſue thoſe great and good ends for which they were called.

For theſe reaſons, we do enter our proteſtation againſt, and diſſent unto the ſaid Vote.

XXXII. Proceedings againſt Mr. Francis Jenkes, for a Speech made by him on the Huſtings, at Guildhall, on Midſummer-day, 1676. 27 Car. II.

[Publiſh'd by his Friends.]

MR. Jenkes having been a Trader for many years, and obſerving the daily decay of trade in the city, occaſion'd by ſuch miſchiefs, as lay not in the induſtry of its inhabitants, but only in the power of the Government to redreſs; and that did require a more ſpeedy redreſs than a Parliament prorogued for fifteen months could afford: after having in vain ſolicited the Lord-Mayor for a Common-Council, that might conſider of a Petition about trade, out of a hearty zeal for the good of the city, as well as encouraged by the conſent and deſire of many ſober citizens, the liberty reſerv'd to the Lord-Mayor, Aldermen, and Common-Council, by the Statute of the 13th of this King, concerning Petitions, the votes of a majority of temporal Lords at the laſt Seſſions, together with the unanſwerable reaſons given in their proteſtation; did at the Folk-mote (or Common-hall) holden the 24th of June laſt paſt, in the Guildhall of London, thus deliver himſelf.

Mr. Common-Serjeant,

" It ſeems a vain thing for this Court to be ſerious about the choice of Magiſtrates and Officers " for the well government of this city; except they " firſt take care to remedy thoſe many miſchiefs " and grievances, which this city now groans under; and which ſeems ſo to threaten the ruin and " deſtruction of the whole, that if there be not " ſome ſpeedy redreſs, there will be little need of " Magiſtrates and Officers, for there will be no " city or people left here to be governed.

" London has once already been burn'd to aſhes, " and firing is now become ſuch a trade, that not " only London, the Burrough of Southwark, and " the places adjoining, but all the Cities, Burroughs, Towns corporate, and Places of principal trade throughout the whole Kingdom, are " perpetually in danger; ſo that no rational or " conſiderate man amongſt us can, promiſe " himſelf, his wife, his children, or eſtate one " night's ſecurity, but they may all be devour'd " in the conſuming flames, except ſome ſpeedy " and effectual courſe be taken.

" But this is not all; for were our houſes ſecure " from fire, yet ſuch is the general decay of trade, " as, if not remedied; muſt unavoidably bring the " whole city to poverty and ruin: and it is conceived, that this is very much occaſion'd by the " French; who have laid ſuch great impoſitions " upon our Woollen Cloth, Stuffs and other Manufactures, that we have almoſt loſt our trade " with France: they have ſpoiled our trade with " Holland, Flanders, and Germany, by a deſtructive war. They have ruined our trade at home, " and beggar'd many thouſands of our honeſt and " induſtrious Weavers, and other Engliſh Manufacturers, and Traders, by the vaſt quantity of " their Silks, and other unneceſſary commodities " imported hither. So that upon an exact ballance of the trade between us and them taken, " it has been demonſtrated, that this City and Kingdom doth loſe eleven hundred thouſand pounds " every year. By means whereof, they who in Queen " Elizabeth's time might not be ſuffer'd to build " men of war, are now grown ſo powerful at Sea, " as to be able to beat both Dutch and Spaniard; " and have made themſelves in a manner ſole maſters of the Mediterranean Sea. And they are " grown ſo preſumptuous, as daily to affront our " Engliſh merchants, and ſometimes in his Majeſty's own ports. Their Privateers daily take our " Merchant-ſhips, plunder others, ſtrip, impriſon " and torment our Seamen, to the great diſcouragement of our Engliſh Navigation, and almoſt " ruin of the Merchant.

" I ſhall inſtance in but one thing more, but " that is worſe than all the reſt; that is, the juſt " apprehenſion that is upon the minds of good " men, of danger to his Majeſty's perſon, and " the Proteſtant Religion. I had not ſpoken this " at this time and place, but having the honour " to ſerve this city in Common-Council; I have

" endeavour'd

" endeavoured at ſeveral times to bring theſe things " before the Court, but could not. In the end of " the laſt common-council, I did deſire my Lord " Mayor, that a common-council might ſpeedily " be held, to hear and conſider of a petition about " trade, ſubſcribed by a great number of citizens " of good quality ; and his Lordſhip did then pro- " miſe, that a common-council ſhould ſpeedily be " held : But it is a good time ſince, and there " have been many fires and loſſes, but no com- " mon-council.

" Wherefore methinks it does become the wiſ- " dom and gravity of this Court, not to admit of " any longer delay in a matter wherein their All is " concerned. And I do humbly move, (and I " conceive it is not only my ſenſe, but the ſenſe " of the far greater part of this Court) that ſome " Members of this Court may accompany the She- " riffs and Mr. Common-Serjeant, before we pro- " ceed to any other matter, to wait upon my Lord " Mayor and the Court of Aldermen, to deſire " that a common-council might ſpeedily be held, " humbly to petition his Majeſty, that for the " quieting and ſatisfying the minds of his liege peo- " ple, and for remedy of the many miſchiefs and " grievances we now groan under, he would gra- " ciouſly be pleaſed (according to the Statutes of " the 4th and 36th of Ed. 3.) timely to call a " new Parliament."

Scarcely were the words, a new Parliament, pronounced, but the greateſt part of the aſſembly cried out, Well moved, well moved! And though none ſpake up formally to the Sheriffs, yet ſeveral amongſt them ſpake enough to ſhew a high approbation of what had been ſaid, and not one word was ſpoken in contradiction : which when the Common-Serjeant ſaw, to prevent (as is conceived) others ſpeaking to the ſame matter, he ſpake to this purpoſe :

" That what had been moved, ſeemed to be the " general ſenſe of the whole Court ; and ſince the " Gentleman that made the motion was pleaſed " to join him with the Sheriffs, and that he muſt " offer his opinion in the matter, it was this, That " it was not ſo proper to carry up that meſſage be- " fore they did proceed to their elections, as firſt " to determine their election, and then carry up an " account of theſe and that together."

But many in the Court did inſiſt upon the motion, and deſired a meſſage might be ſent up immediately ; whereupon one of the Sheriffs ſpake, and did acknowledge, That what had been ſaid by the Gentleman that ſpake firſt, was true ; but that he was an old citizen, and had long known common Halls, and he did believe that the proper work of the day was the election of Officers ; and therefore he did deſire that the Court would proceed, and not to carry up the meſſage till after that was done. To which one replied, That according to his utmoſt underſtanding, that Court was one of the ancienteſt, greateſt, and moſt powerful Courts of this City ; and although the cuſtomary buſineſs of this day were the choice of officers, yet that Court had cognizance of any thing whatever that did relate to the good of the City ; and therefore it was conceived, that nothing was more proper at that time, than this which concerned the preſervation of the City from utter ruin.

Upon which the other Sheriff directing his diſcourſe to the aſſembly, ſaid, That what the Gentleman had moved there, was true, and not unknown to moſt of the perſons there preſent ; but that he was of his brother's opinion, that it was fit firſt to go on to the work of the day, and not to carry up that meſſage till after the election.

Many perſons being ſtill diſſatisfied, and calling for a preſent meſſage to be ſent up, the Gentleman who firſt moved the buſineſs, made it his requeſt, " That ſince there ſeemed a difference touching the " circumſtance of time, that they would proceed " to election, and carry up the meſſage with the " perſons elected, as the Sheriffs deſired ;" to which the Common Hall unanimouſly agreed. Upon which, ſilence being made, the Common Hall proceeded to election of Sheriffs ; and made their election, and ſent up an account thereof to the Lord Mayor and Aldermen by the Sheriffs and Common-Serjeant, as is uſual in ſuch caſes.

The Lord Mayor and Aldermen preſently came down, and took their Seats in the Court of Huſtings, according to cuſtom ; upon which, the Common Serjeant came forth to the front of the Court, and declared the names of the perſons elected, and immediately gave back. Whereupon the Common Hall called out for an anſwer to their meſſage ; upon which, the Common Serjeant ſtepping forward again in the preſence of the Lord Mayor, Aldermen and Sheriffs, ſaid, That he had acquainted his Lordſhip and the Aldermen with their requeſt, and that his Lordſhip had commanded him to declare unto them, That he would be ready to join with them in that, or any other thing for the good of the City. And with that the Lord Mayor and Aldermen, &c. left the Court of Huſtings, and diſmiſſed the aſſembly.

After dinner, the Recorder, Sir John Howel, out of a great pretence of loyalty, but indeed a perſonal grudge againſt Mr. Jenkes, conveyed the news to Whitehall ; where, with his uſual ſtrain of Rhetorick, he made ſuch a diſmal repreſentation of the matter, and was ſo powerful in his eloquence, as to occaſion both the Sheriffs and ſome other of the City-officers to be ſent for ; who were examined by the Lord Chief Juſtice Rainsford, in the preſence of the King, the Lord Chancellor, Lord Treaſurer, Duke Lauderdale, and other Lords.

The Sheriffs and two others made affidavits, but a copy of them could never be obtained.

Upon the 27th of June, Mr. Jenkes was ſummoned by a meſſenger to appear at the council-board the next day ; accompanied with many of his friends, he attended in the Lobby, near the council chamber, according to his ſummons, and after ſome time was called in ; but his friends preſſing to follow him, (as is uſual on ſuch occaſions) were kept out, and not one ſuffered to go in with him.

The King ſitting in council, the Lord Chancellor, Duke Lauderdale, and other Lords about him, the clerk read an affidavit made by the two Sheriffs, the common Crier, and one John Green an Attorney ; the ſubſtance whereof was,

That Fr. Jenkes, at a Common Hall in London, the 24th of June laſt paſt, did complain of grievances ; and did deſire, that before they went upon any other buſineſs, certain Members of that Court might accompany the Sheriffs and the Common Serjeant to wait upon the Lord Mayor, then in the chamber, to deſire that a Common Council might be called to petition his Majeſty, in the name of the City, to call a new Parliament.

The affidavit being read, the council-board proceeded to this effect :

Lord

Lord Chancellor. Sir, What ſay you to this matter?

Mr. Jenkes. I deſire to know if this be all you have to charge againſt me?

A Lord. Then you make little of this, you will find it to be enough.

L. Chan. Sir, did you move for a common-council to petition for a new Parliament?

Mr. Jenkes. Is it any crime to petition for a new Parliament?

To which his Lordſhip not thinking fit to give anſwer, proceeded,

L. Chan. Anſwer to the matter in charge.

Mr. Jenkes. With the liberty of his Majeſty and this board, I will.

The King. Go on.

Mr. Jenkes. May it pleaſe your Majeſty, of all the ſubjects you have,

A Lord, (interrupting him) Anſwer to the matter.

Mr. Jenkes. If his Majeſty will be pleaſed to hear me, I hope you will.

King. Let him go on.

Mr. Jenkes. May it pleaſe your Majeſty, of all the ſubjects you have, none are more loyal than your City of London; and in the City none more loyal than my ſelf: And no man there did more deſire, and, in my circumſtances, act more, in order to your Majeſty's Reſtoration, than my ſelf. And I do defy any citizen or other whomſoever, to ſay I have forfeited my loyalty by any one individual act.

King, (interrupting him.) Sir, you are not Lord Mayor, and I am very well ſatisfied with the loyalty of the City, and that it needs no ſuch vouchers.

L. Chan. Speak to the matter.

Mr. Jenkes. May it pleaſe your Majeſty, being ſummoned to a Court of Common Hall in London, which is a Court that conſiſts of the main body of the City.

L. Chan. (interrupting him.) Sir, you are under a double miſtake; for firſt, it was not a Court, and next, it did not conſiſt of the main body of the City of London.

Mr. Jenkes. With your Lordſhip's leave, it was a Court which did conſiſt of all the Livery of the City of London; which, if I underſtand any thing, is the main body of the City of London. And every Member of that Court hath freedom to propoſe and debate any ſuch matter or thing, as he believes is for the ſervice of his Majeſty, and the good of the City; and no man can uſe more underſtanding than God has given him. And I aſſure your Lordſhip, what I then moved was according to the utmoſt of my underſtanding for his Majeſty's ſervice, and the good of the City. And, my Lord, if I were under a miſtake, I had the fortune to have good company; for what I moved was approved by the whole Court.

King. It was not ſo.

Secretary. We have a depoſition to the contrary.

Mr. Jenkes. It was ſo.

Other Lords. It was not ſo.

Mr. Jenkes. May it pleaſe your Majeſty, if you have a hundred depoſitions to the contrary, if the matter of fact were ſo, it was ſo; and I do affirm it was approved by the whole Court.

A Lord. How came you to be a Privy-Counſellor?

Mr. Jenkes. I never had any ſuch ambitious thought in my head.

A Lord. How came you then to meddle with matters of State?

Mr. Jenkes. I thought any of his Majeſty's ſubjects, in an humble manner, might petition his Majeſty for a remedy of any grievance whatſoever.

A Lord. Do you think any one may petition for a Parliament?

Mr. Jenkes. I believe they may.

The King. I know whoſe ſcholar you are, and I'll take care that none ſuch as you ſhall have to do with the Government.

Several Lords. What was't you moved? what was't you moved?

Mr. Jenkes. My Lords, what I ſpake was not in a corner, but openly in the face of a multitude, and therefore cannot want a witneſs to atteſt it.

A Lord. Juſt now it was a Court, and now it is a multitude.

Mr. Jenkes. We citizens pretend not to place our words ſo exactly in form, but that there may be ſome miſtake in them; but I think my expreſſion was no great abſurdity: For though it were a Court, yet the perſons there were ſo numerous, that it may not be very improper to term them a multitude. Yet, if I have failed in due expreſſion, I beg his Majeſty's pardon. I know ſomewhat of the cuſtoms of the City of London, and the powers and privileges of the Courts there; and ſomewhat alſo of the laws of England; but what the powers and cuſtoms of this Court are, I know not, and therefore ſhall deſire to ſay little, leſt I ſhould unwillingly offend.

L. Chan. Sir, pray tell us, who adviſed you in this matter?

The King. Who adviſed you?

Mr. Jenkes. What I then propoſed was conſented to by the whole Court, and ſo became their Act, as I ſaid before.

L. Chan. and others. Anſwer directly to the queſtion, or declare you will not.

Mr. Jenkes. Since I ſee your Majeſty and the Lords are angry, tho' I am not ſenſible that I have given you any juſt cauſe for it; I muſt not ſay I did it without advice, leſt you ſhould be more angry; and to name any particular perſon, (if there were ſuch) would be a mean and unworthy thing, therefore I deſire to be excuſed all farther anſwer to ſuch queſtions; ſince the law doth provide, that no man be put to anſwer to his own prejudice.

King. We will take that for an anſwer.

L. Chan. ſince you name the law, by the law you ſhall be tried.

Mr. Jenkes. I thank you, and this board.

L. Chan. You may withdraw.

He immediately withdrew, and the room being cleared of all his friends, and other company; Mr. Jenkes was kept there for the ſpace of an hour and an half; and after that, without being called in any more, was, by a warrant of the council, ſent to the priſon of the gate-houſe within the liberties of Weſtminſter. Soon after his commitment, he demanded of the Keeper a copy of the warrant by which he was committed; as he might, and by law ought to have. The Keeper gave him a promiſe of it, but delaying the performance for two days, Mr. Jenkes reſolutely demanded it of him as his duty, but could not yet obtain it. Some time after, the Keeper ſent him one voluntarily, by his man, with this excuſe, That before he had poſitive ſitive order to deny him one, and now had to give it him.

The Copy of the Warrant.

WHereas it appears to his Majeſty in council, by the examination of Sir Thomas Gold, Sir John Shorter, Knights, Sheriffs of the City of London, John Wells, Common Crier of the ſaid City, and John Green, one of the Attorneys of the Lord Mayor's Court, taken upon oath before the Lord Chief Juſtice Rainsford, That Francis Jenkes of the ſaid City, Linnen-Draper, did on the 24th of this inſtant June, at a Common Hall, then aſſembled at the Guild-Hall of the ſaid City, for chuſing Officers for the enſuing year; in a moſt ſeditious and mutinous manner, openly move and ſtir the perſons then preſent, that before they did go on to the choice of new Officers, (which was the only occaſion of that aſſembly) they ſhould go to the Lord Mayor, and deſire him to call a common-council, that might make an addreſs to his Majeſty in the name of the City, to call a new Parliament. And whereas the ſaid Francis Jenkes, being now called in, and heard before his Majeſty in council, was ſo far from denying or extenuating his offence, that he did in a preſumptuous and arrogant manner endeavour to juſtify the ſame:

Theſe are therefore to command you, to take into your cuſtody the body of the ſaid Francis Jenkes, herewith ſent you, and him to keep ſafely, until he ſhall be delivered by due courſe of law; for which this ſhall be your warrant.

Dated at the council-chamber in Whitehall, this 28th day of June, 1676.

Next day, being the 29th of June, divers of Mr. Jenkes's friends waited upon Mr. Secretary Williamſon, and deſired to become bail for him; but Mr. Secretary refuſed to take any bail: but told them, if they did mind him of it on Wedneſday morning, he would move it at the council. But Mr. Jenkes believing that to be (as it proved) but a delay, ordered ſome of his friends to wait upon the Lord Chief Juſtice Rainsford, and moved him for an Habeas Corpus ad Subjiciend. & Recipiend. &c. which accordingly was done, but his Lordſhip denied to grant it, alledging no other reaſon but that it was Vacation: though his Lordſhip could not but know that writ to be the ſubject's right at all times, as well out of Term as in Term; and Mr. Jenkes's friends were ready to offer him multitudes of precedents when it had been granted out of Term, both anciently, and ſince his Majeſty's Reſtoration.

Mr. Jenkes reſolving to leave no legal courſe to attain his liberty, untried; upon Friday the 30th of June, at a general Seal, did by his counſel move the Lord Chancellor for an Habeas Corpus. At firſt his Lordſhip did ſeem much ſurprized, and did refuſe to hear his counſel; but after a little pauſe, his Lordſhip bid Mr. Jenkes's counſel to move it again the next Seal, and ordered the Seal to be put off from Tueſday the 4th, until Thurſday the 6th of July.

Upon Wedneſday the 5th of July, Mr. Jenkes's friends waited upon Mr. Secretary Williamſon, and deſired him, according to his promiſe, to move in council, that Mr. Jenkes might be bailed; but he ſaid he had ſpoke with the King, and could do nothing without a petition. So upon Thurſday the 6th of July, being a public Seal, Mr. Jenkes's counſel did again move the Lord Chancellor (according to his Lordſhip's order) and aſſerted the authority of the Lord Coke, who is moſt clear in the caſe, 2 part, Inſt. fol. 53. ſpeaking of the Writ of Habeas Corpus in the King's-Bench, he ſaith, The like Writ is to be granted out of the Chancery, either in Term (as in the King's-Bench) or in the Vacation; for the Court of Chancery is Officina Juſticiæ, and is ever opened, and never adjourned: So as the ſubject being wrongfully impriſoned, may have Juſtice for the liberty of his perſon as well in the Vacation-time as in Term.

And in the 4*th Inſt. fol.* 88. ſpeaking of the Court of Chancery, he ſaith, And this Court is the rather always open, for that if a man be wrongfully impriſoned in the Vacation, the Lord Chancellor may grant an Habeas Corpus, and do him Juſtice according to law; vid. 4 Inſt. fol. 182, 190. Thus the Lord Coke.

Mr. Jenkes's counſel did likewiſe offer a precedent or two; but the Lord Chancellor making light of the Lord Coke's opinion, ſaying, The Lord Coke was not infallible; and ſlighting all that Mr. Jenkes's counſel offered, over-rul'd the matter, denying to grant the Writ.

On Tueſday morning, July 11, at the Quarter-Seſſions, holden for the liberty of Weſtminſter, Mr. Jenkes being ſtill a priſoner in the Gate-houſe, did move by his counſel to be bailed; where this was the ſubſtance of what paſſed, as it was taken by a perſon preſent.

Court. We have no ſuch name in our Kalendar; and we ſitting here by a limited commiſſion, can take no notice of any perſon that is not in our Kalendar.

Counſel. Every Keeper of a Priſon, either in County or Franchiſe, ought by the Statute of 3 Hen. 7. cap. 3. to certify the names of every priſoner in their cuſtody, at the next general Goal-delivery there, to be calendar'd before the Juſtice of Goal-delivery, that the parties may be delivered according to law, upon pain of 100 l. for every default there recorded. And I demand that this default of the Goaler may be recorded according to that Statute; and that you would, as you may, command him to calendar him now.

The Statute was read.

Court. We are no general Goal-delivery, for we cannot try ſeveral felons, but they muſt be tried at the general goal-delivery for the County.

Coun. You are a general goal-delivery for all offences within the cogniſance of your Franchiſe; and therefore, unleſs the fact for which he is committed be ſuch as is above your cogniſance, he ought ought to be tried here; and if it be ſuch a fact, he ought notwithſtanding to be calendar'd here, that you may ſend him to the County Goal, where he may be tried.

Goaler. I never did calendar any man that was committed by the council-table.

Coun. The neglect hath not taken away your duty; and as often as you have omitted ſo to do, ſo oft have you deſerved to be fined. And I do again demand of this Court, that this default of yours may be recorded.

The Court inclined to the Goaler, and would not record his fault; whereupon the counſel proceeded.

Coun. Since you exclude him from the benefit of your preſent commiſſion, I apply my ſelf to you, without reſpect to that, as you are Juſtices of peace in general; and as ſuch, you have power to bail any man bailable by law, except in ſome particular caſes, where you are reſtrained by Statute.

Court. By whom is he committed?

Coun. By the council-board.

Court. Do you believe the council-board can commit to priſon?

Coun. I admit it.

Court. We don't know for what offence he is committed.

Coun. I have here a copy of the commitment, and deſire it may be read.

But the Goaler refuſing to own it for a true copy, tho' given by himſelf, and the Court requiring a nicer proof that it was a true copy, than could at that time be made, they ordered the counſel to attend in the afternoon; and in the mean time the Goaler to give a true copy. In the afternoon the counſel appearing, the Court called to him, and asked him what he had to ſay.

Coun. I have now a copy given and ſigned by the Goaler for a true copy, and deſire it may be read.

The Goaler, who was to prove it a true copy, upon the counſel coming into the Court, took an occaſion to ſlink away; and the Court (as if it had been by deſign) were ready to take hold of that opportunity to evade the buſineſs; but Mr. Jenkes's friends fetched him back, and he ſwearign it to be a true copy, it was read.

Court. What is it you demand?

Coun. What I did before; That there being nothing in this warrant, for which he is not bailable by law, I demand that he may be bailed.

Court. You have taken a wrong courſe in coming to us.

Coun. I preſume he applies himſelf properly to you; for he being a priſoner within your liberty, you are the moſt proper perſons to bail him: As Juſtices of the Peace, you have power to bail any man within your juriſdiction, bailable by law; and where you may bail by the law, you ought ſo to do; and I demand it for Mr. Jenkes.

Court. Where do you find ſuch power given to Juſtices of the Peace?

Coun. By the ſame Statute of Hen. 7. that I cited againſt the Goaler; the enacting part whereof, ſaith, That the Juſtices of the Peace in every Shire, City or Town, or two of them at the leaſt, whereof one to be of the Quorum, have authority or power to let any ſuch priſoner or perſons, mainpernable by the law, that have been impriſoned within their ſeveral Counties, City or Town, to bail or main-prize, unto their next general Seſſions; or unto the next Goal-delivery of the ſame Goals of every Shire, City or Town, as well within Franchiſes as without, where any Goals be, or hereafter ſhall be, &c.

The whole Statute was read, and the Court taking hold of the preamble, ſaid, This Statute was made for the prevention of bailing felons, not bailable by law, and enables us only to bail felons bailable by law.

Coun. The preamble of the Act recites the miſchief occaſioned by the Statute of 1 R. 3. but the enacting part repeals that Act, and gives you a general power of letting any perſon, mainpernable by the law, to bail; and I am ſure no Statutes made for the liberty of the ſubject, ought to receive ſuch a ſtrait conſtruction.

Court. Do you conſider by whom he is committed? the privy-council.

Coun. I do, and think that alters not the caſe.

Court. He is committed by a ſuperior Court, and we, who are an inferior one, cannot bail him.

Coun. It is not the Court that commits, but the fact for which the party is committed, ought to direct you in bail. The Statute of Hen. 7. hath no ſuch exception in it; nor hath any other ſince put any ſuch reſtraint upon you.

Court. Would you have us bail him, after the Lord Chancellor and the Lord Chief Juſtice have refuſed to grant a Habeas Corpus?

Coun. They did not deny the Habeas Corpus becauſe he was not bailable by law, but becauſe the courſe of their Courts, in their opinions, would not admit it: But however, if you ought to bail him, (as by the Statute I think you ought) their refuſal does not leſſen your duty.

Court. We doubt very much that any inferior Court can bail a man committed by a ſuperior one.

Coun. Scruples and fears do not alter the law: This doubt was once made in the King's-Bench, in the great caſe of Selden, and others; but the law was for the priſoner before that time, and was ſufficiently ſettled then; and this caſe differs nothing from that in reaſon.

Court. It does, for that was upon a Habeas Corpus out of the King's-Bench.

Coun. That is but a circumſtantial difference. The Habeas Corpus from that Court is only to remove the priſoner, and the cauſe before them, that juſtice may be done to him: Mr. Jenkes is already within your juriſdiction, and the Statute gives you authority to bail him; and your authority makes it your duty, and I rely upon that.

Court. We conſidered upon it at dinner, and do believe it a rare caſe, and fit to be adviſed upon; and we will adviſe.

Why did you not move yeſterday when my Lord Chief Juſtice was in Town? now there are no Judges in Town to adviſe with.

Coun. That we did not come yeſterday, was no deſign, for he is not ſo fond of a Goal; and if it be an indiſcretion, yet that is no ſufficient reaſon to detain a man in priſon. However, if you have have power, (which you ought to know) you have it as well when they are not in Town, as when they are. Is he bailable by law, or not?

Court. There is nothing in the warrant, for which he is not bailable by law.

Coun. For what reaſon then do you deny him?

Court. We do not deny him, but we will adviſe, becauſe he is committed by a ſuperior Court.

Coun. No man ought to be impriſoned for any miſdemeanour before conviction, without bail; and it is againſt the Petition of Right, that any man bailable by law, ſhould be detained in Goal without it. I don't know how, by ſuch denials as this, the being committed by a ſuperior Court may grow to be a reaſon; but at preſent I think the Petition of Right ſpoils it for being a good one.

Court. You can give us no precedent of any one being bailed by Juſtices at the Seſſions, who was committed by the council-board.

Coun. I believe it is a rare caſe that a man ſhould be forced to apply himſelf to ſuch, but I think I can furniſh you with an inſtance; and that is of one Cannon, a Quaker, who was committed by the privy council about Chriſtmas laſt, and was bailed at the Seſſions of the Old Baily.

A pert By-ſtander, no ways concerned, ſuggeſted to the Court, and the Court repeated after him, Court. He was committed to Newgate-Priſon, and was calender'd there.

Coun. If you ſtick to the reaſon of being committed by a ſuperior Court, that is no anſwer; but if it muſt be an anſwer, Mr. Jenkes is committed to the priſon of this liberty, and ought to have been calender'd here; and then I do again demand that the Goaler be fined.

Court. We think it a rare caſe, and fit to be adviſed upon; and our commiſſion we here ſit by, directs us to do ſo in difficult caſes.

Coun. I told you before, I had nothing to do with the commiſſion you here ſit by; and you yourſelves excluded me from it: but I apply my ſelf to you as Juſtices of the Peace meerly, and as ſuch you ought to take upon you the knowledge of your office.

Court. In the great caſe of Selden, that you cited, the Judges took two Terms to adviſe.

Coun. You very well know what opinion was had of their doing ſo. Will you adviſe upon it to-night with the King's counſel, and I'll attend you to-morrow morning?

Court. We think fit to adviſe with the Judges about it, till next Seſſions.

Coun. I can eaſily interpret what ſuch adviſing means.

Court. You ſay you apply yourſelf to us as Juſtices of the Peace meerly, then you may come to any two of us a fortnight hence, or more, and perhaps we may adviſe in the mean time.

Coun. I believe it will be a difficult matter to get any two of you together upon this occaſion.

Mr. Jenkes finding all theſe common doors to liberty ſhut againſt him, did by advice betake himſelf to another method, not leſs legal than the former; tho' the power granted by the Statutes, to Juſtices of Peace, and the conſtant iſſuing of the Writ of Habeas Corpus upon demand, (both more eaſy courſes) have occaſioned it to be of more ſeldom uſe.

Juſtice Fitzherbert, in his Natura Brevium, (an Author, and a Book of juſtly venerable authority in our law) in his Chapter of Main-prize, declares, That if a man be taken by the King's commiſſion, and kept in priſon for felony or miſdemeanours, he may by his friends put in ſureties in the Chancery, that he will appear before the Juſtices, &c. and be of good behaviour, &c. and that body for body; and thereupon he ſhall have a Writ out of the Chancery, unto the Sheriff, or unto the conſtable of the caſtle where he is impriſoned, to ſet him at liberty, if he be impriſoned for that cauſe and no other.

Which words ſeem plainly to declare the Writ of Main-prize to be the ſubject's right, and not to leave a diſcretional power to the Officers of Chancery in granting it. But the ſcarcity of precedents being the great objection againſt the Habeas Corpus out of Chancery, Mr. Jenkes reſolved to offend no more in that kind, and therefore cauſed a ſearch to be made in the Rolls in the Tower, for the Writs of Main-prize, where a multitude of them was found, and many in the caſe of a commitment by the King's command. A copy of one, and a note of ſeveral others were taken out, to back the authority of Fitzherbert. With this proviſion, on Monday, July 17. four of Mr. Jenkes's friends, ſubſtantial Merchants, attended by a counſel, went to the Lord Chancellor; and tho' upon tender of themſelves as bail for him, they might have demanded their Writ of Main-prize as the ſubject's right, without other formality, yet they addreſſed themſelves to him in a more reſpectful manner, by way of petition, thus:

To the Right Honourable Henry Lord Finch, Baron of Daventry, and Lord High Chancellor of England; the humble Petition of A. B. C. D. of London, Merchants, friends to Francis Jenkes, now a Priſoner in the Gate-houſe of Weſtminſter, ſheweth:

THat the ſaid Francis Jenkes was committed to the ſaid Priſon, by virtue of a warrant, a true copy whereof is hereunto annexed, for a fact bailable by law; for which, and no other cauſe, he yet remains there a Priſoner: And that in this and all other caſes of like nature, your Petitioners are adviſed, upon putting in bail in the Court of Chancery, according to the ancient courſe and uſage thereof, a Writ of Main-prize ought to iſſue under the Great Seal, to be directed to the Sheriff or Keeper of the Priſon where ſuch priſoner ſtands committed, to deliver the priſoner ſo committed.

That your Petitioners being men of good eſtates, (as ſhall, if your Lordſhip require, be made out to your Lordſhip) do deſire, and are ready to become bail for the ſaid Francis Jenkes; according to the courſe of the Chancery, and according to the law.

The Petitioners therefore pray, that your Lordſhip would accept of bail accordingly; and that thereupon your Lordſhip would order a Writ to be made forthwith, to be directed to the Keeper of the Gate-houſe, for the diſcharge of the ſaid Francis Jenkes. And your Petitioners ſhall always pray, &c.

The Petition being ſent in to, and read by his Lordſhip, was returned by the Secretary with this anſwer; "That his Lordſhip did very well ap"prove of the Petition; but ſince Mr. Jenkes,
"was committed by the council-board, he thought

" fit that they ſhould be petitioned, and ſhould " bail him."

But Mr. Jenkes's friends not being ſatisfied with that anſwer, preſſed to ſpeak to his Lordſhip, and were by his Lordſhip's order called in, who coming towards them, ſpake to this effect:

Lord Chan. Who is't that puts you upon theſe improper methods?

Coun. We preſume this addreſs to your Lordſhip to be a proper courſe in our caſe, and is ſuch as we have precedent for.

Lord Chan. Are you a Lawyer?

Coun. Yes, my Lord.

Lord Chan. Have you read Fitzherbert's Nat. Brevium? Look in his Writ de Homine Replegiando.

Coun. We have nothing to do with that Writ, but it is by Fitzherbert that we are directed to this courſe, in his Chapter of Main-prize, where he ſaith, (what is before cited;) and we are confirmed in his opinion by a multitude of precedents out of the cloſe Rolls in the Tower: I have the copy of one here, and the Number and Roll of many more.

The precedent ſhewn to his Lordſhip was this.

Ex Rol. clauſ. de Anno Regni Regis Ed. 3. XI. parte prima, membr. 28.

Lord Chan. One precedent of diſcretion is worth a thouſand of theſe precedents.

His Lordſhip read the precedent, and obſerving it to bear Teſte the 19th day of March, which could never be in Term, asked, When it was returnable? And ſaid, It muſt be returnable in ſome Court at Weſtminſter.

Coun. This precedent hath no return, neither doth the nature of the Writ in this caſe require one; for it is only a mandate to the Goaler, to ſet him at liberty upon ſureties firſt taken in Chancery for his appearance before the Juſtices; which Juſtices, and the time of his appearance, I ſuppoſe, are to be named in the Recognizance.

L. Chan. Whether there ought to be a return, is the queſtion; beſides, this is a Writ directed immediately to the Marſhal of the houſhold, and is a different caſe.

Coun. With ſubmiſſion to your Lordſhip, it makes no difference who is the Goaler; and thoſe I have given your Lordſhip the Number and Roll of, are to ſeveral Goalers.

Then Fitzherbert's Nat. Brevium was ſhewn to his Lordſhip, and upon reading the words there, If a man be impriſoned by the King's commiſſion, &c. his Lordſhip ſaid, That it was intended of one impriſoned by virtue of a commiſſion out of Chancery.

Coun. I humbly preſume, that is not the ſenſe of the Book; the precedents I have ſhewn your Lordſhip ſeem to interpret it, and are upon other Comments; and Fitzherbert, in his Abridgment, Tit. Main-prize, pl. 23. cites a book-caſe, that ſhews this to have been a courſe in the Chancery; but we ſubmit it to your Lordſhip's judgment.

L. Chan. A little ſubmiſſion in a proper Place will do, but he hath a mind to come out with a high hand.

Coun. He has a mind to be diſcharged by law, as the warrant for his commitment directs.

L. Chan. I am not to controul any Act of the Privy-Council.

Coun. At the laſt motion for a Habeas Corpus, your Lordſhip was pleaſed to ſay, That though that was not a proper method for Mr. Jenkes to obtain his liberty by, yet there was one; and upon that encouragement from your Lordſhip, ſearch has been made, and this courſe we have now taken, found to have been the ancient courſe; and we did preſume, the ſame that your Lordſhip meant.

L. Chan. You have uſed a great deal of induſtry to miſs the right way. Your precedents of Edward III. and Richard II. (three hundred year old) I'll conſider of till next Term. Upon which Anſwer, Mr. Jenkes's friends withdrew.

Now the plenty of precedents proved as great a fault as want of them did before; and their Age, which uſed to add to their authority, and give them a greater reſpect, made them contemned. Such always is the ſucceſs, where Stat pro ratione voluntas.

luntas. In the afternoon, the Secretary that firſt carried in the Petition, came to Mr. Jenkes in a diſſembled confuſion, and told him, That he had committed a miſtake in returning the Petition; That his Lordſhip had asked him for it, and would be very angry with him if he had it not; That he had left his Lordſhip looking over ſome papers, and taken that opportunity of coming for it; and deſired that he might have it, to preſerve him from his Lordſhip's diſpleaſure.

Note, That he returned it by his Lordſhip's Order.

Tho' the Morning's action gave Mr. Jenkes a great deal of reaſon to ſuſpect the Secretary's tale to be a meer contrivance, and eaſy to ſurmize the truth; yet he took no notice of what had then paſſed, but ſent the Petition, (which was then in ſome of his friends hands) that evening to him. Upon the ſecond thoughts which his Lordſhip beſtowed upon the matter of the Petition, he was better reconciled to it, and proved better than his word in conſidering the precedents; for inſtead of pauſing upon them till the next Term, he was pleaſed to carry them and the Petition to the Privy-Council, the next Wedneſday; where, tho' all the particulars are not known, upon credible information, this was the ſubſtance of what paſſed:

His Lordſhip acquainted the Board with the Addreſs that had been made to him; and moved, that the Petition might be there read. After it was read, his Lordſhip told them, that it had ſome appearance of law, and deſired that the Attorney-General might give his opinion. Mr. Attorney told him, If it were law, his Lordſhip ought to grant it; if it were not law, then to deny it; if it were of ſuch difficulty as he could not ſatisfy himſelf, that then he ſhould adviſe with the Judges.

His Lordſhip then moved for an order of council for his direction in the matter; to which ſome of the Lords replied, That they were a Court of State, and not of Law, and that it did belong to him, as Lord Chancellor, to inform them of matters of law: Thereupon his Lordſhip clapping his hands to his breaſt, ſaid, I thank God I have courage enough to ſerve his Majeſty.

About the latter end of July, ſome of Mr. Jenkes's friends attended his Lordſhip again, and offered him bail; inſiſting upon the Writ of Main-prize as the ſubject's right; alledging to his Lordſhip the hazards that his health, his family, and his trade were expoſed to by his confinement. His Lordſhip asked them, why they had not petitioned the King and Council? And told them, if Mr. Jenkes thought it better to lie in priſon and complain, than petition and be bailed, he might do as he pleaſed.

They told him, they had tendered bail to Mr. Secretary Williamſon, who promiſed them to move the King in Council in it: But when they reminded him of it upon the next council-day, he was pleaſed to excuſe himſelf. His Lordſhip told them, he never heard they had tendered bail; but the Writ of Main-prize was forgotten in all his anſwer.

They then told him, that the general report was, that the King and Council had referred it to his Lordſhip; but his Lordſhip would take no notice of that likewiſe, but ſaid, the King would adviſe with the Judges when they came to Town. His Lordſhip withdrew from them; and they left word with his Secretary, That Mr. Jenkes looked upon himſelf to be his Lordſhip's Priſoner.

On the --- of Auguſt, Mr. Jenkes's friends went again to my Lord-Chancellor's; but his Secretary told them, his Lordſhip could not be ſpoke with.

They prevailed with his Secretary to go up to him, and remind his Lordſhip of his laſt anſwer of adviſing with the Judges; and tell him, that ſeveral of the Judges had been in Town, and they did now deſire his Lordſhip's Reſolution.

The Secretary, at his return told them, that as ſoon as he began to mention the buſineſs, his Lordſhip fell into a fit of the Stone; but when that was over, he would mention it unto him. About two hours after, they returned; and the Secretary being abſent, another of his Lordſhip's ſervants came to them, and told them, that his Lordſhip was not well, and could not be ſpoke with; but had ordered him to tell them, That Mr. Jenkes might adviſe with his counſel what was fit to be done, for he was none of his counſel; and if he would petition the King and Council, he might; and that that was his anſwer.

On the 11th of Auguſt, being the laſt council-day that was to be before the 3d of October, Mr. Jenkes thought fit again to tender bail to the Council; and that the Lord-Chancellor, who diſowned all knowledge of his doing ſo before, and that the whole Council might know of it, he ſent this Letter by his bail to the Lord Privy-Seal, then Preſident of the council, which was publickly read.

" My Lord,
" I Have been impriſoned ſince the 28th of " June, to my great loſs, charge, and pre" judice of my health. I have hitherto been de" nied bail, Habeas Corpus, and the Writ of Main-
" prize; which, I am informed, were never be" fore denied to any of his Majeſty's ſubjects in " the like caſe: And this only for moving in a " lawful Court, and in a quiet and peaceable man" ner, that which I did believe to be for his Ma-
" jeſty's ſervice, and the good of the City and " Kingdom, and the preſervation of the Proteſtant
" Religion; and which I conceive I can make
" appear to be according to the Laws and Sta" tutes of this Realm, if I am publickly called " thereto. Wherefore I do not beg a diſcharge,
" for I deſire nothing more than to clear my in" nocence by a public trial: but ſince Mr. Mur-
" rel and others, committed to this Priſon for mat" ters of a far other nature, are daily bailed out; my " humble requeſt to your Lordſhip, is, that you " would be pleaſed to move his Majeſty, that I,
" as well as any other of his Majeſty's ſubjects,
" may enjoy the benefit of the Laws; and that
" the Writ of Main-prize may be granted to me;
" or that my bail, which now attend, may be " taken: Your Lordſhip will very much oblige,

Your Lordſhip's humble Servant,

Francis Jenkes.

This Letter was by ſome improved into a Petition; and when they had given it that name, (tho' that was the only thing wanting to pleaſe the Lord-Chancellor) yet it could not procure the acceptance of bail; but the method propoſed by his Lordſhip, proved as ineffectual as thoſe that were demanded of him. The Lord-Chancellor's Reſolu-

Reſolutions being ſufficiently diſcovered, Mr. Jenkes's friends forbore all farther ſollicitation of his Lordſhip, and made freſh application to the Lord Chief-Juſtice Rainsford, on Auguſt 18. then juſt returned from the circuit.

The time of Seſſions at the Old Baily drawing on, they cauſed two Writs of Habeas Corpus to be made, (the common courſe of removing priſoners from one Goal to another) one, ad deliberandum, directed to the Keeper at the Gate-houſe; the other, ad recipiendum, directed to the Sheriffs of London, and deſired his Lordſhip to ſign them, that Mr. Jenkes might be removed and brought to trial; for that the Keeper of the Gate-houſe not calendering any State-priſoner, (as he called him) at the Seſſions for Weſtminſter, he might lie there all his life-time without trial, which no ſubject ought to do. His Lordſhip excuſed himſelf upon his late return to Town, which had not yet afforded him leiſure to adviſe; and ſent them to the Attorney-General, to know whether he were ready for a trial, before he would give them any anſwer.

Mr. Attorney, upon their coming to him, very worthily told them, That he had no order in it, but that he would not oppoſe the granting of thoſe Writs: adding, God forbid but that the Law ſhould have its due courſe.

They returned to the Lord Chief-Juſtice with this anſwer, and offered to make oath, that it was Mr. Attorney's anſwer; but he would give credit to nothing but a Note under Mr. Attorney's own hand. They told him, it was hard that a man ſhould lie in priſon, who was willing to bring himſelf upon trial; that Writs of this nature were every day granted, and did preſume, could not reaſonably be denied. His Lordſhip anſwered, he would know whether Mr. Attorney were ready for a trial. They replied, That they did not know when Mr. Attorney would be ready, and Mr. Jenkes muſt ſtay for his trial till then.

They then moved his Lordſhip, as they had done formerly, That he would grant a Habeas Corpus to bring him before his Lordſhip, and that he would accept of ſubſtantial citizens for bail, who ſhould render him whenſoever Mr. Attorney ſhould call for him; alledging, that ſuch Writs had been frequently granted by the Lord Chief-Juſtice Keeling, and one of the now Juſtices of the King's-Bench.

His Lordſhip returned, That he did not doubt the ſecurity they ſhould offer him; but he had never granted ſuch a Writ, and he knew not upon what authority others had done it: And in ſhort, refuſed to grant either that or the other Writs.

After all theſe denials of right, Mr. Jenkes reſolved to ſit ſtill, with the ſatisfaction, that his ill ſucceſs was not imputable to the injuſtice of his cauſe; but to the pleaſure or fear of thoſe that had the power of making it otherwiſe: And with patience to expect it till the Term ſhould ſet open the priſon-doors; which will not brook the denial of a Habeas Corpus, tho' a long Vacation muſt.

No further addreſs was therefore made to either of their Lordſhips; but themſelves, after they had taken the pleaſure of denying him, were pleaſed to condeſcend to intercede for him: for, as we heard, by very credible information, the Lord Chief Juſtice went to the Lord Chancellor, and told him, "That the Writs demanded of "him, were according to Law, and could not be "denied; and that he had only taken time till he "had acquainted his Lordſhip with it."

The Lord-Chancellor directed him to the Lord Treaſurer for further advice; who ſent him to the King. As ſoon as his Majeſty underſtood, that what was demanded was the ſubject's right, he immediately commanded that the Laws ſhould have their due courſe, which their Lordſhips had ſtopped: And accordingly he was bailed.

[He was afterwards in 1683, tried with Thomas Pilkington, Henry Corniſh, Eſqrs; and others, for a Riot at Guildhall, and fined 300 marks. See State Trials, Vol. 3. pag. 541.]

XXXIII. Articles of High Miſdeameanours, humbly offered and preſented to the Conſideration of his moſt Sacred Majeſty, and his moſt Honourable Privy-Council, againſt Sir William Scroggs, Lord Chief-Juſtice of the King's-Bench; exhibited by Dr. Oates, and Captain Bedlow. 31 Car. II.

I. THAT the ſaid Lord Chief-Juſtice, contrary to his oath, the duty of his place, in contempt of the King, his Crown and Dignity, did ſet at liberty ſeveral perſons accuſed upon oath before him of High-Treaſon, without their being ever tried, or otherwiſe acquitted; as namely the Lord Brudenell, &c.

II. That at the Trial of Sir George Wakeman and others at the Seſſions-houſe in the Old-Bailey, for High-Treaſon, the ſaid Lord Chief-Juſtice (according to the dignity of his place) managing the ſaid Trial, did brow-beat and curb Dr. Titus Oates, and Mr. William Bedlow, two of the principal witneſſes for the King in that caſe; and encourage the Jury impanelled and ſworn to try the malefactors, againſt the ſaid witneſſes, by his publick ſpeaking ſlightly and and abuſively againſt them and their evidence, and the miſrepeating and omitting of material parts of their evidence; whereby the parties indicted were by the ſaid Jury acquitted of the fact, then charged againſt them, and fully proved by the ſaid witneſſes *.

III. That the ſaid Lord Chief-Juſtice, after the Trial of the ſaid Sir George Wakeman, and others for High-Treaſon, as aforeſaid, in the further abuſe of the ſaid Dr. Titus Oates, and Mr. William Bedlow, and in their great diſparagement ſpeaking of them; ſaid, that before the Trial of Sir George Wakeman, (meaning the aforeſaid Trial) the witneſſes (meaning the aforeſaid Dr. Titus Oates, and the ſaid Mr. William Bedlow) were to be believed; but that at and after the ſaid Trial, they were not to be believed by him, nor ſhould not be believed by him; or to that very effect.

IV. That the ſaid Lord Chief-Juſtice, by reaſon of his office, hath taken upon him the power to oppreſs by impriſonment, his Majeſty's loyal Subjects; namely, Henry Care, for writing and cauſing to be printed divers ſingle-ſheet Books in Engliſh, called, The Pacquet of Advice from Rome; for the information and diſcovery of the idolatrous errors and impieties of the Romiſh Church, to his Majeſty's loyal and obedient Proteſtant Subjects, (in this conjuncture of time very uſeful:) although the ſaid Lord Chief-Juſtice, neither did, nor could alledge or charge the ſaid Care, with any thing contained in the ſaid Book, that was any ways criminal or derogatory to his Majeſty's Laws, Crown or Dignity; and refuſes to take very good Bail for him, though offered; and afterwards leſs bail taken for him upon his Habeas Corpus in Court: but by the ſaid Lord Chief-Juſtice's means, he was continued bound all the Term to his good behaviour; and at the end thereof until the next Term; although no particular crime was, or could be proved againſt or laid to his charge.

V. That to the great oppreſſion of his Majeſty's loyal Subjects, the ſaid Lord Chief-Juſtice, contrary to Law, and in manifeſt breach of his oath, hath, without any reaſonable cauſe, impriſoned a Feme Covert; and divers others his Majeſty's ſaid Subjects, and refuſed to take bail, though tendred, and the matter bailable, as in the caſe of Mrs. Jane Curtis, Mr. Francis Smith, &c.

VI. That the ſaid Lord Chief-Juſtice, is very much addicted to ſwearing and curſing in his common diſcourſe; and to drink to exceſs, to the great diſparagement of the dignity and gravity of his ſaid place. He did in his common diſcourſe at dinner at a Gentleman's houſe of Quality, publickly and openly uſe and utter many oaths and curſes, and there drink to exceſs.

VII. That Charles Price being accuſed upon oath, before the ſaid Lord Chief-Juſtice, to be a Popiſh Prieſt and Jeſuit, and impriſoned for the ſame; and alſo divers other perſons accuſed upon oath for High-Treaſon; as namely, Sir Francis Mannock, Richard Vaughan Eſq; and Daniel Arthur Merchant; the ſaid Lord Chief-Juſtice ſet them at large upon bail, without conſulting his Majeſty's Council, or his witneſſes, and againſt their conſent, divers of which perſons have not ſince appeared, but have forfeited their Recognizances, and the perſons not to be found.

VIII. That the ſaid Lord Chief-Juſtice, to the great diſcouragement of his Majeſty's loyal Proteſtant Subjects; to the manifeſt encouragement of the Roman Catholick Subjects; when information hath been duly and legally given to him of the abode, or perſon of a Popiſh Prieſt or Jeſuit, and a warrant deſired from him to take or ſearch for ſuch Prieſts or Jeſuits; he hath in a ſlighting and ſcornful manner refuſed the ſame, and bid the Informer go to Sir William Waller, who buſied himſelf in ſuch matters mainly.

IX. That the Trial of Knox and Lane, at the bar of the King's-Bench Court, for their miſdemeanours, in endeavouring to take away the credit of Dr. Titus Oates, and Mr. William Bedlow, two of the principal witneſſes for his Majeſty, in the proving of the Conſpiracy and Conſpirators againſt his Majeſty's Life, and Government of theſe Kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland, the deſtruction of the Proteſtants and Proteſtant Religion, and introducing and ſettling of Popery there; although the evidence was ſo full and clear againſt them, that the Jury found them guilty without going from the bar; yet the ſaid Lord Chief-Juſtice, in further diſcouragement and diſparaging the evidence of the ſaid Dr. Titus Oates, and Mr. William Bedlow; would not, nor did not give any charge to the Jury therein, but roſe up ſuddenly, after the evidence cloſed by the Counſel, and left the ſaid Court abruptly, before the ſaid Jury had given in their verdict.

X. That the ſaid Lord Chief-Juſtice, knowing that one William Oſborn was in the conſpiracy and contrivance with the ſaid Knox and Lane, in the laſt article mentioned, to take away the credit of the ſaid Dr. Titus Oates, and Mr. William Bedlow; and knowing the ſaid Dr. Titus Oates, and Mr. William Bedlow, to be material witneſſes for his Majeſty, in proving of the conſpiracy and conſpirators, in the ſaid laſt article mentioned, and had been ſo againſt ſeveral of the ſaid conſpirators that had been tried, and were to be ſo againſt ſeveral others of the ſaid conſpirators that were impeached or accuſed for the ſaid High-Treaſon, and were to be tried for the ſame; and knowing the ſaid William Osborn had been detected before the Lords in Parliament aſſembled, for his ſaid conſpiracy and contrivance with the ſaid Knox and Lane; and that upon his own oath, thereupon denying the fact in their ſaid conſpiracy and contrivance to be true: yet out of his malice

* Sir Francis Winnington in his Speech in the Parliament 1680. printed in The Faithful Regiſter, or, the Debates of the Houſe of Commons in four ſeveral Parliaments; ſays, at Wakeman's Trial, Thoſe perſons who at former Trials had been treated with that reſpect that is due to the King's Evidence, and whoſe Credit and Reputation had ſtood clear without exception in all other Trials, were now not only brow-beaten, but their Evidence preſented to the Jury, as doubtful and not to be depended on, and ſo at all other Trials of Papiſts from that time forward. By which many of the greateſt offenders were quitted and cleared as to the Plot, and thoſe that were brought for defaming the King's Evidence, and ſuborning Witneſſes, in order thereto, very kindly treated, and diſcharged with eaſy Sentences, eſpecially if Papiſts; but if Proteſtants, though only for printing or vending ſome unlicenſed Book, were impriſon'd and largely fined. But, I beg leave to particularize in the caſe of one Care, who was indicted for Printing a Weekly Intelligence, call'd, The Packet of Advice from Rome, or, the Hiſtory of Popery. This man had a ſtrange knack of writing extraordinary well upon that ſubject, and the Paper was by moſt perſons thought not only very ingenious, but alſo very uſeful at this time for the information of the people, becauſe it laid open very intelligibly the errors and cheats of that Church. However, upon an Information given to the Court of King's-Bench againſt this Care, this Rule was made;

Ordinatum eſt, quod Liber imitulat. The weekly Packet, &c. non ulterius imprimatur, vel publicetur per aliquam perſonam quamcunque. Per Cur.

I think it amounts to little leſs than a total prohibition of printing any thing againſt Popery.

lice to the ſaid Dr. Titus Oates, and Mr. William Bedlow; and as much as in him lay to endeavour the diſparagement, if not the ſuppreſſing of the further diſcovery of that helliſh and damnable plot; the ſaid Lord Chief-Juſtice, without the knowledge, conſent, or approbation of his Majeſty, or any of his learned Counſel in the Law, or the ſaid Dr. Titus Oates, or Mr. William Bedlow; did voluntarily give the ſaid Oſborn liberty to make an affidavit before him upon oath, of the truth of the ſaid fact, he had before, as aforeſaid, denied upon his oath; with intent that he ſame might be made uſe of againſt the ſaid Dr. Titus Oates, and Mr. William Bedlow, to their diſparagement, and the apparent prejudice of his Majeſty, againſt the ſaid conſpirators, in the ſaid High-Treaſon.

XI. That he the ſaid Lord Chief-Juſtice, to manifeſt his ſlighting opinion of the evidence of the ſaid Dr. Titus Oates, and Mr. William Bedlow, in the preſence of his moſt ſacred Majeſty, and the Right Honourable the Lords and others of his Majeſty's moſt Honourable Privy-Council; did dare to ſay, that he had thought that Dr. Titus Oates, and Mr. William Bedlow, always had an accuſation ready againſt any body.

XII. That at the aſſize holden at Monmouth laſt, the ſaid Lord Chief-Juſtice, in the preſence of ſeveral Juſtices of the Peace for the ſaid County, did ſay to Mr. William Bedlow, that he did believe in his conſcience, that Richard Langhorn, whom he condemned, died wrongfully, to the great diſparagement of his Majeſty's Crown and Dignity, the Juſtice of the Court, the Jury and Evidence.

XIII. That the ſaid Lord Chief-Juſtice, contrary to the dignity of his place, did make merchandize of the Trials of certain Prieſts to be tried in Staffordſhire, and took twenty guineas in earneſt; then ſold the ſaid Trials to other perſons, refuſing to return the ſaid twenty guineas to thoſe from whom he had received them. And furthermore, before the Trial of Sir George Wakeman; he the ſaid Lord Chief-Juſtice, did bargain with two Bookſellers for one hundred and fifty guineas, for them to print the Trials; and in caſe they would not lay down the money before he went into the Court, he would not go into the Court, but would go into the Country: and if the ſaid Trial, by reaſon of its length, could not be finiſhed in one day, he would have a hundred guineas more, or to that very effect.

The Anſwer of Sir William Scroggs Knt. Lord Chief-Juſtice of the King's-Bench; to the Articles of Mr. Titus Oates, and Mr. William Bedlow.

I. TO the firſt, he ſaith, That the Lord Brudenell was bailed by the Court of King's-Bench in open Court, and afterwards by the Court diſcharged; with this, that William Bedlow did importune the Lord Weſtmorland to get the ſaid Lord Brudenell diſcharged, for that he had nothing to ſay againſt him, as he ſaid to the Lord Weſtmorland.

See the Rules of Court.

II. To the ſecond, he ſaith, That as to his omitting or miſrepeating the evidence at Sir George Wakeman's Trial, it is a reflection upon the whole Court to ſuppoſe it true, and that they ſhould let it paſs. But he ſaith, that Mr. Oates being ask'd at that Trial, why he did not charge Sir George Wakeman at the Council-Table with a letter under his own hand concerning the death of the King, he anſwer'd, he did not know but that he did: to which it was replied, it is plain he did not; for then the Council would have committed him. To which Mr. Oates replied, that that Council would commit no body for the plot; which might be the cauſe of the miſdemeanour of frowning in the articles mentioned.

III. To the third, he ſaith, he doth not remember that ever he expreſs'd much concerning their credit before their Trial; but that there were ſome paſſages at that Trial, which gave him great cauſe of doubt: which he hopes he might do, without making it an article of miſdemeanour.

IV. and V. To the fourth and fifth, he ſaith, That the perſons in the articles mentioned, were committed by him for publiſhing ſeveral libellous and ſcandalous papers, which were proved againſt them upon oath; which commitments, even of a Feme Covert alſo, notwithſtanding Mr. Oates, and Mr. Bedlow's ſkill, were according to Law: tho' there is no Law for theſe perſons to call me to account for judicial acts done upon other men.

VI. To the ſixth, which is an inſolent ſcandal, he referreth himſelf to the teſtimony of that Gentleman of Quality, whoever he be.

VII. To the ſeventh, he ſaith, That the perſons in this article were bailed and diſcharged by the Court, where the Attorney-General was firſt called; but indeed Mr. Oates, and Mr. Bedlow's conſent was not ask'd.

VIII. To the eighth, he ſaith, he conceives himſelf not obliged to do all the buſineſs that Juſtices of the Peace may do; and though without an offence he might have given ſuch an anſwer as is mentioned, yet he did not, but a ſervant of his did.

IX. To the ninth, he ſaith, That when the cauſe was tried, he told the Jury the matter was plain, and ſo did the reſt of the Court; upon which he went away, without any compliment to Mr. Oates, to try cauſes in London.

X. To the tenth, he ſaith, That Oſborn made only two affidavits before him, the ſubſtance of one was, that one Bowring a ſervant to Mr. Oates had ſaid, that he had heard Mr. Oates ſay, that the Kingdom of England would never flouriſh, until it became Elective, and the Kings choſen by the People. The other affidavit was, when he was ſent to him, by an order of Council to be examined; wherein amongſt other things he ſwears, that though at the Trial of Knox and Lane, it was ask'd where Osborn was, and Mr. Oates's Counſel anſwered that he was fled; yet Osborn ſwears, that he at that time was at his father's houſe in the country, and that Mr. Oates knew it; that he took his leave of him the day before he went, and told whither he went, and ſaw a letter wrote by Mr. Oates to his father to ſend for him. Notwithſtanding it was carried at the Trial, as if he had been fled no man knew whither; ſo that the affidavit which the article chargeth me for permitting to be made, was not ſworn before me.

XI. He ſaith, it is more to be wondred how Mr. Oates ſhould dare to charge that as an article of miſdemeanour, which was ſaid in the King's preſence, and yet repeated falſe too.

XII. That at Monmouth Aſſizes he did tell Mr. Bedlow, that he was more unſatisfied about Mr. Langhorn's Trial than all the reſt; and the rather, for that he was credibly informed ſince the Trial, that Mr. Langhorn's ſtudy was ſo ſituated, that he that walked walked in his chamber could not ſee Mr. Langhorn write in his ſtudy: which was Mr. Bedlow's evidence.

XIII. He ſaith, the matter complained of is a meer contract with other men, of which he thinks himſelf not bound to give Mr. Oates and Mr. Bedlow any other account, but that by the taking of twenty guineas he loſt forty; and that his backwardneſs to go into Court to Wakeman's Trial, makes it look as if he had not had ten thouſand pounds to favour Wakeman in this Trial.

If theſe Articles ſhall appear to your Majeſty to be frivolous, or ſcandalous, or not true; I humbly pray your Majeſty's juſt reſentment thereon, in Honour to your Courts and Government.

And that ſuch an unknown Attempt may not go unpuniſhed; that the promoters may be left to be proceeded againſt according to Law.

The Articles of Mr. Titus Oates, and Mr. William Bedlow, againſt the Lord Chief-Juſtice Scroggs, were heard this 21ſt of January, 1679, before the King and Council; and upon the hearing of both ſides, Mr. Oates, and Captain Bedlow are left to be proceeded againſt according to Law.

But I don't find the Chief-Juſtice recover'd any damages.

XXXIV. Proceedings againſt Sir William Scroggs, Knt. Lord Chief-Juſtice of the King's-Bench, and other Judges, in Parliament, 1680. 32 Car. II.

Novemb. 13. 1680.

Several Perſons were examined in the Houſe of Commons about the diſmiſſing of a Grand-Jury in Middleſex. After which, ſeveral Members of the Houſe ſpoke as follows; viz.

Sir William Jones.

MR. Speaker, Sir, the preſervation of the Government in general, as well as our particular ſafeties, have a dependance upon the matter that is now before you, in which there are ſo many miſcarriages ſo complicated, as there ariſeth ſome difficulty how to examine them. I cannot but obſerve, how the Proclamation is here again mentioned; by which you may conclude, there lieth a great weight on the people's right to petition by means thereof, and that the beſt way to remove it, is to find out the adviſers and contrivers of that Proclamation, in order to proceed againſt them according to their deſerts. Without which, what you have done in aſſerting the Right of Petitioning, will remain with ſome doubt; and thoſe that adviſed the proclaiming to the people, that it is ſeditious to petition the King, without that chaſtiſement they deſerve. And therefore, I humbly conceive, you will do well to conſider of it as ſoon as you can. It is not ſtrange, that the Proclamation ſhould be made uſe of with Country Gentlemen, to get abhorrers to petitioning, ſeeing the Judges themſelves have made uſe of it to that purpoſe. They ſhould have known, that though a Proclamation might be of great uſe, to intimate the obſervation of a Law, yet that it had never been uſed inſtead of a Law. But yet I do not admire ſo much at this, as I do at the diſcharge of the Grand Jury, before they had finiſhed their preſentments. It tends ſo much to the ſubverſion of the eſtabliſh'd Laws of this Land, that I dare pronounce, that all the Laws you have already, and all that you can make, will ſignify nothing againſt any great man, unleſs you can remedy it for the future. I obſerve, there were two reaſons why this Grand-Jury were ſo extrajudicially diſcharged; one, becauſe they would otherwiſe have preſented the Duke of York for a Papiſt; the other, becauſe they preſented a Petition to be deliver'd to the King for the ſitting of the Parliament, which they ſaid it was not their buſineſs to deliver. Though I cannot but obſerve, how upon other occaſions they did receive Petitions, and delivered them to the King; and all the difference was, that the Petitions ſo delivered, were againſt ſittings of Parliaments. The truth is, I cannot much condemn them for it; for if they were guilty of ſuch crimes as the witneſſes have this day given you information of, I think they had no reaſon to further Petitions for the ſitting of a Parliament. But, Sir, this buſineſs will need a further Information, and therefore, I humbly pray it may be referred to a Committee.

Sir Francis Winnington.

Mr. Speaker, Sir, I think we are come to the old times again, When the Judges pretended they had a rule of Government, as well as a rule of Law; and they have acted accordingly. If they did never read Magna Charta, I think they are not fit to be Judges; if they have read Magna Charta, and do thus ſo contrary, they deſerve a ſevere chaſtiſement. To diſcharge Grand-Juries of purpoſe to diſappoint them of making their preſentments, is to deprive the Subject of the greateſt benefit and ſecurity the Law hath provided for them. If the Judges, inſtead of acting by Law, ſhall be acted by their ambition, and endeavour to get promotions rather by worſhipping the riſing Sun, than by doing Juſtice; this Nation will ſoon be reduced to a miſerable miſerable condition. Suppoſe that after the diſcharge of this Grand-Jury, ſome Perſon had offered to preſent ſome Murder, Treaſon, or other capital crime, for want of the Grand-Jury, there would have been a failure of Juſtice. As faults committed by Judges are of more dangerous conſequence than others to the publick; ſo there do not want precedents of ſeverer chaſtiſements for them than for others. I humbly move you firſt to paſs a Vote upon this buſineſs of diſcharging Grand-Juries, and then to appoint a Committee to examine the miſcarriages of the Judges in Weſtminſter-hall, and to report the ſame with all ſpeed to you.

Mr. S. Titus.

Mr. Speaker, Sir, As it has been obſerved that this buſineſs has ſome reference to the Proclamation, ſo I believe there is ſomething of the Plot in it too. And therefore, I think if this Plot do not go on, it will have the worſt luck that ever Plot had; ſeeing the Judges, as well as moſt other perſons in publick places, have given it as much aſſiſtance as they could. But whereas ſome have ſpoken ill of theſe Judges, I deſire to ſpeak well of them in one thing: I am confident they have herein ſhewed themſelves grateful to their benefactors; for I do believe that ſome of them were preferr'd to their places of purpoſe, becauſe they ſhould do what they have done. Laws of themſelves are but dead letters: unleſs you can ſecure the execution as well of thoſe you have already, as of thoſe you are now making, we ſhall ſpend our time to little purpoſe. Therefore I ſecond the motion that hath been made for a Vote, to declare the ſenſe of the houſe as to the diſcharging of Grand-Juries, and for referring the further examination to a Committee.

Mr. W. Sacheverel.

Mr. Speaker, Sir, The buſineſs of this debate, is a great inſtance of our ſick and languiſhingcondition. As our Ships, Forts and Caſtles are for ſecuring us from the danger of our Enemies from abroad, ſo our Laws from our Enemies at home; and if committed to ſuch perſons as will turn their ſtrength upon us, are equally dangerous. Sir, We all know how the Government of Scotland hath been quite altered ſince his Majeſty's Reſtauration, by ſome Laws made there; pray let us have a care that ours be not altered by the corrupt proceedings of Judges, leſt we be reduced to the ſame weak condition of defending ourſelves againſt Popery and arbitrary Government here, that they are there. If Judges can thus prevent the penalties of the Law, by diſcharging Grand-Juries before they have made their preſentments, and can make Laws by their Rules of Court, I think the Government may ſoon be ſubverted; and therefore, that it is high time for this Houſe to ſpeak with thoſe Gentlemen. In former times ſeveral Judges have been impeached, and hanged too, for leſs crimes than theſe; and the reaſon was, becauſe they had broke the King's oath as well as their own. If what hath been ſaid of ſome of theſe Judges be fully proved, they ſhall not want my Vote to inflict on them the ſame chaſtiſement. The truth is, Sir, I know not how the ill conſequences we juſtly fear from Judges, can be prevented, as long as they are made durante beneplacito, and have ſuch dependencies as they have. But this muſt be a work of time: in order to remedy our preſent grievances, let us paſs a Vote upon this buſineſs of diſcharging Grand-Juries, and that it may be penn'd as the caſe deſerves. If you pleaſe, let it be drawn up by a Committee, that may withdraw for that purpoſe; and let there be alſo one appointed to examine the miſcarriage of the Judges.

Mr. H. Powell.

Mr. Speaker, Sir, I would beg leave to obſerve to you, becauſe I think it may be neceſſary to be conſidered by your Committee, what an opinion was given not long ſince by ſome of theſe Judges about Printing; which was, that Printing of News might be prohibited by Law, and accordingly a Proclamation iſſued out. I will not take on me to cenſure the opinion as illegal, but leave it to your further conſideration. But I remember, there was a conſultation held by the Judges a little before, and they gave their opinion, that they knew not of any way to prevent Printing by Law, becauſe the Act for that purpoſe was expired. Upon which, ſome Judges were put out, and new ones put in, and then this other opinion was given. Theſe things are worthy of a ſerious examination: for if Treaſurers may raiſe money by ſhutting up the Exchequer, borrowing of the Bankers, or retrenchments, and the Judges make new Laws by an ill conſtruction, or an ill execution of the old ones; I conclude, that Parliaments will ſoon be found uſeleſs, and the liberty of the people an inconvenience to the Government. And therefore, I think, Sir, you have been well moved to endeavour to paſs your cenſure on ſome of theſe illegal proceedings by a Vote, and to refer the farther conſideration to a Committee.

Sir Francis Winnington.

Mr. Speaker, In the front of Magna Charta it is ſaid, Nulli negabimus, nulli deferemus Juſtitiam; we will defer or deny Juſtice to no man: to this the King is ſworn, and with this the Judges are entruſted by their Oaths. I admire what they can ſay for themſelves; if they have not read this Law, they are not fit to ſit upon the Bench; and if they have, I had almoſt ſaid, they deſerve to loſe their heads.

Mr. Speaker; The ſtate of this poor Nation is to be deplored, that in almoſt all ages, the Judges, who ought to be preſervers of the Laws have endeavour'd to deſtroy them; and that to pleaſe a Court-faction, they have by treachery attempted to break the bonds aſunder of Magna Charta, the great treaſury of our peace. It was no ſooner paſs'd, but a Chief-Juſtice (Hubert de Burg) in that day, perſuades the King he was not bound by it, becauſe he was under age, when it was paſs'd. But this ſort of inſolence the next Parliament reſented, to the ruin of the pernicious Chief-Juſtice. In the time of Richard II. an unthinking diſſolute Prince, there were Judges that did inſinuate into the King, that the Parliament were only his creatures, and depended on his will, and not on the fundamental conſtitutions of the Land; which treacherous advice proved the ruin of the King: and for which all thoſe evil Inſtruments were brought to Juſtice. In his late Majeſty's time, his misfortunes were occaſion'd chiefly by the corruptions of the long Robe; his Judges by an extrajudicial opinion gave the King power to raiſe money upon an extraordinary occaſion without Parliament, and made the King judge of ſuch occaſions: Charity prompts me to think they thought this a ſervice to the King, but the ſad conſequences of it may convince all mankind that every illegal act weakens the Royal Intereſt; and to endeavour to introduce abſolute Dominion in theſe Realms, is the worſt of Treaſons: becauſe whilſt it bears the face of friendſhip to the King, and deſigns to be for his ſervice, it never fails of the contrary effect.

The two great Pillars of the Government, are Parliaments and Juries; it is this gives us the title of freeborn Engliſhmen. For my notion of free Engliſhmen is this, that they are ruled by Laws of their own making, and tried by men of the ſame condition with themſelves. The two great and undoubted privileges of the people, have been lately invaded by the Judges that now ſit in Weſtminſter-hall; they have eſpouſed Proclamation againſt Law; they have diſcountenanced and oppoſed ſeveral legal Acts, that tended to the ſitting of this honourable Houſe, they have graſped the legiſlative Power into their own hands, as in that inſtance of Printing; the Parliament was] conſidering that matter, but they in the interim made their private opinion to be Law, to ſuperſede the judgment of this Houſe: They have diſcharged Grand Juries, on purpoſe to quell their preſentments, and ſhelter great Criminals from Juſtice; and when Juries have preſented their opinion for the ſitting of this Parliament, they have in diſdain thrown them at their feet, and told them they would be no meſſengers to carry ſuch Petitions; and yet in a few days after, have encourag'd all that would ſpit their venom againſt the Government: they have ſerv'd an ignorant and arbitrary faction, and been the meſſengers of abhorrences to the King.

Mr. Speaker; What we have now to do, is to load them with ſhame, who bid defiance to the Law; they are guilty of crimes againſt Nature, againſt the King, againſt their Knowledge, and againſt Poſterity. The whole frame of Nature doth loudly and daily petition to God their Creator; and Kings like God, may be addreſs'd to in like manner by petition, not command. They likewiſe knew it was lawful to petition; Ignorance can be no Plea, and their knowledge aggravates their crimes; the children unborn are bound to curſe ſuch proceedings, for 'twas not Petitioning, but Parliaments they abhorr'd. The Atheiſt pleads againſt a God, not that he disbelieves a Deity, but would have it ſo. Treſilian and Belknap were Judges too; their Learning gave them honour, but their Villanies made their exit by a Rope. The end of my motion therefore is, that we may addreſs warmly to our Prince againſt them; let us ſettle a Committee to enquire into their crimes, and not fail of doing Juſtice upon them that have perverted it; let us purge the Fountain, and the Streams will iſſue pure.

Then the Houſe agreed to the following Reſolutions.

Reſolved, That the diſcharging of a Grand-Jury by any Judge, before the end of the Term, Aſſizes, or Seſſions, while matters are under their conſideration, and not preſented, is arbitrary, illegal, deſtructive to publick Juſtice, a manifeſt violation of his Oath, and is a means to ſubvert the fundamental Laws of this Kingdom.

Reſolved, That a Committee be appointed to examine the Proceedings of the Judges in Weſtminſter-hall, and report the ſame, with their opinion therein to the Houſe.

Whereupon a Committee was appointed, and they ſat ſeveral days, and then made the following Report.

The Report of the Committee of the Houſe of Commons, appointed to examine the Proceedings of the Judges, &c. Thurſday, Dec. 23. 1680 *.

THIS Committee being inform'd, that in Trinity-Term laſt, the Court of King's-Bench diſcharg'd the Grand-Jury, that ſerv'd for the huncred of Oſſulſton, in the County of Middleſex, in a very unuſual manner; proceeded to enquire into the ſame, and found by the information of Charles Umfreville Eſq; Foreman of the ſaid Jury, Edward Proby, Henry Gerard, and John Smith, Gentlemen, alſo of the ſaid Jury, That on the 21*ſt* of June laſt, the Conſtables attending the ſaid Jury, were found defective, in not preſenting the Papiſts as they ought, and thereupon were ordered by the ſaid Jury to make further preſentments of them on the 26th following, on which day the Jury met for that purpoſe; when ſeveral Peers of this Realm, and other perſons of honour and quality, brought them a bill againſt James Duke of York, for not coming to Church: but ſome exceptions being taken to that bill, in that it did not ſet forth the ſaid Duke to be a Papiſt, ſome of the Jury attended the ſaid perſons of quality to receive ſatisfaction therein. In the mean time, and about an hour after they had received the ſaid bill, ſome of the Jury attended the Court of King's-Bench with a Petition, which they deſired the Court to preſent in their name unto his Majeſty for the ſitting of this Parliament. Upon which, the Lord Chief-Juſtice Scroggs raiſed many ſcruples, and on pretence that they were not all in Court (tho' twenty of the Jury had ſubſcrib'd the Petition) ſent for them, ſaying he would diſpatch them preſently. The Jury being come, and their names called over, they renewed their deſire that the Court would preſent their Petition: but the Chief-Juſtice ask'd, if they had any bills? they anſwered, they had, but the Clerks were drawing them into form. Upon which, the Chief-Juſtice ſaid, they would not make two works of one buſineſs. And the Petition being read, he ſaid this was no article of their charge, nor was there any Act of Parliament that required the Court to deliver the Grand-Jury's Petitions: That there was a Proclamation about them; and that it was not reaſonable the Court ſhould be obliged to run on their errands; and he thought it much, that they ſhould come with a Petition to alter the King's mind declared in the News-Book. The Jury ſaid, they did it not to impoſe on the Court, but (as other Juries had done) with all ſubmiſſion they deſired it: but the Court refuſed, bidding the Cryer return them their Petition. And Mr. Juſtice Jones told them, they had meddled with matters of State, not given them in charge, but preſented no bills of the matters given in charge. They anſwered as before, they had many before them, that would be ready in due time. Notwithſtanding which, the ſaid Juſtice Jones told them, they were diſcharged from further ſervice. But Philip Ward (the Clerk that attended the ſaid Jury) cried out, No, no, they have many bills before them; for which the Court underſtanding (as it ſeems to this Committee) a ſecret reaſon, which the Clerk did not, reproved

* This Report is printed in State-Trials, Vol. III. page 218. but without the Impeachment and Anſwer of the Lord Chief-Juſtice Scroggs, or the Debates in Parliament; ſo that to make this Proceeding complete, we have printed the Report here again, that Gentlemen may ſee the whole at one view.

reproved him, asking if he or they were to give the rule there? the Cryer then told the Court, they would not receive their Petition; the Chief-Juſtice bid him let it alone, ſo it was left there, and the Jury returned to the Court-houſe, and there found ſeveral Conſtables with preſentments of Papiſts and other offenders, as the Jury had directed them on the 21ſt before; but could not now receive the ſaid preſentments, being diſcharged. Whereby much buſineſs was obſtructed, tho' none of the ſaid Informants ever knew the ſaid Jury diſcharged before the laſt day of the Term, which was not till four days after. And it further appeareth to the Committee, by the evidences of Samuel Aſtry, Jaſper Waterhouſe, and Philip Ward, Clerks, that have long ſerved in the ſaid Court, that they were much ſurprized at the ſaid diſcharging of the Jury, in that it was never done in their memory before; and the rather, becauſe the ſaid Waterhouſe as Secondary, conſtantly enters on that Grand-Jury's paper; that the laſt day of the Term is given them to return their verdict on, as the laſt day but one is given to the other two Grand-Juries of that County, which entry is as followeth:

Trinit. 32 Car. II.

Being the laſt day of the Term, and ſo in all the other Terms the laſt day is given; which makes it appear to this Committee, that they were not in truth diſcharged for not having their preſentments ready, ſince the Court had given them a longer day, but only to obſtruct their further proceedings: and it appeareth by the evidence aforeſaid to this Committee, that the four Judges of that Court were preſent at the diſcharging of the ſaid Jury, and it did not appear that any of them did diſſent therein; upon conſideration whereof, the Committee came to this reſolution:

Reſolved, That it is the opinion of this Committee, that the diſcharging of the Grand-Jury of the hundred of Oſſulſton in the County of Middleſex, by the Court of King's-Bench, in Trinity-Term laſt, before the laſt day of the Term, and before they had finiſhed their preſentments, was illegal, arbitrary, and a high miſdeameanour.

This Committee proceeded alſo to enquire into a rule of the Court of King's-Bench, lately made againſt the publiſhing a Book called, The Weekly Packet of Advice from Rome; or, The Hiſtory of Popery: and Samuel Aſtry Gent. examined thereupon, inform'd this Committee, that the Author of the ſaid Book Henry Carr, had been informed againſt for the ſame, and had pleaded to the Information; but before it was tried, a rule was made on a motion, as he ſuppoſeth, againſt the ſaid Book: all the Judges of that Court (as he remembers) being preſent, and none diſſenting. The copy of which rule he gave into this Committee, and is as followeth:

Dies Mercurii proxime poſt tres Septimanas, ſancte Trinitatis. Anno 32 Car. 2. Regis.

Ordinatum eſt quod liber intitulat. The Weekly Packet of Advice from Rome, or, The Hiſtory of Popery, non ulterius Imprimatur vel publicetur per aliquam Perſonam quamcunq; Per. Cur.

And this Committee admiring that Proteſtant Judges ſhould take offence againſt a Book whoſe chief deſign was to expoſe the cheats and foppery of Popery; enquired further into it, and found by the evidence of Jane Curtis, that the ſaid Book had been licens'd for ſeveral months, that her husband paid for the copy, and enter'd it in the Hall-book of the company. But for all this, ſhe could not prevail by theſe reaſons, with the Lord Chief-Juſtice Scroggs, to permit it any longer; who ſaid, 'twas a ſcandalous Libel, and againſt the King's Proclamation, and he would ruin her if ever ſhe printed it any more. And ſoon after ſhe was ſerved with the ſaid rule, as the Author, and other Printers were; and by the Author's evidence it appears, that he was taken and brought before the ſaid Chief-Juſtice by his warrant above a year ſince, and upon his owning he writ part of that Book, the Chief-Juſtice called him rogue and other ill names; ſaying, he would fill all the Goals in England with ſuch rogues, and pile them up as men do faggots; and ſo committed him to priſon, refuſing ſufficient bail, and ſaying he would goal him, to put him to charges; and his Lordſhip obſerved his word punctually therein, forcing him to his Habeas Corpus, and then taking the ſame bail he refuſed before. Upon which, this Committee came to this reſolution.

Reſolved, That it is the opinion of the Committee, that the rule made by the Court of King's-Bench, in Trinity-Term laſt, againſt printing a Book called, The Weekly Packet of Advice from Rome, is illegal and arbitrary.

And the Committee proceeded further, and upon Information that a very great latitude had been taken of late by the Judges, in impoſing fines on the perſons found guilty before them, cauſed a tranſcript of all the fines impoſed by the King's-Bench ſince Eaſter-Term, in the 28th of his Majeſty's Reign, to be brought before them, from the ſaid Court, by Samuel Aſtry Gent. By peruſal of which, it appear'd to this Committee, that the quality of the offence, and the ability of the perſon found guilty, have not been the meaſures that have determined the quantity of many of theſe fines; which being ſo very numerous, the Committee refer themſelves to thoſe Records as to the general, inſtancing in ſome particulars, as follow.

Upon Joſeph Brown of London, Gent. on an Information for publiſhing a printed Book called, The long Parliament diſſolved; in which is ſet forth theſe words: Nor let any man think it ſtrange, that we account it Treaſon for you to ſit and act contrary to our Laws; for if in the firſt Parliament of Richard II. Grimes and Weſton for lack of courage only were adjudged guilty of High-Treaſon for ſurrendring the places committed to their truſt; how much more you, if you turn Renegadoes to the people that intruſted you, and as much as in you lie ſurrender not a little pitiful Caſtle or two, but all the legal defence the people of England have for their lives, liberties and properties at once! Neither let the vain perſuaſion delude you, that no precedent can be found, that one Engliſh Parliament hath hang'd up another; though peradventure even that may be proved a miſtake: for an unprecedented crime calls for an unprecedented puniſhment; and if you ſhall be ſo wicked to do the one, or rather endeavour to do, (for now you are no longer a Parliament) what ground of confidence you can have that none will be found ſo worthy to do the other, we cannot underſtand: and do faithfully Trinit. 29 Car. 2.

promiſe, if your unworthineſs provoke us to it, that we will uſe our honeſt and utmoſt endeavours (whenever a new Parliament ſhall be called) to chuſe ſuch as may convince you of your miſtake: The old and infallible obſervation, That Parliaments are the pulſe of the People, ſhall loſe its eſteem; or you will find, that this your preſumption was over-fond; however, it argues but a bad mind to ſin, becauſe it's believed it ſhall not be puniſhed. The Judgment was, that he be fined 1000 marks, be bound to the good behaviour for ſeven years, and his Name ſtruck out of the Roll of the Attorneys, without any offence alledged in his ſaid vocation. And the publiſhing this Libel conſiſted only in ſuperſcribing a Pacquet, with this incloſed, to the Eaſt-Indies. Which Fine he not being able to pay, (living only upon his practice) he lay in priſon for three years, till his Majeſty graciouſly pardoned him, and recommended him to be reſtored to his Place again of Attorney, by his warrant dated the 15th of Dec. 1679. Notwithſtanding which, he has not yet obtained the ſaid reſtoration from the Court of King's Bench.

Hill. 29 & 30 Car. 2. Upon John Harrington of London, Gent. for ſpeaking theſe words, laid in Latin thus: Quod noſtra Gubernatio de tribus ſtatibus conſiſtibat, & ſi Rebellio eveniret in Regno, & non accideret contra omnes tres ſtatus, non eſt Rebellio. A Fine of 1000 l. ſureties for the good behaviour for ſeven years, and to recant the words in open Court; which Fine he was in no capacity of ever paying.

Hill. 31 & 32 Car. 2. Upon Benjamin Harris of London, Stationer, on an information for printing a Book, called, An Appeal from the Country to the City, ſetting forth theſe words: We in the Country have done our parts, in chuſing for the generality good Members to ſerve in Parliament: but if (as our two laſt Parliaments were) they muſt be diſſolved or prorogued whenever they come to redreſs the grievances of the ſubject, we may be pitied, not blamed, if the Plot takes effect; and in all probability it will. Our Parliaments are not then to be condemned, for that their not being ſuffered to ſit, occaſioned it. Judgment to pay 500 l. Fine, ſtand on the Pillory an hour, and give ſureties for good behaviour for three years. And the ſaid Benjamin Harris informed this Committee, That the Lord Chief-Juſtice Scroggs preſt the Court then to add to this Judgment, his being publickly whipt; but Mr. Juſtice Pemberton holding up his hands in admiration at their ſeverity therein, Mr. Juſtice Jones pronounced the Judgment aforeſaid; and he remains yet in priſon, unable to pay the ſaid Fine.

Notwithſtanding which ſeverity in the caſes forementioned, this Committee has obſerved the ſaid Court has not wanted in any other caſes an extraordinary compaſſion and mercy, though there appeared no publick reaſon judicially in the Trial; as in particular:

Hill. 31 & 32 Car. 2. Upon Thomas Knox principal, on an Indictment of Subornation and Conſpiracy, againſt the Teſtimony and Life of Dr. Oates, for Sodomy; and alſo againſt the Teſtimony of William Bedloe; a Fine of 200 marks, a year's impriſonment, and to find ſureties for the good behaviour for three years.

Eod. Ter. Upon John Lane, for the ſame offence, a Fine of 100 marks, to ſtand in the Pillory for an hour, and to be impriſoned for one year.

Upon John Tasborough Gent. on an Indictment for Subornation of Stephen Dugdale, tending to overthrow the whole diſcovery of the Plot: The ſaid Tasborough being affirmed to be a perſon of good quality, a Fine of 100 l. Par. 32 Car. 2.

Upon Anne Price, for the ſame offence, 200 l. Eod. Ter.

Upon Nathaniel Thompſon and William Badcock, on an Information for printing and publiſhing a weekly Libel, called The true Domeſtick Intelligence, or, News both from City and Country, and known to be popiſhly affected, a Fine of 3 l. 6 s. 8 d. on each of them. Trin. 32 Car. 2.

Upon Matthew Turner, Stationer, on an information for vending and publiſhing a Book, called The Compendium; wherein the juſtice of the Nation in the late Trials of the popiſh Conſpirators, even by ſome of theſe Judges themſelves, is highly arraign'd; and all the witneſſes for the King horribly aſpers'd: And this being the common notorious popiſh bookſeller of the Town, Judgment to pay a Fine of 100 marks, and is ſaid to be out of priſon already. Eod. Ter.

Upon ——Loveland, on an Indictment for a notorious Conſpiracy and Subornation againſt the Life and Honour of the Duke of Buckingham, for Sodomy, a Fine of 5 l. and to ſtand an hour in the Pillory. Trin. 32 Car. 2.

Upon Edward Chriſtian, Eſq; for the ſame offence; a Fine of 100 marks, and to ſtand an hour in the Pillory. And upon Arthur Obrian, for the ſame offence; a Fine of 20 marks, and to ſtand an hour in the Pillory. Mich. 32 Car. 2.

Upon conſideration whereof, this Committee came to this Reſolution:

Reſolved, That it is the opinion of this Committee, that the Court of King's Bench, (in the impoſition of Fines on Offenders of late years) hath acted arbitrarily, illegally and partially, favouring Papiſts, and Perſons popiſhly affected, and exceſſively oppreſſing his Majeſty's proteſtant ſubjects.

And this Committee being informed, That ſeveral of his Majeſty's ſubjects had been committed for crimes bailable by Law, although they then tendered ſufficient ſureties, which were refuſed, only to put them to vexation and charge; proceeded to enquire into the ſame, and found that not only the forementioned Henry Carr, had been ſo refuſed the common Right of a ſubject, as is aboveſaid; but that George Broome, being a Conſtable laſt year in London, and committing ſome of the Lord Chief Juſtice Scroggs's ſervants, for great diſorders, according to his duty, he was in few days arreſted by a Tipſtaff, without any London Conſtable, and carried before the ſaid Chief Juſtice, by his warrant, to anſwer for the committing of thoſe perſons aboveſaid; but being there, was accuſed of having ſpoken irreverently of the ſaid Chief Juſtice, and an affidavit read to him to that purpoſe; and was falſly, (as the ſaid George Broome affirms) ſworn againſt, by two perſons that uſe to be common bail in that Court, and of very ill reputation. Upon which, he was committed to the King's Bench, though he then tendred two able citizens and common-council-men of London to be his bail: And he was forc'd to bring his Habeas Corpus, to his great charge, before he came out; when the Marſhal, Mr. Cooling, exacted 5 l. of him, of which he complained to the Chief Juſtice, but had no other anſwer, but he might take his remedy at law. But the ſaid Marſhal fearing he ſhould be queſtioned, reſtored him two Guineas of it.

And further this Committee was informed, by Francis Smith, bookſeller, That about Michaelmas was twelve-month he was brought before the ſaid Chief Juſtice, by his warrant, and charged by the meſſenger Robert Stephens, That he had ſeen ſome parcels of a Pamphlet, called, Obſervations on Sir George Wakeman's Trial, in his Shop: Upon which the Chief Juſtice told him, he would make him an example, uſe him like a boor in France, and pile him and all the bookſellers and printers up in priſon, like faggots: and ſo committed him to the King's Bench, ſwearing and curſing at him in great fury. And when he tendred three ſufficient citizens of London for his bail, alledging, impriſonment in his circumſtances would be his utter ruin; the Chief Juſtice replied, the citizens looked like ſufficient perſons, but he would take no bail: And ſo he was forced to come out by a Habeas Corpus, and was afterwards informed againſt for the ſame matter, to his great charge and vexation. And a while after Francis, (the Son of the ſaid Francis Smith) was committed by the ſaid Chief Juſtice, and bail refuſed, for ſelling a Pamphlet called, A New Year's Gift for the ſaid Chief Juſtice, to a coffee-houſe; and he declared to them he would take no bail, for he would ruin them all.

And further it appeared to this Committee, that the ſaid Chief Juſtice, (about October was twelvemonth) committed in like manner Jane Curtis, ſhe having a husband and children, for ſelling a book called, A Satyr againſt Injuſtice; which his Lordſhip called a Libel againſt him: And her friends tendering ſufficient bail, and deſiring him to have mercy upon her poverty and condition, he ſwore by the name of God ſhe ſhould go to priſon; and he would ſhew no more mercy than they could expect from a wolf that came to devour them; and ſhe might bring her Habeas Corpus and come out ſo; which ſhe was forced to do, and after informed againſt and proſecuted, to her utter ruin, four or five Terms after.

In like manner it appeared to this Committee, that about that time alſo, Edward Berry, Stationer of Grays-Inn, was committed by the ſaid Chief Juſtice, being accuſed of ſelling The Obſervations on Sir George Wakeman's Trial; and though he tendered 1000 l. bail, yet the Chief Juſtice ſaid, he would take no bail, he ſhould go to priſon, and come out according to Law. And after he with much trouble and charge got out by a Habeas Corpus, he was forced by himſelf, or his Attorney, to attend five Terms before he could be diſcharged, though no information was exhibited againſt him in all that time. In conſideration whereof, and of others of the like nature, (too tedious here to relate) this Committee came to this Reſolution;

Reſolved, That it is the opinion of this Committee, That the refuſing ſufficient bail in theſe caſes, wherein the perſons committed were bailable by law, was illegal; and a high breach of the liberty of the ſubject.

And this committee being informed of an extraordinary kind of a charge, given at the laſt Aſſizes at Kingſton, in the County of Surrey, by Mr. Baron Weſton, and proceeding to examine ſeveral perſons then and there preſent; it was made appear to this committee, by the teſtimony of John Cole, Richard Mayo, and John Pieroe, Gentlemen, and others; ſome of whom put down the ſaid Baron's words in writing, immediately; that part of the ſaid charge was to this effect: He inveighed very much againſt Farel, Luther, Calvin, and Zuinglius, condemning them as authors of the Reformation, which was againſt their Princes minds: and then adding to this purpoſe; "Zuinglius ſet up "his fanaticiſm, and Calvin built on that bleſſed "foundation; and to ſpeak truth, all his diſciples "are ſeaſoned with ſuch a ſharpneſs of ſpirit, that "it much concerns Magiſtrates to keep a ſtrait "hand over them; and now they are reſtleſs, "amuſing us with fears, and nothing will ſerve "them but a Parliament. For my part, I know "no repreſentative of the Nation but the King, all "power centers in him: 'Tis true, he does in-"truſt it with his Miniſters, but he is the ſole Re-"preſentative; and I'faith, he has wiſdom enough "to intruſt it no more in theſe men, who have gi-"ven us ſuch late examples of their wiſdom and "faithfulneſs." And this committee taking the ſaid matter into their conſideration, came to this Reſolution;

Reſolved, That it is the opinion of this committee, that the ſaid expreſſions in the charge given by the ſaid Baron Weſton, were a ſcandal to the Reformation, in derogation of the rights and privileges of Parliaments, and tending to raiſe diſcord between his Majeſty and his ſubjects.

And this committee being informed by ſeveral Printers and Bookſellers, of great trouble and vexation given them unjuſtly, by one Robert Stephens, called a meſſenger of the Preſs; the ſaid Stephens being examined by this committee, by what authority he had proceeded in that manner, produced two warrants under the hand and ſeal of the Chief Juſtice Scroggs, which were in hæc verba.

Angl. ff. WHEREAS there are divers ill-diſpoſed perſons, who do daily print and publiſh many ſeditious and treaſonable Books and Pamphlets, endeavouring thereby to diſpoſe the minds of his Majeſty's ſubjects to ſedition and rebellion: And alſo infamous Libels, reflecting upon particular perſons, to the great ſcandal of his Majeſty's Government. For ſuppreſſing whereof, his Majeſty hath lately iſſued out his royal Proclamation: And for the more ſpeedy ſuppreſſing the ſaid ſeditious Books, Libels and Pamphlets, and to the end that the Authors and Publiſhers thereof may be brought to their puniſhment:

Theſe are to will and require you, and in his Majeſty's name to charge, and command you, and every of you, upon ſight hereof, to be aiding and aſſiſting to Robert Stephens, meſſenger of the Preſs, in the ſeizing on all ſuch Books and Pamphlets as aforeſaid, as he ſhall be informed of, in any Bookſellers or Printers Shops or Warehouſes, or elſewhere, whatſoever; to the end they may be diſpoſed as to Law ſhall appertain. Alſo if you ſhall be informed of the Authors, Printers or Publiſhers of ſuch Books or Pamphlets as are above mentioned, you are to apprehend them, and have them before one of his Majeſty's Juſtices of the Peace, to be pro-

To Robert Stephens, meſſenger of the Preſs; and to all Mayors, Sheriffs, Bailiffs, Conſtables, and all other Officers and Miniſters whom theſe may concern.

W. SCROGGS.

Angl. ff. WHEREAS the King's Majeſty hath lately iſſued out his Proclamation for ſuppreſſing the Printing and Publiſhing unlicenſed News-Books, and Pamphlets of News: Notwithſtanding which, there are divers perſons who do daily print and publiſh ſuch unlicenſed Books and Pamphlets:

Theſe are therefore to will and require you, and in his Majeſty's Name to charge and command you, and every of you, from time to time, and at all times, ſo often as you ſhall be thereunto required, to be aiding and aſſiſting to Robert Stephens, meſſenger of the Preſs, in the ſeizing of all ſuch Books and Pamphlets as aforeſaid, as he ſhall be informed of, in any Book-ſeller's Shop, or Printer's Shop or Ware-houſes, or elſewhere whatſoever, to the end they may be diſpoſed of as to Law ſhall appertain. Likewiſe, if you ſhall be informed of the Authors, Printers or Publiſhers of ſuch Books and Pamphlets, you are to apprehend them, and have them before Me or one of His Majeſty's Juſtices of the Peace, to be proceeded againſt as to Law ſhall appertain. Dated this 28th Day of May, Anno Dom. 1680.

To all Mayors, Sheriffs, Bailiffs, Conſtables, and all other Officers and Miniſters whom theſe may concern.

W. SCROGGS.

To Robert Stephens, meſſenger of the Preſs.

Upon view whereof, this committee came to this Reſolution;

Reſolved, That it is the Opinion of this committee, that the ſaid warrants are arbitrary and illegal.

And this committee being informed of certain ſcandalous diſcourſes, ſaid to be uttered in publick places by the Lord Chief Juſtice Scroggs, proceeded to examine Sir Robert Atkins, late one of the Juſtices of the Common-Pleas, concerning the ſame; by whom it appears, That at a Seſſions-dinner at the Old Bailey, in the Mayoralty of Sir Robert Clayton, who was then preſent; the ſaid Chief Juſtice took occaſion to ſpeak very much againſt petitioning, condemning it as reſembling 41, as factious and tending to rebellion, or to that effect; to which the ſaid Sir Robert Atkyns made no reply, ſuſpecting he waited for ſome advantage over him. But the Chief Juſtice continuing and preſſing him with the ſaid diſcourſe, he began to juſtify petitioning as the right of the people; eſpecially for the ſitting of a Parliament, which the Law requires, if it be done with modeſty and reſpect. Upon which the Chief Juſtice fell into a great paſſion; and there is ſome reaſon to believe, that ſoon after he made an ill repreſentation of what the ſaid Sir Robert had then ſpoke, unto his Majeſty. And this committee was further informed, that the ſaid Sir Robert Atkins being in circuit with the ſaid Chief Juſtice, at Summer Aſſizes was twelve-month, at Monmouth, (Mr. Arnold, Mr. Price, and Mr. Bedloe being then in company) the Chief Juſtice fell ſeverely, in publick, upon Mr. Bedloe; taking off the credit of his evidence, and alledging he had over-ſhot himſelf in it, or to that effect; very much to the diſparagement of his teſtimony. And the ſaid Sir Robert defending Mr. Bedloe's evidence and credit, he grew extream angry and loud; ſaying to this effect, That he verily believed Langhorn died innocently. To which the ſaid Sir Robert replied, He wondered how he could think ſo, who had condemned him himſelf, and had not moved the King for a reprieve for him. All which matters of diſcourſe, this committee humbly ſubmit to the wiſdom and conſideration of this houſe, without taking upon them to give any Opinion therein.

And this committee proceeded further to inquire into ſome paſſages that happened at Lent Aſſizes laſt for the County of Somerſet, at the trial of Thomas Dare, Gent. there, upon an Indictment for ſaying falſly and ſeditiouſly, That the Subjects had but two means to redreſs their grievances, one by petitioning, the other by rebellion: And found, that though by his other diſcourſe, when he ſaid ſo, that it appeared plainly he had no rebellious intent, in that he ſaid, Then God forbid there ſhould be a rebellion, he would be the firſt man to draw his ſword againſt a Rebel; yet he was proſecuted with great violence: And having pleaded, Not guilty, he moved Mr. Juſtice Jones, (who then ſat Judge there) that he might try it at the next Aſſizes; for that Mr. Searle, (who was by at the ſpeaking of the words, and a material witneſs for his defence) was not then to be had, and an affidavit to that purpoſe was made and received. But the ſaid Juſtice Jones told him, That was a favour of the Court only, and he had not deſerved any favour, and ſo forced him to try it preſently. But the Jury, appearing to be an extraordinary one, provided on purpoſe, being all of perſons that had highly oppoſed petitioning for the ſitting of this Parliament, he was adviſed to withdraw his Plea; and the ſaid Juſtice Jones encouraging him ſo to do, he confeſt the words, denying any evil intention, and gave the ſaid Juſtice an account in writing, of the truth of the whole matter, and made a ſubmiſſion in Court, as he was directed by the ſaid Juſtice, who promiſed to recommend him to his Majeſty; but impoſed a fine of 500 l. on him, and to be bound to good behaviour for three years: Declaring alſo, That he was turned out from being a Common-Counſellor of the Corporation of Taunton, in the ſaid County, on pretence of a clauſe in their Charter, giving ſuch a power to a Judge of Aſſize. And the ſaid Thomas Dare remains yet in priſon for the ſaid Fine; in which matter of the trial aforeſaid, this committee deſireth to refer itſelf to the judgment of this Houſe.

The Reſolutions of the Houſe of Commons upon the ſaid Report.

1. That it is the Opinion of this Houſe, that the diſcharging of the Grand Jury of the Hundred of Oſſualſton, in the County of Middleſex, by the Court of King's Bench, in Trinity Term laſt, before the laſt day of the Term; and before they had finiſhed their Preſentments, was arbitrary and illegal, deſtructive to publick Juſtice, a manifeſt violation of the oaths of the Judges of that Court, and a means to ſubvert the fundamental Laws of this Kingdom, and to introduce Popery.

ma

2. That it is the Opinion of this Houſe, that the rule made by the Court of King's Bench in Trinity Term laſt, againſt printing of a Book, called, The Weekly Pacquet of Advice from Rome, is illegal and arbitrary; thereby uſurping to themſelves legiſlative power, to the great diſcouragement of the Proteſtants, and for the countenancing of Popery.

3. That it is the Opinion of this Houſe, that the Court of King's Bench, in the impoſition of fines on offenders, of late years, have acted arbitrarily, illegally and partially, favouring Papiſts, and perſons popiſhly affected, and exceſſively oppreſſing his Majeſty's Proteſtant ſubjects.

4. That it is the Opinion of this Houſe, that the refuſing ſufficient bail in theſe caſes, wherein the perſons committed were bailable by law, was illegal, and a high breach of the liberties of the ſubject.

5. That it is the Opinion of this Houſe, that the ſaid expreſſions in the charge given by the ſaid Baron Weſton, were a ſcandal to the Reformation; and tending to raiſe diſcord between his Majeſty and his ſubjects, and to the ſubverſion of the ancient conſtitution of Parliaments, and of the Government of this Kingdom.

6. That it is the Opinion of this Houſe, that the ſaid warrants are arbitrary and illegal.

The Reſolutions of the Commons, for the impeachment of the ſaid Judges.

Reſolved, That Sir William Scroggs, Knt. Chief Juſtice of the Court of King's Bench, be impeached upon the ſaid report, and the reſolutions of the Houſe thereupon.

Reſolved, That Sir Thomas Jones, one of the Juſtices of the ſaid Court of King's Bench, be impeached upon the ſaid report, and reſolutions of the Houſe thereupon.

Reſolved, That Sir Richard Weſton, one of the Barons of the Court of Exchequer, be impeached upon the ſaid report, and reſolutions of the Houſe thereupon.

Ordered, That the Committee appointed to prepare an impeachment againſt Sir Francis North, Chief Juſtice of the Court of Common-Pleas, do prepare impeachments againſt the ſaid Sir William Scroggs, Sir Thomas Jones, and Sir Richard Weſton, upon the ſaid report and reſolutions.

Ordered, That the ſaid report, and ſeveral reſolutions of this Houſe thereupon, be printed; and that Mr. Speaker take care in the printing thereof, a-part from this day's other Votes.

January 5, 1682. The Articles againſt Sir William Scroggs, Chief Juſtice of the King's Bench, were read, as follow:

Articles of Impeachment of High Treaſon, and other great Crimes and Miſdemeanours, againſt Sir William Scroggs, Chief Juſtice of the Court of King's Bench, by the Commons in Parliament aſſembled, in their own Name, and in the Name of all the Commons of England.

1. THat he the ſaid Sir William Scroggs, then being Chief Juſtice of the Court of King's Bench, hath traitorouſly and wickedly endeavoured to ſubvert the fundamental Laws, and the eſtabliſhed Religion and Government of this Kingdom of England; and in ſtead thereof, to introduce Popery, and an arbitrary and tyrannical Government, againſt Law; which he has declared by divers traitorous and wicked Words, Opinions, Judgments, Practices and Actions.

2. That the ſaid Sir William Scroggs, in Trinity Term laſt, being then Chief Juſtice of the ſaid Court, and having taken an oath duly to adminiſter Juſtice, according to the Laws and Statutes of this Realm; in purſuance of his ſaid traitorous purpoſes, did, together with the reſt of the ſaid Juſtices of the ſame Court, ſeveral days before the end of the ſaid Term, in an arbitrary manner diſcharge the Grand Jury, which then ſerved for the Hundred of Oſſulſton, in the County of Middleſex, before they had made their Preſentments, or had found ſeveral Bills of Indictment which were then before them; whereof the ſaid Sir William Scroggs was then fully informed: and that the ſame would be tendered to the Court upon the laſt day of the ſaid Term; which day then was, and by the known courſe of the ſaid Court, hath always heretofore been given unto the ſaid Jury for the delivering in of their Bills and Preſentments: By which ſudden and illegal diſcharge of the ſaid Jury, the courſe of Juſtice was ſtopped maliciouſly and deſignedly, the Preſentments of many Papiſts and other offenders were obſtructed, and in particular, a Bill of Indictment againſt James Duke of York, for abſenting himſelf from Church, which was then before them, was prevented from being proceeded upon.

3. That whereas one Henry Carr had, for ſome time before, publiſhed every week a certain Book, intitled, The weekly Pacquet of Advice from Rome, or the Hiſtory of Popery; wherein the ſuperſtitions and cheats of the Church of Rome were from time to time expoſed; he the ſaid Sir William Scroggs, then Chief Juſtice of the Court of King's Bench, together with the other Judges of the ſaid Court, before any legal conviction of the ſaid Carr of any crime, did in the ſame Trinity Term, in a moſt illegal and arbitrary manner, make, and cauſe to be entred, a certain rule of that Court, againſt the printing of the ſaid Book, in hæc Verba.

Dies Mercurii proxime poſt tres Septimanas Sanctæ Trinitatis, Anno 32 Car. 2. Regis.

ORdinatum eſt quod Liber intitulat' The weekly Pacquet of Advice from Rome, or, The Hiſtory of Popery, Non ulterius imprimatur vel publicetur per aliquem perſonam quemcunque.

Per Cur'

And did cauſe the ſaid Carr, and divers Printers and other perſons to be ſerved with the ſame; which ſaid Rule and other Proceedings were moſt apparently contrary to all Juſtice, in condemning, not only what had been written without hearing the Parties, but alſo all that might for the future be written on that ſubject; a manifeſt countenancing of Popery and diſcouragement of Proteſtants, an open invaſion upon the right of the ſubject, and an encroaching and aſſuming to themſelves a legiſlative power and authority.

4. That he the ſaid Sir William Scroggs, ſince he was made Chief Juſtice of the King's Bench, hath, together with the other Judges of the ſaid Court, moſt notoriouſly departed from all rules of juſtice and equality, in the impoſition of fines upon perſons ſons convicted of miſdemeanours in the ſaid Court; and particularly in the Term of Eaſter laſt paſt, did openly declare in the ſaid Court, in the caſe of one Jeſſop, who was convicted of publiſhing falſe News, and was then to be fined, That he would have regard to perſons and their principles in impoſing of fines, and would ſet a fine of 500 l. on one perſon for the ſame offence, for the which he would not fine another 100 l. And according to his ſaid unjuſt and arbitrary declaration, he the ſaid Sir William Scroggs, together with the ſaid other Juſtices, did then impoſe a fine of 100 l. upon the ſaid Jeſſop; although the ſaid Jeſſop had before that time proved one Hewit to be convicted as Author of the ſaid falſe News. And afterwards in the ſame Term, did fine the ſaid Hewit upon his ſaid conviction, only five marks. Nor hath the ſaid Sir William Scroggs, together with the other Judges of the ſaid Court, had any regard to the nature of the offences or the ability of the perſons, in the impoſing of fines; but have been manifeſtly partial and favourable to Papiſts, and perſons affected to, and promoting the popiſh Intereſt, in this time of imminent danger from them: And at the ſame time have moſt ſeverely and grievouſly oppreſſed his Majeſty's proteſtant ſubjects, as will appear upon view of the ſeveral Records of fines ſet in the ſaid Court. By which arbitrary, unjuſt, and partial proceedings, many of his Majeſty's liege people have been ruined, and Popery countenanced under colour of juſtice; and all the miſchiefs and exceſſes of the Court of Star-Chamber, by Act of Parliament ſuppreſſed, have been again, in direct oppoſition to the ſaid Law, introduced.

5. That he the ſaid Sir William Scroggs, for the further accompliſhing of his ſaid traitorous and wicked purpoſes, and deſigning to ſubject the Perſons as well as the Eſtates of his Majeſty's liege people, to his lawleſs will and pleaſure, hath frequently refuſed to accept of bail, though the ſame were ſufficient, and legally tendered to him by many perſons accuſed before him only of ſuch crimes for which by law bail ought to have been taken, and divers of the ſaid perſons being only accuſed of offences againſt himſelf; declaring at the ſame time, that he refuſed bail, and committed them to goal only to put them to charges; and uſing ſuch furious threats as were to the terrour of his Majeſty's ſubjects, and ſuch ſcandalous expreſſions as were a diſhonour to the Government, and to the dignity of his office. And particularly, that he the ſaid Sir William Scroggs did, in the year 1679, commit and detain in priſon, in ſuch unlawful manner, among others, Henry Carr, George Broome, Edward Berry, Benjamin Harris, Francis Smith, ſen. Francis Smith, jun. and Jane Curtis, citizens of London: Which proceedings of the ſaid Sir William Scroggs, are a high breach of the liberty of the ſubject, deſtructive to the fundamental laws of this Realm, contrary to the Petition of Right, and other Statutes; and do manifeſtly tend to the introducing of arbitraay power.

6. That he the ſaid Sir William Scroggs, in further oppreſſion of his Majeſty's liege people, hath, ſince his being made Chief-Juſtice of the ſaid Court of King's Bench, in an arbitrary manner, granted divers general warrants for attaching the perſons and ſeizing the goods of his Majeſty's ſubjects, not named or deſcribed particularly in the ſaid warrants: By means whereof, many of his Majeſty's ſubjects have been vexed, their houſes entered into, and they themſelves grievouſly oppreſſed, contrary to Law.

7. Whereas there hath been a horrid and damnable Plot contrived and carried on by the Papiſts, for the murthering the King, the ſubverſion of the Laws and Government of this Kingdom, and for the deſtruction of the proteſtant religion in the ſame; all which the ſaid Sir William Scroggs well knew, having himſelf not only tried, but given judgment againſt ſeveral of the offenders: Nevertheleſs, the ſaid Sir William Scroggs did, at divers times and places, as well ſitting in Court, as otherwiſe, openly defame and ſcandalize ſeveral of the witneſſes, who had proved the ſaid treaſons againſt divers of the conſpirators, and had given evidence againſt divers other perſons, who were then untried, and did endeavour to diſparage their evidence, and take off their credit. Whereby, as much as in him lay, he did traitorouſly and wickedly ſuppreſs and ſtifle the diſcovery of the ſaid popiſh Plot, and encourage the conſpirators to proceed in the ſame, to the great and apparent danger of his Majeſty's ſacred life, and of the well-eſtabliſhed Government, and Religion of this Realm of England.

8. Whereas the ſaid Sir William Scroggs, being advanced to be Chief-Juſtice of the Court of King's Bench, ought by a ſober, grave, and vertuous converſation, to have given a good example to the King's liege-people, and to demean himſelf anſwerable to the dignity of ſo eminent a Station; yet he the ſaid Sir William Scroggs, on the contrary, by his frequent and notorious Exceſſes and Debaucheries, and his prophane and atheiſtical Diſcourſes, doth daily affront Almighty God, diſhonour his Majeſty, give countenance and encouragement to all manner of vice and wickedneſs, and bring the higheſt ſcandal on the public Juſtice of the Kingdom.

All which Words, Opinions and Actions of the ſaid Sir William Scroggs, were by him ſpoken and done, traitorouſly, wickedly, falſly and maliciouſly, to alienate the hearts of the King's ſubjects from his Majeſty, and to ſet a diviſion between him and them; and to ſubvert the fundamental Laws, and the eſtabliſhed Religion and Government of this Kingdom, and to introduce Popery, and an arbitrary and tyrannical Government, contrary to his own knowledge, and the known Laws of the Realm of England. And thereby he the ſaid Sir William Scroggs hath not only broken his own oath, but alſo, as far as in him lay, hath broken the King's oath to his people; whereof he the ſaid Sir William Scroggs repreſenting his Majeſty in ſo high an Office of Juſtice, had the cuſtody: for which the ſaid Commons do impeach him the ſaid Sir William Scroggs, of the high Treaſon againſt our ſovereign Lord the King, and his Crown and Dignity, and other the high crimes and miſdemeanours aforeſaid.

And the ſaid Commons, by proteſtation ſaving to themſelves the liberty of exhibiting at any time hereafter, any other accuſation or impeachment againſt the ſaid Sir William Scroggs, and alſo of replying to the anſwer that he ſhall make thereunto, and of offering proofs of the premiſſes, or of any other impeachments or accuſations that ſhall be by them exhibited againſt him, as the caſe ſhall (according to the courſe of Parliament) require; do pray that the ſaid Sir William Scroggs, Chief-Juſtice of the Court of King's Bench, may be put to anſwer to all and every the premiſſes, and may be com-committed to ſafe cuſtody; and that ſuch proceedings, examinations, trials, and judgments may be upon him had and uſed, as is agreeable to Law and Juſtice, and the courſe of Parliaments.

Reſolved, That the ſaid Sir William Scroggs be impeached upon the ſaid Articles.

Upon which the following Speeches were made.

Sir Thomas Lee.

Mr. Speaker; Sir, in my opinion the matter contained in the laſt ſeven Articles, doth not anſwer the firſt Article nor the Title; for therein you accuſe Sir William Scroggs in general words, of high Treaſon, the higheſt of crimes; and when you come to particulars, you inſtance the diſmiſſing of Grand Juries, prohibiting the printing of Pamphlets, inequality in levying of fines, and the like. Sir, I would not be underſtood to be an Advocate for the Lord Chief Juſtice Scroggs; but I hope that as long as I ſit here, you will always give me leave to be an Advocate for this Houſe: which I cannot more ſignally demonſtrate, than by offering my opinion againſt every thing which I think will reflect upon the Juſtice or Prudence of the Houſe, or prove any hindrance to the finiſhing of thoſe great Affairs you have under debate.

Sir, I am of opinion, that though all theſe things contained in theſe Articles ſhould be fully proved, they will not amount to treaſon; and although it be true that you do but impeach, and that the Lords are to judge, yet it is not agreeable to the Juſtice of this Houſe, that the Articles ſhould be for Treaſon, unleſs you are well ſatisfied that you can make out that the matter contained in the Articles is ſo: which I very much doubt. And therefore I am of opinion, that the Articles ought only to be for high crimes and miſdemeanours; which I am the more forward to preſs you earneſtly to, becauſe I am afraid if theſe Articles ſhould go for high Treaſon, it may occaſion ſome diſpute with the Lords, who happily, if they do not conclude that the matter contained in the Articles amounts to treaſon, will not commit him, notwithſtanding their Order made in the Earl of Danby's caſe: And that may occaſion ſuch miſ-underſtandings as may hinder all other buſineſs. And alſo if you ſend it up for high treaſon, it may occaſion another diſpute with the Biſhops, whether they ſhall withdraw or no, when the Caſe comes to be tried. Upon the whole matter, I think it will be much ſafer that you make the Impeachment for high crimes and miſdemeanours only.

Mr. Daniel Finch, (afterwards Earl of Nottingham.)

Mr. Speaker; Sir, my obligation to ſerve my Country, calls on me to give you my opinion in this matter, and not any kindneſs to my Lord Chief-Juſtice; for I can ſafely declare, that I do not think him fit for that eminent place now, becauſe indeed I never thought he was fit: So that what I ſhall ſay, proceeds from my kindneſs to the Publick, and particular obligations to this Houſe. I think we ought to be cautious how we increaſe Laws to take away our lives; our fore-fathers were very careful in it, as may appear by the Statute of 25 Ed. 3. which was made to prevent the Judges from taking on them any power to declare any thing treaſon but what was expreſs'd within that Statute; reſerving all obvious crimes of that nature to the judgment of the Nation in Parliament, who no doubt may declare other things treaſon which are not within that Statute. But it is a queſtion with me, whether it can be done any other way than by Bill, that ſo it may be an Act of King, Lords and Commons; and not for the houſe of Lords only, the Commons only proſecutors, and the King not concerned. That the Lords alone are proper Judges in many caſes, when perſons are proſecuted upon ſome known Law, is not to be doubted: But I much queſtion if they ought to be ſo in caſes of declarative Treaſon, though upon an Impeachment from the Houſe of Commons: For that were to allow all the Lords alone a power of making a Law in the caſes of the higheſt nature, even of life and death. Sir, our forefathers thought not good to intruſt their lives nor liberties with any one Eſtate alone, they thought with a multitude of Counſellors there was moſt ſafety: And therefore I hope we ſhall be very cautious how we make a precedent in the caſe. And I am the more earneſt in moving you herein, becauſe I am very confident that no precedent can be offered to make good, that there was ever any thing declared treaſon in Parliament, which was not felony by ſome expreſs known law before. And I hope we ſhall be ſo careful of our ſelves and our poſterity, as not to go about to make a breach upon the conſtitution of the Government in this particular, but rather make the Impeachment only for high crimes and miſdemeanours.

Sir Francis Winnington.

Mr. Speaker; Sir, I cannot agree with that honourable Member that ſpoke laſt, as to his notion that the Parliament cannot declare any thing to be treaſon, which was not before felony by ſome known law; the Statute of 25 Ed. 3. leaves the power at large to Parliaments without any ſuch reſtriction. And I am of opinion, that any thing that tends to the deſtruction or alteration of the Government, hath always been, and ought to be declared in Parliament, treaſon, if brought there to be judged. The Parliament doth not in this make new Crimes, and then condemn them; but only declares that to be a Crime which was ſo before, and wanted nothing but condemnation. And it may conſiſt with the prudence of this Houſe, as well to be careful how to weaken thoſe laws and cuſtoms which tend ſo much to the preſervation of the Government, as how to increaſe any that may tend to the deſtruction of any one Man, by multiplying precedents for chaſtizing of treaſon; the crimes for which Treſilian and the reſt at that time were impeached, were not felony by any known law, and yet they were condemned in Parliament. Empſon and Dudley were accuſed in general, for endeavouring to ſubvert the Government, which being in general words, was not felony by any known law, yet the Judges having recourſe to Parliament, they were condemned. The Articles againſt Finch, Berkley, and the reſt, were all for high treaſon; and the matter contained in their Articles amounted to no more than what is now contained in this. And there is ſo little weight in the caſes that have been offered againſt this, that, I think they are offered rather for ornament than argument. The Chancellour is the keeper of the King's conſcience, and the Judges of his coronation-oath. As they are in great places, and have a great power, ſo they ought to be the more careful how they behave themſelves: And as they have greater encouragements, ſo to be ſubject to more ſevere chaſtiſements than others, the the publick being more concerned in their actions; and therefore the cuſtom of Parliaments hath made that treaſon in them, which is not ſo in other perſons. The words of Judges and Privy-Counſellors, in ſome caſes, are Overt-Acts of themſelves. I think it will become the wiſdom of the Nation, to make all the defence and proviſion they can, againſt the corrupt doings of Men in ſuch places: And I do not ſee what danger can ariſe to our poſterities by ſuch proceedings. Is it not with the Parliament we intruſt this power? Who can imagine that a Parliament can ever be ſo conſtituted, as not to be carefully concerned in their proceedings as to life and death; and only to concern themſelves therein, when ſome extraordinary exigences in which the Government is much concerned, requires it? What Man would deſire to live after he was thought worthy of death by ſuch an Aſſembly? And notwithſtanding what hath been ſaid to extenuate the crimes mentioned in theſe Articles, I think, the Order that was made in the King's Bench about Printing, by the Judges, was taking on them a legiſlative Power; which hath formerly been judged treaſon: And I think we live now in as dangerous times as ever, and under as great a neceſſity to have a care of the miſchiefs that may happen to the Nation by ill Judges, as ever. And I ſee no reaſon to doubt our being able to make good theſe Articles; and therefore I pray that the Articles may be ingroſſed as they are.

Mr. Powel.

Mr. Speaker; Sir, I agree that it will become this Houſe very well, to be very cautious how they make precedents in caſes of treaſon, which are the Sheet-Anchors of life and death: as alſo how they weaken parliamentary proceedings, that are neceſſary to preſerve the Government. And I hope that nothing but the true merits of the cauſe will lead us in a matter of ſo great importance, and neither wit nor oratory, nor any forced explanation of the laws; I ſee it agreed by all, that Parliaments have a power of declaring treaſon. The queſtion is, which is moſt cuſtomary and ſecureſt, to have it done by Bill, that ſo King, Lords and Commons may join therein; or whether by an impeachment from the Commons, the Lords being only the Judges; or whether any thing ought or can be declared treaſon by Parliament, which was not felony by ſome known law before.

Sir, I am of opinion that it is ſafeſt and moſt agreeable to the policy of this Government, that the declaring of any thing treaſon in Parliament ſhould be by Bill, that King, Lords and Commons may join therein, that ſo ſuch a precious thing as the life of the ſubject ſhould have the greateſt ſecurity imaginable. However, it is not to be doubted, but it hath been practiſed otherways, and that many perſons have been condemned in Parliament upon impeachments from the Commons, for facts which were not treaſon by any known law. And the reaſon may be, thereby to prevent the dangers that might ariſe from ſome Miniſters of State growing ſo great with the King, as that they ſhould be able to ſecure him from ever giving his conſent to a Bill. In ſuch a caſe, by giving ill counſel and other ſecret courſes, (happily as far as reaſon, yet not known by any law) they would be ſecure from puniſhment, if this way of proceeding againſt ſuch a perſon, where the King's concurrence is not neceſſary, were not allowed of. And the preſerving of this right, is ſo far from being contrary to the wiſdom of our Anceſtors, that it is very agreeable to all their proceedings in the conſtitution of this Government, in order to ballance it the better, and preſerve it againſt the deſigns of great ill Men. And as to the other objection, whether the Parliament can declare any thing treaſon that was not felony before by ſome known law? I am quite of another opinion, and do believe the practice hath been otherways. The Judges in Rich. the 2d's time were condemned for giving extrajudicial opinions, which, I think, was not felony by any Statute-Law. A Knight of Cheſhire was condemned in Parliament, for conſpiring the death of the King's uncle: An Earl of Northumberland, for giving liveries to ſo many perſons as were judged a little army. And many other caſes which I have read of, in which perſons have been condemned in Parliament, when their crimes were not felony by any known law. But I do not take any delight in ripping up old Statutes or Precedents about treaſons. I am ſorry the misfortunes of our times ſhould make it now neceſſary. But if the Parliament, as I conclude, have often declared ſuch things as theſe treaſon, and the Commons have impeached perſons guilty of ſuch crimes, for high treaſon; I ſee no juſt objection why theſe Articles ſhould not go up as they are drawn: For notwithſtanding what hath been ſaid to mitigate the crimes contained in theſe Articles, I am of opinion, that the order made in the King's Bench, about printing their warrants for ſeizing of Books, their diſmiſſing of Grand Juries, doth tend to the ſubverſion of the Government; and hath been, and ever ought to be, in Judges, judged high treaſon. And therefore, that it cannot conſiſt with the prudence of this Houſe, nor the ſecurity of the Nation, that this perſon ſhould be impeached of leſs than high treaſon: And therefore I move you, that the Articles may be engroſſed.

Mr. Paul Foley.

Mr. Speaker; Sir, we are not going about to declare any thing treaſon, but to offer our Articles, and leave it to the Lords; therefore moſt of theſe arguments would be more proper there: for we only impeach, they are to be the Judges, whether the matter be treaſon or no. It is true, we ought to be cautious what we do in it, becauſe it is not proper that this Houſe ſhould impeach a Man for treaſon, without having good grounds for it. But is not the Order about printing a kind of an Act of State to ſerve inſtead of a Law? Is not the uſe of grand Juries a very eſſential part of this Government? And is not the diſmiſſing of them, as this Judge did, a way to render them uſeleſs? Are not his Warrants to ſeize Books and Papers, arbitrary; and doth not all tend to the ſubverſion of the Government? And what better grounds ſhould we have for our proceedings? I think the Articles are well drawn, and ought to be ingroſſed as they are.

Sir Richard Temple.

Mr. Speaker; Sir, I cannot admit that Parliaments, by impeachments before the Lords, can make any thing treaſon, but only ſuch matters as were treaſon by common law, before the Statute of Edward the third. And, I think, we ought to be ſo cautious of our poſterities, as not to preſs for ſuch precedents, leſt you put into the hands of the Lords a power, for which we may have cauſe to repent hereafter, but never get back again: For the Lords do not uſe to part with thoſe Powers they once get. There are precedents by which it appears, that the Lords have attempted to make declarative treaſons alone, without any impeachment from the Commons. Have a care how you give them encouragement to proceed therein; better keep to the other way of making no declarative treaſons but by Bill.

The Articles were read, and Queſtion put:

Reſolved, That the ſaid Sir William Scroggs be impeached upon the ſaid Articles; and that the ſaid Articles be ingroſſed, and carried up to the Lords by my Lord Cavendiſh.

Ordered, That the Committee appointed to examine the proceedings of the Judges in Weſtminſter-hall, and to prepare impeachments againſt Sir Francis North, Chief Juſtice of the Common-Pleas; Sir Thomas Jones, one of the Juſtices of the Court of King's Bench; and Sir Richard Weſton, one of the Barons of the Court of Exchequer, do bring in ſuch impeachments with all convenient ſpeed.

After the Articles were brought into the Houſe of Lords, the Lord Chief-Juſtice put in the following anſwer; viz.

The Anſwer of Sir William Scroggs, Knt. Chief-Juſtice of his Majeſty's Court of King's Bench; to the Articles of Impeachment exhibited againſt him by the Commons of England, in the late Parliament aſſembled.

"THE ſaid Sir William Scroggs, by, and "under proteſtation, that there is no man- "ner of high treaſon, nor any overt-act of high "treaſon, particularly alledged or expreſſed in the "ſaid Articles of Impeachment, to which the ſaid "Sir William Scroggs can, or is bound by law to "make any anſwer unto; and ſaving to himſelf, "(and which he prayeth may be ſaved to him) "both now and at all times hereafter, all, and "all manner of benefit and advantage of exception to the inſufficiency of the ſaid Articles, in "point of law; as well for that there is no overt-act of treaſon expreſſed therein, as for all other "the defects therein appearing; for Plea thereto "he ſaith, That he is in no wiſe guilty of all or "any the crimes, offences, or miſdemeanours, "of what nature, kind, or quality ſoever, by the "ſaid Articles of Impeachment charged upon "him, in manner and form, as in and by the ſaid "Articles is ſuppoſed; which he is ready to aver "and prove, as this honourable Houſe ſhall a- "ward; and humbly ſubmitteth himſelf, and the "juſtice of his cauſe, to this moſt honourable "Houſe: and prayeth to be diſcharged of the "premiſes, and to be hence diſmiſſed and acquit- "ted of all the matters, crimes, miſdemeanours, "and offences, in and by the ſaid Articles of Im- "peachment charged upon him, &c.

W. Scroggs.

After this, a Petition of Sir William Scroggs was read.

To the Right Honourable the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, in this preſent Parliament aſſembled; The humble Petition of Sir William Scroggs, Knt. Chief Juſtice of his Majeſty's Court of King's Bench; ſheweth,

"THAT your Petitioner, the laſt Parlia- "ment, was impeached before your Lord- "ſhips, by the Houſe of Commons, of ſeveral "Articles ſtiled high treaſon, and other great "crimes and miſdemeanours.

"To which your Petitioner hath now, with the "firſt opportunity, put in his anſwer to this ho- "nourable Houſe.

"Your Petitioner humbly prays, that your "Lordſhips would be pleaſed to appoint the "Houſe of Commons to reply, that ſo a conve- "nient day may be appointed for the hearing of "the Cauſe; that your Petitioner may no longer "lie under the reproach of the word high-trea- "ſon."

And your Petitioner, as in duty bound, ſhall ever pray, &c.

W. Scroggs.

Ordered, That the copy of this Anſwer and Petition ſhall be ſent to the Houſe of Commons.

But the Parliament being ſoon after prorogued, this Affair was dropped. However, the Lord Chief-Juſtice was removed from his high Station, and allowed a penſion for life.

XXXV. The Report from the Committee of the Commons in Parliament, appointed by the Honourable Houſe of Commons, to conſider the Petition of Richard Thompſon of Briſtol, Clerk; and to examine Complaints againſt him. And the Reſolution of the Commons in Parliament upon this Report, for his Impeachment of High Crimes and Miſdemeanours; Friday, Decemb. 24. 1680. 32 Car. II.

The Report from the Committee of the Commons in Parliament, appointed to conſider the Petition of Richard Thompſon, and to examine Complaints againſt him.

At the Committee appointed to take into conſideration the Petition of Richard Thompſon, Clerk; and to examine the Complaints againſt him.

IN the firſt place, the Committee read unto the ſaid Thompſon, the heads of the Complaints againſt him; which (for the moſt part) he denying, deſired to have his accuſers brought face to face: Whereupon the Committee proceeded to the examination of witneſſes, to prove the ſaid complaint.

The firſt witneſs examined, ſaith, That there being a great noiſe and rumour, that Mr. Thompſon had prepared a Sermon to be preached on the thirtieth of January, 1679. the ſaid witneſs went to the ſaid Sermon, and did hear Mr. Thompſon publickly declare, that the Presbyterians were ſuch perſons, as the very Devil bluſh'd at them; and that the villain Hampden grudged, and made it more ſcruple of conſcience, to give twenty ſhillings to the King, for ſupplying his neceſſities by Ship-money and Loan, which was his right by Law, than to raiſe Rebellion againſt him. And that the Preſbyterians are worſe (and far more intolerable) than either Prieſts or Jeſuits.

The ſecond ſaith, That hearing a great talk and noiſe ſpread of a Sermon to be preached by Mr. Thompſon, on the 30*th* of January 1679; was minded to hear the ſame, and accordingly did; at which he writ ſome notes: amongſt which, he ſaith, that Mr. Thompſon openly preached, that the Devil bluſh'd at the Presbyterians; and that the villain Hampden grudged more to give the King twenty ſhillings, which was his juſt due by Law, (Ship-money and Loan) than to raiſe Rebellion againſt him; and that a Presbyterian Brother, qua talis, was as great a Traitor by the Statute, as any Prieſt or Jeſuit whatſoever.

That he heard, that Mr. Thompſon ſaid, that he hoped the Presbyterians would be pulled out of their houſes, and the Goals filled with them: and with'd their houſes burnt.

The third ſaith, That he was cited to the Biſhop's Court, to receive the Sacrament laſt Eaſter; but being out of town at that time, did receive it at a place called Purl in Wiltſhire; and that a month after he came home, was again cited to the ſaid Court; and he did accordingly appear, and told the Court, that he hoped his abſence and buſineſs might be accepted for a lawful excuſe: upon which, Mr. Thompſon immediately ſaid, that they would proceed to excommunicate him: Upon which, this Informant produced his certificate, of which the Chancellor approved, and ſaid it was lawful. Hereupon Mr. Thompſon ſaid, that his receiving the Sacrament from any other Miniſter, than the Miniſter of the Pariſh wherein he dwelled, was damnation to his Soul; and that he would maintain this doctrine.

The fourth ſaith, That being at Briſtol-Fair, he heard a great talk and noiſe of a Satyr-Sermon prepared, and deſigned to be preached by Mr. Thompſon againſt the Presbyterians, on the 30th of January, 1679; and that very many reſorted to hear him: in which Sermon, the ſaid Mr. Thompſon declared and ſaid, that there was a great talk of a plot: but (ſays he) a Prebyterian is the man; and further added, that the villain Hampden ſcrupled to give the King 20*s.* upon Ship-Money and Loan, which was due by Law, but did not ſcruple to raiſe Rebellion againſt him.

The fifth ſaith, That Mr. Thompſon in a Sermon preached the 30th of January 1679, did ſay, that the Presbyterians did ſeem to out-vie Mariana, and that Calvin was the firſt that preached the King-killing Doctrine; and that after he had quoted Calvin often, ſaid, if this be true then, a Presbyterian-Brother qua talis, is as great a Traitor as any Prieſt or Jeſuit: and that then he condemned all the Proceedings of Parliaments.

The ſixth ſaith, That he the ſaid Mr. Thompſon, had utter'd many ſcandalous words concerning the Act for burying in Woollen; affirming, that the makers of that Law, were a company of old Fools and Fanaticks, and that he would bring a School-boy, ſhould make a better Act than that, and conſtrue it when he had done.

The ſeventh ſaith, That Mr. Thompſon in a Sermon by him preached (while Petitions for the ſitting of this Parliament were on foot) ſpeaking of a ſecond Rebellion by the Scotch, who had framed a formidable Army, and came as far as Durham, to deliver a Petition forſooth; and that they ſeemed rather to command than petition their Sovereign to grant; and comparing that Petition with the then Petition on foot, greatly inveighed againſt it, and ſcoffed much at it.

The eighth ſaith, That Mr. Thompſon, (when the Petition was on foot for the ſitting of this Parliament) uſed at the Funeral-Sermon of one Mr. Wharton theſe words, (pointing at the dead ſaid) that he was no Schiſmatical petitioning Rebel, and that by his inſtigations, the Grand-Jury of Briſtol made a preſentment of their deteſtation againſt petitioning for the ſitting of the Parliament; that the ſaid Mr. Thompſon had told him, that he was Governor to Mr. Narbor, when he was beyond Sea; and ſaid, that he had been very often (and above one hundred times) at Maſs, in the great Church at Paris, and uſually gave half a Crown to get a place to hear a certain Doctor of that Church, and that he was like to be brought over to that Religion; and that when he went beyond Sea, did not know but that he might be of that Religion before his return. That he is very cenſorious, and frequently caſts evil aſperſions againſt ſeveral Divines at Briſtol of great note, viz. Mr. Chetwind, Mr. Standfaſt, Mr. Croſman, Mr. Palmer and others, ſaying, that ſuch as went to their Lectures, were the brats of the Devil.

The ninth ſaith, That Mr. Thompſon in his preaching inveighed bitterly againſt ſubſcribing Petitions for ſitting of this Parliament, ſaying, that it was the ſeed of Rebellion, and like to Forty-one; and that the Devil ſet them on work, and the Devil would pay them their wages; ſaying, that before he would ſet his hand to ſuch Petitions, he would cut it off, yea and cut them off.

The tenth ſaith, That about two years ſince, being in the Chancel of St. Thomas's Church in Briſtol, where Queen Elizabeth's Effigies is, Mr. Thompſon pointing his finger to it, ſaid, that ſhe was the worſt of women, and a moſt lewd and infamous woman: upon which, this Informant replied, he never heard any ſpeak ill of her: thereupon Mr. Thompſon ſaid, ſhe was no better than a Church-robber, and that Hen. VIII. begun it, and that ſhe finiſh'd it.

The eleventh; Rowe ſaith, That in the year 1678, he waited on the Mayor to Church, and that Mr. Thompſon who was there railed at Hen. VIII. ſaying, he did more hurt in robbing the Abby-lands, than he did good by the Reformation. That after dinner Mr. Thompſon comes to this Informant, and claps his hands on his ſhoulders, ſaying, hah boy, had Queen Elizabeth been living, you needed not to have been Sword-bearer of Briſtol. The ſaid Rowe asked him why? He replied, ſhe loved ſuch a luſty Rogue (ſo well) as he was; and he would have been very fit for her drudgery at Whitehall.

The twelfth ſaith, That he heard a great noiſe of a Sermon to be preached by Mr. Thompſon on the 30th of January 1679, to the ſecond part of the ſame Tune; and that he was preſent at the ſame Sermon, in which Mr. Thompſon ſaid, there was a great noiſe of a Popiſh Plot, but, ſays he, here is nothing in it but a Presbyterian Plot; for here they are going about to petition for the ſitting of the Parliament, but the end of it will be to bring the King's head to the block, as they have done his father.

The thirteenth ſaith, That in January laſt, or thereabouts, there was a Petition going about for the ſitting of this Parliament, when Mr. Thompſon, in Redcliff Church, in his Sermon ſaid, it was a ſeditious and rebellious Petition, and rather than he would ſign it, his hand ſhould be cut off.

The fourtheenth ſaith, The 8th day of April, he going to pay Mr. Thompſon his dues, ſpeaking concerning the Meeters in private; Mr. Thompſon ſaid, he would haul them out, and fill the Goals with them, and hoped to ſee their houſes a-fire about their ears in a ſhort time; and this he the ſaid Thompſon doubled again and again.

The fifteenth ſaith, That about December 1679, Mr. Thompſon came to viſit his mother, being ſick, and diſcourſing of Religion, Thompſon ſaid, if he were as well ſatisfied of other things, as he was of juſtification, auricular confeſſion, penance, extreme unction and criſm in baptiſm, he would not have been ſo long ſeparated from the Catholick Church. And further affirmed, that the Church of Rome was the true Catholick Church. He further endeavoured to prove extreme unction, and auricular confeſſion, as well as he could out of the Epiſtles. Further, he hath heard him ſay, the King was a perſon of a mean and ſoft temper, and could be led eaſily to any thing, but yet a Solomon in vices; but that the Duke of York, was a Prince of a brave ſpirit, would be faithful to his friends, and that it was our own faults that he was a Roman Catholick, in that we forc'd him to fly into France, where he embraced that Religion. About the ſame time, he the ſaid Thompſon ſaid the Church would be militant; but greatly commended the decency of ſolemnizing the Maſs in France; and that it was performed with much more reverence and devotion than any other Religion doth uſe. He further heard him ſay in a Sermon, about the time of petitioning, he would rather cut off his hand than ſign it, and had many bad expreſſions of it; that it was the ſeed of Rebellion, and like forty and forty-one. And further, the ſaid Mr. Thompſon at one Sandford's ſhop-door in Briſtol, ſpeaking of Bedloe, ſaid, that he was not to be believ'd, becauſe Bedloe had ſaid he, meaning Mr. Thompſon, was at St. Omers, where Mr. Thompſon ſaid he was not; and that Bedloe was of a bad life and in many Plots, and not to be credited in any thing he ſaid. And that in another diſcourſe he commended the Romiſh Clergy for their ſingle life, and is himſelf ſo; and did at the ſame time vilify and rail at the Engliſh Clergy for marrying; ſaying it was better for a Clergyman to be gelt than to marry; and that the Calviniſts in France were letcherous fellows, and could ſcarce be two years a Prieſt without a wife. About the time, and after the Election of Sir John Knight to this Parliament, Mr. Thompſon ſaid, he was not fit to be believ'd, and as bad as any fanatick. He further ſaid in the Pulpit at St. Thomas's, that after excommunication by the Biſhop, without abſolution from the Spiritual Court, ſuch a one was ſurely damned; and he would pawn his Soul for the truth of it.

Evidence ended; Mr. Thompſon after the evidence given by every particular perſon face to face, was asked to every one, if he had any queſtions to ask before they called another? Who anſwer'd, he ſhould not ſay any thing at preſent. When the witneſſes before-mentioned were all examined, Mr. Thompſon being deſir'd to make his defence, and declare whether he were guilty of the matters laid to his charge, did for the greateſt part confeſs words ſpoken to that effect; and in other things endeavoured to turn the words with more favour towards wards himſelf; but the witneſſes being of great credit, and many more being ready to have made good the ſame things, the Committee look'd upon the buſineſs to be of a high nature, and therefore ordered the matter to be reported ſpecially; leaving it to the wiſdom of the Houſe.

The Reſolution of the Houſe of Commons, upon the ſaid Report.

Reſolved, Nemine contradicente,

THAT Richard Thompſon Clerk, hath publickly defamed his ſacred Majeſty, preached Sedition, vilified the Reformation, promoted Popery, by aſſerting Popiſh Principles, decrying the Popiſh Plot, and turning the ſame upon the Proteſtants; and endeavoured to ſubvert the Liberty and Property of the Subject, and the Rights and Privileges of Parliament; and that he is a ſcandal and reproach to his function.

And that the ſaid Richard Thompſon, be impeached upon the ſaid Report and Reſolution of the Houſe. And a Committee is appointed to prepare the ſaid Impeachment, and to receive further inſtructions againſt him; and to ſend for Perſons, Papers, and Records.

Mercurii, 5 die Januarii 1680.

A Petition of Richard Thompſon Clerk, in cuſtody of the Serjeant at arms attending this Houſe, was read.

Order'd, That the ſaid Serjeant at arms be impower'd to receive ſufficient ſecurity, for the forthcoming of the ſaid Richard Thompſon, to anſwer to the Impeachment againſt him.

Jan. 10. 1680. The Houſe was prorogu'd, which put an end to the intended Impeachment.

XXXVI. The Great Caſe of MONOPOLIES, between the Eaſt-India Company, Plaintiffs, and Tho. Sandys, Defendant: Whether their Patent for Trading to the Eaſt-Indies, excluſive of all others, is good? 35 Car. II. 1683.

THE Eaſt-India Company having a Patent granted them of the ſole Trade to the Eaſt-Indies excluſive of all others; commenced a ſuit againſt Mr. Sandys for trading thither without licence; in which caſe, the following Arguments were made, viz.

Mr. Holt * (afterwards Lord Chief-Juſtice) his Argument.

The Governour and Company of Merchants of London, trading to the Eaſt-Indies, againſt Thomas Sandys, de Term Mich. 35 Caroli 2*di*, Rs. Rot. 126.

THE Defendant comes and prays Oyer of the Letters Patent, which are ſet forth, as we have declared and pleaded.

To this Plea the Plaintiffs have demurred. My Lord, I do conceive the general queſtion in this caſe, will be this, whether or no an action lies by the Company upon this Charter; for that the Defendant not being a member of the Company, has traded into the Eaſt-Indies without licence of the Company. My Lord, I think there may be two queſtions made in this caſe, firſt, whether or no this Grant of the King to the Company, to have the ſole trade to the Indies, excluſive of all others his Subjects, whether that be a good Grant. Secondly, Suppoſing it to be a good Grant, yet whether or no it does reſt ſuch an intereſt, liberty or franchiſe in the Company, that an action may be brought and maintained by them againſt any perſon trading to the Eaſt-Indies; who is not qualified by this Charter. My Lord, for the firſt, I do humbly conceive, that this Charter granted to the Company to have the ſole trade to the Indies excluſive of all others is a good Grant; and my Lord, I ſhall endeavour to make it appear to be a good Grant from theſe conſiderations. Firſt, my Lord, from the conſideration of the perſons that are to be traded withal, and they are Infidels, and not Chriſtians. Secondly, my Lord, from the conſideration of Foreign Trade itſelf, how and in what nature by Law, it may be reſtrained by the King's royal Power. And

* The Six following Arguments in this Great Caſe, were copied from the MSS. of Samuel Pepys Eſq; (Secretary to the Admiralty) in Magdalen College Cambridge. Theſe Arguments are of great concern to the Publick in general, and to every individual Man in this Kingdom, either immediately or by conſequences; ſince Trade is the Life of a Nation; and muſt be of great Service to the Profeſſors of the Law, to ſhew on what grounds and reaſons the Caſe was adjudg'd. And the Proceedings on the Quo Warranto in State-Trials, Vol. 4. P. 769. having been found uſeful to the Gentlemen of the Law, is the reaſon why theſe Arguments; (tho' not ſo properly a Trial) ſpoke by ſome of the greateſt Men that ever appear'd at the Bar, are here inſerted.

The Arguments of Holt, Treby, Finch, Pollexfen, and Sawyer, are very briefly abridg'd in Skinner's Reports. But the Arguments of Mr. Williams, and the Lord Chief-Juſtice Jefferies, are not mentioned there.

And in the third place conſider the circumſtances and particulars of this Grant made to the Company in this caſe.

My Lord, for the firſt, that does relate to the perſons to be traded with, they being Infidels and not Chriſtians; I do conceive that by the law of the land, no ſubject of England can trade with Infidels, without licence from the King; or at leaſt it is in the power of the King to prohibit it, and for this very reaſon, becauſe Infidels are by the Law taken notice of, and the Law hath adjudg'd them to be perpetual enemies: the Law hath ſet a mark upon them, and they are uſed as all other enemies are. And ſo, 7 Rep. 17. 6. the expreſs words of my Lord Coke are in Calvin's caſe; ſays he, Infidels are perpetual enemies. Reg. 282. That ſets forth the Writ of Protection, that was given to the Prior and Brothers of the Hoſpital of St. John at Jeruſalem, that it was uſed for the defence of the Church, contra Chriſti & omnium Chriſtiavorum inimicos, 12 H. VIII. 4. If a man do beat a man outlawed, a Traitor, or a Pagan; and they bring an action, he may plead his being a Pagan, and in abatement of his action: I mention this, my Lord, to ſhew what opinion the Law has of theſe people, judging of them to be enemies as they are Infidels; and for that reaſon has excluded them from the benefit of the Law, and the common Juſtice the Nation affords: and from that it may be inferred, that ſince the Law hath excluded them from common Juſtice, ſurely the Law will not allow an intercourſe or intimate correſpondence with ſuch perſons to the ſubjects of England. And, my Lord, this is grounded upon the care that the Government hath, or ought to have by the conſtitution of the Government itſelf, of the Chriſtian Religion, which I conceive is the main end of Government. The profeſſion and preſervation of Chriſtianity is of ſo high a nature, that of itſelf it ſuperſedes all Law: if any Law be made againſt any point of the Chriſtian Religion, that Law is ipſo facto void. Why? Becauſe it is made againſt the prime and original end of Government. If the King conquer a Chriſtian country, their Law continues till it be altered by the King; but if he conquers a Pagan country, the Law ceaſes ipſo facto to be Law; for the Law of Infidels is contrary and repugnant to the Chriſtian Religion. Why then if the Chriſtian Religion have the prevalence in Chriſtian countries, there muſt be ſome means provided by the Law, whereby the King may have a power to preſerve it: and there is nothing more dangerous to the right Religion, than for the profeſſors of that Religion to have commerce with Pagans; we read how the Children of Iſrael were perverted from the true Religion, by converſe with the Nations round about them, in the book of Judges.

And Grotius de bello & pace Lib. 2. Chap. 15. Paragh. 11. ſays, Cavendum eſt enim ne nimia commixturatio contagium adferat infirmis, quamobrem utile erit, Sedes diſtingui ſicut Iſraelitæ ſeorſim ab Ægyptiis habitarunt.

The Government is to take care that there is not an infection, by correſpondence with Infidels; my Lord, 'tis not to be doubted but that the King is to have a care of the Chriſtian Religion. In old times of Popery, Bracton, Lib. 2. Ch. 24. the King of England, ſays he, is Dei Miniſter & Vicarius & 5. ch. Bracton, Jus publicum eſt quod ad Statum.

This is looked upon to be part of the Jus publicum, the care of Religion and ſacred things, and the propagation thereof, why then; my Lord, if this be true, then 'tis lawful for the King to take care and uſe his Royal Authority, to prevent all his Subjects from being perverted. My Lord, I think 'tis plain by the Writ of Ne Exeat Regnum, that ſays the King may prohibit any perſon from going beyond Sea. Why? for the defence of the Realm; that is a ſufficient reaſon, it is not in the power of the party to litigate it with the King, but he muſt ſubmit. Now always Religion is firſt to be regarded; ſecondly, the defence of the Kingdom; and thirdly, the Trade thereof. Now, my Lord, the ſubjects of a Chriſtian Prince going to trade with Infidels, being in their company, that may be dangerous to the State and Religion; ſo that it muſt neceſſarily be in the power of the King to controul it. Hob. 217. Curteon's caſe, it was adjudged that an Information did lie at the Common Law, before any Statute, againſt any perſons that ſhould tranſport Coin, becauſe 'tis againſt the Policy and State of Government, that money ſhould be tranſported; now if it be againſt the Policy of State to trade with Infidels, by the ſame reaſon that ought to be reſtrained. In the next place, I will conſider foreign trade, and whether the ſubjects of England have right to ſuch a foreign trade, that they can ad libitum trade without any controul, and I conceive they have not.

Firſt, My Lord, I conceive that the liberty and right of a foreign trade, depends upon agreement and contract with foreign Princes, in whoſe country the trade is; and if ſo be it do depend upon agreement and amity with the Prince; then have not the ſubjects of England ſuch an uncontroulable right, of trading, becauſe it depends upon the accidents of Peace and War; which, if there were ſuch a right, it could not. 30. ch. Magna Charta, omnes Mercatores, niſi publice antea prohibiti fuerunt, habeant ſalvum & ſecurum conductum exire de Anglia & venire in Angliam, & morari & ire per Angliam præterquam in tempore guerre. Then he goes on further, if there happen to be War with a foreign Prince, and the Kingdom of England; and the Merchants of that Country be found in England, this ſhews that War is an interruption of the Commerce. 12 H. 7. ch. 6. my Lord, that Statute recites that the Merchants-Adventurers inhabiting within the city of London, and divers parts of England, had free paſſage, &c. into divers parts of Spain and other places, that were in league and amity with our Kingdom and Sovereign; ſo that it appears that league and amity is the foundation of Commerce.

Selden in his Mare clauſum, ſays the rights of trades are founded on the covenants of Princes; what is the reaſon? leſt the manners and morals of the people ſhould be corrupted by the example of foreign Nations. My Lord, 2 Rolls Abr. 214. mentions the Parliament-roll of 1 H 5. wherein it is ſaid, that the Commons did petition the King, that the Merchants of England, paying their cuſtoms and other duties, might have liberty to export their goods to any place or country, notwithſtanding any proclamation to the contrary: and the King ſays he will be adviſed, he would adviſe with his Council. My Lord, from that time to this it appears, that there was no complaint of the King's proclamation as illegal, that did prohibit their trade; but they only pray that he would make an alteration of the Law. But there were ſeveral proclamations at that time to reſtrain the ſubject from trading with foreigners, (therefore they deſire he would conſent they might trade;) but the King in that caſe caſe did think fit to part with his power, but gives the uſual anſwer in ſuch caſes. My Lord, in the next place it is neceſſary, for the King to have power to reſtrain a foreign trade; becauſe a foreign trade, as the caſe may be, may be very inconvenient and miſchievous: for 'tis well known, that if ſo be the importation of foreign Commodities do exceed the exportation of domeſtick, that trade is rather a grievance than a benefit; ſo 'tis ſaid, 2 Inſt. 325. And, my Lord, there has been ſufficient appearance of this matter of late days.

My Lord, the importation of Iriſh cattle, by the 18 of this King, chap. 2. was declared to be a nuſance. So the 29th of King Charles I. the importation of French commodities; why this, my Lord, is declared, the Statute does not enact it, but declares it to be in itſelf a common nuſance: why now, if ſo be a trade come to be a nuſance, that it is rather hurtful than advantagious; the King by virtue of his prerogative is to defend the Nation, and protect his Subjects from theſe evils, he has a power to reſtrain theſe evils; eſpecially when we have the judgment of the Parliament, by whom theſe things have been declared to be nuſances 10 Rep. 141. In the caſe of the Iſle of Ely, the firſt Statute that was made concerning Sewers, was in H. VI's time; there was a queſtion, that ſince there was a thing ſo neceſſary as the taking care of the Inundation with remedy there before any Statute, ſays the book, the King by his prerogative as the fountain of Juſtice, might take care of it, tho' there was no Statute then. My Lord, when foreign commodities come to be an annoyance to the people, the Law muſt be defective if the King had not a power to reſtrain them. But in this Caſe here 'tis only a regulation of Trade, a Grant of it to the Company; and 'tis only ſpecified how they ſhall manage that Trade, to the intent all people might trade under the government as they ought to do; and I think, my Lord, it is well known that if this Company had not ſettled and eſtabliſhed a Trade in the Indies, Mr. Sandys nor none of theſe Gentlemen could have had an opportunity to do it. And if they have liberty to interfere with the Company, they would ruin the Company, and they themſelves could not trade; but I know what objections will be made againſt me, even by the Defendants Plea. My Lord, that 18 E. III. ch. 3. to wit, that the Sea ſhall be open to all Merchants to part with their Merchandize where they pleaſe; which, with ſubmiſſion to your Lordſhips, cannot be taken ſo univerſally as they themſelves would have it. For if you will take the words to be ſo large, without any manner of reſtraint, you will make this Statute to give liberty of trade to the King's enemies, for they are Merchants. But, my Lord, the next anſwer I give to it, is this; I conceive the true meaning of the Statute is, that the Sea ſhould be open without paying any extraordinary duties, but what might juſtly be impoſed: that is, that none ſhould pay any duty or cuſtom for Navigation, but only the due cuſtom, that is, when they come into Port. And ſo I muſt compare that Statute with Magna Charta, 30 ch. omnes Mercatores niſi publicè antea prohibiti fuerint, habeant ſalvum & ſecurum conductum exire de Anglia & venire in Angliam, &c. ſine malis toluetis; ſo that they have liberty allowed in this caſe to trade without unlawful exactions. But, my Lord, in the third place, ſuppoſing this Statute to be taken as general, as I know the other ſide endeavours it ſhould, yet it cannot extend to this caſe; for I think they can hardly make it out, that at that time there was any trade drove with Infidels, but the trade was drove with Chriſtians: why now, if there was not ſuch a trade had at the making of that Statute, we muſt not extend the Law to this caſe, which differs from the reaſon of trade in other caſes. That there was none, I think appears plainly by Hiſtory; Hollingſhed's Hiſtory of England 163, whereas, ſays he, in times paſt, the chief trade was in Holland, Portugal, &c. now, ſays he, men not being content with thoſe journeys, they have ſought out the Eaſt and Weſt-Indies, and have made now and then ſuſpicious Voyages. And it appears by the Statute of H. VII. that I mentioned before, that the ancient trade of England conſiſted with near Countries, and ſo the trade was at the time of the making of this Statute.

My Lord, I do obſerve as to the Caſe I reported before, when the Commons did petition the King, that they might have liberty to trade notwithſtanding any proclamation; Rolls Abr. 214. they were not of an opinion at that time, that this Statute did extend to Merchants, to give them liberty to trade every where at their will and pleaſure; if they had, they would have inſiſted upon it, and urged it to the King, that whereas there was a Statute gave them free liberty, therefore deſire the Law might be obſerved: but they do not deny, no they tacitly acknowledge the King had ſuch a power.

My Lord, it does appear what the ancient trade of England was by the Cuſtoms; for at the Common Law there was no Cuſtom but in three things, Wool, Woolfell and Leather, theſe are the Cuſtoms that were due to the King by Common Law; indeed, there was foreign Cuſtom, but that was for a foreign commodity, and was prize; Dyer 165. 2 Inſt. 52, & 43. Davies Rep. 8.

Now, my Lord, if ſo be the trade of the Nation had conſiſted of other commodities, it may be ſuppoſed, there would have been cuſtom paid for them afterwards in Ed. III's time; when new Trades were introduced, we find Acts of Parliament made for raiſing new Cuſtom, therefore ſince no Cuſtom was paid, but theſe ancient Cuſtoms, we may ſuppoſe the trade of the Nation moſtly conſiſted of thoſe commodities. Fitzherb. nat. br. 85. Dyer 165. Merchants as well as others may be prohibited from going out of the land, or any perſon whatſoever; and Davies, Rep. fol. 9, b. gives one reaſon why the King did permit the Merchants to trade when it was in his power by Writ of Ne Exeat Regnum, or a proclamation, to put a ſtop to them.

My Lord, in many caſes, when the doing of an Act may be to the publick detriment, the King hath power to reſtrain it, and it cannot be done without the King's licence: Co. Litt. fol. 5. a Subject can't build a Caſtle, or other Fortreſs defenſible, without licence of the King; why? becauſe it may be dangerous. Why then ſhould a Subject trade with an Infidel Country, without licence from the King? for by trading with Infidels they indanger their Religion. And therefore, as it requires licence to build a Caſtle, tho' a man otherwiſe might lawfully do it upon his own ground; ſo for the ſame reaſon does it to trade with Infidels, 9 Rep. 87, b. 2 Inſt. 199. A man cannot incloſe his ground to make a Park without licence of the King; in that caſe he takes nothing from any body, but ſuch incloſing and turning profitable ground into a place of pleaſure, may be of publick conſequence, and therefore cannot be done without the King's licence, 11 H. VII. 23. If two men play at ſword and buckler, and one kill the other, that is ſelony. But if they play with licence of the King, that is not felony; ſo that the King hath power to prohibit, and by his command make that unlawful, that otherwiſe would be lawful. For the King may command a man, by his Writ to ſtay in the Kingdom, and if he go contrary to the King's Writ or Proclamation, in that caſe the King may ſeize all his Lands for the contempt, as in the caſe of Sir Francis Inglefield: ſo that as the King may govern the trade of the Nation in regard it may be miſchievous, the King may hinder it, when it will be apparently miſchievous.

In the third place, I ſhall conſider the Grant; and the Grant hath theſe things in it. 'Tis a Grant to a Company, that they and their children ſhall trade to the Indies, notwithſtanding any Statute or diverſity of Faith or Religion; and that they ſhould have the ſole commerce and trade there. There is a prohibition to any of the King's ſubjects to trade there without licence. Now, my Lord, this Grant I take to be good; for my Lord, tho' it may not in itſelf be lawful without the King's licence, yet it is in the power of the King to make it ſo. And for this reaſon can the King make an Alien a denizen.

The reaſon of the Law, why an Alien is uncapable to purchaſe lands here, is becauſe 'tis againſt the policy of the Land for to ſuffer a Foreigner to come into England and enrich himſelf with the lands and goods of the Kingdom, yet the King may cure this incapacity; but notwithſtanding he be made a Denizen, yet does he remain an Alien ſtill, and ſubject to that Prince from whence he came; Dyer 3. ch. B. So that notwithſtanding it may be dangerous for an Alien to have land, yet the King is entruſted with it, and he may give this Alien liberty to purchaſe land.

My Lord, it is, as I have obſerved, unlawful to tranſport the Coin of England; yet the King may give leave to tranſport Coin, as there is a precedent 5 Car. I. of a licence to tranſport 10000 l. So, my Lord, for the trading with Infidels, tho' in itſelf it's againſt the policy of the Government; that is, for the ſubject to have an uncontroulable liberty to trade at their pleaſure: yet the King, who is entruſted with the adminiſtration of the Government, may give authority to do it. And there is a great deal of difference between trading in a Company, and trading out of a Company: if they trade in a Company, they trade under the Government of England; if they trade out of a Company, then they trade out of the Government of England, and out of its protection. This Company is incorporated and made to have the government of this trade; they being Chriſtians, no queſtion, are to take care of the Chriſtian Religion; and to take care that their Agents and Factors that trade under this conſtitution, keep up to that Religion they profeſs; but certainly it is quite another thing when people trade of their own head, there they converſe only with Infidels, they cannot have Divine Offices.

My Lord, it has been objected, Oh, but ſay they, if the King give a licence to ſome, tho' they cannot do it without the King's licence, yet the King having diſpenſed with this Law, this diſpenſation ſhall have an univerſal influence, and give licence to others.

My Lord, it ſeems to me a very ſtrange inference, they acknowledge that make this objection, that without the King's licence, beyond what it is, where the King hath qualified his Grant ſolely to the Company and their Factors, they would have it extend to all the people of England. I think 'tis the firſt time that ever the King's licence, or authority that he gives, ſhould be extended beyond itſelf. But, my Lord, the great objection will be, that this is a Monopoly, and therefore the Grant is void in Law; with ſubmiſſion, I think it is none, and I hope I have ſaid ſomething already to prove it to be none, and it does not come within the definition of a Monopoly, 3 Inſtit. 181. A Monopoly is an inſtitution or allowance of the King, by his Grant, Commiſſion or otherwiſe, to any perſon or perſons, bodies politick or corporate, of or for the ſole buying, ſelling, making, working or uſing of any thing; whereby any perſon or perſons, bodies politick or corporate, are ſought to be reſtrained of any freedom or liberty that they had before, or hindred in their lawful trade: reſtrained of the freedom they had before, that I think they cannot make out, that they ever had any ſuch freedom. They cannot make out they were in poſſeſſion of this trade before, therefore this Charter does not reſtrain them of any freedom they had; then ſay they, it hinders others lawful trade.

My Lord, I have made it appear that the trading with Infidels without licence of the King is not a lawful trade. But to go further, tho' the proof lies on their ſide, they having the affirmation; yet I hope to give ſuch evidence, as is even as much as can be expected in any caſe. In the 43d of Queen Elizabeth, a Parliament was ſitting at Weſtminſter, and at that very time there was a Charter granted to this Company; and a Charter that had theſe very words, of having the ſole trade excluſive of others; and there had been another Charter granted before of having the ſole trade, 27th of the Queen. Now in this Parliament 43d of the ſaid Queen, the Parliament fell very vigorouſly againſt Monopolies, and brought in a great catalogue of them. But, my Lord, I do obſerve that in all the catalogue, and in all the debates of Parliament at that time, there's not one word mentioned of the Eaſt-India Company's Charter, neither of the Charter of the 27*th* of the Queen, nor of the Charter of that very Parliament. Nay, there is not ſo much as mention made of the Charter granted to any other Company. My Lord, I have this from a Book that is lately come out, Townſhend's Collection of Proceedings in Parliament, 244, 245. there is the whole catalogue of Monopolies, and the full debate of them; but as for any Charters of Corporations, tho' there were many at that time, there is not the leaſt complaint.

My Lord, between the 43d of the Queen, and the 20th of King James, is about twenty-three years; in the 43d of the Queen, the diſcourſe of Monopolies firſt began in Parliament; and they were conſidering, it may be ſuppoſed, all this time, how to ſettle the matter of Monopolies, and to declare what were Monopolies. And after all this long conſideration, and ſo great an agitation as it had, they came to make the Statute of 21 Jac. which ſeems to be a ſettling and bounding the prerogative of the Crown, and right of the Subject; it does condemn Monopolies, and has theſe words, all Monopolies, and all commiſſions for the ſole buying, &c. or uſing of any thing within the King's Dominions, why that is condemned. But, my Lord, it does appear that the Parliament were ſo far from condemning the Charter of this Company, or the Charter of any other Company; that there is an expreſs proviſo that the Statute of Monopolies ſhould not extend to any Company for the ordering or managing of trade, tho' I think the words of the Statute did not reach this caſe, yet they were ſo careful, that they would have a proviſo to ſave this and all other Companies. And, my Lord, there is a Statute 3 Jac. cap. 6. by the preamble of which Statute, it appears that the King had granted a Charter to divers Merchants to be a Company, and to have the ſole trade into Spain and Portugal, excluding all others, that were not members. The Statute recites the miſchief of liberty to all the King's ſubjects to trade there: I obſerve, the Parliament did not condemn the Charter to be unlawful, but took it to be good, and that nothing leſs than an Act of Parliament could reſtore the liberty of trade to the ſubjects againſt the Charter; for they do ſay, notwithſtanding the Charter had given the ſole right of trade to the Company, yet it ſhould be lawful for all people to trade there, notwithſtanding that Charter. Now, my Lord, I do think, that practice and uſage is a great evidence of the Law: I ſhall ſhow your Lordſhip ſome precedents of ſome Charters, that have been granted to perſons of a ſole trade excluſive of others. 6 Feb. 26 Eliz. ſhe granted to Abraham Gilbert and his aſſociates the ſole trade to China, prohibiting others. 6 March, 27 Eliz. there is a Patent to Sir Walter Raleigh to diſcover new Countries that were heatheniſh and under Infidels. 11 Sept. 23 of her Reign, there was a Patent to divers Turky-Merchants to have the ſole trade to Turky, excluding all others. 1*ſt* of Jan. 34th of the Queen, a Charter granted to the Turky-Company. 5 July, 27th of the Queen, there were Letters Patents granted to certain Noblemen and Gentlemen to trade into Barbary, and that during twelve years none ſhould trade there, but they, their Agents and Aſſigns. 30 Eliz. a Patent made to the Merchants of Exeter, to have the ſole trade to the Rivers of in Guinea; 34th of the Queen, another Patent to Gregory and Pope, to have the ſole trade to Guinea. My Lord, all theſe I have now quoted, I have cauſed to be examined on the Rolls, and are to be found there. 2. Brownlow 296. there it was held by my Lord Coke, that no ſubject ought to trade to an Infidel Country without licence of the King, for fear of being perverted from the Chriſtian Religion; this my Lord Coke ſays, and he ſays he had ſeen an ancient precedent of a licence. More 675. Darcy and Allen, Juſtice Dodderidge (that I think was only then Serjeant) argues againſt the Patent, but he did agree that a Grant to a Company to have the ſole trade with Infidels is a good Grant, and the King by his prerogative might reſtrain his ſubjects from it: he admits a Patent for ſole Printing was good; why, becauſe the publick was concerned. My Lord, the Parliament of late time have been ſo far from looking upon the Eaſt-India Company to be a Monopoly, that they have declared it to be for the good of the Kingdom; 14th of this King, chap. 24. in the preamble 'tis recited.

Now, my Lord, I hope I have made good, that the King has this power both by precedents, by authorities, and opinion of Lawyers; and alſo the judgment and the opinion of the Parliament: And that it was never condemned, and ſo I conclude this firſt point. The ſecond point, my Lord, in the next place, which I ſhall be very ſhort upon, for that it will be conſequential to what I have endeavoured to prove before; that is, ſuppoſing it to be a good Grant, whether if any perſon do trade to the damage of the Company, 'tis a good ground for an action.

Firſt, I do think the Company have, and 'tis very plain they have an inheritance, and 'tis a franchiſe and liberty they could not have, unleſs they had the King's Grant, and others excluded from it; then it does agree with all the caſes of this nature; wherever the King grants a franchiſe to one, and another perſon violates the franchiſe, the King's Patentee may have an action of the caſe, againſt the perſon that does interfere or violate the franchiſe. 22 H. VI. 14. 11 H. IV. 47. ſuppoſing the King grant a man a Fair or Market, if any man ſet up another Fair or Market, tho' with the licence of the King, yet he that has the Grant ſhall have an action. Now the Eaſt-India Company are to be at great charges, nay, there is a truſt repoſed in them, that they ſhall trade, and carry on this trade for the good of the Company; ſo that they are put into a trade, and are obliged to carry it on. The Defendant hath no right; if they have a right, they ſhall have a remedy againſt any that invade it. And for theſe reaſons

I pray your Judgment for the Plaintiffs.

Sir George Treby, (afterwards Lord Chief-Juſtice) his Argument.

The Governor, and Company of Merchants of London, trading into the Eaſt-Indies, againſt Thomas Sandys. Trin. 35 Caroli Secundi Reg. Rot. 126.

May it pleaſe your Lordſhip,

I Am of Counſel in this caſe with Thomas Sandys the Defendant. The caſe ariſes upon a Charter ſet forth by the Plaintiffs, and a Statute pleaded by us; and it is as Mr. Holt has opened it. Only I ſhall, for my purpoſe, open it a little more than he did.

It is a ſpecial action on the caſe, declarative; wherein the Plaintiffs declare, that King Charles II. our preſent King, by his Letters Patents, bearing date the 3d of April, in the 13th year of his reign, reciting, that the Governor and Company of merchants trading into the Eaſt-Indies, had been of long time a corporation, and enjoyed divers liberties, privileges and immunities, by virtue of divers Letters Patents and Charters, granted to them by Q. Elizabeth, and K. James; and the King being informed, that divers diſorders and inconveniences were then lately committed, to the great prejudice of the ſaid company, and interruption of their trade: Whereupon they had humbly beſought the King, to grant and confirm their ſaid Charter, with ſome alterations and additions, tending to the advancement and benefit of their trade.

The King gives and grants to them, that they ſhall be a corporation perpetual, to have ſucceſſion and capacity, &c. And further willed and granted, that they, and every one that was, or ſhould be of the company; and their ſons at their ſeveral ages of 21; and their apprentices, factors, and ſervants employed by them, might, and ſhould freely traffick, and uſe the trade of merchandize by ſea, by ſuch ways and paſſages then found and diſcovered, as they ſhould think fitteſt, into, and from the Eaſt-Indies; and into, and from the Iſlands, Ports, Havens, Cities, Creeks, Towns and Places of Aſia, Africa, or America, or any of them, beyond the cape of Bona Eſperanza, to the ſtreights of Magellan; as by the Court of the Company ſhall from time to time be limited and agreed; without any moleſtation, impeachment or diſturbance, any ſtatute, uſage, diverſity of religion or faith, or any other cauſe or matter whatſoever notwithſtanding, ſo always the ſame trade be not undertaken, or addreſſed, to any Country, Iſland, Port, Haven, City, Creek, Town, or Place, already in the lawful and actual poſſeſſion of any ſuch chriſtian Prince or State, as at this preſent is, or at any time hereafter ſhall be in league or amity with the King, his heirs or ſucceſſors, and who doth not, or will not accept of ſuch trade.

And further grants, That they and their ſucceſſors, and their factors, ſervants, and aſſignees, in the trade of merchandize for them, and in their behalf, ſhall for ever hereafter have, uſe and enjoy, the whole, entire and only trade and traffick, and the whole, entire, and only liberty, uſe and privilege of trading and trafficking, and uſing the feat and trade of merchandizing, to and from the ſaid Eaſt-Indies; and to and from all the Iſlands, Ports, Havens, Cities, Towns and Places aforeſaid.

And further grants to them, That the ſaid Eaſt-Indies, or the Iſlands, &c. ſhall not be viſited, frequented or haunted by any of his ſubjects, during the time that theſe Letters Patents remain in force, contrary to the true meaning of the ſaid Letters Patents, and the virtue of the prerogative royal. Charging alſo and commanding, and prohibiting all other ſubjects, that none of them viſit, haunt, frequent, or trade, traffick or adventure, by way of merchandizing into or from any part of the ſaid Eaſt-Indies, &c. unleſs it be by and with the licence and agreement of the Company, in writing firſt had and obtained under the common ſeal.

Here the declaration makes a break, or ſtop, and ſo it would ſeem as if the reſtraint and prohibition were abſolute and general; but upon Oyer prayed of the Letters Patents, they being ſet forth in hæc verba, it appears to be, ſub modo, under the following penalty, viz. Upon pain that every ſuch other perſon or perſons, that ſhall trade to or from the Eaſt-Indies, ſhall incur the King's indignation, and forfeiture and loſs of the goods, merchandizes, and other things whatſoever, which ſo ſhall be brought into this Realm of England, or any the dominions of the ſame. As alſo the Ship and Ships, with the furniture thereof, wherein ſuch goods, merchandizes and other things, ſhall be brought or found, the one half of all the ſaid forfeitures to be to the King, his heirs and ſucceſſors; the other half to the Company. And further, all and every the ſaid offenders, for the ſaid contempt, to ſuffer impriſonment during the King's pleaſure; and ſuch other puniſhments as to the King, his heirs and ſucceſſors, for ſo high a contempt, ſhall ſeem meet and convenient; and not to be in any wiſe delivered, until they and every of them ſhall become bound to the Governor, in the ſum of 1000 l. at leaſt; at no time then after to ſail or traffick into any part of the ſaid Eaſt-Indies, &c. And further grants, That the Company may grant and give licence under the common ſeal, to any perſons to ſail and traffick to the Eaſt-Indies; and that the King, his heirs and ſucceſſors, will not, during the Letters Patents, give licence to any perſon to ſail or trade there.

By virtue of which Letters Patents they alledge they have been, and are a corporation; and have had, eſtabliſhed and managed, and do ſtill manage a great trade of merchandize to the ſaid Eaſt-Indies, with the inhabitants there; who at the time of making the ſaid Letters Patents, or ſince, were not chriſtians, nor ſubjects to any chriſtian Prince or State; but were, and are infidels, and enemies of the chriſtian faith; and have ſpent and laid out many and great ſums of money on that occaſion.

And further ſay, that the commerce and trade aforeſaid cannot be eſtabliſhed, managed or carried on but per hujuſmodi Corpus Corporatum, by ſuch a Corporation; and that they ought to have and enjoy the ſole trade there, according to the form and effect of the ſaid Letters Patents.

But the ſaid Thomas Sandys being a ſubject of the King, and no member of the Company, nor ſon, apprentice, factor, ſervant, or aſſignee, ſufficiently knowing the premiſes, and deſigning to prejudice the Company, contrary to the form and effect of the ſaid Letters Patents, after the making the ſame, and after the Company had ſettled their trade, 19 Jan. 34 Reg. did trade into the Eaſt-Indies, within the Parts, Regions, and Places abovеſpecified, beyond the promontory of Good Hope, on this ſide the Streight of Magellan aforeſaid, in certain Ports and Places, called Atcheon, Mechlopotan, and Porta Nova, with a certain Ship called the Expectation, without the licence, and againſt the will of the Governor and Company, and to the prejudice, impoveriſhment, and manifeſt grievance, and againſt the form and effect of the ſaid Letters Patents; to the damage of the plaintiffs 1000 l.

The defendant prays Oyer of the Letters Patents; whereupon they are ſet forth in hæc verba.

And thereupon the defendant pleads the Statute, 18 Ed. 3. cap. 3. whereby 'tis enacted, That the Sea be open to all manner of Merchants, to paſs with their merchandize where it ſhall pleaſe them.

Upon this the plaintiffs demur.

My Lord, I ſhall not differ with Mr. Holt in the ſtate of the controverſy, but make the ſame two points, viz. 1. Whether this Patent, as it purports an excluſion of all other ſubjects from this trade, be good or void? 2. Whether here be an apt ſuit brought?

In the firſt place, I ſhall not queſtion but the Patent is good, to make theſe perſons a corporation, and all the privileges and benefits they can derive from being a body corporate, they may enjoy, and apply them to trade if they will. Yet as to this particular, I ſhall obſerve thus much, that when ſuch Charters of incorporation were firſt taken notice of in Q. Elizabeth's and K. James's time, they did not eſcape the cenſure of learned men, who foreſaw the ill uſe of them. Co. Mag. Char. 540. Three things which have fair pretences are miſchievous, 1. New Courts; 2. New Offices; 3. New Corporations trading into foreign Parts, or at home; which under the fair pretence of order and government, in concluſion tend to the hindrance of trade and traffick, and in the end produce Monopolies.

Rolls

1. Rolls Rep. 226. Juſtice Dodderidge ſays, theſe things would overthrow the Realm.

In this argument I am ſenſible I am to ſpeak of a tender point, the King's prerogative: But I ſhall treat it with that regard and deference that I ought, and as our Books teach us.

The prerogative is great; but it has this general and juſt limitation, That nothing is to be done thereby that is miſchievous or injurious to the ſubject.

Finch's Law, 81, 83, 84. ſpeaks highly of it, as a matter divine. The King, (ſays he) carries God's ſtamp, and has the ſhadow of God's excellencies given him; the power of God is always joined with juſtice; for to do wrong, is not omnipotence, but weakneſs. So it is with the King; he can be no wrong-doer, he is all juſtice; therefore he has a prerogative in all things that are not injurious to the ſubject, as he may create Corporations, &c. (ſays he.) And ſo ſay I, he may create Corporations, and this Corporation; but for the ſame reaſon he cannot add a reſtraint to all other ſubjects from exerciſing this trade.

I ſhall lay for my foundation, that this Patent, as to reſtraining the trade, and excluding all other ſubjects, has the nature of a Monopoly, and is therefore void in that particular.

Mr. Holt and I are agreed on the deſcription of a Monopoly, which is made by my Lord Coke, Pla. Coron. 181. viz. an Inſtitution by the King, by his grant, commiſſion, or otherwiſe, to any perſon, or corporations, of or for the ſole buying, ſelling, making, working or uſing of any thing, whereby any perſon or corporations are ſought to be reſtrained of any freedom or liberty they had before, or hindred in their lawful trade.

And the like deſcription is made in the preamble of the Act concerning Monopolies, 21 Jac. cap. 3. where it is alſo declared, That all grants of Monopolies, and all other matters or things whatſoever, any way tending to the inſtituting, erecting, ſtrengthning, furthering or countenanceing of the ſame, are altogether contrary to the laws of this Realm, and utterly void, and of no effect; and in no wiſe to be put in uſe or execution.

If therefore this trade to the Eaſt-Indies be a lawful trade, then this Patent for the reſtraining it, muſt be a Monopoly. The nature of a Monopoly conſiſts in reſtraining a common right; it appropriates to one, or a few, what others had the lawful uſe of before.

I confeſs I did a little wonder to hear merchandizing to the Eaſt-Indies objected againſt as an unlawful trade, and did not expect ſo much divinity in the argument; but to that I ſhall endeavour to anſwer by and by.

Generally ſpeaking, merchandizing was always reckoned a lawful trade; every man might uſe the ſea, and trade with other Nations, as freely as he might uſe the air.

And for this trade to the Eaſt-Indies, it was lawfully uſed before there was a Company, or elſe there had never been a Company. This trade has been long, but this Company is made by theſe Letters Patents 22 years ago.

This is not diſtinguiſhed, nor diſtinguiſhable from the reaſons and rules laid down in the other caſes of Monopolies.

I ſhall chiefly inſiſt upon two caſes in one book, Coke 11. Rep. the taylor of Ipſwich his caſe, fol. 53. and Darcy and Allen's caſe, called the caſe of Monopolies, fol. 86. It is the main ground of both thoſe caſes that at Common Law no man could be prohibited to exerciſe his trade, for that is an avoidance of Idleneſs, it helps to provide ſuſtenance for a man and his family; and 'tis a ſervice to the King: and the conſequences of reſtraining trade are pernicious, as raiſing prices of commodities and impoveriſhing men, bad commodities, &c.

Now that foreign trade was underſtood to be comprehended under this general reſolution, I deſire your Lordſhip to look upon the report of the Taylor's of Ipſwich caſe, in 1. Rolls rep. 4. where it is ſaid that no trade of Merchandize can be hindred by Patent, and a Charter to hinder trade at Sea is void; as that a hundred men ſhall have the ſole trade or the like.

The King's prerogative cannot make this good, it is not lawful for a man to reſtrain himſelf from his trade, 5. Moor 242. 2 Leon. 210. a bond not to uſe his trade of a Dyer or a Smith is void, ſo a bond not to plough his land.

And ſo a bond that a man ſhall not go out of his houſe, for a man muſt ſerve the King, and do his duty with his liberty and his labour; and if Merchants and Mariners ſhould enter into a bond or a covenant not to trade, or not to trade to the Eaſt-Indies, it were void. And if it be unlawful for a man to reſtrain himſelf from it, the King cannot reſtrain him.

Another reaſon is, the King cannot by his Letters Patents take away the ſubjects property, and I do not know a greater property than freedom of trade and labour; the King cannot take away ſix-pence that a man has got by his trade, much leſs can he take away his whole trade: if the profit which a man gets by his trade be his own, the liberty whereby he acquires it is his own; otherwiſe the whole property of Traders were precarious.

Mr. Holt would expound the Statutes that are pleaded, to ſignify that the King ſhall not lay an impoſition upon Merchandize, though that be not the true meaning of the Statute, yet even that were ſufficient for our purpoſe, and will prove that the King cannot totally prohibit a man to trade; for if he can prohibit abſolutely, he can prohibit ſub modo, and require that none ſhall trade unleſs they pay ſo much; and ſo much for licence; and ſo by that means he might lay that impoſition, which it is agreed he cannot.

In Darcy's Patent there was a rent of a hundred marks per annum, reſerved to the Queen; and they that drew, and they that argued that Patent, ſuppoſing the Grant of the ſole trade to have been good, made no doubt of the conſequence, that the reſervation was good.

It is truly ſaid by my Lord Coke, Co. Mag. Cha. 47, & 63. that all Monopolies concerning trade and traffick, are againſt the Common Law, and divers Statutes; and 'tis as truly ſaid by him, Co. Placita Coronæ, 182. that though theſe Monopolies were ever without Law, yet they were never without friends.

Several attempts have been made for them, Mr. Holt has cited ſome; for the moſt part, they lurked private, ſometimes they have appear'd in Courts of Juſtice, but there they have always been diſappointed.

Rot. Parl. 50. Ed. III. nu. 33. It appears there had been a Patent granted to one Peachy, for the ſole ſelling ſweet Wine in London: this concerned a thing of delicacy, and was a matter of ſmall moment then; yet the Patent was brought into Parliament, and adjudged void, and the party puniſhed.

Co. Mag. Charta 61. and Pla. Cor. 182. A Patent granted by Philip and Mary (in reſpect of Philip's landing there) that all Malmſeys ſhou'd be imported at Southampton, and not elſewhere, adjudged void. 14 H. VIII. was the College of Phyſicians erected by Letters Patents; wherein there was a clauſe, that none without their allowance, ſhou'd practice Phyſick in, or within ſeven miles compaſs of London. Coke's 8. Rep. p. 114. Dr. Bonham's caſe but they were well-adviſed, that that clauſe in the Letters Patents was void. And therefore, 16 H. VIII. they procured an Act of Parliament to make good their Letters Patents; and the very reaſon of making that Act, was to give that force to that reſtraint, which cou'd not be by the Letters Patents only.

15*th Jacobi*, was granted a Patent for ſole printing of Law-Books, the validity of which happen'd to come in queſtion in 1668, in Chancery; between the Patentees and ſome Bookſellers, who had acquired copies of Law-Books to be printed, and it was referred to all the Judges.

Many ſpecious reaſons were given to maintain it; as, that the Invention of Printing was new, that it concerned the State, and was matter of publick care; that it was in the nature of a proclamation, and none could make proclamations but the King. That the King had the making of Serjeants and Officers, and Judges of Law; that they were printed in a particular language and character, with abbreviations, &c. But it was the opinion of all the Judges, certified to my Lord-Keeper, that thoſe perſons who had acquir'd Copies ſince the Patent, could not be reſtrain'd by the Patent from printing them.

Lord Chief-Juſtice. It received another Judgment in the Houſe of Lords.

Sir George Treby. Not this caſe, my Lord.

But beſides the Common Law, our point is moſt ſtrongly eſtabliſh'd by particular Statutes, and it has been the wiſdom and care of Princes and Parliaments in all times to aſſert this freedom of trade.

Magna Charta, cap. 30. All Merchants (if they were not openly prohibited before) ſhall have their ſafe and ſure conduct to depart, come and tarry, to buy and ſell without any manner of evil toll, by the old and rightful cuſtoms, except in time of War.

It is true, as Mr. Holt ſays, that this provides againſt Mala tolneta, but 'tis plain too, that it eſtabliſhes their liberty of trading, and coming and going with their Merchandize.

My Lord Coke ſays, indeed, that this reſpects Aliens only, but more ſtrongly proves that the Engliſh had this liberty; for they would never have extended it to Aliens, and have left the Engliſh without it.

From this exception (niſi antea publicè prohibiti fuerint) it cannot be inferred that the King may reſtrain his ſubjects from trade; for my Lord Coke in his Comment. fol. 57. ſays that this prohibition muſt be intended by Act of Parliament, for that it concerns the whole Realm, and is imply'd by the word publicè.

Beſides that this prohibition muſt relate to Aliens only, and that likely in reſpect of War too.

Subſequent Statutes make it moſt clear 2 Ed. III. cap. 9. Merchants Strangers ſhall go and come with their Merchandize. 6 Edw. III. (Stat. 1.) cap. 1. all Merchants, Strangers and others, may freely buy and ſell their commodities, from whence ſoever they come, without interruption; notwithſtanding Charters or Uſage to the contrary. Which Charters and Uſage (if any be) the King, Lords and Commons hold to be of no force, as being to the damage of the King and his great Men, and the oppreſſion of the Commons.

14 Edw. III. (Stat. 2.) cap. 2. All Merchants, Aliens, Denizens and Foreigners, (except thoſe which be of enmity) may without let, come with their Merchandize, tarry and return.

25 Edw. III. (Stat. 4.) cap. 2. If any Charter, Proclamation, Command, Uſage, Allowance or Judgment be made to the contrary, it ſhall be void.

28 Edw. III. (Stat. 1.) cap. 2. eſtabliſhes the like freedom, as in the time of that King's Progenitors, and there is uſed the word Engliſh Merchants, as in other Statutes the word Denizens.

I obſerve that it was then look'd upon as an ancient right, it having been in the time of his Progenitors.

2 R. II. cap. 1. 11 R. II. cap. 7. and 16 R. II. cap. 1. are to the like purpoſe.

When there has been occaſion to prohibit any Merchandize, it has been done by Acts of Parliament.

27 H. VI. cap. 1. confirmed 28 H. VI. cap. 1. prohibits Merchandize, growing or wrought within the Dominions of the Duke of Burgundy, and the like, 4 E. IV. cap. 5. till that Duke revoked his Proclamation concerning our cloths.

3 E. IV. cap. 4. Forbids importing woollen caps, cloths, laces, &c. and many other Statutes of like nature; whereof ſome in his preſent Majeſty's reign, as concerning Iriſh cattle, French goods, and concerning our Foreign Plantations: all which were vain and needleſs, if the King alone could have reſtrained the ſame.

26 H. VIII. cap. 10. Gives power to the King during his life, to reſtrain or ſet at liberty traffick beyond Sea for certain Countries. Now Henry the VIIIth, as my Lord Coke (Inſt. co. 361.) obſerves, ſtood as high upon his prerogative, as ever any King had done; and would never have accepted his power from a Grant of Parliament, if he had had a prerogative of this nature before.

35 Eliz. cap. 7. It is enacted that the Queen may prohibit tranſporting of corn, by proclamation; and ſo it is 1 Jac. cap. 25. which ſhews that a proclamation, which is an Act of Prerogative, was not ſufficient for the purpoſe, without the authority that was derived upon it from the Acts of Parliament.

My Lord, I ſhall now anſwer Mr. Holt's Arguments, and Allegations.

Firſt, he ſays, that by the Law of the land, no ſubject can trade with Infidels without the King's licence.

But I ſay this is gratis dictum, and I muſt deny the Law to be ſo. He cannot find any Statute, Judgment or Reſolution in all our Law-Books to this purpoſe.

All the authority he has is a caſual ſaying of a ſingle Judge in Michelborn's caſe.

For in Darcy and Allen's caſe, there is not a word ſpoken by Dodderidge, or any other concerning trade with Infidels.

Dodderidge

Dodderidge ſays nothing of foreign trade; cites and affirms the Law of Mag. Charta, cap. 30.

Michelborn's caſe is in 2*d. Brownlow* 296. and it is in theſe words. Hill. 7 Jacobi, in the Common Bench, upon a motion made for conſultation, upon a prohibition awarded, it was ſaid by the Lord Coke, that no ſubject of the King may trade with any Infidels without licence of the King; and the reaſon of that is, he may relinquiſh the Catholick Faith and adhere to Infideliſm. And he ſaid, he had ſeen a licence made in the time of Edw. III. where the King recited that he having a ſpecial truſt and confidence that his ſubjects will not decline from his Faith and Religion; licenced him ut ſupra, and this did ariſe upon a recital of a licence, made to a Merchant to trade to the Eaſt-Indies.

Firſt, To this ſlender authority I anſwer,

If the Law had been according to this conceipt, there would have been much ſaid and done about it in divers caſes; there would have been proceedings againſt perſons that had traded to Granada, (of which the Moors loſt the Dominion within theſe 200 years) to Barbary, to Turky, and other Infidel places in Aſia, Africa, or America, but we never heard, or read of any till now.

Secondly, 'Tis an apocryphal caſe; that Book, called Brownlow, is of little authority, it was printed without approbation of the Judges, or any legal licence.

And the conceipt is of leſs authority, it is reported as dictum obiter, upon a motion, a caſual ſaying of the Judge; which the Clerk took, and likely miſtook, for it is no where ſaid in my Lord Coke's own Books, though they are voluminous. And the ground of his ſaying (if he did ſay it) is, that he had ſeen a licence in Edw. III's time, but I cannot learn that it has been ſeen by any man elſe. Neither Mr. Holt nor I can find it, nor does my Lord Coke tell us where it was; perhaps it was taken upon truſt, and miſtaken, perhaps not authentick, and perhaps a ſufficient anſwer to it would have been found in it: however, it was but one, and certainly if the Law had required it, there would have been more than one licence from the beginning of our Records till that day.

Una Hirundo, &c.

Thirdly, The reaſon there given makes ſtrongly againſt this Charter, the reaſon is, leſt men ſhould decline from the Faith; ſo that it ſeems there is a ſpecial truſt in the King, that he ſhould ſuffer none to go into Infidel parts, but ſuch as are orthodox, ſound and firm in Religion; ſuch of whom the King is ſpecially aſſured that they will not fall from the Faith, this is to be exerciſed by the King only; and he is to grant licence to particular and known perſons of whom he has this confidence, the King cannot grant his royal care to the Company.

But now this Charter would have this truſt deputed and transferred, for it contains a licence not only for the then Members of the Company (who were twenty-two or twenty-three years ago) but their unknown ſucceſſors, and to their ſons begotten, and to be begotten, and their Servants, Factors, Apprentices, and Licenſees.

Mr. Holt alſo gives a reaſon for this trade being unlawful, namely, that the Law has judged Infidels to be perpetual enemies, for which he relies upon another ſingular ſaying of my Lord Coke in Calvin's caſe, fol. 17. and recites two authorites cited there, namely the Regiſter, 282. and 12 H. VIII. 4.

And he takes notice that the children of Iſrael were perverted from the true Religion by converſe with the Nations round about them. And he cites Grotius de Jure belli & pacis, lib. 2. cap. 15. par. 11. where he ſays, Cavendum eſt ne nimia commixtio contagium adferat Infirmis.

As to this ſingular opinion of Infidels being perpetual enemies, it is not eaſy to underſtand what my Lord Coke means by it; his words are theſe.

All Infidels are in Law, perpetui inimici, for between them, as with the Devils whoſe ſubjects they are, and the Chriſtian, there is perpetual hoſtility, and can be no peace; for as the Apoſtle ſays, 2*d Corinthians* 15. What agreement is there of Chriſt with Belial, or what part has the Believer with the Infidel.

It ſeems by theſe words, that it is to be underſtood of a ſpiritual diſcord in reſpect of Religion; and not a temporal between the Nations: for he ſays, 'tis becauſe they are the Devil's ſubjects, and he relies upon the Texts of Scripture: and if this perpetual hoſtility be taken into a political and proper ſenſe, and the Law be ſo, it deſtroys the licence and privilege of the Company, and their action brought, and all poſſibility of ſuch a thing for them. There is not nor can be any peace, treaty, or intercourſe between the Engliſh and the Indians, but a conſtant never-ceaſing ſtate of war; and eſpecially if it be founded upon a Divine Precept: for whatſoever prerogative the King may have, he cannot have a prerogative to diſpenſe with the Canon of the Scripture.

But, my Lord Coke himſelf does much clear this matter, Jur. Co. 155. where he ſays that there may be peace and leagues of commerce with Infidels. All that the Regiſter ſays, is, that the Hoſpitallers were inſtituted for defence contra Chriſti & Chriſtianorum inimicos; which is an expreſſion of enemies of Religion, not of the State. In the book of Henry the VIIIth, he ſaid indeed, obiter, that a perſon out-law'd, a Traitor, or a Pagan being beaten, ſhall not have an action; it is true in caſe of an Outlaw, or a Traitor, it may be pleaded in abatement: but no other Book ſays, nor can any man maintain that the Law is ſo in caſe of a Pagan.

A Pagan, Turk or Jew, may maintain an action of debt or battery, or other perſonal action here; were it otherwiſe, there could be no trading of the Jews here, nor of the Turks; the contrary whereof is implied and admitted in the Act of Navigation, 12 Caroli II. cap. 18. paragr. 18.

By the like reaſon that there ſhou'd be no trading with Infidels, there ought to be no foreign trade at all, for there is no Country where the Religion does not differ in ſomewhat or other, from the Religion eſtabliſh'd in the Church of England.

And whatever he ſays of the children of Iſrael, I think there are many inſtances in the Old Teſtament of commerce with the Heathen, though I not foreſeeing ſuch uſe of Divinity here, am not ſo well furniſh'd.

As to the citation out of Grotius, it is by way of caution only; but the whole drift of that chapter, demonſtrates that commerce and leagues with Infidels are lawful, and he expounds that text of 2 Cor. which my Lord Coke bottoms upon, to refer only to joining with them in Idol worſhip. And to ſhew clearly the mind of that Author, he has writ a whole Book, intitled, Mare Liberum, to manifeſt the right and lawfulneſs of trade to the Indies; and he he ſays that God in nature, appointed all people to reſort to and trade with others, for that he hath given ſeveral commodities to ſome, which others ſtand in need of.

I muſt take leave to ſay, that this notion of Chriſtians not to have commerce with Infidels is a conceit abſurd, monkiſh, phantaſtical and phanatical.

'Tis a-kin to Dominium fundatur in Gratia.

The Indians have a right to trade here, and we there, and this is a right natural and human, which the Chriſtian Faith doth not alter.

I agree with Mr. Holt, that an Act of Parliament made againſt the Chriſtian Religion is void; but I think a Charter againſt natural and civil right is as certainly void.

Mr. Holt further ſays, that publick ſafety and policy are concern'd in this trade, and therefore it ſhould be reſtrainable by the Common Law; and he cites Courteen's caſe, Hob. 270. where ſeveral Merchants were puniſh'd for buying and tranſporting great ſums of money, becauſe (the Book ſays) it was againſt the State-Policy and ſafety of the Kingdom; and ſo puniſhable, and not permitted by the Common Law: and Mr. Holt ſays, that trading with Infidels is in like manner againſt the State-Policy too.

Anſw. That was in the Star-Chamber, and perhaps it was one of the errors for which that Court was diſſolv'd, 16 Car. I. cap. 10. in which Act it is ſaid, that the Judges of that Court had undertaken to puniſh where no Law did warrant.

If tranſporting of money had been prohibited by Common Law, the Statutes 9 E. III. cap. 1. and 5 R. II. cap. 2, &c. had been needleſs; but before thoſe Statutes every man might diſpoſe of his own private money as he wou'd. And in that caſe of Courteen's the offence ſeems to have conſiſted in ingroſſing great quantities, and ſo it more fully appears in a contemporary report of the ſame caſe, in the ſelect caſes added to Popham, 149, and 150. where it is ſaid, that as one ſhall be puniſh'd for ingroſſing commodities, ſo another for great quantities of money, all other commodities being thereby ingroſs'd. And this point of Courteen's caſe is a good authority againſt the privilege claimed by the Company, which in truth is nothing elſe but to ingroſs to themſelves all the commodities of India, &c.

But if the Common Law would have all the treaſure kept within the Realm, it does not follow that we muſt keep all other commodities, and have no trade at all; at leaſt without ſpecial licence, I know no State-Policy or Law for that.

In the next place, Mr. Holt conſiders foreign trade and ſays, the ſubjects have not a right to trade abroad, ad libitum.

Anſw. This is againſt the former argument and the ground of the Plaintiffs declaration, for that was, there ſhou'd be no trade to thoſe places, for a ſpecial cauſe, (viz.) becauſe they were Infidels; but this argument imports, that there ought not to be any trade at all abroad, no not with chriſtian countries without the King's licence.

The reaſon, with which he would ſupport this argument, is, becauſe trade depends upon treaties, and upon the accidents of peace and war, which the King has the power of.

But this too thwarts the former argument, for Infidels he ſays are perpetual enemies; and if ſo, there is no peace nor treaty with them, and therefore no trade to be (as not by the Company) with them.

Beſides, allowing there may be peace and treaties with them, I cannot ſee how this conſideration can conduce to the preſent queſtion; for it cannot be pretended, that the King makes leagues with Indian Princes, that one part of his ſubjects ſhould trade thither, and the reſt ſhould not, or that the King is, or can be in amity with them, as to one part of his ſubjects (namely the Company) and in enmity with them, as to the other of his ſubjects.

The King has, and is to preſerve the highways, but it is to keep them for the paſſage of himſelf and his people; not to ſhut them up againſt any of his people at leaſt, except in caſe of war.

He cites the Statute 12 H. VII. cap. 6. where the Merchant-Adventurers, ſay they had commerce with Spain and Portugal, and other places in league and amity with the King.

No doubt they had, and beyond this is truly ſaid in the ſame Statute, that of right they ought to have it, which ſhews that it was not by the King's grant or licence. And in like manner the Defendant of right ought to have trade with the Indians, there being no war betwixt this Realm and them.

He cites out of Roll's Abridgment, 2 Pars. 214. a note of Rot. Parl. 1 H. V. nu. 41. where the Commons pray that all Merchants may export and import to and from any place, any goods at their pleaſure, paying the cuſtoms and other dues, any proclamation notwithſtanding; the King anſwers, that he will be adviſed by his Council.

And Mr. Holt takes this to be an acknowledgement by them of the legality of the proclamation.

Anſw. It is not ſo, for it was the courſe then, to propoſe and paſs declaratory and confirming (as well as other) Laws, by way of Petitions to the King; and tho' they thought the proclamation illegal, yet it was more proper for them to endeavour to obtain redreſs by prayer, than conteſt. But their Petition was a Petition of Right, and the proclamation (eſpecially if there were no war a-foot) was void, being againſt the Common and Statute Law. And to cite and ſet up ſuch a proclamation, is to ſet up grievance to the Law: and yet I take it there was an extraordinary occaſion at that time, Hen. V. having occaſion to lay an embargo on ſhips, in order to his proceeding to his great war in France.

He ſays that foreign trade may be miſchievous, it may be a nuſance, ſo the importing Iriſh cattle and French goods have been declared to be by the Parliament, and the King may reſtrain ſuch evils.

Anſw. Theſe Acts of Parliament were enacting, and they enact it ſhall be adjudged a common nuſance. They did not find and declare it to have been one before.

If it had been ſo, there had been no need of theſe Acts, and we know the reaſon of that clauſe was to make the matter diſpenſable.

If the importing Eaſt-India commodities be a nuſance, it is not licenceable, and the Company cannot maintain their trade, much leſs their action; unleſs it ſhould be thought that the bringing in of thoſe commodities by the Defendant is a nuſance, but the bringing in the ſame by the Plaintiffs is not.

He inforces this with a reaſon, that there may be miſchief from the abundance of the importation exceeding our exportation, and reſembling it to what is ſaid 10 Rep. 141. that by the Common Law the the King ought to ſave and defend his Realm as well againſt the Sea as againſt enemies; that it ſhould not be drowned nor waſted; and as the King may prevent inundation of water, ſo he ſays, he may as to trade.

Anſw. This is a ſimilitude in words, but not as to the nature of things, and if there be any force in in, it is againſt the Plaintiffs; for there is not in their Charter any limitation, the Company may bring in as much as they will, nay, it ſeems by their allegation, that this trade is to be managed moſt largely by means of the Company, and therefore thence is rather the danger of the glut.

Mr. Holt makes it a great argument to maintain the Charter, that it is a neceſſary regulation of the trade, and that the trade could not have been ſettled but by ſuch a Company; and ſays, if it ſhould be laid open, it would ruin the trade both of the Company and the Defendant.

And it is averred in the declaration, that this trade cannot be managed, but per hujuſmodi Corpus Corporatum.

Anſw. This contradicts Michelborn's caſe, for that was upon a licence granted to a ſingle Merchant to trade to the Eaſt-Indies; and it is known that this trade has been manag'd by private perſons before, and ſince there was a Company.

And this is to ſet up convenience or pretence of convenience againſt Law; the Statute, which we have pleaded, ſays that all trade ſhall be open; the Plaintiffs ſay, it ſhall be open to them only, becauſe they can manage it beſt.

If other men ſhould ſay that they could manage it better, the pretence were as fair for them to exclude the Company from the trade.

But I except againſt this averment, it is a frivolous and impoſſible averment, no iſſue can be taken upon it, unleſs iſſue ſhould be taken upon a ſimilitude, (viz.) hujuſmodi Corpus Corporatum.

If a licence were granted (as it is ſaid to be in Michelborn's caſe) to one man to trade to the Eaſt-Indies; and he ſhould bring ſuch an action, and aver that the trade could not be managed but by ſuch an one as he, it would not be good, and yet as good as this is. In an action for words, it is not allowable to alledge that the Defendant ſpoke ſuch words, or hujus ſimilia.

Moreover, the declaration as it is penn'd, contradicts itſelf; for it ſays, that the trade cannot be managed but by the Company, and yet charges the Defendant, that he did manage a trade there; which is not poſſible, and it is penal enough upon the Defendant, that he attempts to manage trade where he cannot.

Mr. Holt objects, that the Statute we plead, ought not be taken univerſally, that the Sea ſhall be open to all Merchants; for then it would extend to give liberty of trade to the King's enemies who are Merchants.

Anſw. True it is, neither this, nor any ſuch Law extends further than to Alien Armies and Subjects, there are jura belli, as well as jura pacis; and it is underſtood, that enemies who are foreigners may be taken and proceeded againſt according to martial Law; but the Defendant is a ſubject, and cannot be an enemy.

He ſays further, that this Statute ſhould not extend to this trade, becauſe that in Edw. III's time, when it was made, trade was driven with Chriſtians only, and not with Infidels.

If this be ſo, it deſtroys the only authority, he has (viz.) Michelborn's caſe, where the only ground of the opinion is, that there was a licence granted to trade with Infidels, in the time of the ſaid Ed. III.

But this Statute muſt be taken as it is penned univerſally, and not confined to thoſe countries, places and parts which were then uſed; the Statute does not diſtinguiſh, & ubi lex non diſtinguit, ne nos diſtinguimus, otherwiſe no man muſt trade, but to thoſe few places that he can prove were traded to before, 18 E. III.

He ſays (as ff. n. b. 85.) that the King may reſtrain men, by Ne Exeat Regnum, from going beyond Sea; and cites Davis, 9. b. that one reaſon of the King's being intitled by preſcription to the great cuſtom, was for his leave to Merchants to go and carry goods out of the Realm.

Anſw. It is true, that Book of Davis does ſay ſo, but he cites to prove the opinion, Dyer 165. and this Statute 18 E. III. which we have pleaded; ſo, that that Book is of no further uſe, than the authorities upon which it is founded do warrant: which, if we examine, we ſhall find that in Dyer it is among other things made a quære, in a caſe referred to the Judges concerning a new impoſition ſet by Queen Mary on Merchandize, whether by Common Law, Merchants were, or might be reſtrain'd from going out of the Kingdom, without leave of the King or Queen; to which the Judges give no reſolution: which ſhews, they thought the Law was, that there was no ſuch reſtraint or need of leave, for when Judges give no reſolution, in the caſe of the King, it is a ſign that in their opinion the Law is againſt him, and for the Statute 18 E. III. which we plead, it is flat againſt it.

F. N. B. 85. a. is expreſs, that by Common Law, every ſubject may go out of the Kingdom for Merchandize, or Travel, or other cauſes as he pleaſes, without leave, V. Co. pl. Cor. 180.

5 R. II. cap. 2. Reſtrains people paſſing out, but it excepts Merchants, and even that Statute is repeal'd. 4 Jacobi, cap. 1. 'tis clear that the King may reſtrain his ſubjects from going out of the Realm, by his Writ of Ne Exeat Regnum. But that Writ was originally for the Clergy only, and is properly granted for matter of State only; and the words of it are, Quam plurima nobis & Coronæ noſtræ præjudicialia ibidem proſequi intendis. Of late indeed it has been extended to confine a perſon to abide the Juſtice of a Court here, but I think no further. It is always to reſtrain a man from ſomething unlawful, and againſt the duty of a ſubject; never to reſtrain from a lawful Act, as trade is.

Neither is it general or univerſal, but always particular, and granted upon oath, made concerning a particular perſon; and ſince there needs ſuch a ſpecial Writ to reſtrain an obnoxious perſon, it proves the Law to be, that all other perſons are at liberty to go.

And there was no Ne Exeat Regnum againſt the Defendant, nor cauſe for any, and if there had been; and he had gone againſt it, though it were an offence to the King, it would not give cauſe of action to the Plaintiffs.

He cites Co. Litt. 5. a. That no ſubject can build a caſtle or a fortreſs without the King's licence, and 11 Rep. 87. b. and Co. Magna Charta 199. that no man can make a park without the King's licence; and 11 H. VII. 13. that the King may licence; where if one kill another, it is no felony.

Anſw. Theſe inſtances agree not to our caſe; a man may not build caſtles without the King's licence, any

any more than raiſe forces, or appropriate beaſts, which are feræ naturæ, and the King's game; much leſs take away the lives of the King's ſubjects; but there is no parity of reaſon, that a man ſhould not uſe an innocent trade.

It is more ſuitable thereto, to inſtance, that a man may without licence build a houſe, or make a hedge, and incloſe a garden or field, and thereby preſerve the lives of himſelf and his family.

In the next place, Mr. Holt ſays there's a great deal of difference between trading in a Company, and trading out of a Company; that this Charter is good becauſe it gives the trade to a Company, and being a Company, and Chriſtians, they will take care that their Agents and Factors keep up to the Chriſtian Religion; but other people will converſe only with Infidels, and cannot have Divine Offices.

Anſw. It is not requir'd by the Charter, that the Members taken into the Company, ſhould be Chriſtians, and their ſons, ſervants, and factors may be no Chriſtians, nor are they bound to have Divine Offices. And the Defendant and others are likewiſe Chriſtians, and may have Divine Offices as well as they; and in this trade, the Defendant and thoſe with him, converſe with the ſame perſons, as the Company and their Agents do, or if not, then there is no interfering, no cauſe of complaint.

He obſerves out of the Journal of the Houſe of Commons, 43 Eliz. that the Houſe of Commons fell vigorouſly upon Monopolies; and there was brought in a catalogue of them, but therein is nothing of the Eaſt-India trade, tho' there was ſuch a Charter then in being.

Anſw. I know not whether there was ſuch a Charter then in being; but if there were, poſſibly it was not taken notice of, or poſſibly no grievance then appear'd from it; and likely that Company was better adviſ'd, than to endeavour to reſtrain others from trade.

Beſides, I have heard a Vote of the Houſe of Commons cited ſometimes, but never knew the ſilence of the Houſe of Commons cited for authority before; doubtleſs in that Parliament, as in others, the Members complain'd of thoſe grievances, which then affected the Boroughs and Places they ſerv'd for: they undertake not to enumerate all the Monopolies, that were or might be, and it is moſt prudent, in order to obtain redreſs, to limit their complaints to the preſent occaſion.

Firſt, Mr. Holt mentions three Statutes, 3 Jacobi, cap. 6. there having been a Charter obtain'd by ſome Merchants for ſole trade into the Dominions of Spain and Portugal. It is enacted, that it ſhall, and may be lawful, for all ſubjects to trade thither, notwithſtanding that Charter or any other; and thereupon he infers, that the Parliament takes the Charter to be good, and therefore enact that the trade ſhall be laid open.

Anſw. There is no juſt ground for this inference.

Firſt, It were a ſtrain beyond the Plaintiffs own foundation, for that it related to a trade to Spain or Portugal, which are Chriſtian Countries.

Secondly, The preamble of the Act ſets forth reaſons enough, to deſtroy the Patent at Common Law, (viz.) that all ſubjects ought to enjoy equally the benefit of peace and free trade; that otherwiſe the ſubjects of England would be in a worſe condition than thoſe of Scotland and Ireland; that it was attended with the impoveriſhing of Merchants, Mariners and Manufacturers, leſſening the price of their commodities, and inhancing foreign, &c.

Thirdly, The Act calls it a common traffick, and does not only ſay it ſhall be lawful, but that there ſhall be free liberty to trade there, in ſuch ſort and manner as was accuſtomed: ſo that the Act did not make the Charter illegal, but found it ſo, as being an innovation againſt what is uſed and ought to be.

Alſo he mentions the Statute of Monopolies, 21 Jacobi, cap. 3. wherein he obſerves, there is a proviſo to ſave the Companies or Societies of Merchants. And the Statute 14 Caroli II. cap. 24. which in the preamble declares the putting in of Stock into the Eaſt-India Company to be for publick good.

Anſw. That laſt Statute indeed in the preamble ſays, it is for publick good, but it is the publick good of the Company; and the ſame preamble ſays, that divers Noblemen, Gentlemen, and other perſons of quality, not bred to trade or merchandize, did put in Stock there; and enacts, that they ſhall not in that reſpect be reckon'd Traders, and ſo liable to a Commiſſion of Bankrupt: whereupon I might obſerve, that this Company is not to be reckon'd a Company of Merchants, and therefore not within the proviſo, 21 Jacobi, above-mentioned.

But I give this further anſwer concerning that proviſo: the words of it are, Provided alſo, and it is hereby further intended, declared and enacted, that this Act, or any thing therein contain'd, ſhall not in any wiſe extend, or be prejudicial to the City of London, &c. or to any Companies, or Societies of Merchants within this Realm; erected for the maintenance, enlargement or ordering of any trade, or merchandize, but that the ſame, and their liberties, privileges, powers and immunities ſhall be, and continue of ſuch force and effect, as they were before the making of this Act, and of none other, any thing before in this Act to the contrary in any wiſe notwithſtanding.

Now firſt this is but a general ſaving; and ſuppoſing, as Mr. Holt does, that there was ſuch an Eaſt-India Company then in being; if the Parliament had had as favourable an opinion of their Charter, as they had of Manſell's or Maxwell's, or the other there mention'd, they would have ſaved it by particular mention, as they did thoſe, which would have been ſome countenance to ſuch a Charter.

Secondly, Admitting it ſaved generally or particularly by the proviſo, that does not make it better; the proviſo only ſays, it ſhall continue of ſuch force and effect, as it was before the making of the Act, and none other: i. e. If notwithſtanding the body of the Act, if it were a Monopoly and void before, it ſhall remain ſo; and if it were good before, it ſhall remain ſo, notwithſtanding the proviſo.

If it be asked, to what purpoſe the proviſo was made, it is anſwer'd clearly thus; the Statute giving an additional penalty of treble damages and double coſts againſt any perſon, that ſhould after forty days, after the end of that Seſſion of Parliament, hinder, grieve, diſturb or diſquiet any perſon, or any ways ſeize, attach, diſtrain, take, carry away or detain his goods, by occaſion or pretext of any Monopoly, or of any ſuch Commiſſion, Grant, Licence, Power, Faculty, Letters Patents, &c.

Now the proviſo, appointing that nothing in the Act ſhall extend to any Society or Company of Merchants, it ſaves perſons that ſhall hinder, grieve, diſturb or diſquiet others by occaſion or pretext of ſuch a Society, or Company from that penalty; ſo that the Plaintiffs have this advantage from the proviſo, (if they are at all within it) that they ſhall not be liable to the Defendant's treble damages and double coſts for bringing this preſent Suit againſt him.

6 Car. Jones 231. Mounſon verſus Liſter, was a caſe concerning an office granted by Letters Patent, 4 Jacobi, for ſole making all Bills, Informations and Letters miſſive in the Council of York. Now the next proviſo in the Statute, does ſave Offices in the ſame manner, as this proviſo does Societies or Companies of Merchants. It was adjudged, that tho' this grant of this office were ſaved by the proviſo, yet it was ſtill a Monopoly and void; it being unreaſonable that one perſon ſhould have the making of all bills, &c. which is proper work for Counſel or Attorneys, and that (in caſe of croſs-bill) both parties ſhould be obliged to diſcloſe their evidence to that perſon; but by reaſon of this proviſo, this Grantee ſhould not be liable to the treble damages and double coſts; the proviſo ſaves us againſt that Statute, but does not eſtabliſh againſt the Common Law.

Beſides, this proviſo does not at all extend to this Charter, it only concerns ſuch as were then in being, and ſays they ſhall continue in ſuch force, as they were before the making of that Statute. But this Company that is now Plaintiff, was made not long ſince, viz. by Charter 13. of this King.

Mr. Holt cites ſeven precedents of Grants by Queen Eliz. of ſole trading to ſeveral Infidel parts.

To which I anſwer, that the more there are of this kind, the ſtronger the argument is for us; for the greater occaſion has been adminiſtred to bring actions or informations of this nature, but none was ever brought; and the reaſon why none has been brought, is, becauſe none could be upon this ſcore.

The clauſes in this Charter, for forfeiting ſhip and goods, and impriſonment, &c. may as well be cited for precedents hereafter; and yet it will not be denied, that at leaſt ſome of theſe clauſes are void: it has been frequent to inſert clauſes in Charters, which will not hold water, they ſerve for a flouriſh and in terrorem, like the penalty of 1000 l. in a Subpœna.

Alſo theſe Charters were temporary, and they were bottom'd upon ſome new diſcovery of a trade or a paſſage; and in truth that is the only good foundation, upon which ſuch a Charter can be granted. Godb. 254. when a new invention or diſcovery has been made, or is making by any perſon, by his skill, charge, and perhaps peril of his life; the King may remunerate him with ſuch a Grant, but that muſt be only for a reaſonable number of years, and no further by the Common Law: and before the Statute of Monopolies, 21 Jacobi adjuſted that reaſonable time to fourteen years. And I take it that the firſt Grant made in England, to perſons for ſole trade to the Eaſt-Indies, was upon ſuggeſtion and conſideration of their being firſt tradders there, and that was for fifteen years, which is long ſince expir'd. Though it ſeems, trade to the Eaſt-Indies, was known to other Europeans many hundred years ago.

Impiger extremos currit Mercator ad Indos, Per Mare. Hor.

I ſhall mention two or three Acts of Parliament, which do countenance and encourage free trade by any perſon to the Eaſt-Indies.

17 Caroli I. cap. 21. it is made a Premunire to hinder any perſons from importing Salt-Petre; the Defendant did import Salt-Petre in this Ship, and and ſo do all Ships that come from the Eaſt-Indies; it is their uſual ballaſt.

12 Caroli II. cap. 18. parag. 3. (confirm'd and re-enacted 13 Car. II. cap. 14.) forbids the bringing in of any goods of Africa, Aſia, or America, and in any Veſſel, but ſuch as belong to the people of England, Ireland, Wales, and Berwick, or of the King's foreign plantations. And paragr. 13. mentions Eaſt-India commodities. Here was juſt occaſion for the Parliament to take notice of the Company (for this preſent Charter was in being in 13, when the laſt Act paſſed, and a like former Charter in being in 12, when the firſt paſſed) and ſo they would, if they had thought the trade reſtrained to the Company. But they ſeem to allow, that theſe goods may be imported in any Engliſh or Iriſh Veſſels, whether of the Company or of other perſons.

22 and 23 Car. II. cap. 11. 'tis enacted, That all and every perſon or perſons, that ſhall build or cauſe to be built any ſhip or veſſel of three decks, with a fore-caſtle, and five foot between each deck, mounted with thirty pieces of ordnance, and other ammunition proportionable; ſhall for the firſt two voyages, which the ſaid ſhip or ſhips make from his Majeſty's Dominions to any foreign port, have and receive to their own proper uſe and benefit one tenth part: and all perſons that ſhall build any ſhips of two decks, above three hundred tuns and thirty guns, ſhall have one twentieth part of the Cuſtoms, that ſhall be paid to his Majeſty for all ſuch goods or merchandize, as ſhall be exported or imported on the ſaid ſhip or ſhips, to and from this Kingdom.

'Tis known, that ſuch ſhips uſed to be built and imployed for the Eaſt-India trade, and not for trade to any Chriſtian Country; but the Act takes no notice of this Company, or of a licence to be from the King; but allows and declares, that all and every perſon and perſons may build any ſhip of three decks, and make a voyage with her to any foreign part, and encourage people ſo to do, with a reward; to which reward (if the Defendant's ſhip be within the circumſtances) the Defendant might be entitled, for this voyage for which he is now ſued. And certainly no Law appoints a reward and a puniſhment for the ſame thing.

I will eſtabliſh this point with two authorities, not of a private nature, like dormant Patents, but the judgment of Parliaments, and of the Court of King's-Bench.

1 & 2 Ph. & Mar. the Muſcovy Company was erected by Letters Patent, and therein a clauſe, to reſtrain all others from trading upon a like penalty as here; but notwithſtanding that, other people did trade thither: and thereupon 8 Eliz. an Act of Parliament was made, reciting the Charter, and that other perſons did trade thither notwithſtanding; and therefore enacts, that the Charter ſhall ſtand, and no other perſon ſhall trade thither, which ſhews the judgment of the Parliament, that without this Act, the reſtraint was not good.

The other concern'd the late Canary Company.

It is Mich. 20 Car. II. Rot. 403. Banco Regis, Horn 118, &c. Ivy.

They had a Charter with like reſtraint and penalties as in this; and in treſpaſs brought for ſeizing the ſhip, the Defendant juſtified by virtue of the Charter, and judgment was given for the Plaintiff againſt the Charter by the uniform opinion of the whole Court.

That caſe indeed was not the ſame with this, as to the manner; but as to the matter and ſubſtance it is the ſame.

I ſhall conclude this point with an obſervation of my Lord Coke, Jur. Co. 31. that Acts of Parliament againſt the freedom of merchandize never hold long.

If that be the fate of Acts of Parliament, which are Laws, certainly a Charter made to ſuch purpoſe, ought not to be allowed.

The ſecond Point.

I take the Law to be clear with F. N. B. 85. a. that every ſubject may go out of the Kingdom for merchandize as he pleaſes, and whither he pleaſes without asking leave of the King, and ſhall not be puniſh'd for it.

But now taking it by admiſſion, that perſons are reſtrain'd, and that the Defendant ought not to have traded to the Eaſt-Indies without licence; yet I conceive this action upon the caſe can never be maintained.

In maintenaince of it, Mr. Holt ſays, that this privilege of trade granted to the Company is a franchiſe; and if another violates it, the Grantee may have an action of the caſe againſt that perſon, as 22 H. VI. 14. and 11 H. IV. 47. where the King has granted a Fair or Market, if a man ſet up another Fair or Market to the damage of the former, he that has the Grant ſhall have an action in the caſe.

I obſerve, that in the arguing of the firſt point, Mr. Holt all along called this a licence, which now (to ſupport this ſecond point) he would have a franchiſe; but theſe two things differ greatly. A franchiſe (underſtood properly) is an Hereditament, a thing of Intereſt, and aſſignable and transferrable. But a licence is only Relaxatio Juris, a diſpenſation with the Law, a privilege to certain perſons to do an Act with impunity. When the King grants a market, he creates or grants a real thing; but when he gives liberty to trade, he does not create or grant a real thing, but only diſcharges or prevents a penalty inflictable for trading without ſuch leave.

When the King creates or grants a Market to any perſon, if he make a Grant of another Market to another perſon, to the damage of the firſt, it will be void, becauſe the Grantee has a franchiſe that is a real intereſt; and the Grantee may have an action of the caſe againſt him that ſets up a Market under pretence of ſuch a Grant, as well as he may againſt a man that ſets up a Market without any pretence of Grant.

But if the King licenſe any perſon to trade, he may notwithſtanding licenſe others too, although that be to the damage of the firſt; for he has not convey'd any intereſt to the firſt, that ſhould hinder him from diſpenſing with others.

There is no bottom for this action to ſtand upon, there are but two things in the Charter towards it; firſt, a licence to the Company to trade; ſecondly, a prohibition and reſtraint to others, whereby the Company is to have the ſole trade.

If the King had only granted a licence to the Company to trade to the Eaſt-Indies; the Company could not thereupon have an action againſt the Defendant, for trading thither. Now when the King in the ſame Charter, adds a reſtraint and prohibition to the Defendant and all other ſubjects; this Mr. Holt would have to be no more than the Law ſaid before; but if it be more, this does not add any real intereſt to the Company, or better entitle them to an action.

Suppoſe it be an offence, and puniſhable for the Defendant to trade to the Eaſt-Indies without the King's licence; the King diſpenſes to the Plaintiffs, ſo that they may trade there freely; then the Defendant trades there without licence, this may (according to that ſuppoſition) ſubject him to penalty at the ſuit of the King, but this gives no title to levy money upon the Defendant for trading without licence, there is no privity, no cauſe of action.

The reſolution at the end of the Caſe of Monopolies, 11 Rep. 88. b. is a clear authority to this purpoſe: Cards were prohibited by Act of Parliament to be imported; and the Queen grants to Darcy that he ſhould have the ſole importation of Cards, non obſtante that Statute; and during that Grant, another man imported Cards, againſt whom Darcy brought an action on the Caſe for it, and therein alledged too that he had been at great charge to make and provide Cards ſufficient. But reſolved that the action would not lie; but for puniſhing the party, the remedy which the Statute appointed againſt importing muſt be follow'd.

It is inſiſted upon, that the Plaintiffs have been at great charge to carry on this trade, and by others interloping they ſhould loſe the fruits of it.

The Defendant has as much to ſay that he has been at great charge, and by reſtraining and proſecuting him he ſhou'd be a loſer.

But I ſay, this is damnum ſine injuriâ. In the mention'd Books of 22 H. VI. 14. and 11 H. IV. 47. it is held, that the action on the caſe would not lie, which was brought by a Schoolmaſter (or two) for that he had an ancient ſchool in a town, and one ſet up another near, ſo that whereas before he had two ſhillings a quarter for a boy, now he could have but one ſhilling: ſo for erecting a mill, that withdraws cuſtom from a former mill, no action lies.

In every action on the caſe, there muſt be damnum & injuria, there muſt be a wrong to the party plaintiff: it is no wrong to the Plaintiffs here, that another offends againſt that Law, which is diſpens'd with to them.

If the Defendant's trading without the King's leave, be an offence againſt the King, it is puniſhable by the King ſtill, and that way of puniſhment muſt be follow'd, if there is to be any; beſides, all the foundation the Plaintiffs ſhould ſtand upon is the Charter, but they do not follow that; the Charter appoints the penalty to be forfeiture of ſhip and goods, whereof one half to the King, but no action on the caſe is given, or meant, wherein the damage may be more or leſs, and wherein the King is excluded from any ſhare.

If an Act of Parliament prohibit under forfeiture of ſhip and goods, the one half to the King, the other to the party, that muſt be followed, there ſhall never be an action on the caſe; for the Common Law ſhuts it up with a ſtrong negative, and ſays there ſhall be no other penalty. And in all caſes of Statutes, By-Laws and Charters, the method of puniſhment preſcribed muſt be obſerved.

To obviate this the Plaintiffs have been cautelous, and have miſrecited the Charter in their declaration; they, to let in a pretence for their action, recite cite the prohibition or reſtraint, and ſtop there, as if the prohibition were abſolute and general; whereas it is ſub modo, under a ſpecial penalty of forfeiture.

And this appears upon Oyer, and therefore for this variance, judgment ought to be for the Defendant, if there were nothing elſe in the caſe.

But waving this concerning the form of the Suit, I inſiſt upon the main matter.

There is a natural neceſſity that every man that will live muſt eat, and thence a neceſſity and obligation to labour; and there is a property in this means of livelihood as well as in life.

The King's power and prerogative is to eſtabliſh and preſerve this to all his ſubjects.

Traffick is one of the honeſteſt and juſteſt ſorts of induſtry, and is more eſpecially proper for an Iſland.

The King cannot prohibit merchandize, nor lay a penny impoſition upon it; therefore our Kings have receiv'd tunnage and poundage from the Grants of Parliaments: whereas if they had ſuch a power (as the Plaintiffs Counſel ſpeak off) over all trade, they might by the means of that, have made an undeniable title to ſuch a revenue, without the conſent of the Lords and Commons.

Reſtraining of trade (though but for a time or place) is one of the great things which has been always reſerved to, and exerciſed by authority of Parliament, as we find almoſt in every Seſſions.

This which is now before your Lordſhip, is the greateſt Monopoly that has been attempted. It monopolizes Africa, Aſia, and America, at leaſt on the South; it devours above half the trade of the Nation, the trade of Linnens from Hamburgh, Flanders, and Holland; Silks from Italy and Turky, and, when the prohibition expires, from France; and affects our Manufactures at home, upon all which the livelihood of many thouſands depends.

It is againſt the Common Law and many expreſs Statutes.

No man was ever puniſhed in any Court for uſing foreign trade, no not in the Star-Chamber, which extends the prerogative moſt. It is Caſus primæ impreſſionis, although there has been great occaſion to have had precedents if any ſuch action could have lain.

But as this is the firſt that has been brought, I ſhall preſume it will receive that juſt diſcouragement from your Lordſhips, that it will be the laſt. And I pray your Judgment for the Defendant.

Mr. Sollicitor-General Finch (afterwards Earl of Ailesford) his Argument.

De Term. Paſch. Anno Regni Regis Caroli ſecundi xxxvi. Die Sabbati xix Aprilis, Anno Dom. 1684. Banco Regis.

The Eaſt-India Company againſt Thomas Sandys.

MR. Juſtice Withins. Mr. Sollicitor-General, do you argue that caſe to-day?

Mr. Sollicitor-General. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Juſtice Withins. Mr. Pollexfen, do you argue on the other ſide?

Mr. Pollexfen. I do, Sir.

Mr. Juſtice Withens. Then, Gentlemen, let him come down to the Bar.

Mr. Sollicitor-General. My Lord, this is an Action upon the caſe, brought by the Eaſt-India Company againſt Sandys; wherein they do ſet forth that the King, reciting former Letters Patent granted to this Company to incorporate it, did grant a Charter to ſuch particular men, and made them a Corporation by the name of the Governour, &c. and did grant to them the ſole trade, in all the parts upon the Coaſts of Aſia, Africa, and America, from the Cape of Good-Hope to the Streights of Magellan. And further, that he did likewiſe grant to this Company and ſucceſſors the ſole trade; and granted to them, that no other of the King's ſubjects ſhould trade within thoſe limits, and did expreſly prohibit all his ſubjects to trade thither, not being of the Company without a licence from them. Then they ſay, that Mr. Sandys being one of the King's ſubjects, did take upon him to trade within the limits of thoſe Letters Patent, to wit, at Meſiapotan, not having a licence from their Company, or any other authority to do it. And this, they lay to their damage of 1000 l.

Mr. Sandys to this, after he prayed Oyer of the Letters Patents, which are ſet forth in hæc verba, pleads the Statute of 18 E. III. which ſays, that the Sea ſhall be open, and all Merchants ſhall go with their merchandize, where they pleaſe. To this Plea we have demurred.

Upon this Record, the Queſtions will be theſe two.

Firſt, Whether or no the Patent to the Eaſt-India Company, with a prohibition to all others to trade within their limits, therein ſet forth, be a good Patent. The next is,

Secondly, Whether admitting it to be a good Patent, this action will lie; that is, whether it be a bare licence to the Company, or whether it paſs ſuch an Intereſt to the Company with that licence, as will entitle them to an action againſt any, that ſhall intrude or incroach upon their trade.

Firſt, My Lord, I am to prove that this Grant is good, and here theſe conſiderations will fall in.

Firſt, Whether the King had power at Common Law to have made ſuch a Grant.

Secondly, Whether that power be any ways abridged by any Act of Parliament, as it is much inſiſted upon by the other ſide.

Anſw. Firſt, That the King had ſuch a power at Common Law, I conceive is plain for theſe reaſons.

Firſt, Becauſe no ſubject at the Common Law had a right to trade with Infidels, no nor to go thither without licence from the King, firſt had and obtained.

Secondly, No ſuch trade can be eſtabliſhed without precedent treaties, and no ſuch treaties can be made by ſubjects, without licence from the King to make them. If therefore this Patent does not reſtrain any natural liberty or right, that the ſubject had, but is introductive of a new one, they had not before; it will not fall out to be within the definition of a Monopoly, in which it is one eſſential part, that it reſtrains people from that liberty, they had before.

Now that no ſubject had a right at Common Law to trade with Infidels, or to go into an Infidel Country, without licence from the King, will be evident thus. And,

Firſt, It will be very conſiderable, before we enter upon that queſtion, particularly, to ſee how all right in general to trade ſtands circumſtantiated; and there it is plain,

Firſt, That there is no trade, but what depends upon the good will and pleaſure of the foreign prince with whom it is, whether he will admit it or no; that is pretty clear.

Secondly, This may be reſtrained by a total prohibition of any commerce with that Prince or Nation, by the King here.

Thirdly, Tho' every man now, and Merchants always were at liberty to go abroad without licence; yet the King may reſtrain any man by the Writ Ne Exeat Regnum, from going out of the Kingdom; and that without ſhewing any particular cauſe why, or alledging any matter that is traverſable and triable with the King. And,

Fourthly and Laſtly, If any foreign Prince, upon concluding any league or treaty with the King, ſhould reſtrain trade to any number of perſons, or any particular qualification of manner of proceeding in it; I ſee not how any man can pretend to a right, to act contrary to that, in breach of ſuch a league or treaty made with the King by ſuch a foreign Prince.

Then we ſay further, by the Statute of 3 and 4 Jacobi, which opens the trade to Spain and Portugal, that does ſhow plainly that that trade was before incloſed; and it does not ſhow that the Incloſure of it was illegal, but gives a right that was reſtrained before: and yet I am far from affirming that the ſubject has no right to trade, tho' it has been objected that this clogs it, and makes it as none. And therefore, they held it abſolutely neceſſary to diſaffirm that power and prerogative, which the Law, for the publick good, does repoſe in the King, and that upon reaſons that will not hold, nor are ſo fit to be urged in decency: for I take it, the poſſibility of the abuſe of power, is no objection againſt that power. For by this argument, tho' the King has a power and prerogative by Law, to reſtrain ſubjects from going beyond Sea, by a Ne Exeat Regnum, no, ſay they, he cannot; for then he may reſtrain all his ſubjects from going out of the Kingdom, and ſo impriſon and hinder every one from going out of the Nation. It is the ſame argument with this, that they urge the King claims a prerogative to reſtrain ſuch trade upon occaſion; they ſay this argument cannot hold, for by this rule he may reſtrain all commerce and trade whatſoever: ſo that this way of arguing does ſtrike at all power, and I need give no other reaſon for it, for there can be no power at all, which is not accompanied with ſome truſt; and there is no truſt, but it poſſibly (morally ſpeaking) may be broken. So that this is no argument againſt the right of the ſubject to trade on the one ſide, nor againſt the prerogative of the King on the other, in whom the Law has repoſed a truſt to regulate and qualify trade.

But, my Lord, in this caſe the queſtion is not of ſo large an extent, nor ſo general as this is: but only here it is a queſtion, how that right ſtands with reſpect to Infidels, and that is the queſtion before your Lordſhip.

And I cannot but obſerve, in my entrance into the queſtion, that unleſs the Law had once been held clear in this matter, this could not have come to be any ſubject of debate now, for no ſuch trade as this, could ever have been gained to the Nation; for none could have ventured upon ſo hazardous an enterprize, or ſo chargeable a project as this was, if it had been any doubt whether thoſe that run no ſuch adventure ſhould be admitted to reap the firſt fruits of it.

So that this queſtion, as it tends to overthrow this trade, if the Law be taken to be as they wou'd have it, ſo it overthrows the Turky trade too, which ſtands upon the ſame foundation, with reſpect to the prohibition by Letters Patent as this does: for the queſtion is not, upon how eaſy terms the privileges are to be obtain'd, as it is confeſſed the terms are eaſier in the Turky Company, than in the Eaſt-India Company; but whether any terms at all are requiſite: and if any terms can be impos'd upon it, then thoſe are good; if none, then that will overthrow the Turky trade, and all the trade of the Nation. And ſurely if they can prevail in this queſtion, the ſubjects, for whoſe right they pretend ſo much to ſtand up, will have little cauſe to thank them for ſtanding up for a right, as they call it, againſt the very Intereſt of the Nation. But to return to our argument.

The ſubject can have no ſuch right to trade with Infidels without licence from the King; for they are looked upon as enemies, not only in a ſpiritual ſenſe, as they are of a contrary Faith and Religion, but they are ſo treated in Law; and the reſolutions of the Law are ſuch as we may ſee in Calvin's caſe, and the 12 H. VIII. which is a Book they cited, and was quoted here before, upon the firſt argument of this caſe; where it is held, that a Pagan, tho' he be beaten, cannot have or maintain any action at all, becauſe he is perpetuus inimicus: ſo an Alien enemy can neither maintain a real or perſonal action, as it is ſaid in the 1ſt Inſtit. 129. B. ſo a Jeweſs, tho' born here, and marrying a converted Jew, ſhall not be endowed, and ſo is the ſame Book 32. So they are look'd upon no more than common Aliens; for we ſee that tho' they are born here, yet they have not the capacities ſo much as of Denizens, for they ſhall not be endowed as Denizens may. And tho' my Lord Coke, by the way, ſays in that Book, no Alien can be endowed; yet I find in the Parliament-Rolls a Petition of the Commons, it is in 8 H. V. m. 16. they pray that Female Aliens may be endowed, and the King's anſwer is, let it be as it is deſired. But I mention that only by the by, for it is not at all relating to our queſtion, but for that the other reſolution goes to it, that an Infidel is always to be treated as an enemy.

But, my Lord, further, that all Infidels are likewiſe Aliens and Enemies, in reſpect of their properties which they gain here; it is to be gather'd from what I find in Rot. finium, 50 H. III. m. 5. the King releaſes a debt, that was owing to a Jew, and in the ſame Roll, 49 H. III. Rot. finium, there are divers pardons of debts owing to Jews, ſome in recompence for ſervice done, and others in compaſſion of the poor, that they had drawn in to be engaged for great ſums to them.

Rot. Parl. 13 E. I. m. 4. A Jew died, and the King granted away his goods, and his Widow redeem'd them for 1000 l. and the King granted to the Jeweſs, that he would not diſcharge any debts, that were owing to her. This ſhews their properties were all at the King's mercy; and ſometimes the King granted licence to them, and gave them leave to aſſign their debts, Rot. Parl. 3 E. I. m. 6. which recites that it was provided by King Hen. III. that no Jew ſhould ſell his goods without licence. The King grants a licence to Judeo Noſtro to ſell a debt of 20 l. that was owing him from the Biſhop of Bath and Wells; and doubtleſs the reaſon of that Law in Hen. IIId's time, was, that the King might prevent any miſchief, that might follow upon an unlicenſed commerce between his ſubjects and thoſe Infidels: and this appears plainly by conſidering, that by the ancient Law of the Land, no Jew could inhabit any where within the Kingdom, but where by cuſtom they were permitted to dwell; and ſo is Rot. Clauſ. 1 E. I. m. 7. in dorſo; they had gone and inhabited at Wincheſter, but they were removed thence, and the Record tells you the reaſon why, Amoti, &c.

They had particular Juſtices aſſigned over to them, to determine their cauſes, and that you ſee Rot. Clauſ. 49 H. III. m. 4. the King conſtitutes two Juſtices ad Cuſtod. Judæorum, and gives them power to determine their Pleas in the places, where they were accuſtomed to inhabit.

And there is in Rot. Parl. 13 E. I. m. 7. a very remarkable Record to this purpoſe, Rex dilecto, &c.

My Lord, I find another Record like this in the Patent-Rolls of that year; for we ſee what care the Law took, that Chriſtians ſhould not be circumvented by the Jews; and the Government had an eye upon them, that they ſhould not have commerce one with another; that recognizances ſhou'd be enter'd in the preſence of Chriſtians. That Record is thus, Rex omnibus, &c.

We ſee a man here, that deals with a Jew, and buys things of him without licence, and the King grants that he would not trouble him, or proceed againſt him by Law for that offence.

By the ancient Law it appears, that if a Chriſtian marry'd a Jew, it was felony, and the party offending was to be burnt; ſo is the 3*d Inſt. fol.* 89. and there my Lord Coke cites Fleta for his authority in it.

From all this it appears, that Infidels have no right to trade and traffick here, and ſurely then no ſubject has a right to trade with them in their country; for the reſtraint certainly muſt be mutual. And, my Lord, for this, I muſt remember you of a caſe that has been before cited in this caſe, and that is Michelborne's caſe in Brownlow, where my Lord Coke declares the Law to be as we ſay, and that he had ſeen a licence in Edw. III's time; and that he ſays was for the ſafety of Religion.

And ſurely, my Lord, it is upon ſome ſuch grounds as this, that the Law provides that no excommunicate perſon ſhall bring an action, no not in auter droit, becauſe no perſon muſt converſe with them; therefore, they cannot ſue as Executor to any perſon. Then if the Law be cautious for the ſafety of Religion, as to reſtrain converſe in our country; à fortiori it may reſtrain the ſubjects liberty of trading in an Infidel country, where they muſt be under the Laws of the place; and the inconveniences in the one caſe, are ſure much greater than in the other.

For we ſee in Calvin's caſe, if the King conquers an Infidel country, their Laws actually ceaſe till the King gives them new ones. But 'tis otherwiſe of a Chriſtian country, for there the Laws remain till the King is pleaſed to alter them.

Another reaſon, my Lord, is this, the King's prerogative in making leagues and truces, is ſure as large and unlimited as the ſubjects right to trade; and yet in the caſe of Infidels that is reſtrain'd, as to ſome ſort of leagues that a Chriſtian Prince cannot make with them, &c. For that you may ſee in the 4*th Inſtit.* 155. where my Lord Coke ſays that the Law of England is ſo, that the King can't make Fœdus mutui auxilii aut amicitiæ, with an Infidel Prince. And there he reckons up four ſorts of leagues; three of which he ſays may be had with Infidels, that is, Fœdus Pacis, Fœdus Congratulationis, & Fœdus Commercii; but Fœdus mutui Auxilii, he ſays, by Law is not allowable: and herein theſe leagues are grounded upon the Law of God.

Therefore, my Lord, the Law ſurely does not give the ſubject an unlimited freedom to trade, but it muſt depend upon ſuch cautions and ſecurity, as nothing but ſuch leagues can provide for; which leagues I am ſure none but the King is capable of making.

This then, one would think, were enough to clear our Patent from that objection, that 'tis a Monopoly. But there are other things, that make it yet more evident it is not ſo. As firſt, in all the complaints that have been of Monopolies, this Patent was never counted to be one among them, nor thought to be illegal; if it ever had been thought ſo, the Statute of 21 Jacobi, cap. 3. which is a Statute made for regulating of trade, would never have been made.

In the next place, I ſay either the firſt patent for this trade was a Monopoly, or this is none: the firſt was none, not only for the reaſons I gave before, but becauſe it was a new trade. Patents for new Inventions are not made good by the Statute of 21 of King James, but left as they were before; only they are reſtrain'd to a number of years, and were always good, becauſe they were for the incouragement of trade, and of uſeful inventions to increaſe them.

A fortiori therefore in this caſe, what is of much greater conſequence to the Nation in point of trade, than any little ſlight Invention of a particular thing, muſt be allowed to be good; then I ſay, ſure if the firſt Patent be not a Monopoly, then neither can this Patent be a Monopoly, for there is no Law that hath declared how long ſuch a trade as this is may be incloſed, as the Statute of 21 King James has ſet limits for, as new Inventions.

And again, this Company is for the advantage and benefit of the Nation, which a Monopoly can never be: and that it is for the benefit of the Nation, appears by the Statute of the 14th of this King, cap. 24. which recites it to be of great advantage to the publick, and for the incouragement of the publick Trade and Navigation. Here then, my Lord, is both the judgment of the Parliament concerning Companies of this kind, and an incouragement of this particular Company by the whole Parliament.

And again, they are taken notice of in another Statute, made in the 29th of this King, ch. 1. where they are taxed 20 s. for every 100 l. capital Stock in the Company.

Another reaſon is this, becauſe of the abſolute neceſſity of a Company to manage this trade, not only in reſpect of the Indians themſelves, but alſo in reſpect of other foreign Nations, who are rivals to us in this trade, and are ready to take all advantages againſt us about it. But this part of the caſe is much more fit to be diſcourſed of by Merchants and Stateſmen, than Lawyers.

Yet thus far the Law falls in to conſider this matter, as they are a Corporation under ſtipulations and leagues with other Countries for the carrying on of their trade; and ſo are in the nature almoſt of foreign Plantations, under a regulated and Chriſtian Government within themſelves, whereby thoſe miſchiefs chiefs are prevented, that would have fallen upon an unlimited and unregulated trade with Infidels, that are enemies to our Religion and Nation; which the Law, as I have already ſhewn, takes ſo much care to prevent.

For other conſiderations, whether this trade be driven to the full extent of it, or may be more advantageous to be inlarged, as it is proper here to be diſcourſed of in a Court of Law, ſo the application for that muſt be made elſewhere; for I do not know any Law that hath made the Defendant a Reformer among us.

My Lord, in the next place, the next queſtion is, whether this prerogative of the King is abridged, or reſtrain'd by any Act of Parliament, as is inſiſted on by the Defendant's Counſel; I think not. For,

Firſt, In general the chief trade of this Nation, conſiſted anciently moſt in Wool, Wool-Fell and Leather, and with our neighbouring Nations only; and yet,

Secondly, Even that trade was reſtrain'd in the exerciſe of it; for none muſt buy and ſell, but he muſt do it at the Staple, as appears by 2 Edw. III. chap. 9. that abrogates the Staple, and afterwards it was erected again. And then, in the Third place, there was no ſuch trade as this or any other ever eſtabliſh'd with Infidels in thoſe days, and ſo there was no occaſion for ſuch a Law to reſtrain them.

The beſt rule therefore to interpret this Act of Parliament, will be to apply the remedy to the inconvenience and miſchief, that was before it. If then there was no ſuch inconvenience as this complain'd of, the reſtriction of the trade with Infidels; then all may reaſonably conclude and inſiſt upon it, there was no ſuch remedy as the laying open of a trade, as they alledge, intended to be introduced. But if we conſider the Act itſelf, we ſhall ſee ſome particular reaſon for the making of it, either for the taking off ſome clogs, that were upon the trade then in uſe, or the providing ſome remedies which were introduced to obviate the preſent inconveniences and miſchiefs.

Firſt then, for Magna Charta, which hath been cited chap. 30. that gives liberty to Merchants, Quod niſi publicè antea prohibiti fuerint, habeant ſalvum & ſecurum conductum exire de Anglia & venire in Angliam, & morari & ire per Angliam, tam per terram quam per aquam, ad emendum & vendendum ſine omnibus malis tolnetis, &c. præterquam in tempore guerræ.

This helped Merchant Strangers in this particular, becauſe before that they could come but at four times in the year, and muſt ſtay here but forty days at a time; as my Lord Coke obſerves in his Comment upon that Statute, and cites the Mirror of Juſtice for it. And if this Law proves any thing relating to this queſtion, it is, that before that Act, Merchants cou'd not go out of the Kingdom, and ſtill they may be prohibited publickly; which, tho' my Lord Coke ſays muſt be by Act of Parliament, yet he cites no Law for that opinion, and with ſubmiſſion the word Publick doth not neceſſarily import that it ſhou'd be by Act of Parliament. My Lord, that Law, that comes neareſt in words to this caſe here before you, is that of 18 E. III. which is pleaded by the Defendant, that is part of the Act, the latter clauſe of it; that the Sea be open to all manner of Merchants, to paſs with their merchandize whither they pleaſe.

This is part of that Law; but, my Lord, the meaning of this Law is quite and clear another thing, as I ſhall ſhew with ſubmiſſion moſt plainly: and I will beg leave, my Lord, a little to introduce it, by giving you a Hiſtory of this Law, how it comes to be made; for it is but a ſhort one, and 'tis only the laſt clauſe of it, that is pleaded by the Defendant.

By the Statute of the 11th of Edw. III. it was made felony to tranſport Wool, and this my Lord Coke obſerves in his Comment upon Magna Charta, upon chap. 30. King Edw. III. took advantage of it, for exacting money of the Merchants, for diſpenſations with the Law, and for licences for tranſporting of Wool. Hereupon ſeveral complaints were made in the Parliament; and particularly, in the 17th year of Edw. III. Rot. Par. nu. 28. the Commons complain, that the Grant of 40*s.* upon a Sack of Wool made by the Merchants only, was not to bind the Commons, and therefore pray it may be revoked. The King anſwer'd, this cannot tend to charge the Commons; for that there was ſet a certain price upon Wool in every County, which the King willed ſhou'd ſtand; and that all Wool ſold under that price ſhould be forfeited in the hands of the buyer.

This was in 17 E. III. and this matter, my Lord, among other things, was repreſented to the ſame Parliament, by the ſame Merchants, by way of advice, as a thing fit, 17 E. III. in dorſo, nu. 58. of the Parliament-Rolls of that year. And they ſet forth, whereas they were ſummon'd to Nottingham, to inform the price of Wools, which they did not, regarding the times to come as they ſay, and that was abuſed; they pray liberty to buy Wools as freely as other merchandizes, as they can agree between buyer and ſeller: and that all Indictments and Proceedings contrary to that Law might be ſtayed; and further they add their advice, that the King would ordain the Staple in ſome place in England, rather than beyond the ſeas.

Then comes the 18 E. III. Rot. Parl. nu. 12. among other Petitions of the Commons, there are theſe which refer to the firſt part of the Act of Parliament: That the prices ſet upon the ſorts of Wools in every County, which run more to the damage than advantage of the people, might be ouſted, and that every one may buy freely, as he can agree with the ſeller, and none be accuſed for doing the contrary.

This, my Lord, explains the firſt part of that Act of Parliament; that the ordinances before this time made upon taking ſorts of Wool, which was imprinted in Raſtall, and all the Statute-Books; (for the Roll is, ſur pris,) and defeated, and that every man as well ſtranger as Denizen, may henceforth buy Wool as he can agree with the ſeller, as they were wont to do before the ſaid ordinances.

Now, my Lord, you ſhall ſee the latter part of the Act, which is that they plead: among the Petitions of the Commons in the ſaid Roll, there the 5th Petition is, reciting, That whereas the King had granted to them of Flanders, that the Staple for Wool ſhould be held at Bruges; at the time of which Grant, all manner of merchants, that is, Lombards, Genoeſe, Catalonians, Spaniards, and others, who uſed to buy the greateſt part of the wool, and carry them out of Flanders by land and ſea where they would, to the great profit and increaſe of the price of wool, thither coming: yet the Towns of Bruges, Ghent, and Ipres, have of late ordained,

That

That no wools coming to the Staple, be ſold to ſtrangers, nor carried out of the ſaid Country of Flanders, as they uſed to be, to the damage of the merchants of England, and of all the commonalty; and therefore they pray remedy hereof.

This is granted by the King, that they may buy wool as they were wont to do; and that a Writ ſhould be ſent to the Sheriff to make Proclamation accordingly. Then they pray, that the effect of theſe anſwers may be put into writing, in the manner of a Patent under the Great Seal; and this is done, in which there is this very Statute of 18 *E.*3. in terminis, as it is printed. And this plainly ſhews, that the Sea being to be open, and merchants to paſs wherever they pleaſe, was only in anſwer to that petition and repreſentation, and to redreſs the miſchief; that they might buy here, and go where they would, and not be neceſſitated to go and buy at the ſtaple; which was ſo abuſed by thoſe of Bruges: And this is likewiſe purſuant to the advice and petitions of merchants before the 17th E. 3. That the King would eſtabliſh a ſtaple ſomewhere in England, and not in parts beyond the Seas.

My Lord, for the reſt of the Acts of Parliament that have been cited on the other ſide, I ſhall not enter upon them particularly; but this every body at the firſt ſight may ſee, they carry their own anſwer along with them, and the occaſion of their making does appear in themſelves, tho' this did not, and very few of them come up to this Queſtion now before you, or any thing like it, as will appear plainly upon the bare reading of them.

The only Queſtion then my Lord, that remains, is, whether an action lies for the Company? For I think I have made it out, that the King had ſuch a prerogative at Common Law, and no Act of Parliament hath taken it away. Then I ſay, the Queſtion is, Whether an action lies for the Company? that is, whether it be a bare licence, or coupled with an Intereſt. And as to that point, I ſhall be very ſhort, for to me it ſeems to be no Queſtion at all. For, Firſt, They are at a great charge and expence to ſupport this trade, and therefore ſurely they ought to profit by it.

Secondly, They are looked upon by the Parliament to have an intereſt in this trade, or elſe they had never been taxed ſo high as twenty Shillings for every 100 l. in their ſtock. Then if they have an intereſt in the trade, this trading of the defendant is an incroachment upon that intereſt, and then here is damnum & injuria; which will intitle them to an action.

For ſo it is in other things: A Fair, in ſome ſenſe, is but a licence to hold a market at ſuch a time, in ſuch a place; but becauſe of the profit that tends to that liberty, and the charge that the party is at in keeping of it, an action does lie againſt any Man that ſets up another Fair, to the prejudice of him that had the firſt Grant.

In the common caſe of Patents for new inventions, an action lies for uſing the invention without licence, becauſe of the intereſt conveyed by the Grant, and the charge that the party that invents, is at. So that I think, my Lord, with ſubmiſſion, we have here an intereſt in this trade; and an intereſt, I ſay, as well as a licence, well founded upon the King's Letters Patent; which the King had power to make by prerogative at the common Law; and that power not reſtrained by any Act of Parliament. And therefore I humbly pray your judgement for the Plaintiffs.

Mr. Pollexfen, (afterwards Lord Chief Juſtice) his Argument.

De Term. Paſch. Anno Regni Regis Caroli Secundi xxxvi. Die Lunæ xxi Aprilis, Anno Dom. 1684, Banco Regis. The Eaſt-India Company againſt Thomas Sandys.

Mr. Pollexfen.

MAY it pleaſe your Lordſhip, the Governor and Company of Merchants of London, trading to the Eaſt-Indies, they are plaintiffs, and Thomas Sandys is the defendant. If your Lordſhip pleaſe, I will open a little more of the Record than has been yet opened: And the Caſe upon the Record ſtands thus:

Theſe plaintiffs bring their action againſt the defendant, and do declare, That the King by his Letters Patent, in the 13th year of his reign, did grant to them the ſole trade, between the Cape of Good Hope and the Streights of Magellan, in the Eaſt-Indies: And did alſo grant to them, that they, and no body elſe, ſhould come thither, nor trade there; and they do ſay, the defendant did come thither, and did trade; and that this is to the plaintiffs damage.

This defendant has prayed Oyer of the Letters Patent; and there are ſome things that are not mentioned in the Declaration: but not being upon the Record, and appearing upon the Oyer, I crave leave to open them, that I may make uſe of them in the diſcourſe I am to make; and I deſire your Lordſhip would pleaſe to take notice of them.

In the Letters Patent, when they come to the Prohibition and Reſtraint, the Prohibition and Reſtraint is in this manner, which they have left out in their declaration. The Letters Patent do prohibit the trading without a licence, upon pain that every ſuch perſon that ſhall trade to or from the Eaſt-Indies, ſhall incur the forfeiture of his merchandize, and alſo of the Ship; one moiety to the King, and the other moiety to the Eaſt-India Company.

And then there follows another clauſe, which is omitted alſo out of the Declaration; and that is a clauſe of Grant to the Company, that for any conſideration of benefit to their own uſe, they may grant licence to ſtrangers or others, to trade to and from the Eaſt-Indies.

And then there is another clauſe that is omitted alſo, and that is this, That the King grants to the Company, that the King will not, without conſent of the Company, give licence to any perſons beſides the Company to trade thither.

And there is likewiſe another clauſe which I would take notice of, That no body of the Company ſhould have a vote in the Company, unleſs he have a ſtock of 500 l.

Theſe clauſes now being in the Letters Patent, and the Letters Patent being ſet forth upon the Record, they are become parts of the Cauſe.

The defendant has pleaded the Statute of 18 *E.*3. and thereupon there is a demurrer.

My Lord, the Queſtions that are in the Cauſe are only theſe two.

Firſt,

Firſt, Whether or no this Grant of the ſole trade to the plaintiffs, be a good Grant or not? And next,

Secondly, Suppoſing it ſhould be a good Grant, Whether or no the plaintiffs can maintain this action, as now it is brought?

My Lord, in the argument of this Caſe divers Things have been ſaid in which I ſhall differ from the other ſide; but only take notice how far they may be of force in point of argument, to make the Queſtions that are in the Caſe, to turn, as to the Law, one way or other.

My Lord, It is no Queſtion but that the King, by Law, can reſtrain any of his ſubjects from going out of the Kingdom: For the King hath a particular intereſt in the ſervices of his ſubjects; and therefore it is moſt reaſonable, and an undoubted Rule, I think, in the Law, that the King may reſtrain any particular ſubject pro hic & nunc, as the King takes it to be moſt neceſſary and convenient for his ſervice to reſtrain.

Next, my Lord, I do not deny, but think it alſo to be Law, That the King may reſtrain all his ſubjects from a trade to ſuch a particular Country or City, upon ſome reaſons or occaſions; as in times of war, and times of plague, that I reckon by law may be done very well.

But, my Lord, that is not the Queſtion in our Caſe; for the Queſtion in our Caſe is a Queſtion concerning a ſole trade granted to a particular perſon, or body politick, (which is but one particular perſon in conſideration of Law) with a reſtraint upon, and excluding all his other ſubjects. Now from what has been granted already, to argue that the King may grant ſuch a ſole trade, is no conſequence at all from theſe poſitions that have been agreed, i. e. from the authority and power the King has to reſtrain his ſubjects from going out of the Kingdom, or to reſtrain them from trading in ſuch a place. For,

Firſt, As to the power the King has by Law to reſtrain his ſubjects from going out of the Kingdom; tho' by Law his power be ſuch, yet firſt of all it is not a power univerſal to reſtrain all his people, but to reſtrain this or that Man for his particular ſervice, for this or that particular Time. But to make a univerſal reſtraint, that none ſhall go out but you J. S. or you ſuch a body politick, will go a great deal further than ever it has been before, or can be conceived.

Next, my Lord, That becauſe the King can reſtrain trade in time of war, or in time of plague, that therefore he can reſtrain all his people, and for ever; except ſuch and ſuch particular Men, or a Corporation: that muſt needs be further than ever any thing I have heard yet to be Law, or could find any foot-ſteps of.

So that I think there are no inferences can be drawn from theſe things, that can conclude any thing as to this particular point that now we are upon, i. e. That the King can grant a ſole trade to any particular perſon and body politick, and their ſucceſſors, for ever; and reſtrain and exclude all his other ſubjects from that trade. My Lord, that will not be, I think, a conſequence that can be drawn from any of the poſitions that I have laid down.

And, my Lord, further I would obſerve this in the arguing of this Caſe, That when they lay down this as a general poſition, That the King can reſtrain his ſubjects; there is no diſtinction, nor is there any foundation in law for it, betwixt going to an Infidel Country, or going to a Chriſtian Country. For it is as undoubted, the King may reſtrain any of his ſubjects, as the King's pleaſure ſhall be, or as there ſhall be war or plague, and ſuch other occaſions as may require it, from going into a Chriſtian Country, as well as he may from going into an infidel one. And therefore if the argument have weight in it in this point, it hath weight as well to affect Chriſtian Countries, and the whole trade abroad with them, as Infidel Countries, and trading with them.

And there is no difference at all from this reaſon or foundation, that can be inferred, as I can make.

Next, my Lord, when they argue and make uſe of the Statute of 3 Jac. Cap. 6. which enacts, That the King's ſubjects ſhall freely trade to Spain and Portugal, notwithſtanding the Charters of incorporation granted to ſome Merchants, and the Prohibitions in thoſe Charters: If they will ſay that thoſe Charters of reſtraint were lawfully granted, then they do argue for a power in the King to reſtrain trade even to chriſtian Countries; which is a thing, under favour, that never was yet affirmed, as I remember, but rather the contrary admitted: And if they ſay, thoſe Charters that were granted for reſtraint of trade to Spain and Portugal, were not lawful, becauſe they were chriſtian Countries, then the Statute makes nothing for them: For ſure it is no argument, that becauſe an unlawful Charter was granted, therefore another unlawful Charter may be granted; or becauſe that was void, therefore the other ſhould not be void; no, rather the contrary.

My Lord, theſe things I have taken notice of, becauſe they are matters that have been inſiſted on in the argument on the other ſide; and I would lay what is not neceſſary out of the Caſe. And I now come to the great point of this Caſe, and which indeed is a great point in the conſequence of it.

Firſt, Whether the Grant of ſole trade to the plaintiffs, be a good Grant or not?

And I humbly conceive, ſuch a Grant of a ſole trade to any particular perſon, or body politick, with a reſtraint to all others, is againſt the Law of the land, and by the Common Law void; and this I ſhall endeavour to prove from good authorities.

1. By the Common Law, trade is free and open for the King's ſubjects; and for that the Books that I ſhall cite are theſe, 3 Inſt. 181. Commercium Jure Gentium commune eſſe debet, & non in Monopolium & privatum pauculorum Quæſtum convertendum; iniquum eſt alios permittere, alios inhibere Mercaturam.

The next Book, my Lord, is Fitzh. Nat. Br. fo. 85. that ſays thus; Note, That by the courſe of Common Law, every Man may at his pleaſure go out of the Realm for merchandize, or to travel, or other cauſe, as ſhall pleaſe him, without demanding licence of the King; and ſhall not be puniſhed for it. And the Stat. of 5 R. 2. c. 2. which prohibited all but the great Men and Merchants, to paſs out of the Realm without licence, has therein declared the Law, when it excepted Merchants, that they had a right to go without licence: But this Statute is repealed afterwards by the Statute of 4 Jac. Cap. 1.

Then,

Then, my Lord, there is Rolls, 1 Rep. fol. 4. the taylor of Ipſwich's Caſe againſt Sherring. The words and ſenſe of the Books are, That no Trade, Mechanick, or Merchant, can be hindered by the King's Patent. A Patent to hinder trade at ſea, is a void Patent; a Patent that only a hundred perſons ſhall uſe ſuch a trade, is not good.

Dyer 165. That every one may at his pleaſure go with his Goods; and cites F. N. B. for it. And F. N. B. 85. ſaith thus, Note, That by the Common Law, every Man may at his pleaſure go out of the Realm for merchandize, or to travel, without demanding licence of the King.

Theſe, my Lord, are the Books; and thus they ſpeak generally at the Common Law: and I offer it to your Lordſhip as a further reaſon, That the Common Law is ſuch, notwithſtanding all their arguments, in regard that the Common Law, as far as it is againſt ingroſſing, is alſo againſt all ſole trade. For, my Lord, all ſole trade is ingroſſing, as I take it, with ſubmiſſion; appropriating trade and merchandize to a particular perſon or perſons, or body politick, excluding others, is ingroſſing ſuch trade. Now that ingroſſing is againſt the Common Law, and againſt the very fundamentals and principles of the Common Law; that, I think I need not labour much to prove, nor ſhall I go about to cite many Books to prove that.

That ingroſſing any ſort of merchandize is an offence at Common Law, vide 3 Inſt. 196. And in the Caſe Dominus Rex verſ. Criſpe & al. here was lately an agreement betwixt copperas-makers and copperas-merchants, for the buying of all copperas: Theſe copperas-makers ſhould for three years make at ſo much a Ton; and reſtraining them from ſelling to any others. It was here adjudged an ingroſſing, upon an information.

And if a company of Merchants ſhall buy up here in like manner, all the merchandize of Spain, or Portugal, or the Canaries, or other town or place, for three years to come; this, I think, would be an ingroſſing, and the contract againſt law.

But then, my Lord, to prove that ſole trade is ingroſſing, that the nature of the thing muſt ſpeak; for whoſoever has the ſole trade of buying and ſelling of ſuch a ſort of commodity, or whoſoever has the ſole trade to any particular Country or Place, has thereby the ſole ingroſſing, and ſole having of all the commodities of that place; ſo likewiſe has he the ſole buying: and all the people that have to deal about the commodities that are to be vended and vented in that Country or Place, are at his will and pleaſure; and thereby he makes all thoſe his own, and he makes what price he pleaſes, and orders and diſpoſes of them, both as to value and every thing elſe, as his own. And thereby, my Lord, I take it, it muſt be ingroſſing; and every monopolizing of buying and ſelling, or of trade, is ingroſſing. But that only ingroſſing is by particular agreement and contracts between particular Men, among one another, without the King's authority, or help of his Letters Patent; but monopolizing is ingroſſing under colour of authority, by help of thoſe Letters Patent that create them: for the conſequence of it muſt be, that they would ſell at their own prices, and thereby exact upon the King's ſubjects, and their Patent: For the ſole trade to the Eaſt-Indies, inveſts them in all the merchandizes of theſe Countries, and ingroſſeth all in their hands. Then if ingroſſing by the Common Law be forbidden, and it is unlawful to do it, all Letters Patent to authorize and help Men to ingroſs, muſt needs be as void as that, which is the end of ingroſſing; and that is monopolizing.

My Lord, in the 3d Inſt. 181. the Caſe of John Peachy, in 50 E. 3. who was ſeverely puniſhed for procuring a Grant or Licence under the Great Seal, that he only might ſell ſweet wines in London, is a ſtrong caſe for us. For, my Lord, this was ingroſſing by colour of the King's Grant, and puniſhed as a great offence: And the caſe of Monopolies, that are reported 11 Co. 84. Moor 673. and in Noy, do prove that monopolizing is ingroſſing, and the ſame law that is againſt ingroſſing is againſt monopolizing; and the ſame law that makes the one void, makes the other void.

In Darcy's caſe, where a Grant by Patent was made to him, for the ſole importing from beyond ſea, and the ſelling of cards under a rent, and prohibiting all others to ſell; there it was adjudged a void Grant.

And the Stat. of 21 Jac. cap. 3. does declare all Monopolies to be void at Common Law; ſo then if this Grant be a Grant to you, to ingroſs or monopolize, I think it will be eaſily concluded to be againſt the Common Law, and made void thereby.

Next, my Lord, that this Grant of the ſole trade to the Eaſt-Indies, is againſt the ancient Statute Laws of this land, I think is plain alſo. As for the Statute of Monopolies, I ſhall crave leave to ſpeak of it by it ſelf, by and by: But I ſay it is againſt the ancient Statutes of this Kingdom. Magna Charta, 9 H. 3. cap. 30. all Merchants, if they were not prohibited before, ſhould have their ſure and ſafe conduct to depart out of England, and come into England, and ſtay, and go thro' England, as well by land as by water, to buy and ſell without any evil tolls, by the ancient and juſt cuſtom, except in time of war. And my Lord Coke ſays, That in this Act, Niſi publicè prohibiti fuerint, is intended of a prohibition by the publick council of the Kingdom, by Act of Parliament. So that this Act does in theſe words make our caſe: It ſays, They ſhall, if not openly prohibited, have ſafe and ſure conduct: And if that open or publick prohibition muſt be by Act of Parliament, ſo it is probably a declaration of the Common Law. Then here is no ſuch in this caſe, no prohibition by Act of Parliament to reſtrain from going to the Eaſt-Indies, but the defendant may go thither if he pleaſe. The Stat. of 2 Ed. 3. cap. 9. That all Merchants, Strangers &c. may go and come with their merchandize into England, after the tenor of the Great Charter.

The Statute that is pleaded 18 E. 3. cap. 3. That all Merchants, Strangers, and Denizens, and all other and every of them, of what eſtate and condition ſoever they be, ſhall ſell their merchandizes, from whenceſoever they come, freely, without interruption; and ſhall have the Sea open to them, to paſs with their merchandize where they ſhall pleaſe, without interruption, excepting to the King's enemies; and that this Act ſhall be obſerved and performed notwithſtanding any Charter to the contrary; and that Charters to the contrary are of no force, but are to the King's damage, and to the oppreſſion of the Commons.

Stat. 14. E. 3. cap. 2. recites Magna Charta, and enacts, That all Merchants, Aliens, and Denizens, may without Left, ſafely come with their merchandize, ſafely tarry, and ſafely return.

Now if ſo be, all Merchants, Strangers, &c. ſhall ſell their merchandize wherever they come, without interruption, and that enacting clauſe be large enough, as ſure it is; then it has an expreſs clauſe, That all Charters and Patents to the contrary are void, as being to the King's damage, and the oppreſſion of the people; and therefore they are all by the Parliament declared to be void.

The Stat. of 25 E. 3. cap. 2. confirms the former Stat. of 9 E. 3. and has the ſame clauſe in effect; If any Proclamation or Commiſſion be to the contrary, it ſhall be void. The Statutes of 2 R. 2. cap. 1. and 11 R. 2. cap. 7. confirm the two former Acts, and enact, That all Charters, Letters Patent, and Commands to the contrary, ſhall be void. So that, my Lord, thoſe many Statutes, as moſt of the old ones being penned in general, (but ſhort) words, and being in favour of trade, have been taken to extend generally, for the general and moſt large advantage of trade; tho' perhaps ſome particular trades were by conſtruction moſtly concerned; as the Statutes of the Staple might be the occaſion of making ſome part of them. But they do enact, as your Lordſhip ſees, in general words, That all Grants and Letters Patent to the contrary, ſhall be void; and ſurely this would have never been put in, but that in all times Grants have been made, which the King has been deceived in, and found them contrary to his real advantage, tho' they have been otherwiſe pretended, and were to the oppreſſion of the people, and therefore void.

In the 2 Inſt. 63. my Lord Coke, in his obſervation upon the conſideration of Magna Charta, and the ſeveral Statutes that were after that made in reference to trade, ſays, That upon this Chap. of Mag. Chart. (to wit) the 30th, this concluſion is neceſſarily gathered, That all Monopolies concerning trade and traffick are againſt the liberty and freedom granted and declared by his Great Charter, and againſt divers other Acts of Parliament, which are good Commentaries upon it. So that, my Lord, I do not offer it only as my preſent thoughts, but what has been taken for Law heretofore; that thoſe Acts are of general extent, and all Charters made to the contrary, are ipſo facto void, and of no force.

Obj. My Lord, they ſay it is true, if we are a Monopoly, then the Law is againſt us; but we are no Monopoly.

Reſp. My Lord, to prove they are a Monopoly, that is the next thing, which, with your Lordſhip's favour, I ſhall go about.

And for that I ſhall firſt take the deſcription that is of a Monopoly, made by my Lord Coke, in his chap. of Monopolies, in the 3d Inſt. 181. and if it is poſſible to exempt them out of that deſcription, I confeſs then they have a ſtronger Caſe than I do hope they have.

A Monopoly, (ſays he) is an inſtitution, or an allowance by the King, by his Grant, Commiſſion, or otherwiſe, to any perſon or perſons, bodies politick or corporate, of or for the ſole buying, ſelling, making, working or uſing of any thing, whereby any perſon or perſons, bodies politick or corporate, are ſought to be reſtrained of any freedom or liberty that they had before, or hindered in their lawful trade.

Firſt, My Lord, I think by their Patent, they have the ſole trade granted to them; that is, the ſole buying and ſelling (for merchandizing conſiſts in buying and ſelling) and therefore they have the ſole buying and ſelling in the Eaſt-Indies; and they have conſequently the ſole ſelling of the commodities when they come home; for none elſe can bring them home but them, if their Charter be good.

The ſole uſing of any thing, is a general word; and another part of this deſcription, ſole trading, is ſole uſing of merchandizes, in a particular place to which they trade; and ſo they are within all the words ſole ſelling, ſole buying, ſole uſing.

Secondly, They are alſo within the latter part; whereby any perſon is hindered or reſtrained from any freedom or liberty they had before, or in their lawful trade: For that it is lawful for them, as I hope I ſhall make it appear, as I think, upon the Patent granted to ſeize the Ships and Goods of thoſe that trade thither; and the bringing of this action is a ſufficient proof that you were hinderers of this trade, and peoples going thither to traffick. So I think, my Lord, they come within every part of the deſcription that's given in that Book of a Monopoly.

Next, my Lord, I think that all the evils and miſchiefs that are in the Books taken notice of to be in Monopolies, are alſo in this caſe; and whatſoever hath the evils and miſchiefs attending Monopolies, it is a great and ſhrewd argument, that that which hath the effect, hath alſo the cauſe.

The evils and miſchiefs that attend Monopolies, are, firſt, That the price of the commodities they ſell, ſhall be kept up, and raiſed higher than otherwiſe it would be: He that hath the ſole ſale, will keep up the price as high as he pleaſes; this is one of the evils mentioned in the caſe of Monopolies, reported by my Lord Coke, lib. 11. fo. 86. b. the truth whereof I think is evident enough in that Company; for the price and value of things they bring from thence, are of their own ſetting, and at their own diſpoſal. Nothing among Men is more evident than that, and indeed it muſt be a moſt wonderful virtue, and a mighty contempt of riches, that a Man who hath the ſole commodity in his hands, will not ſell it for the moſt he can; or not keep up the price, and make the moſt of it; and in things that he buys, to be ſure he will buy as cheap as he can; and in things that he ſells, he will ſell as dear as he can; and I think that he that has ſuch a power muſt be a Man of an extraordinary virtue, if he do not execute it.

Secondly, Another evil of Monopoly is, that it is pro privato pauculorum quæſtu, which is likewiſe mentioned in the margin of the Book cited before, 3 Inſt. 181. Now whether this trade be for particular private gain of a few or no, I think any Man that knows any thing will be ſatisfied about it in his own mind, who conſiders the preſent ſtate and condition of this Company. It is not upon Record indeed, but ſure it is eaſily gathered as a conſequence; and it will appear plainly by this reaſon to be pro privato pauculorum quæſtu: for trade is not in its own nature fixed and ſtable, but varying and altering, ſometimes better, ſometimes worſe, ſometimes beneficial, ſometimes detrimental, according as the times of war and peace, ſickneſs, ſcarcity of this or that commodity, in this or that Country; or the modes and cuſtoms of the Country, or the manners and habits of Men do occaſion it: And the Merchants by their education and obſervation, are thoſe that govern and manage this trade for the maintenance of themſelves and their families, and the general good of Men; and direct and employ their

their Eſtates and Traffick into this or that part of the World, as time and occaſion ſhall give them beſt encouragement.

But a ſole trade granted into this or that part of the World to one Company, and of another part to another, ſets up particular men that head that Company, but deſtroys all other Merchants and inferior people; all ſhipping muſt be ſubject to the prices, theſe Impropriators of trade will allow them, or elſe lie ſtill and be deſtroy'd, for none elſe muſt employ them, nor can do it; and ſo muſt all Maſters of Ships, for it is neceſſary to them in order for their livelihood, that they go ſuch Voyages, and theſe cannot go, except upon the terms that the Company will allow of. So all Mariners, Artificers, Factors and all other perſons, whoſe employments depend upon this trade, muſt be ſubject to their will and pleaſure; and of how great conſequence that may be to the Kingdom, my Lord, does deſerve conſideration.

Thirdly, A third evil and miſchief in Monopolies is, that they are to the oppreſſion of the King's people; and any body, I think, that has known any thing of late years about this Company, that is, that knows their dealings with and handling of their factors and ſervants, that get any thing in their ſervice, and other people that they employ, will find inſtances enough of their oppreſſion; and that will be enough to ſatisfy any man, what kind of people they are: for what a work is there, when they have any factor or ſervant, or any body elſe, that has got any thing in their ſervice? Thoſe things indeed are not upon the Record, but they are conſequences that are viſible to every body: and the truth of it is, in all Patents for ſole trade, ſo it will be. So that if the evils and miſchiefs, which the Common Law forbids, and endeavours to prevent, by judging all Monopolies, Ingroſſings and ſole Trade unlawful, be to be avoided, the evils and miſchiefs attending their Patent and ſole Trade are perhaps the greater, becauſe their trade is the greateſt that ever England knew.

My Lord, in Fitzherbert's Natura Brevium, 222. there is this ſaid, and I urge it for this reaſon; becauſe, if ſo be theſe are conſequences of a ſole trade, it cannot be denied but theſe are oppreſſions of all the King's people. Now there it is ſaid, that every Grant of the King has a condition implied in it, Quod Patria per Donationem non magis ſolito oneretur ſeu gravetur; ſo the Book of 13 H. IV. 14. Grant le Roy, to the charge or prejudice of the ſubjects, is void: and therefore the King is deceived in this Grant; and the Grant is as well by the Common Law, as all theſe ancient Statutes void.

Obj. Ay, but ſay they, this is not a Patent granted to the advantage of a few, or for the raiſing of the prices and monopolizing of commodities; but for good government and order, and the preſervation of this trade, that otherwiſe would be deſtroy'd: and ſay they, there have been ſuch Grants heretofore, to Turky, Barbary, and other places.

Reſp. It is true, my Lord, this is ſaid; and that Patent does ſay, that it is for good order and government, and the advantage of trade. But I pray, my Lord will alſo remember, what our Books ſay concerning ſuch Grants and Monopolies, in 2 Inſt. 540. that new Corporations trading into foreign parts and at home, tho' under the fair pretence of order and government, yet in concluſion tend to the hindrance of trade and traffick, and in the end produce Monopolies. This is an old obſervation, for in the 11*th Rep.* 88. b. in the end of the caſe of Monopolies, there are theſe words: Privilegia quæ re vera ſunt in Præjudicium Reip. magis tamen ſpeciоſa habent Frontiſpicia, & boni publici prætextum, quam bonæ & legales Conceſſiones, ſed prætextu liciti non debent admitti illicitum. Thoſe are the words of that Book; and there it is alſo taken notice of, that Darcy's Patent had a moſt glorious and ſpecious preamble; for there it is mention'd, that the ſubjects might exerciſe themſelves in huſbandry and lawful employments, and that Cards making had made Cards playing more frequent, and principally among Servants and Apprentices; and therefore the ſole making, and trade of Cards ſelling was granted to Darcy. Obſerve, ſays the Book, what a glorious pretext and preamble this odious Monopoly had.

There is the caſe of Horn and Ivy, Mich. 20 Car. II. Rot. 403. A Patent made three years after the Patent given to the Company, and in imitation thereof, the Patent is to the Canary Company; and recites, that the trade to the Canaries was of great advantage to the King's ſubjects at that time; and by reaſon of too much exceſs in trading of ſubjects there, our merchandizes were decreaſed in their value; ſo that the King's ſubjects were forced to carry Silver there to get Wines: and all this happened for want of regulation and good government, and thereupon the Patent did conſtitute Sir Arthur Ingram, and about ſixty perſons more by name. And all thoſe, that had been traders there within ſeven years, for the value of 1000 l. a year, ſhould be a Company and Body politick and corporate by ſuch a name; that there ſhould be a Governour, a Deputy-Governour, and twelve Aſſiſtants, and names them, but to be continued by election, and ſhould have the ſole trade to theſe Iſlands; that no other ſhou'd haunt or viſit theſe Iſlands, and prohibits all others under pain of forfeiture and impriſonment, and indeed follows very much the frame of this Patent, with a non-obſtante to the Statute of Monopolies. But notwithſtanding this glorious preamble, this Patent was ſoon after condemn'd, both in this Court, and afterwards in the Parliament for the abuſe of trade, and the regulation of it for the general good, which is the thing that is pretended; but few men can doubt, what is really intended by that; and no one I think can doubt, what is the real intention of this Patent under the name of regulation and government: to ingroſs all into the hands of ten or twelve men, is moſt excellent regulation and government.

My Lord, as to the other Companies and Charters that have been granted, ſuppoſing that all theſe Grants were ſuch as this, and uſed and practiſed as this is, it is no argument that they are legal, or that this was good. For, my Lord, it is well known, both by the ancient Statutes that I have cited, and by common experience, that there have been in all ages and times Patents granted, that were not by Law grantable, but the King was deceived in them, and thoſe Patents were void and of no force; and therefore it is no argument, becauſe there have been many ſuch Grants and Patents in former times, that this ſhould be good.

I agree, my Lord, if ever this Grant or any Grant like this had come in queſtion, and had receiv'd any judicial allowance to be good, it had been ſomething; but otherwiſe it can be no inference at all, becauſe there are others, this is a good one.

But, my Lord, to keep myſelf cloſe to the point of Monopolies; Monopolies have been granted in the beſt of times, in Queen Elizabeth's time, there was Darcy's Patent granted then; and it appears there had been Grants to divers others of the ſole making and ſelling of Cards, but when it was queſtion'd, it was condemn'd. Statute 9 E. III. cap. 1. and the other Statutes before cited, the clauſes that ſay all Patents granted or to be granted contrary to the freedom of trade in theſe Statutes mention'd, prove, Firſt, That ſuch Patents have been.

Secondly, That they did foreſee and provided againſt thoſe, that would be.

The Proviſo in the Statute of 43 Eliz. cap. 1. ſect. 9. ſhews alſo that Monopolies were granted; but ſo far were they from receiving any allowance, or approbation, that that Statute, that was made in the end of her reign, for confirmation of the Queen's Grants by a ſpecial Proviſo, does except and provide that it ſhould not extend to make good any Letters Patent, that did concern any licences, powers or privileges commonly called Monopolies.

The Statute of Monopolies, and this Statute ſufficiently ſhew, that there were ſuch Grants, and that they were not allowed; ſo that even in Queen Elizabeth's time, and during her reign, divers ſuch Grants it ſeems had been made. But, my Lord, if ſo be there had never been any judicial allowance in times paſt for any ſole trade, or ſole buying or ſelling, tho' there have been in all times ſuch Grants made, yet that will be no argument that they were good; but on the contrary, and further the practices of theſe Companies have been to the contrary, till within late years; no ſole trade practiſed among them.

But, my Lord, on the contrary, ſince that Patents have been ſo granted, ſince that there is no judicial allowance of ſuch; I would appeal to them to ſhew whether there has been any practice of theſe things. I do not ſuppoſe, but that in Turky and Barbary, perſons have traded, that have not been licenſed by the Companies, and that continually in all times; but yet I think no-body will find any judicial opinion, that has been given againſt them for it, or that ever any ſuch Patent was of force to reſtrain the ſubjects freedom of trade in thoſe places.

My Lord, I am apt to think, that the Grants to thoſe Companies, that is, the Turky Company, the Barbary Company, and the Ruſſia Company, are like to this of ſole trade; but yet if it never has been practiſed to reſtrain others in this manner, it is rather an argument againſt them of the other ſide; but they have never dealt thus, nor uſed the clauſe of prohibition as theſe men do. For, my Lord, whoever thinks to make any concluſion for the preſervation of ſuch a ſole trade by a Company, with a reſtraint of others, becauſe ſuch Patents and Charters have been granted to other Companies, will have but little reaſon ſo to do, if he conſider what a difference there is between this Company and them: for, my Lord, theſe Companies did never ſet up for a ſole trade, tho' there be ſuch words in the Patents, they never uſed them, but have always uſed their trade quite contrary, and in another method in a commendable way, and I think in a legal way; but not ſo as to warrant any thing of this, that is here pretended. Therefore, if your Lordſhip pleaſe to give me leave, I would obſerve the difference betwixt the way of trading, that thoſe other Companies have, and the trade of the Eaſt-India Company. The Companies of Turky, Barbary, Ruſſia, Muſcovy and Hamburgh, nor any other, till of late years, did ever trade with a Joint-Stock, but the Members of the ſaid Company, every man uſed his own trade, bought and ſold his own commodity, uſed and employed his own factors and ſervants; and the Company took care to ſend out a Conſul, or ſome one to be their Agent, to preſerve the trade, and by ſmall impoſts upon the commodities traded for, to provide for ſuch Officers: which Impoſts or Aſſeſſments were made by By-Laws and Regulations among themſelves. They take care the Markets ſhall not be over-clogged by the commodities they ſend out, which they do alſo by their own Orders and By-Laws that are made among themſelves; they only order what Ships ſhall go, but leave the particular Members of the Company, every man to ſend what he will upon his own account, and appoint who he will to be his factor, and to bring over what commodity he pleaſes: they trade not upon any Joint-Stock, or the Stock of the body politick. If you deal with any of them, you know the particular perſon you have to deal with: no man is refuſed to be of their Company, that has a mind, paying ſome ſmall ſum of money for his freedom; and whoever is of the Company, has a Vote in ordering the affairs of the Company. But now you of the Eaſt-India Company ingroſs the ſole trade into the body politick; you have a Joint-Stock, every man whether Merchant or not, if he can buy ſuch a ſhare in their Stock, is of their Company. The Committee manage, and the reſt muſt ſubmit to their pleaſures and diſtribution: thoſe few of them which have the moſt ſhares, have the diſpoſal of the whole Stock; no Member trades, buys or ſells, or has any thing that he calls his own, but only ſuch a ſhare in the Stock: you ſuffer not the Members to trade with their own money, at their own diſcretion, or to employ whom they pleaſe, this you do not do; you ſuffer no man to have a Vote among you (and your Letters Patent have ſuch a clauſe that none ſhall) but he, who has 500*l.* Stock; which 500*l.* no man can acquire, unleſs he pays 14*l.* or 15*l.* for it, two and a half per Cent, or ſome great ſum. So that by the very foundation, they can have no more perſons in their Company, than they that have 500*l.* ſhares; and theſe ſhares being ingroſſed into few hands, they have all, and call themſelves the Company. So that man that will not be deceived by words, but diſtinguiſh things different one from another, will diſtinguiſh between one Company and Society, and another; who are Ingroſſers, Monopolizers, and who not.

The Turky Company, and the reſt like it, may be truly ſaid to be Managers, Regulaters and Improvers of trade. They have no Joint-Stock, that they trade upon, they ingroſs not, they admit every man that will to be free of their Company, to trade with his own money, his own credit, and buy and ſell his own, and to imploy whom he pleaſeth; and none among them under pretence of government, regulation and preſervation of trade, makes unreaſonable advantages.

But this inviſible Eaſt-India Merchant, the Body politick, covers and countenances ſome few men among them, to ingroſs, buy and ſell at their own rates, and that exclude all others for the great and exceſſive advantages of the few.

The

The other Companies, as the Turky Company, &c. have not any ſole buying or ſelling, nor exerciſing any ſole trade or ingroſſing.

Every Member of theſe Companies, which are a multitude, and every one that is not, may if he will be a Member, and no man is excluded.

But this Company is quite contrary, and therefore (if ever any was) are great Ingroſſers and Monopolizers of trade. I do not argue nor ſpeak againſt Companies, nor regulating, nor managing trade, which was the true intent of the Patent; ſuch as I have mention'd, and is virtuouſly and commendably practiſed in the great Companies of Turky, Muſcovy, Hamburgh, and others; where the Members of the Companies trade upon their own particular Stock and Eſtates, and no Merchant hindred or denied to be a Member, that deſires it, paying it's ordinary fees of admiſſion: but againſt the inviſible Merchant, this politick capacity trading in Joint-Stock.

Suppoſe a like Patent to any one, or two, or three men, Farmers or Partners in their private capacity of this ſole trade; and they had the management of it, and hereby poſſeſſors of ſuch vaſt wealth and merchandize:

What wou'd this politick body (I mean the principal Members, for the body cannot think or have ſenſe) judge of this?

Perhaps yours is much worſe, there a man ſhould know with whom he dealt, who were his debtors, and how to come at them; but dealing with you is a kind of dealing with ſpirits, an inviſible body, only ſubſiſting in Intelligentia Legis.

Therefore being ſo unlike the other Companies, and ſo contrary to them, you have no countenance from them; but tho' they are good and commendable, you are Ingroſſers and Monopolizers.

This ſhews the great and vaſt difference between the one and the other; this ſhews that you, that are the Eaſt-India Company, have the ſole trade as a Company; and whoever buys in many Stocks, has as many votes as he has 500 l. in the Stock.

There is no ſuch thing in any other Company, but quite otherwiſe in all theſe reſpects; but hereby it comes to paſs, that he that has ſo many ſhares in the Stock, has an abſolute power, by having ſo many votes.

The inviſible Body or Corporation perhaps trade for 1000000 l. per Ann. they get into their hands to ſell 7 or 800000 l. worth of merchandize at a time; the three laſt Sales they made came to 1800000 l. no body hath theſe commodities but they. Is this trading, and no ingroſſing or monopolizing? It is their wonderful virtue then, hatred and contempt of riches, that makes them not to raiſe and increaſe values and prices, and be as rich as they pleaſe, if they do not do it. Never was there ſuch an inſtance of ſo great a trade in England, but none of your Members buys or trades at all; any man among you whether he be Merchant or not Merchant, Citizen or Gentleman, or what he will, if he has a Stock, his Stock goes on by this joint trade, but it is a few men that manage the whole as they ſee beſt; no man employs ſhips or workmen as he thinks moſt convenient; but you are one great trader in this vaſt trade, which is indeed one quarter part of the trade of the whole World.

My Lord, this being then the great difference between this trade by a Joint-Stock, and in the Company as a body politick, which is but as one entire perſon, having the trade entire to himſelf, and the trade of particular Members, under orderly regulations:

It is quite a different and diſtinct thing from any thing, in any of the other Companies, that they would be liken'd unto, to obtain their own ends; nor is there any reaſon to make them like one another, for the whole matter is carried on diſtinct in both; the one is a ſole trade by a body politick, the other diſperſed thro' the Members, according to their own diſcretion and occaſion, under regulation. No man, if he comes into the Eaſt-India Company, can trade among you, or vote among you, unleſs he have 500 l. Stock; and if he do not come in, (ſince it is according to your conſtitution, that every many ſhould have as many votes as he has 500 l.) his vote is like to do him little good, if ſome few men in the Company agree againſt it.

And beſides this, my Lord, in the Turky Company, where they trade as diſtinct Members, every man knows his creditor and his debtor, becauſe they deal in their natural capacities; but you trading in capacity of a body politick, every man that trades with you has a creditor or a debtor, he knows not whom.

And it is a great miſchief, when perſons know not how to ſue or how to deal with them; for take them all apart, they are as juſt and as good people to deal with, as can be; but take them together as a body, what more hard to deal with than a Corporation?

My Lord, we have ſeen the inſtance of theſe things in this Company, in a few days they having ſo great power, that none could contend with them, and ſoon after ſo inviſible as well as low, that no dun can find them. This we all know very well, my Lord; and I inſtance in this to ſhow, that whereas they would be likened to other Companies, which were created for the preſervation and benefit of trade; and the Members of it are under the regulation and government of the Company, but not as you are; they are traders, your Members are none, you are only the Body politick, the inviſible Merchant, that no one knows where to find; and a Body politick, in judgment of Law, has neither Soul nor Conſcience, and yet forſooth they are traders.

I only inſtance in theſe things, to ſhew that ſignifies nothing, which you did inſiſt upon, that there are other Companies for trade: for I ſay, that they are good and regular, and not Monopolizers, for they do not trade in ſuch a manner by ſole buying and ſelling, but every one trades as a particular Merchant; but you are otherwiſe, your body politick is the ſole Merchant, and none of your Members can trade, unleſs a particular ſervant, perhaps to ſave charges, you give him leave to buy or deal in ſome little things; but all others are quite excluded.

My Lord, having thus ſhewed you the way of their trade in ſole buying and ſole ſelling, I ſhall now in the next place come to the Statute of Monopolies, which is the Statute of 21 King James, chap. 3. and I hope I ſhall plainly ſhew you, that they are within the words and meaning of that Statute.

By that Statute, my Lord, it is enacted, that all Monopolies, Commiſſions, Grants, Licences, Charters and Letters Patent granted, or to be granted to any particular Perſons, Bodies politick or corporate, of, or for the ſole buying, ſelling, making, working, or uſing of any thing within this Realm; and all Proclamations, Inhibitions, Reſtraints, Reſtraints, Warrants of Aſſiſtance; and all other matters and things whatſoever, tending to the inſtituting, erecting, ſtrengthening, furthering, or countenancing of the ſame contrary to the Laws of this Realm, are and ſhall be utterly void and of none effect.

And that all Perſons, Bodies politick and corporate, which now are or hereafter ſhall be; ſhall ſtand and be diſabled to have, uſe, exerciſe or put in ure any Monopoly or ſuch Commiſſion, Grant, Licence, Charter, Letters Patent, Proclamations, Inhibitions, Reſtraint or other matter, or thing tending as aforeſaid; or any liberty, power or faculty, grounded or pretended to be grounded upon them.

Then, my Lord, there follows the clauſes of forfeiture of treble damages to the party grieved, by the uſing of any ſuch Monopoly: then there is the clauſe about new Inventions and ſome other things; then comes the Proviſo concerning Corporations, of which ſome uſe being made in this caſe, I ſhall crave leave to conſider it diſtinctly.

Provided alſo, and it is hereby enacted, that this Act or any thing therein contain'd, ſhall not in any wiſe extend or be prejudicial to the City of London, &c. or any Corporation, Company or Fellowſhip of any Art, Trade, Occupation or Myſtery, or to any Companies or Societies of Merchants, within the Realm, erected for the maintenance, inlarging or ordering of any trade or merchandize; but that the ſame Charters, Corporations, Companies, Fellowſhips and Societies, and their Liberties, Privileges, Powers and Immunities ſhall be and continue of like force and effect, as they were before the making of this Act, and no other, any thing in this Act to the contrary notwithſtanding.

The next Proviſo extends to Patents granted, or to be granted for Printing, making of Salt-Petre, and Offices, which do not concern the caſe in queſtion.

By the deſcription of a Monopoly, which I have before, out of my Lord Coke, ſtated and expreſs'd, this ſole trade granted to you, and the excluſion of all others, is a Monopoly within that deſcription, as I have before ſhewn that their Charter is directly contrary to this Act. My Lord, firſt, that they are within the enacting clauſe of this Act, this I think, by comparing what they claim with the enacting clauſe, will plainly appear. I need not now ſtand ſo much upon the word Monopoly, whether by what I have ſaid, I have proved them a Monopoly or no; but by the other words of the Statute, ſuppoſing that word Monopoly was out of the Act, yet they are within it: for the Act of Parliament having the words of ſole ſelling, or ſole buying, or ſole uſing of any thing; if they have the ſole buying or ſole ſelling, or ſole uſing of this trade, then they are moſt plainly, I think, within the enacting words of this Act of Parliament.

Now, my Lord, that their Charter is directly contrary to the enacting words, I muſt alſo therein refer my ſelf to the words of the Charter, which has ſole buying; for all others are prohibited ſo much as to come and go from and to the Eaſt-Indies without their licence. It has alſo ſole ſelling; for all others are prohibited to import any commodity from thence, into the Realm; and they cannot ſell them, except they import them. They have likewiſe the ſole uſing; for they have granted to them the ſole trade, which includes all buying, ſelling, ſole uſing, that appropriates all to themſelves, and excludes all others.

How then, my Lord, can any man read this Act of Parliament and their Charter, and compare them together, but he muſt at the ſame time conclude, that their Charter is contrary to what is enacted there? For the Act of Parliament does ſay, That all Letters Patent granted to any perſon, or body politick, for the ſole buying, ſole ſelling, or ſole uſing any thing, and all Proclamations, Reſtraints and Inhibitions to the contrary, and all other matters and things touching thereunto, are contrary to law, and utterly void, and of none effect; why then they have by their Grant, the ſole buying, ſole ſelling, and ſole uſing of this trade; therefore they are quite contrary to what is in the enacting words of this Act of Parliament. Then, my Lord, if they are contrary to the enacting clauſe of the Act, then their hopes muſt be, that they are ſaved by the Proviſo.

My Lord Coke, in his Comment upon this Act, in 3 Inſt. 182. does ſay this Act is forcibly and vehemently penned for the ſuppreſſion of all Monopolies; and the word ſole uſing, is there ſaid to be ſo general, as no Monopoly can be raiſed but will be within the reach of this Statute.

The word, any thing, ſhews alſo the general ſcope and intent, that nothing ſhould be excluded that was a Monopoly: For Monopolies in times paſt, were ever without law, but never without friends. And if it be ſo penned for the ſuppreſſion of all, it ought to have a large and general conſtruction.

Obj. But then let us ſee whether they are in the ſaving of this Proviſo.

The Proviſo excepts Charters to Companies or Societies of Merchants within this Realm, erected for the maintenance, inlargement or ordering of trade or merchandize.

Reſp. This Proviſo extends not to this Charter, or any Letters Patent that were not at the time of the making of this Act; and that is the firſt thing that I offer, why they are not within the reach of the Proviſo. Becauſe this Proviſo does not extend to any Letters Patent after the Act of Parliament made, but only the Letters Patent before. For the Proviſo ſays, It ſhall not extend, or be prejudicial to any Town corporate, concerning any Charter granted to them, &c. or Cuſtoms uſed by them, or to Societies erected for the maintenance, inlargement or ordering any trade or merchandize. This does extend to thoſe that were granted or erected at the time of the making of the Act; and there are no words of ſaving, for any that ſhould hereafter be erected. And the word hereafter would as well have been in the clauſe of ſaving, as in the enacting clauſe, if it had been intended. But the following words concluding this Proviſo, ſhew it further; for the Proviſo goes on, and ſays, That the ſame Charters, Cuſtoms, Corporations, Fellowſhips and Societies, and their Liberties, &c. ſhall be and continue of ſuch force and effect, as they were before the making of this Act, and no other. This ſhews, that that which is within the Proviſo, was that which was before the making of the Act only; and this governs and concludes the whole Proviſo. Now that only extending to thoſe that then were, and to leave them as they were, to leave their Charters and Companies, their Powers and Privileges, in the ſame ſtate and condition as they were before the Act; can never have any reference to what ſhould be after.

can

The beginning of the Proviſo ſays, this Act ſhall not prejudice them: the concluſion ſays, they ſhall be as they were before the Act was made; therefore they muſt have had a being before the Act, but no words herein extend to thoſe that then had not a being.

And, my Lord, the next Proviſo for printing, ſaltpetre, offices, &c. that is to this, further ſhews this to be the meaning of this Proviſo; for that expreſly provides, That this Act, or any thing therein contained, ſhall not extend to any Grant or Privilege heretofore made, or hereafter to be made, of, for, or concerning printing. If then the former clauſe had intended to include any Letters Patent that were after to be granted, it would have had theſe words, To be granted as well here as in the clauſe that comes afterwards.

But, my Lord, ſuppoſe this not to be a ſufficient anſwer to this Proviſo, but that this Proviſo ſhall be conſtrued to extend to Companies, Charters, Privileges, and Immunities, granted after this Act; yet the plaintiffs are not within this Proviſo, nor the ſaving of it: For it extends only to Companies that are for the maintenance, inlargement, or ordering of any trade or merchandize, and to their powers, &c. that they have to that end not two Companies, that are erected to have a ſole trade by a joint ſtock, or ſtock of the corporation, to exclude all others from having any thing to do in that trade. It does, and reaſonably may be intended to extend to all Companies that are for the maintenance, increaſe, and well ordering of trade; as the Turky Company, the Muſcovy Company, the Ruſſia Company, and Hamborough Company; and thoſe that I have been ſpeaking of, that trade not as bodies politick, or a joint ſtock, but every Merchant that will, may be thereof a member; and every member thereof trades upon his own private ſtock and account as a Merchant: but not to this Company, who inſtead of ordering the trade, endeavour to bring the ſole trade unto themſelves.

Therefore, my Lord, theſe are the Companies that are within the exception ſaved from the penalty of this Act; but we muſt be as ſilly as the Infidels they deal with in theſe matters, not to diſtinguiſh betwixt theſe corporations, and their management and yours; they exclude none from trade, they trade not in a politick capacity in a ſole ſtock, but every man is a trader upon his own peculiar; but you take upon you in your politick capacity, as you have expreſſed it in your declaration, totum, integrum & ſolum Commercium & Negotiationem habere, uti & gaudere; and to exclude not only all ſtrangers, but all your own members, to have any diſtinct or ſeparate trade upon his own account, except a little to pay and excuſe you of charges, and thereby ingroſs all that vaſt quantity of merchandizes, the many hundred thouſand pounds worth you bring in or carry out. In whom is the property? In the corporation. Who buys and ſells all? The corporation. Who are the debtors for the money that buys and provides theſe merchandizes? The body politick, the corporation, the inviſible body. Who ſhall be ſued for all theſe debts? The body politick; ſue them as you can, they will be either too great and too rich to contend with, or elſe in that condition as you know not how or where to have them.

An inviſible body, ſubſiſting only in Intelligentiâ legis, a body politick without ſoul or conſcience, as the Law ſays it to be.

We have ſeen them in a year's time, in both theſe qualifications, ſo great as ſcarce any man would contend with them, ſo inviſible at another time, as a dun would ſcarce find them; this ſurely cannot be for maintenance or inlargement of trade, to deal with I know not whom, where no ſecurity or perſon ſubſiſts.

It is indeed for the maintenance of the Company's trade, to enable ſome of them to get 10 or 20000 l. per annum by it, and to keep this vaſt trade in a few hands.

But ſure that is not of the trade the Proviſo intends; reſtraining to the body politick, which is but one perſon, or many in partnerſhip, is quite contrary to the inlargement in the Proviſo mentioned.

And therefore to ſay you are within the ſaving by this Proviſo, a Company erected for the maintenance and inlargement of trade, when you reſtrain all but yourſelves to trade, ſeems to be a contradiction.

And for the following words in the Proviſo, Or ordering of any trade or merchandize; if you ſay you are ſaved within the extent of theſe words, then you muſt make a conſtruction of theſe words in this ſenſe:

That ordering trade or merchandize, is excluding all others, and taking the whole to ourſelves.

A moſt excellent Ordering that is.

But the ſenſe of theſe words in the Proviſo is, to ſave to the corporations and fellowſhips of arts, trades, occupations and myſteries; and to Companies of Merchants, the powers and authorities that they had for the maintenance, inlargement or ordering of trade.

By taking care that commodities were honeſtly and rightly made, without fraud or deceit, as to the goodneſs or excellency of the commodity, or deceit in their meaſures or quantity.

That the ſervants and younger ſort were honeſtly and induſtriouſly educated in their trades and myſteries, by the maſters and elder ſort.

To place and keep good order and decorum amongſt thoſe of the ſame myſtery and trade.

For aſſembling and conſulting for the common good and management of their reſpective trades and employments.

This is that which the Proviſo excepts and provides for, not for a ſole trade in a Company, in a joint ſtock, excluding all others, as this is.

For the ſame exception is alſo for the manufacturers that are mentioned juſt before, as new inventions, and the ſociety of any craft or myſtery; theſe alſo are under the exception, which does ſtill expound them to be meant of that regular due order and government in companies, for the due regulating of trades and myſteries, that is by making by-laws to take care that their wares be well and ſubſtantially made, that the younger ſort be obedient to the elder, and the elder inſtruct the younger, and not oppreſs them. Theſe are the laws that they have power (and 'tis fit they ſhould have) to make for the management and increaſe of trade. But to have a ſole power over trade, and an intereſt in it by a joint ſtock, to ingroſs it into one man's hands, or into the hands of a body politick, which is but as one perſon in law, and in this manner to trade under the pretence or order of good government; this this, under favour, was never meant or intended by this exception in this Act. Therefore that which I have before expreſſed, is the ſenſe and meaning of this Proviſo, and not the having the ſole trade, excluding all others, as here is endeavoured and deſigned to have.

My Lord, in the taylor of Ipſwich's Caſe, 11 Co. 54. that company of taylors made a by-law, to exclude taylors from exerciſing or uſing their trade, within the town of Ipſwich, unleſs they preſent themſelves to the maſter and wardens of the Company, and three of them admit them to be ſufficient workmen, and proved they have ſerved ſeven years at leaſt, as apprentices, and then admitted by the maſter and wardens, and Company; and if any did offend in any part, they ſhould forfeit ſo much to the Company. In this caſe there ſeemed to be a good end and meaning, to exclude inſufficient workmen, and to encourage good ones: a good order, one might think. Yet ſo zealous and careful were the Judges then, leſt under any pretence they ſhould exclude men from their lawful trades, that they adjudged this a void by-law, as tending, in the purview of it, to reſtrain men of their freedom in uſing their trades, and introducing oppreſſion of the young tradeſmen by the old and rich tradeſmen, and to ſubvert the liberty the law gives. And in that very Caſe it was adjudged, fo. 54. That ordinances for the good order and government of men, of trades and myſteries, are good; but not to reſtrain any in their lawful myſtery. Norris and Stap's Caſe, Hob. 211. to the ſame purpoſe.

Therefore, my Lord, this is the ſenſe and meaning of that exception that is in the Statute of Monopolies, That it ſaves ſuch as were for the ordering of men in their trades and good government, but not to enable a corporation to have a ſole trade, to hinder or exclude others from uſing it. That is the true ſenſe of the Proviſo: But for the other ſenſe that they would have, 'tis the way to make it the moſt repugnant and contradictory Act that can be: For, my Lord, to ſhew that this is ſo, give me leave to compare them.

The ſenſe they would have, is, That it ſhould ſave to bodies politick, the having the ſole buying, ſelling and uſing, any merchandize or trade, as a corporation, that ſuch ſhould be excepted out of this Act.

Now let us compare the Proviſo with the enacting clauſe, and taking the Proviſo in that ſenſe they would have it; that a body politick may have the ſole buying and ſelling, or uſing any merchandize or trade, as a corporation: Then the enacting part, with the Proviſo, will run thus, enacted, That Letters Patent to any perſon or body politick, for the ſole buying, ſole making or uſing of any thing within this Realm, are contrary to Law, and void; and no body politick ſhall be capable of having, uſing or exerciſing of any ſuch Letters Patent, Inhibition or Reſtraint, provided that bodies politick may have the ſole buying, ſelling and uſing of any trade or merchandize.

Is there any thing can be put in words and terms, more contradictory than this is? And yet thus it muſt be if their ſenſe prevail. So that, my Lord, there is not a more repugnant and contradictory thing can be made, than this Proviſo to the body of the Act, if you take it in the ſenſe they would have it.

Suppoſe the Statute of that enacts, That no man ſhall uſe a trade that he has not ſerved an apprenticeſhip to by the ſpace of ſeven years; had a Proviſo, that a man may chuſe a trade that he had not ſerved an apprenticeſhip to by the ſpace of ſeven years; this had been a void repugnant Proviſo. This is as plainly repugnant, that no body politick ſhall be capable of having a ſole trade. Repugnant Proviſos are in law void.

My Lord, If ſo be a Proviſo be repugnant and contradictory, then it will be void; and ſo are all our Books, 1 Co. 46. Plowd. Com. 563. A Statute gives the lands of J. S. to the King; and then a Proviſo comes to ſave the right of all perſons: This ſhall be conſtrued, all perſons beſides J. S. not to deſtroy the premiſes.

Therefore when this Act ſays, That all Patents granted to a body politick, of the ſole buying, ſelling and uſing of any thing within the Realm, ſhall be void; and a Proviſo ſays, that it ſhall not extend or be prejudicial to any company of Merchants erected for the ordering, maintenance and increaſe of any trade or merchandize, if conſtrued in their ſenſe, to give the company ſole buying, ſelling and uſing of any thing, is directly contradictory and void; then that cannot be the ſenſe. But taking it in the other, which I apprehend to be the true ſenſe, that order and government is provided for; that is the meaning of the Proviſo, and nothing elſe: and this is the general practice of the Societies and Companies allowed in all times. But a ſole trade, under the pretence and colour of order and management, never, as I believe, had any judicial allowance: And then you are within the enacting clauſe of this Act of Parliament, and are a Monopoly; or becauſe, it may be, you do not like that word, you have the ſole buying, and ſole ſelling, and ſole uſing of this trade, which is contrary to the expreſs words of this Act of Parliament, and ſo your Patent and Charter is void.

But, my Lord, they endeavour to anſwer this objection with another ſort of anſwer: They ſay the Proviſo is, That the Act ſhall not extend to companies of Merchants erected for government and order of trade, but that their Charters, Privileges and Immunities, ſhall be of like force and effect as they were before the making this Act; and therefore, ſay they, Patents to Companies of Merchants for ordering of trade, if good before this Act, ſhall be good ſtill; and therefore, ſay they, this Act cannot hurt us.

My Lord, the objection is nice, as I apprehend, but ſo it is, if I take them right; this, under favour, is but the ſame thing again in other words; for the concluſion of this Proviſo extends no further than the Charter mentioned in the beginning of it; it extends but to the ſame Charters (ſo are the very words) ſhall be of as good force, &c. Why then what Charter or Patent is it, that ſhall remain as they were before the Act? why thoſe that are excepted. What are excepted? thoſe that are for order and management, as I have before ſhewn; not thoſe that are for a body politick, to uſe a ſole trade, that is repugnant to the enacting clauſe; therefore theſe, as I have ſaid, are not excepted, or within the Proviſo, and ſo we come back again where we were. Are you excepted out of the Act? If you are, I agree the Act hurts you not; if you are not excepted, then you cannot be in the ſame condition as you were before, or as ſuch Charters were before the making the Act; for the concluſion and latter part of the Proviſo is to be taken in no larger ſenſe than the words that went before in the beginning; nor can extend further than theſe words extend: ſo that I ſay it retorts juſt back again where it was. If they be excepted, they be not within the Act; but then the Proviſo will be repugnant, as I have ſaid before, before, and contradictory; if they are not excepted, they have no benefit by the Proviſo.

So, my Lord, taking it upon what I have ſaid, I do hope that the words of the Act of Parliament, plainly do extend to bodies politick, and to inhibit the ingroſſing ſole trade by bodies politick. They ſay themſelves, and it appears they are a body politick, and they have this ſole trade; and ſo the enacting clauſe extends to them.

Next, I ſay the Proviſo extends to Charters granted before, not to Charters to be granted after the Act of Parliament: and as to thoſe Charters that are excepted, it leaves them juſt as they were before; but if their ſenſe takes place, then it is, as I conceive, with ſubmiſſion, moſt palpably contradictory and repugnant to the Act: and then it is as lawful at this day to grant to any corporation any ſole trade or manufacture, yea, down-right to grant them a Monopoly, as it is to make any other Grant; and ſo this would be rather a countenance, than an Act made againſt them.

But then, my Lord, they come to another thing; this is an infidel Country, this is a ſole trade with Infidels, and ſuch a trade the ſubjects never had any right to have without the King's licence; and now being ſo, that differences the cauſe: and to prove it, they cite Michelborn's Caſe, in 2 Brownl. 296. wherein Mr. Brownlow being Prothonotary, recites what my Lord Coke ſaid in that Caſe, That no ſubject might trade into infidel Countries without the King's licence; and his reaſon was, becauſe he might relinquiſh the catholick faith, and adhere to Infideliſm: and that he had ſeen a licence in the time of Ed. 3. wherein the King recites the confidence that he had in his ſubject, that he would not decline his Religion, and licenſed him; and that this did ariſe upon the recital of a licence made to trade to the Eaſt-Indies.

And they do cite Calvin's Caſe, in Co. 7 Rep. fo. 17. wherein 'tis ſaid, That Infidels are in law, perpetui inimici, and between them and Chriſtians there is perpetual hoſtility, there can be no peace; and 12 H. 8. fo. 4. where it is holden, that a pagan cannot have or maintain any action at all, nor have any thing within this Realm; and to prove this, Regiſter 282. and 12 H. 8. fo. 4. are there cited.

My Lord, I have the more fully recited what this is, becauſe I hope I ſhall give very full anſwers to all: But, my Lord, before I do anſwer thoſe Books;

Firſt, Let us ſee what the conſequence of it will be: Suppoſing the Law to be as theſe Books ſay, and as theſe Gentlemen would have it; and the conſequence will be, that the plaintiffs cannot maintain their action, but the Charters granted to them will be void.

Firſt, Upon the reaſons given in theſe Books; for if the Books are of authority, the reaſons there given muſt be of authority, (ſays that Book of Brownlow's.) The King has the care and preſervation of Religion, by the Law veſted and repoſed in him, that the ſubject ſhould not trade with Infidels without licence, that they may not renounce their faith; and the King will take care to give licence to traffick, to ſuch only as he can have confidence will never waver from their profeſſion.

Suppoſing this to be true, then their Patents muſt be naught; for then it is only grantable to perſons in whom ſuch confidence may be. My Lord, then ſee how this will ſtand with their Charter. Their corporation and body politick is indefinite, as to perſons, and the members changed continually; ſome ſell their ſtocks, and go out, or die; others buy their ſtocks, and come in that way to be members of the company, or as executors to thoſe that die, and many new members are every year. I doubt they do not much examine, or take care to be ſatisfied, how fixed thoſe are in their Religion they daily take in; and how then can there be confidence in a body politick, which the law ſays has neither ſoul nor conſcience? What confidence can be repoſed in ſuch a perſon about religion?

Secondly, Beſides, it is not only the members of the company, that at the time of the incorporation were incorporated, and their ſucceſſors, that are thus privileged; but their ſons and apprentices, their factors and ſervants, have licence by this Patent to trade there: and what ſecurity can there be, that ſuch may not (by converſing with Infidels) change their religion? If this licence be a truſt and prerogative in the King, to be given to ſuch perſons, in whom the King can have confidence, that they will not, by converſe with Infidels, change or prejudice their religion, &c. this cannot be granted to a body politick and their ſucceſſors, which may have continuance for ever; and to their ſons, factors, apprentices and ſervants, perſons altogether unknown, not born, nor in rerum natura when theſe Letters Patent were made.

Suppoſe ſuch a licence to you, to trade with enemies, and ſuppoſing that the Law has eſtabliſhed ſuch a power and prerogative in the King, in the preſervation of religion, to licence; the King cannot grant this prerogative to you of the Eaſt-India Company, that you ſhould have a power to grant licences to whom you will: yet all this is done by your Patent; for you have thereby power granted you for your ſons, apprentices, factors and ſervants, which are perſons that you yourſelves nominate and appoint at your diſcretions, and undoubtedly very religious, and others that you bring into your Company.

Next, beſides this power that you have expreſſed for thoſe that are your apprentices, &c. which are at your diſcretion, to make whom you pleaſe; there is another expreſs clauſe, That the Company for any conſideration, or benefit to themſelves, may grant licence to any ſervant, ſtranger or other, to uſe this trade. So the Patent expreſſes what the meaning was of the word Conſideration, by adding the Words, Or benefit to themſelves; and that the King, without conſent of the Company, will not grant licence to any other to trade there.

Can this then be a good Grant? Can the King grant from himſelf his kingly care, and the truſt in him repoſed for the care of religion to you, to manage it as you will, and that he will not uſe it himſelf without your conſent? Surely, you cannot ſay ſo. So that ſuppoſing by law there is ſuch a truſt repoſed in the King for preſervation of religion, as you would have, to give licence to his ſubjects to trade with Infidels; and that none without his licence can do it: yet this Grant to you will be void in it ſelf, and then you have no more right than we, and can maintain no action againſt us.

But then a little to conſider the authorities upon which this great matter relies, to prove this religious point or piece of law.

Firſt, That Book of Brownl. is a Book that was printed in the late times, and not licenſed by any Judge or Person whatsoever; but truly I have got a copy, and a note of the Roll of the Case there reported; and it is this, Mich. 7 Jac. B. C. Rot. 3107. Michelborn against Bathurst; it is in a Prohibition, setting forth, That the King had granted to the plaintiff his commission to go with the Ship Tyger to the Indies, to spoil and suppress the Infidels, and to take from them what he could; that the plaintiff, in the Prohibition, having this commission from the King, did enter into articles with the defendant, to give him a share of what he should get in the adventure: and thereupon there was a suit in the admiralty by the defendant, against the plaintiff, and he comes and moves for a Prohibition, suggesting that the articleswere made upon the land, and not upon the high sea, and so the Court had no jurisdiction. Now upon the debate of this Case, it did appear, there was a kind of Letters of mart, a commission from the King, in a warlike manner to spoil the Infidels, and get what he could from them. But now, how this would come in debate to make a resolution about the business of trade, I do not know; probably it might be as is there related; but what is in the Book is only an occasional saying of my Lord Coke's, upon the motion for this prohibition. So that a man that will lay any great stress upon such an authority, must be mighty willing; for it is only an occasional saying, and nothing relating to what was there brought in judgment, which was about a commission to take away Goods, perhaps from enemies, by Letters of mart, not about trade; and so I hope there is no great matter in that Report.

The next Case, my Lord, is that of Calvin, where it is said that an Infidel is perpetuus inimicus, can maintain no action, or have any thing; and that there is perpetual hostilities between Christians and such, and no peace can be made with them.

My Lord, 'tis true that this is said in Calvin's case, but I must also say, as there was no occasion in the former Report for saying of that, no more is there in Calvin's case for saying of this; for it made nothing to the matter in question about the Post-nati, or were they any wise led to it in the debate of that case; there was nothing there in judgment, that gave occasion for it, so that I cannot think it was much considered of before it was spoken.

The Books that are there cited, I have looked upon, to see if they would prove any such thing as they are there cited for, and I think they do it not by any means.

There is first the Register 282. and all that I find there, is, that in a writ of protection granted to the Prior and Brethren of the hospital of St. John at Jerusalem, and their agents, it is said, That that hospital was founded in defence of holy Church, against the enemies of Christ and Christians: but truly, how to conclude out of that Book this, that Infidels should not have any property in trade, or be perpetui inimici, with whom no peace can be had, I know not, or that can maintain no action.

Then fo. 12 H. 8. 4. they also cited, that is only this, The original case in an action of trespass for beating his servant, taking away his dog, called a blood-hound: And there it is said, If a Lord beat his villain, or an husband beat his wife, or a man beat one out-law'd, or a traitor, or a pagan; they shall have no action, because they are not able to sue an action. I must confess, my Lord, this comes in very oddly, from a dog to a pagan, and there is nothing to lead to it in all that case, that I can see; and yet this is all the authority that is cited in Calvin's case, to prove that they can have no action. So that all that a man can make of this, is only discourse, and sudden thoughts and opinions, and sayings of counsel; nothing of debate or judgment in the case.

It is true, my Lord, the christian religion and paganism are so contrary to one another, that it is impossible they should be reconciled any more than contradictions can be reconciled; but because the religions cannot be reconciled, that therefore there should be a partition-wall between us, as to property and commerce, perhaps is a doctrine as irreligious as can be, and does destroy all means of coming to convince and reduce them to the faith. But now, besides these extrajudicial and occasional sayings in these Books cited, which are of little authority, I cannot find any Books or Cases, much less judgment or authority, for such opinions in so great a point as this is: but on the other side, if a man considers the general cause and practice of trade and commerce, and legal proceedings in all times and ages, one would think my Lord Coke could not be in earnest in what he has said in Calvin's case about Infidels. Let a man consider what a great part of the world we have commerce with are Infidels, at this day, as the Turks, the Persians, the Moors; and other places in Spain and Portugal were possessed by the Moors, who were Infidels, till about 200 years since: for till the year 1474, the Moors had possession of both these Countries for the space of near 700 years before, and have we not always had trading with all those? Have we not leagues and treaties with the Princes of infidel Countries? Do we not receive ambassadors from them, and send ambassadors to them, and ministers residing with them? Have we not, from time to time, and this in all times and ages, and that in Q. Elizabeth's time, in the best and most religious time, for many hundred years? Have we not likewise war and peace with them, in like manner as with christian Kings and Countries?

And let a man consider the consequences of this doctrine. If they are perpetui inimici, then we may justify killing of them, as those we are in hostility with, wheresoever we meet them; and justify the taking away what they have from them, as 17 E. 4. fo. 13, 14. it is adjudged, that a man may seize and take to his own use, the goods of an alien enemy, wherever he can find them; for it is the price of his adventure to take them, and of his victory over his enemy, if he have taken him. And 2 H. 7. 15. if an Infidel be an alien enemy, then any man may take away the goods of an Infidel, and have them to his own use; and this would be a good trade, if this be so; any man may kill and beat him, if this be so.

Mr. Sollicitor, in his argument, was pleased to use many ancient Rolls and Records out of H. 3. and Ed. 1. and about those times, concerning these Princes dealing with and handling of the Jews; and I believe he might have cited many more.

Mr. Prynne, in his Book which he calls The Second Part of a short Demurrer to the Jews, discontinued, and barred Remitter into England, printed in the year 1656; has a long treatise, in which I believe an hundred Records and Histories are cited to this purpose, That the Jews did exact and enrich themselves by usury, to the great impoverishing of the people; and that the Princes of those times polled them, taxed them, and took away the eſtates of the Jews from time to time; and thereby a man might think that theſe Kings uſed them but as ſponges, to make them gripe what they could from others, and then ſqueezed it from them into their own treaſury: and it muſt in all probability be ſo. The Story is true, my Lord, as he relates it, and in the Rolls there are a multitude of them cited to that purpoſe.

But beſides Mr. Prynne, there is a Statute of Morton, ch. 5. made 20 H. 3. my Lord Coke in the 2d Inſt. 89. ſays, was principally deſigned againſt the uſurious Jews. The Statute de Judaiſmo 18 E. 1. relates, that the King's people had been diſinherited, much injured and impoveriſhed by the uſury of the Jews, and enacts, That no Jew thereafter ſhould take uſury upon Lands, Rents, or other Things. And in the 2d Inſt. 507. my Lord Coke, in his Comment upon that Statute, ſays, That 15060 Jews thereupon went out of the Realm.

So that, my Lord, we do not diſpute but that the fact alledged may be true; that the Jews were extorſive, and the King took away their eſtates: But the matter is the uſe and application of that fact.

For, firſt, I think, if it be known law, and taken to be according to any known law which we have, that they were as alien enemies, then as the King might take away their eſtates, ſo the ſubjects may take them away too; ſo there is no ſuch uſe to be made of it as the other ſide would have, as I perceive. They ſay as Infidels the King would take away their eſtates, becauſe they are perpetui inimici; and I ſay, if they were alien enemies, then the ſubjects might take them away too; for ſo the Book ſays.

But next, my Lord, I do uſe it another way; That all theſe dealings with the Jews, ſhew that they were not alien enemies, but treated as alien amies, ſo long as the King pleaſed. For, my Lord, if they were alien enemies, and the Books they cite are true, as Calvin's caſe mentions them, all their contracts and dealings were all abſolutely void, they could never have any property; how could they then be guilty of uſury? How could any man living be extorted upon by them, to pay any money due to them upon contracts or bargains, unleſs theſe men were treated as alien amies? How could they have the benefit of their contracts, as other alien amies have? So that I take it, that is a ſtrong evidence that they were treated as alien amies; otherwiſe it is impoſſible that which you ſay could be true, That they could hurt the King's people by extortion and uſurious contracts; when according to your law, they were not able to make any contracts or have any property at all: Is it poſſible the King could take away their eſtates that had none? And they had none, if your doctrine be true. If any man owed them money, they could not recover it, becauſe they could not bring any action; and the King could not have it, becauſe it was a void contract made with one not capable of making a contract. So that, my Lord, the inſtances they make uſe of, are I hope inſtruments and ſtrong arguments againſt them, not for them. They were taken notice of as alien amies, capable of making contracts which the King's ſubjects were never bound to perform, unleſs they were legal, and they obliged by them by law. As for theſe ancient Records in general, time had hidden the knowledge of the laws, and tranſactions of thoſe times. It is not poſſible to know what the laws and tranſactions of thoſe times were, or rightly to diſtinguiſh between legal and violent acts.

And ſo being references from thence, to conclude in judgment now, is notum per ignotius; or like dependences, which unleſs latter times have concurred or agreed with, are only fit to make diſorder and confuſion.

Secondly, But that which is deducible from hence, is not, as I conceive, what has been endeavoured.

That they had no property, becauſe the Princes of thoſe times took from them their eſtates, when they pleaſed, and taxed them how or in what manner they pleaſed.

But perhaps the reaſon was, that theſe people being under the curſe, and being a vagrant people, without Head, Prince, Governor or Country, it was no difficulty to tax or take from them at pleaſure, being hated of the people where they lived.

But it could not be as they would have it, that they ſhould be amongſt us alien enemies; for an alien enemy can neither make bargain nor contract, nor be capable of property.

But the ſubject may, at will and pleaſure, fall upon and take all that he has to his own uſe, as upon the King's enemy; and what he can take from him is his own acquiſition, as the price of his adventure, and conqueſt over his enemy.

The Books cited 17 E. 4. 2, & 7. prove this.

But by what is admitted by them, that they were great uſurers, and had great eſtates, it is evident that they were here treated as alien amies: how could they elſe in ſuch multitudes live amongſt us? how could they be uſurers, and get eſtates, if they could not make contracts? how is it poſſible they could preſerve their bodies or eſtates againſt the King's ſubjects, unleſs they had the King's protection, and were treated as alien amies? And of latter times, how many of them have lived amongſt us, driven great trades, have had, and have at this time, conſiderable eſtates?

Let it now be adjudged, that any man that will, may take away their eſtates; that they can have no remedy or action for their debts owing to them, but inſtead thereof may be beaten or impriſoned as enemies to the King.

And we ſhall probably ſee, what the ſucceſs of ſuch a judgment will be.

My Lord, that they are taken notice of and handled as other aliens, without any diſtinction between alien enemy and alien Infidel, I would offer this as an argument. The queſtion, I confeſs, is new, and ſo there is not much that I can find in our Books about it; but the Act of Navigation made in the 12th year of this King, a year before this Charter now in judgment before you, concerning trade, ſhews, that Infidels have the ſame liberty of trade as Chriſtians; that Act being made for increaſe of ſhipping and navigation, (it is ch. 18.) prohibiting goods to be imported by any foreign Ships, except Ships of that ſame Country where the goods do grow; and diſtinguiſhes not between infidel and chriſtian Countries, but expreſly ſays, That no currans, nor commodities of the growth, product, or manufacture of any of the Countries, Iſlands, Dominions or Territories, in the Ottoman or Turkiſh Empire: And does enact, That no goods ſhall be imported from that Country, but in our Ships, or Ships of the Country of which the Goods are; and thoſe Ships to be ſailed by a Maſter, and three fourths of the ſame Country. This muſt be an admittance and an allowance, that the maſters and mariners of that Country have the ſame freedom and privilege of trade that other foreign aliens have ; and ſhews plainly, that the Infidels of the Turkiſh Empire have liberty of trade here.

My Lord, the Act for tonnage and poundage has general rates and impoſitions ſet upon the commodities of all infidel Countries, without ſaying, brought in by, or with any manner of diſtinction. So that I think, that this opinion of a difference betwixt alien Infidels and alien Chriſtians, was not taken notice of, nor known, nor thought of, till now : For, my Lord, if it had, it is unlikely the Act of Navigation ſhould provide and give allowance, for the maſters and mariners of infidel Countries to come hither with Goods, when by Law they could never come in, but were enemies, and to be knocked on the head if they did.

My Lord, pray let us conſider of late times what a number of Jews have lived among us ; ſhould we declare this for Law at this day, that the people ought to uſe them as alien enemies, ſtrip them, plunder them, knock them on the head, kill them and ſlay them, what would be the conſequence ? What work would this make ! For if this be true, what they aſſert, that they are perpetual enemies, then we can have no peace with them ; whoever owes a Jew any thing may play the Jew with him, never pay him ; whoever has a mind to any thing he has, may take it away from him ; if he has a mind to beat him, and knock him on the head, he may, there is no protection for him, nor peace with him.

My Lord, I do believe that 'tis true, that the Jews being under the curſe, and having been a vagrant people for ſo long a time, and having no Prince to defend them, it is probable they have been made havock of, and our Kings and Princes have made bold to do with them according to their own pleaſures ; tho' what is recorded of it, is ſo long ago, that it is hard to know the whole truth : But I think they are no precedents to be followed now, unleſs they had been followed by a ſucceſſion of practice and authority in ourBooks of law ; for otherwiſe many times a man might argue of old Books from dark things to darker, as long as he will, and never make any thing clear. In the caſe of Southern and How, there was occaſion for this to be taken notice of, if this opinion had been true Law. It is reported in 2 Cro. fo. 469. A man employed another to ſell jewels in Barbary for him, and the other perſon did ſell them as true jewels, when indeed they were counterfeit, and not above 100 l. value to the King of Barbary for 800 l. and thereupon the King finding himſelf cheated, impriſoned the plaintiff that ſold them to him, 'till he repay'd him his money ; and he brought an action againſt the perſon that employed him to ſell them. It would have been of uſe in this caſe, if the contract and ſale, and the lawfulneſs of converſing in trade by Chriſtians with Infidels, had been queſtionable ; for the defendant in that action to have urged againſt the plaintiff, What reaſon had he to ſue him ? for what had he to do to go amongſt the King's enemies? And he ought not to recover damages for any ſuch thing. I ſay, it would have been of uſe, if any ſuch point of Law had at that time been thought of.

In that caſe, it was of all ſides admitted, and not ſo much as objected, that this contract was void, becauſe the King of Barbary was an Infidel.

So that this opinion, that Infidels are perpetual enemies, and in perpetual hoſtility, can maintain no action, nor have any property amongſt us ; has no authority for its foundation, but only ſome extrajudicial ſayings, without debate or conſideration ; and it is againſt the continual practices of Princes and People at all times.

Perhaps it is no ſmall part of religion, that men ſhould ſpeak, and deal plainly and uprightly one with another.

We know that religion too often has been made a cloak and veil for other ends and purpoſes. It ſhould not be ſo, and I hope will not be ſo uſed in this caſe.

My Lord, the Statutes that I have cited, they have made no manner of diſtinction between Infidels and Chriſtians in matter of trade ; and it is hardly to be thought, eſpecially as to ſome of the latter ones, but that there was trade with Infidels then : For it is ſcarce to be thought that our Princes ſhould go thither only with ſwords in their hands, to make war upon them, and afterwards to make peace with them, and no notice be taken of the law about trade concerning Infidels.

The Statutes I have cited of Magna Charta, cap. 9 E. 3. 25 E. 3. 2 and 11 R. 2. all declare and enact the freedom of trade, in all general words, except only ſuch as are in war with the King : In none of them is there any exception of trade with Infidels.

Can it be imagined that in theſe days we had no trade with Turky or Barbary ? Our Kings went with armies to the Holy Land, and Richard had made war and peace with the Turks : Had we no trade there but with our ſwords?

But to look nearer home, Spain and Portugal were Infidels, and in the hands of the Moors, in the year 1494, which was 14 E. 4. can it be thought that in all theſe times between Magna Charta, H. 3. and E. 4. we had no trade with Spain and Portugal ?

Stat. 12 H. 7. cap. 6. was made in the year 1497, which was but 23 years after the Moors were driven out ; and in that Statute 'tis recited, that the Merchants adventurers, dwelling in divers parts of England, out of London, did ſhew, That whereas they had their free paſſage, courſe and recourſe, with their Goods, Wares and Merchandizes, in divers coaſts and parts beyond the Seas, as well into Spain, Portugal, Venice, Dantzick, Lapland, and Frieſland, and divers and many other Regions and Countries, in league and amity with the King ; that they were impoſed upon by a Company of Merchants in London, and forced to pay duties.

I only make uſe of the recital, to prove the free paſſage there mentioned to Spain and Portugal, and to other Regions and Countries.

There is no diſtinction of infidel Countries from chriſtian Countries, tho' Spain and Portugal had been ſo lately Infidels.

'Tis moſt probable the trade they had then was with Turky and Barbary, as well as with Venice : The words other Regions and Countries ſeem to imply as much, and the freedom equal.

So that I think, as to this objection, That Infidels are perpetual enemies, that we can have no peace with them, nor they maintain any action, or have any property by our law ; I think the authority to maintain it none at all. The conſtant practice, as well by Princes as People, is conſtantly againſt it.

The Charters that they have cited to Barbary and other places, ſome of them are before the laſt of theſe

theſe Statutes, that is the Statute of K. James; and yet there is no difference taken notice of there between chriſtian and infidel Countries: So that, my Lord, taking altogether the light, or at leaſt the weak authority of theſe ſayings and occaſional diſcourſes, for this diſtinction of infidel from chriſtian, in point of trade, will ſignify but little; and the conſtant practice of all our times, wherein we have any ſort of trade; and the arguments drawn from the Records that have been cited of the Jews having property and allowance to live amongſt us, and our dealings with foreign nations taken notice of in our Acts of Parliament, without ſuch diſtinction, ſeems to be a practice ſo quite contrary to thoſe ſayings, that are perhaps taken out of ſome zealous catholick Authors of thoſe ſuperſtitious times, rather than conſonant to the rules of Law, that they can be no foundation for this diſtinction; eſpecially conſidering that Spain and Portugal, as I ſaid, 'till the middle of Edward IVth's time, were poſſeſſed by Infidels: And yet I can't but think they muſt be traded with, and no man can find any thing of the diſtinction but only out of theſe occaſional ſayings in Calvin's caſe.

But be that point of trading with or without licence (which I mentioned before) how it will, yet I conceive that point will never be ſufficient to ground this ſame ſole trade, or to found a Monopoly upon, that cannot warrant a Grant of a ſole trade, ſole buying and ſole ſelling, to be granted to you and your ſucceſſors, your ſons, ſervants, apprentices, factors, and ſuch as you ſhall licence for ever: There is a licence and grant in perpetuity, not only to thoſe that then were, but to their ſons and ſucceſſors, and thoſe whom they ſhall licence; and this into a very great part of the World.

And by the ſame reaſon all Turky and Barbary, a great part of the Weſt-Indies, and other places of the World, may be monopolized; and perhaps all chriſtian Countries.

The Statute of Monopolies has no allowance or exception for Monopolies, to infidel Countries; that is, againſt all ſole buying, ſole ſelling, or ſole uſing of any thing.

And the Turky trade was uſed long before that time, as by Charter, granted 23 Eliz. So was the Bourbon trade, as by the Charter thereof; and I believe to the Eaſt-Indies alſo.

And the Statute of Monopolies being ſo general (the Proviſo not reaſonably conſtruable to except this Company out of the extent of that Statute, unleſs all Patents that may be granted to Companies of Monopolies, are by that exception or Proviſo, out of the Statute) and deſerving for the ſuppreſſing ſo great evils as Monopolies are, and always have been accounted:

I hope it will not be avoided upon any imaginary difference in Law, betwixt infidel and chriſtian Countries, to monopolize thereby the trade, perhaps of the greater part of the World, as Turky, Perſia, Barbary, Eaſt and Weſt-Indies; for the Weſt-Indies, I think, the greater part are pagans.

My Lord, I have looked over the caſes, that were here, and the debates that have been printed in 3d and 4th of King Charles I. about the King's Power of impoſing rates and ſubſidies, and impoſitions upon merchandizes, in Bates's caſe in the Exchequer, 4 Car. I. 2 Inſt. 63. and Mr. Ruſhworth's account of the debates in Parliament at that time about that matter: many things are there ſaid concerning the King's Power of reſtraining and prohibiting of trade, and the Writ Ne Exeat Regnum. And from theſe reaſons, they that argued for the King, urge the reaſonableneſs of impoſitions upon merchandize. That caſe aroſe from an impoſition upon Currants, and methinks if there had been known any ſuch diſtinction, as they would here inſinuate; it had been of great uſe in that caſe as well as this, but throughout the Arguments and Reaſons there debated, they did never make any diſtinction between Infidel and Chriſtian, but native and foreign commodities; and did endeavour to have a prerogative to impoſe rates upon them: and the reaſons were theſe, and all the Arguments run thus; The King can prohibit and reſtrain any Merchant to go out of the country by Writ, Ne Exeat Regnum. The King can prohibit any foreign commodities to be imported; then none can go out without licence, nor import without licence, and conſequently it is a legal thing, when this licence is granted upon the payment of ſuch a duty or impoſition, or under ſuch a rate as can be agreed on between the King and the Merchant; and therefore ſuch an impoſition or farm is lawful.

Theſe were the arguments in that caſe, and in theſe arguments it appears that a reſtraint in conſequence does import a tax, rate or farm, for a diſpenſation with that reſtraint.

For if licences be requiſite, it is worth conſideration, whether that will not introduce the impoſing of rates without Parliament, or otherwiſe than in a Parliamentary way. This, I ſay, is worthy conſideration. Suppoſe it true, there have been licences to go into Infidel Countries to trade; ſo there have been to go beyond the Seas, and have been to other trade beſides this: yet it does not follow as a true conſequence, that it is unlawful to go or trade without licences; much leſs does it follow from thence, that ſuch a Patent as this to any one or few Subjects, or to ſuch a Corporation, to have the whole and ſole trade into any place, and power of licenſing others, can be warranted by it.

I don't queſtion but the King may reſtrain the paſſage of Merchants and Merchandize in ſome caſes, and to embargo Ships in ſome caſes.

But theſe are upon ſpecial reaſons; as Firſt, In the caſe of War.

Secondly, In the caſe of ſuch merchandizes, as are neceſſary for the defence or ſafety of the Kingdom, to reſtrain their Exportation.

Thirdly, In caſe of a Plague from particular places to import.

But then theſe prohibitions are general, and their particular reaſons and grounds are apparent.

But if under any pretence any ſole trade to ſome one perſon, body politick, or natural be granted, excluding all others; that Grant I conceive is in deceit of the King, and to the prejudice of his Subjects, and void.

Never has ſuch a Grant hitherto had any judicial allowance; nay, ſo far from that, that as far as I could obſerve, no opinion has been till within four or five years, that ſuch Grants were good to exclude others, nor any action or ſuit ever adventured before now, to be brought upon any ſuch ground.

So that, my Lord, as to this great point, both the old Common Law, and the old Statute Law, and the Statute of Monopolies, with ſubmiſſion, are againſt this Grant of the ſole trade; and the diſtinction between Infidel Countries and Chriſtian, is ſo thin, and upon ſo weak a bottom, that I hope it will never be ſtrong enough to bear the weight of

ſo great a conſequence as this is. For tho' at preſent Infidels be diſtinguiſhed from Chriſtians; yet from their arguments and kind of reaſoning about reſtraint of going beyond Sea and trading, Spain and Portugal may be brought in, and France too; and ſo the argument will run from Infidel to Chriſtian at length, and I know not where it will ſtop.

So I humbly leave that point to your Lordſhips judgment, whether ſuch a Grant of a ſole trade, appears to be ſuch a Grant, as is good according to Law; and whether or no, notwithſtanding what they have ſaid, it does not appear by the old Common Law, and the old Statute Law, and by all our late Acts of Parliament, to be in Law a void Grant.

The next thing, my Lord, I come unto, is the ſecond point, which I ſhall be but ſhort in: about the firſt, I have taken up moſt of your time, and I beg your Lordſhip's pardon for it; becauſe, if I miſtake not, it is a moſt weighty point in the conſequence of it. But then ſuppoſing and admitting their Grant to be a good Grant, whether or no, can you maintain this action? If the Law ſhould be ſo, that the Defendant ought not to have traded there without licence, then he may be puniſhable at the King's ſuit, by fine and impriſonment; but that you ſhould maintain an action againſt him, what cauſe of action, what damage or loſs to you, have you laid in your declaration? You ſay in your declaration, that the Defendant Sandys not being a Member of your Company; nor a Son, Factor or Servant, nor Aſſign of your Company; traded into the Eaſt-Indies in the places within the limits of your Charter; and has there bought wares, and bargain'd and ſold merchandizes, and imported and ſold them in England, againſt the will of the Company, and to their prejudice and impoveriſhment, and againſt the form of their Charter, and to the Company's damage 1000*l.*

Firſt, You have not alledged in all your declaration, whether or no he had a licence from the King, and that is naught: for I think, tho' the King is pleaſed to ſay in his Letters Patent, he will not grant licences without leave of the Company, yet he may do ſo if he pleaſe notwithſtanding that Grant.

Secondly, Then you have not ſhewn any loſs or damage that you have had by his trading thither: did he buy ſo much of the merchandize of the country, as not to leave there ſufficient for you to furniſh your Ships withal, ſo that they came home empty? No ſuch thing is alledged. Did he hence export to ſell there ſo much merchandize, as not ſufficient left for you here to buy? Or, did he bring home here ſo much, as that there were not buyers ſufficient for his Goods and yours alſo? There are no ſuch things alledged, or is the truth ſo: as that hereby your impoſing your prices upon your commodities, ſelling at your own prices, and exacting what you thought fit, was hindred; and for this you would maintain an action.

I think it will be the firſt time, that ever a man recover'd damages for being hindred from impoſing and exacting his own prices, or having the advantage of his Monopoly, or for another's having an earlier or a quicker trade, and under-ſelling his own commodities and merchandizes lower than the Plaintiffs can afford them.

You agree by your own declaration, that there are many others that are concern'd as well as you: you ſay, you have the ſole trade to yourſelves; your Factors, your Servants and your Sons, as ſoon as they come to twenty-one; all that are of your Company, all that you grant licences to, all that you ſhall aſſign your trade to; all thoſe have an intereſt, if you can maintain an action. Other people have trade there as well as you, can they maintain an action?

A Commoner may bring an action upon the caſe againſt a Stranger, for putting his Cattle into the Common, provided that the Common thereby be impaired, and the Commoner have not ſufficient Common as before, and have a damage, otherwiſe he can maintain no action.

In Robert Mary's caſe, 9 Co. 113. it is there reſolved, that for every feeding of the beaſts of a ſtranger in a Common, the Commoner ſhall not have an aſſize or action upon the caſe; but an action does lie, if the feeding be ſuch, that the Commoner cannot have common paſture for his own beaſts; and then it is the conſequence, the loſs of his Common, that gives him cauſe of action.

It is not alledged in the declaration, that your trade was any thing the worſe. No damage appears to you by it: what reaſon, that you ſhould recover damages, where you have not ſuſtain'd any loſs? And you have alledged none in your declaration; how can your declaration be good? It then contains no cauſe of action.

You ſhould now, if you would have made a declaration, that ſhould have intitled you to a cauſe of action, have ſhewn how you ſuffer'd by Sandys a ſtranger trading to the Eaſt-Indies, that he bought up all, and you could have nothing; for if he left enough for you, what hurt have you. What reaſon is there you ſhould recover damage, if you have not ſuſtain'd any loſs? And if you alledge none in your declaration; how is you declaration, that ſhews no cauſe of action, maintainable?

In the caſe of Monopolies, 11 Co. 88. b. Rolls Abr. 1ſt part, fol. 106. The laſt point in that caſe is a full authority in this point: That admitting the Patent to be good, for the ſole making and ſelling of Cards, that was granted to Darcy for 12 years, yet no action would lie in that caſe, though the Defendant did contrary to this Patent ſell Cards. Adjudged that it was a Monopoly and Patent void: that if the Patent had been good, yet no action would have laid againſt the Defendant upon it.

My Lord, If that be ſo as it is declared to be in that caſe; in the laſt point reſolv'd by the Judges, if that action would not lie there, this will not lie; ſuppoſing this Charter to be never ſo good, and the Defendant has done contrary to it.

My Lord, there is only one other reaſon, for which the action will not lie; and that is grounded upon the Letters Patent, as they are granted to you. For by the Letters Patent, it is not abſolutely, but ſub modo granted, that you ſhall have the ſole trade; and that no other perſon ſhall trade there, under pain of forfeiting ſhip and goods; one half to the King, another half to the Company. So that, my Lord, the words of reſtraint are not abſolute, but only under ſuch a penalty and forfeiture.

Now, my Lord, if I ſhould ſuppoſe this Patent to have all the force and ſtrength, that they can deſire; ſuppoſing that this Patent were in an Act of Parliament, penned in this manner, that did reſtrain all perſons from trading to the Eaſt-Indies, except the Company, under pain of forfeiture of ſhip and goods; under favour, you that will have advanadvantage of this reſtraint, muſt take it in that manner as the Act does give it; you ſhall not have any other penalty or puniſhment, but what the Act gives. For when any new Law is made, you muſt take it as it is, and no otherwiſe, till another new Law be made. And ſo is the rule in 7 Co. 37. 11. Co. 56, & 59. Plowd. Com. 206. It cannot be altered without a new Law.

And I would but only ſuppoſe upon the Statute of Edw. VI. that gives the owner of tithes, treble damages againſt him that ſets them not forth; a man brings an action upon the caſe, would that be well? No, he muſt take the Law as it is, ſuch an action never was brought, nor if brought could be maintain'd; yet here the damages are given to the party.

The like of all other penal Statutes: a man muſt only forfeit the penalty the Statute inflicts; ſo that this action cannot, as I conceive, be maintain'd. So that, my Lord, taking all together, admitting (tho' I hope it is not ſo) that this Patent is a good Patent; yet you are not the ſole perſons intereſted, there are others beſides you, your Grantees, Factors and Servants, and Sons are to trade there. You have not laid any particular damage; therefore you cannot, by the reaſon of the caſe of Monopolies, maintain any ſuch action as this.

And if you will take advantage of this Grant, it is reaſonable you ſhould take it as the Grant gives it, proceed for the forfeiture of ſhip and goods; but for the action of the caſe, your Charter does not give it; nor, if an Act of Parliament had been penned after this manner, would ſuch an action have lain.

So that to conclude.

Firſt, That that, which this Company claims in this caſe by this Patent, to have the ſole trade to the Eaſt-Indies in their politick capacity, excluding others, is a Monopoly, and ingroſſing againſt the Common Law, and the antient Statutes, and the Statute of Monopolies, 21 Jacobi. And therefore they have no right to have what they claim.

Secondly, That what the Defendant has done in this caſe, he has lawfully done, and therefore not to be puniſh'd.

Thirdly, That tho' the Company had a lawful claim to the trade in ſuch manner, as in their declaration is ſet forth, and the Defendant done what he ought not, yet they cannot maintain this action.

And upon the whole matter, whether beſt for the Company to have judgment for them or againſt them, may deſerve their thoughts.

But this being ſo great in the conſequence, as the whole trade of the Kingdom depending upon it, I have laboured the more.

The antient Laws, the antient ways, is what I endeavour, and againſt new ways upon any pretence whatſoever.

And therefore, my Lord, I humbly beg your judgment for the Defendant.

Lord Chief-Juſtice. Do you intend to have another Argument in it, Gentlemen?

Mr. Sollicitor-General. What your Lordſhip pleaſes.

Lord Chief-Juſtice. It is a caſe of great weight and conſequence, perhaps, as ever any caſe, that has come into Weſtminſter-hall. I muſt needs ſay, it has been extraordinarily well argued on both ſides; and it muſt be neceſſarily taken notice of as a point of great conſequence, wherein the King's prerogative, and the privileges of the Eaſt-India Company, and this joint trade, are concern'd on the one ſide; and the benefit of particular perſons, and the liberty of free uncontroulable trading is concern'd on the other: and it is fit there ſhould be all the conſideration, and all the deliberation upon a matter of this great moment, that poſſibly can be. I cannot be ſo wonderfully captivated with the differences, that have been made between the Charter to the Eaſt-India Company, and thoſe to the Turky Company and the others; and tho' I have heard much in the defence of Charters and Corporations, I am of opinion there is no ſuch great matter of commendation due to them: but I take the Common Law to be the beſt Law in World. For that Charter, that you Mr. Pollexſen defended here ſo ſtrongly after judgment given againſt it; the Corporation became as inviſible within a few days, as you ſay this was, no duns could ſee it; tho' there were duns that went to wait upon that Corporation, but came away as empty as they went: and I wiſh the duns were like to be as well ſatisfied from the one, as they are from the other; and therefore there can be no great matter in that. But there is another thing that very much deſerves conſideration, it is a queſtion wherein trade is mightily concern'd: we know we have a potent Neighbour, who has both experience and induſtry, and are our rival in this trade; I wiſh we had as much induſtry and were as diligent as they; they have found by long experience, that a Joint-Stock is the only way to carry on their trade, I mean Holland. And it is very well known, if it had not been for a Joint-Stock, the trade had never been ſo beneficial as it is. And Mr. Sandys would not have had ſuch a deſire to the trade, for it would not have been ſo well ſettled and fixed; and therefore, I take it to be a wonderful thing, and to carry a great conſequence in it upon that account; that we ſhould conſider how this trade comes to be ſo great, and ſo deſirable. Now that by the Joint-Stock, and Induſtry, and Expence of the Company, the thing is become facile and valuable; for particular perſons to come and ſweep away the advantage of it, that ought to be well conſider'd. Mr. Sandys and his Partners are very zealous now to reap the fruits of the Company's labours. But ſuppoſe this queſtion ſhould be asked, Will you be contented to come in and pay your proportion of all the charge theſe people have been at, to put the trade into this capacity it is in? But is it fair, after they have reduced it into ſo good condition, at a vaſt expence and trouble, for other particular perſons to come and ſay, let us have the benefit of it, that have had nothing of the burthen and charge? And then there is another conſequence of great concern; peace and war, no one doubts, are actually in the power of that Prince and People with whom the trade is. I would deſire to know, ſuppoſing an injury ſhould be committed by any particular perſon to the Infidels, and the Ship get away; will not all the reſt of the Company's ſtock, being of the ſame Nation, be in danger of ſuffering by it? Certainly it would; and therefore ſince they are likely to anſwer for the wrong, is it not fit they ſhould have the management of it? So we may, if we come to argue by conſequences, eaſily find out a great many inconveniences on both ſides; but they are not to overrule the Law one way or the other; they are ſpecious pretences by way of argument, but the Law is a certain rule, and conſequences are not one way or

or other to over-rule it. The main point truly is a point of great conſideration and weight; perhaps as conſiderable as ever any that has come in debate here; and therefore it is fit, that all due deliberation be taken to have it debated.

Mr. Juſtice Withins. Mr. Pollexfen, you ſeem to argue that the King's Grant to them is a void Grant, and againſt Common Law, as being a Monopoly in granting them the ſole trade; then that does not come to the point in Michelborne's caſe, about trading without licence with Infidels; and therefore you go upon another ground, than what Mr. Sollicitor did.

Mr. Pollexfen. I go upon the particular caſe here before you.

Mr. Juſtice Withins. And you have not given any anſwer to the Petition of the Commons, cited by Mr. Sollicitor.

Mr. Pollexfen. Truly Sir, I think, it does not need any anſwer; for I go chiefly againſt this Grant, which is againſt Law and void.

Lord Chief-Juſtice. Truly, Mr. Pollexfen, I am not much in love neither with your other point about the action; for what became, pray, of all the actions that have been brought upon that Statute of Monopolies, by the Patentees of new inventions, as there has been multitudes in my Lord Hales's time, and at all times?

Mr. Pollexfen. In that caſe there's no-body but the particular Grantee, that has that invention; and he brings the action. But here, of your own ſhewing, you have intitled others to the trade, as the ſervants, and factors, and children; and therefore you can never have ſuch an action.

Lord Chief-Juſtice. When will you have it argued again?

Mr. Pollexfen. We ſhall be ready for the Defendant next Term.

Lord Chief-Juſtice. That is a little too ſoon, there's but a very ſhort Vacation, and that is but a ſhort Term; I think you had beſt have another argument in Michaelmas-Term.

Mr. Sollicitor-General. Yes, if your Lordſhip pleaſe.

Mr. Pollexfen. What your Lordſhip pleaſes; we ſhall be ready, if your Lordſhip pleaſes to hear us next Term.

Lord Chief-Juſtice. I know Mr. Sandys is in very great haſte, but the zeal and tranſport of any particular perſon, muſt not think to oblige us to go hand over head, in a caſe of this great weight and moment; there is great conſideration to be had of the length of time, that this Company has continued; there has been an Eaſt-India Company in King James's time, in the late King's time, and in this King's time.

Mr. Juſtice Holloway. And here is a great trade ſettled, we muſt not deſtroy it preſently.

Lord Chief-Juſtice. We muſt not gratify the zeal and tranſport of Mr. Sandys, by being overhaſty in this matter.

Mr. Pollexfen. My Lord, we ſhall be well content to ſtay till Michaelmas-Term.

Lord Chief-Juſtice. Ay, I know the Counſel will; but whether your Client will or no, I cannot well tell, nor do not much care. Well, we will conſider of it, and hear another argument in Michaelmas-Term.

Mr. Attorney-General (Sir Robert Sawyer) his Argument.

The Governour and Company of Merchants of London, trading to the Eaſt-Indies, Plaintiffs. Thomas Sandys, Defendant.

De Termino S. Michaelis, Anno Regni Regis Car. xxxvi. Anno Domini 1684.

IN an action upon the caſe brought by the Company againſt the Defendant, for trading into the Eaſt-Indies contrary to their Grant, in prejudice of their trade, and to their damage of 1000 l.

It comes before the Court upon the Plaintiffs demurrer to the Defendant's Plea of the Statute of 15 E. III.

The Record having been ſo often opened at large; I ſhall only put it as a Caſe upon the Record.

The King by his Letters Patent, 3tio Aprilis, 13 Car. II. reciting that the Company had long been a Company, and enjoy'd divers liberties and privileges under the Charters of Queen Elizabeth and King James, grants the Company the ſole trade and traffick to the Eaſt-Indies, being an Infidel country; with a prohibition to all others of his ſubjects to trade thither, without the leave and licence of the Company.

The Defendant not qualified as the Charter directs, without the leave of the Company, and againſt their wills, trades to the Eaſt-Indies, to the prejudice and damage of the Company's trade.

Upon this caſe, the points which have been moved and argued, are two.

Firſt, Whether the Letters Patent giving licence to the Company, to trade into the Eaſt-Indies, and to exerciſe the ſole trade there, with prohibition to other ſubjects to trade there, be good in Law.

Secondly, Whether admitting the Patent good, this action will lie for the Company.

In debating of the firſt point, I ſhall not go about to maintain the validity of theſe Letters Patent, or any ſuch of like nature; to bind up the King from granting licence to other of his ſubjects as he ſhall pleaſe: but ſhall content myſelf, to ſhew that all the ſubjects not licenſed by the King, nor authorized by the Company (as the Defendant is not) are bound by theſe Letters Patent.

Where the queſtion will be between the King's prerogative (and that in one of the higheſt points thereof, which concerns the defence and protection of his Kingdom) and the intercourſe with foreign Nations, on the one ſide; and the general liberty of trade, which is a tender point, and meerly concerns the intereſt of his ſubjects, on the other ſide.

It therefore being a queſtion of great conſequence, and of greater conſequence than difficulty, as I hope to ſhew; I ſhall, in examining into the point, uſe the utmoſt caution, by aſſerting the King's juſt prerogative in this matter, and not to depreſs the ſubjects true liberty of trade.

The ſubject matter of this queſtion, only relating to a foreign trade with Infidels, not in amity with the King of England; doth not neceſſarily oblige me to enter into the conſideration of any other trade,

trade, or of the King's prerogative, or the ſubjects liberty in relation thereto.

Which would much ſhorten my task in ſupporting theſe Letters Patent, and the trouble the Court is like to receive thereby.

But becauſe the great force of the arguments, made uſe of on the other ſide againſt theſe Letters Patent, have been drawn from principals and precedents of Law; which concern as well the inland trade and traffick of this Kingdom, as with other Chriſtian Nations in amity with the King of England, with whom leagues of commerce have been made by our Kings; or to whom a common trade hath been laid open by ſeveral particular Laws:

It is made neceſſary for me from the other ſide, a little to conſider theſe trades, and how far the ſubjects liberty or the King's prerogative be concern'd in them.

Whereby it will appear, that the arguments and authorities produced by the defendant's council, will be of no great force to impeach theſe Letters Patent for the management of a foreign trade with Infidels.

I ſhall therefore briefly conſider the inland or native trade within the Kingdom, and then the foreign trade with other Nations.

The inland trade is either for manufactures or merchandize.

Under the trade of manufactures falls in the husbandman, and all ſorts of artificers; who have full right by the Common Law, to exerciſe what, and as many trades as they pleaſe; ſo as no annoyance happen to the neighbourhood: And with theſe the King's prerogative is little concerned, it cannot reſtrain them, it being their livelihood.

Nor is the publick weal otherwiſe concerned therein, than that all its members ſhould live by their honeſt labours and induſtry. As to the trade of merchandize, or inland commerce, every man (generally ſpeaking) might buy of any man, whether native or foreign, and as many kinds or ſorts of merchandize as he pleaſeth, which I take to have been the Common Law before 37 Ed. 3. cap. 5. whereby all trading Merchants were reſtrained to one ſort of merchandize.

But that Act continued not long, being repealed 38 Ed. 3. cap. 2.

Yet this trade of inland merchandize, lay under ſeveral reſtrictions at Common Law. 1. Notwithſtanding ſuch general liberty of buying and ſelling, no man could ingroſs any one commodity. 2. The ancient common Law confined this ſort of trade to certain places, as Towns, Cities, or other publick places appointed by the King, Co. 3 Inſt. fo. 196. in the Chap. for eſtalling.

It was puniſhable to buy above the value of twenty pence elſewhere, or to anticipate merchandizes before they arrived at theſe places.

3. No aſſemblies could be held for the traffick of buying or ſelling, without the King's licence; for tho' ſome Markets and Fairs are held by preſcription, (the original Grants not appearing) yet theſe were derived from the Crown, by ſome royal licence before time of memory: they all depend upon the ſame Crown, and may be forfeited to the Crown.

This is ſo frequent in our Books, I need not cite the authorities.

And here the prerogative of the Crown had a great ſtroke.

The inland traders, in buying and ſelling, might buy and ſell in private places, and could not be reſtrained: But they could not hold aſſemblies for trade without the King's leave and licence; Marts, Fairs, and Markets, in their true notion, being no other than royal licences to aſſemble for trade and traffick.

And theſe, when granted, cannot be reſumed without cauſe of forfeiture: For I do admit, that a licence to trade or traffick carries an intereſt with it, being a matter of profit.

And I take the Law to be the ſame, whether the Fair or Market be erected only, and not granted to any one; and where it is granted to a ſubject, all the King's ſubjects have a liberty and right of trafficking there, and cannot be prohibited by the Lord of the Fair or Market.

The reaſon of theſe reſtrictions of the inland trade of merchandize, and the King's prerogative therein, is from the concern the publick peace and juſtice of the Kingdom hath in this ſort of trade, more than in the former of the manufactures; viz. to prevent all manner of cheats by falſe weights and meaſures, corrupt merchandizes, and too great enhancing of the prices, and breaches of the peace, occaſioned by publick concourſes, tho' under colour of trade and traffick.

And upon this ground the Common Law provides, That to all ſuch licences for publick Marts, which the King may grant when and where he pleaſes, being not to the damage of others before granted, a Court of juſtice is incident of common right, for preſervation of the publick peace and correction of ſuch deceits which generally attend the trade of merchandizing.

Fourthly, There was another reſtriction upon the inland merchandize taken notice of in our Books, which was more particular, and to certain Places, viz.

The claim of foreign bought and foreign ſold, by ſeveral Cities, Towns and Ports, ſome by cuſtom and others by Charters; and there is no great queſtion to be made, but before 9 E. 3. cap. 1. the Charters as well as Cuſtoms did prevail for that Liberty, but both were taken away by the Statute, and divers ſubſequent laws taken notice of in the caſe of the City of London, Co. 8. fo. 128.

And between that and 9 H. 4. there were great ſtrugglings in Parliament between the foreign Merchants and the City of London, and other Towns, about that Cuſtom.

'Till at length, London prevailed for a private Act of Parliament for eſtabliſhing of the Cuſtoms, which they have enjoyed ever ſince 9 H. 4. 30.

By an ancient Record of Henry III. it appears, that the abbots, and others the religious of the County of Lincoln, under colour of ſelling their wool, which aroſe upon their demeſne lands, turned Merchants, and bought up wools and ſold them with their own wools: They were prohibited to do it by a Writ out of the Chancery.

And upon the complaint of the Merchants of Lincoln, in the time of Edward I. the like Writ of Prohibition iſſued, Pla. Parl. in the Appendix 609. By all which it appears, that the inland traffick of the Kingdom, which was within the care and cognizance of the Common Law, was not unlimited, nor the ſubject's liberty therein never ſo large as it is now inſiſted upon, to all foreign parts whatſoever.

And that the managery of the principal part of the home traffick, which conſiſts in the Marts, Fairs, and Markets of the Kingdom, depends upon the King's prerogative, and is managed under it; the Law having entruſted the King with that power, for the benefit of his people, and the peace of the Kingdom.

In the next place, I will take a view of the foreign trade.

The Common Law, and our Law-Books, take notice but of two ſorts of foreigners, alien friends, and alien enemies; Calvin's Caſe, Co. 7. 17.

Neither can there be any other ſort of foreigners, generally ſpeaking: For if the queſtion ariſe, whether alien friend or alien enemy? it muſt be tried by the leagues with the Prince, whoſe ſubject he is; which is, or ought to be enrolled in Chancery. And tho' there be not actual war or fighting between the two Princes and their ſubjects, yet they are in Statu Belli, and may aſſume arms when they pleaſe, and ſeize the Goods and Perſons of each other's ſubjects.

I ſhall firſt conſider what the Common Law determined as to the ſubjects trade and traffick with alien friends, beyond the ſeas, and upon what foot that trade ſtands. And then particularly conſider how it determines in caſe of commerce with alien enemies, and incidently of Infidels.

I conceive the Common Law hath made no expreſs proviſion, nor given any abſolute right for the ſubjects to trade with any foreigners beyond the ſeas.

It will be of little uſe to diſcourſe how far the law of Nations interpoſes in this matter: whether every Nation be obliged to entertain trade and commerce with another Nation.

And antecedent to all leagues and treaties for commerce, little will be found, beſides the laws of hoſpitality, which do not give any demandable right.

Bodinus, in his Book de Repub. lib. 1. cap. 6, 7. ſays, Quæ tametſi jure gentium eſſe videantur prohiberi, tamen ſæpe a Principibus videmus.

And in his Book, de Republ. lib. 1. cap. 6. holds, That it is lawful to forbid foreigners from entering the borders, not only if a war be on foot, but in time of peace; that the manners of the Inhabitants may not be corrupted by converſe with ſtrangers.

And in his Book de Republ. lib. 1. cap. 6, and 7. That the Laws of commerce are contained in the particular compacts and agreements of People and Princes.

What Bodinus declares to be the Law of Nations, exactly agrees with the Laws of this Kingdom; for all ſtrangers come hither under ſafe conducts, which contained both the King's licence and protection of them.

The King might inhibit foreigners from coming into the Realm, and might remand them when here.

Magna Charta, cap. 30. which is a general ſafe-conduct to merchants ſtrangers, which reſerves this prerogative to the King, niſi publicè prohibiti.

My Lord Coke, in his Comment upon this Chap. 2 Inſt. 5, 7. admits they might have been prohibited before this Statute, but conſtrues the ſaving of this Prohibition by Act of Parliament.

Which conſtruction, as it is without any former precedent or authority, ſo it is againſt the conſtant ſtream of precedents and practice ever ſince.

Rot. Clauſ. 24 H. 3. dorſo, which was after this Statute, the King ſent his writs to ſeveral Mayors, commanding that all the Merchants, ultra montem, ſhould depart the Kingdom within a month.

And in the ſame Roll, dorſo, there is another Writ to the Mayor of London, giving leave to Roman, Florentine, and ſome other Merchants, to ſtay till the feaſt of St. Martin in the year following.

And the conſtant practice in every King's reign ſince, hath been both by proclamation and orders of council, to command foreigners to depart the Realm.

Beſides, the conſtruction my Lord Coke puts upon it, makes the clauſe idle and eluſory.

That one Act of Parliament ſhould provide for a ſaving by a ſubſequent Act, which of it ſelf would be repealed by the former.

So where an Act of Parliament prohibited foreigners to come in, the King by his ſafe conducts might licence them.

The Commons, in the Parliament 1 H. 5. pray, That the Statute made by Henry IV. for avoiding of ſtrangers out of the Realm, might be put in execution. The King grants it, ſaving his prerogative to licence whom he pleaſes. The Commons replied, Their intention was no otherwiſe, nor ever ſhould be by the grace of God. 1 H. 5. No. 15. Rolls Prerogative, 180.

This might further appear by the ſeveral Statutes made for the inviolable obſervation of the King's ſafe-conducts, which are in expreſs words mentioned to extend to alien enemies, as well as alien friends; 2 H. 5. cap. 6. and 20 H. 6. cap. 1.

It is held in Horn and Ivy's Caſe, Hill. 21 and 22 Car. Secundi, Banco Regis, Syderfin, That at Common Law the King might prohibit the importation of foreign commodities, before the Statutes therefore made.

So then as the caſe ſtood at Common Law, foreign Princes and Nations might prohibit the ſubjects of England to trade with them, as the King might prohibit foreigners to trade here.

The King might inhibit any of his ſubjects from going beyond ſea: And this might have been by particular Writ or general Proclamation.

Our Books and Precedents are ſo full in this point, that it was admitted on the other ſide; for there could not be produced any authority that renders it the leaſt queſtionable, but multitudes are for it.

Rot. Clauſ. 7 Ed. 2. memb. 10. A Writ to the Sheriff of York, to ſeize the bodies and lands of ſuch as had gone beyond ſea, contrary to the King's Inhibition.

Rot. Clauſ. 41 Ed. 3. mem. 24. dorſo, Writs to all the maritime Towns, to take care that a Proclamation prohibiting all his ſubjects, (except noted Merchants, and thoſe unarmed) be put in execution.

Hereby it is evident, that it was penal to go beyond ſea, contrary to the King's Inhibition, before the Statute of 5 R. 2. cap. 2.

All that that Statute adds to ſtrengthen the King's Inhibition, is only in point of further penalty, viz. A forfeiture of the Goods of the paſſenger, and of the Veſſel of the Maſter exporting: And though there be three ſorts of perſons excepted out of that Statute, viz. Lords and other great Men, true and notable Merchants, and the King's ſoldiers; yet that Law gave thoſe perſons no other liberty than they had before, only leaves them out of the Penalty provided by that Statute.

That

That before this Statute, Noblemen and other great Men might be prohibited, appears by my Lord Coke's opinion, 3 Inſt. 179. in the caſe of fugitives; and the Records there mentioned, eſpecially that of the 25th of Ed. 3. Rot. Clauſ. memb. 15. dorſo, where the King by his proclamation prohibits, that, Nequis Comes, Baro, Miles religioſus, ſagittarius aut operarius, extra Regnum ſe transfretet, ſub pœna Arreſtationis & Incarcerationis.

And for the King's ſoldiers, it is plain they could not depart the Realm without the King's leave; but his raiſing of them for his foreign ſervice, was a ſufficient licence for them to depart the Realm with their ſeveral captains.

And for the true and notable Merchants excepted in the Statute, they are the ſame with the noted Merchants excepted in the proclamation of 41 E. 3. who were the Merchants of the Staple, who were admitted and ſworn to obſerve the laws of the Staple; and were bound to repair thither, and not elſewhere, without the King's ſpecial licence, as I ſhall afterwards ſhew.

By the Statute of 27 Ed. 3. which ſettled the laws of the Staple, cap. 23. all Merchants as well aliens as denizens, repairing to the Staple, are required to be ſworn before the Mayor and Conſtable of the Staple. After the Staple was at Calais, as it was 41 E. 3. & 5 R. 2. the ſame laws of the Staple continued; and theſe Merchants are in many Records taken notice of.

37 H. 8. cap. 15. All perſons are prohibited to buy wool in Kent, and ſome other Counties, except the Merchants of the Staple.

And 1 Eliz. cap. 13. provides, It ſhall be lawful for the Merchants, called Merchant Adventurers, and Merchants of the Staple, out of the River of Thames only, and twice in the year at moſt, to ſhip out and in foreign bottoms.

Now 41 E. 3. & 5 R. 2. the Staple was at Calais, and all the Merchants of the Staple were bound to repair thither only, and had a general licence ſo to do, without taking of Paſſports, as the form of the Statute of 5 R. 2. directed.

But theſe notable Merchants were reſtrained to trade to any other place than the Staple, as I ſhall after ſhew.

As the King may inhibit any of his ſubjects going beyond ſea, ſo he may at any time recall any of his ſubjects, under penalty of forfeiture of Goods and Lands, during life, Dyer 12, 8. parag. 10. & 276. & 375. 3 Inſt. 179. in the chapter of fugitives, & 25 & 26 Eliz. Cater's caſe in the Exchequer-Chamber, Leon. fo. 9.

Upon theſe grounds it is evident, that the Common Law did not give any abſolute right to the ſubjects to trade beyond ſea with foreigners; for no man can have a full right by law to any thing which others have a right by the ſame law to hinder him of, or to obſtruct him in the uſing or enjoyment of it.

And Mr. Pollexſen did rightly obſerve, that this fundamental right of the King, of prohibiting his ſubjects from going beyond ſea, equally reſpects the trade with chriſtian Nations as with Infidels; for both have a right to debar the Engliſh from trading with them, as the King of England had a right at Common Law, to reſtrain his ſubjects within the Realm from paſſing over the ſea to trade with them.

Which is founded upon the King's right of protecting his Kingdom, which could not be diſcharged if the ſubjects had ſuch general right as is pretended, of withdrawing their perſons and eſtates as well to infidel as chriſtian Countries.

And if ſuch general right were by the Common Law, it is marvelous; and that no Record or Book-caſe can be found, where it was ever ſo reſolved.

Notwithſtanding great occaſion hath been given in all times, by prohibition, for the ſubject to have aſſerted ſuch right;

The only authority produced is the opinion of Fitzherbert in Nat. Brev. fo. 85. where the words of Fitzherbert are, That by the Courſe of the Common Law, every man may go out of the Realm for merchandize, or travel, or any other cauſe, as he pleaſes, without demanding licence of the King, and ſhall not be puniſhed for it.

By this opinion, the liberty the ſubject had to travel, or to go for any other cauſe beyond ſea, is the ſame as to trade.

And this opinion imports no more than a bare impunity, that the Common Law made no expreſs proviſion againſt it, ſo as to puniſh it as an offence at Common Law, but left it to the direction of the King to prohibit, or permit as he ſhould ſee cauſe.

That this was the meaning of Fitzherbert, and that he did not intend any right the Common Law gave the ſubjects to go beyond ſea, but only that the Common Law was ſilent therein, and left it as a thing indifferent, antecedent to the King's Inhibition; it's evident both by Fitzherbert, in the ſame place, and the co-temporary opinions of the Sages of that time.

For immediately Fitzherbert explains his opinion, That becauſe every ſubject is bound to defend the King and the Realm, the King at his pleaſure may command the ſubject not to go out of the Realm without his licence; and if they do contrary thereto, they ſhall be fined for their diſobedience.

Here, by Fitzherbert, that liberty which he had aſſerted for the ſubject to trade and travel, as it was equal, ſo it might be equally reſtrained by the King, at his pleaſure.

All the Judges at that time were of the ſame opinion.

Mich. 1. Eliz. Dyer 165. in an aſſembly of the Judges and others, the queſtion is fully ſtated, Whether a ſubject generally might withdraw his perſon out of the Kingdom, for merchandize, travel, or other cauſe, by the ſole licence or permiſſion of the Common Law?

The queſtion is not put upon any right the ſubject had to go, but upon a bare permiſſion at Common Law.

For all the Judges agreed with Fitzherbert, that the King might prohibit them.

And Fitzherbert's opinion for ſuch permiſſion only, is urged; and at that time left with a Quære upon it, without any allowance of ſuch permiſſion from the Judges, but ſeemingly to the contrary.

But afterwards Mich. 12 & 13. Eliz. Dyer 296. a particular caſe of a Merchant that went beyond ſea to live, and not for merchandize, without the King's licence, came before the Judges; and 'twas debated before the Judges of both benches, and the Chief Baron, upon this point,

Whether it were an offence puniſhable at Common Law?

Two of the Judges held it to be an offence, and that the Common Law did prohibit it.

The reſt of the Judges concurred with Fitzherbert, and held, that before an expreſs prohibition by the King, by Proclamation or Writ, it was not an offence or contempt, but left by the Common Law as a thing indifferent, which imports no right, but a bare impunity.

But all the Judges, after a Prohibition, held it an offence and contempt, puniſhable at Common Law; whereby that point is ſettled by the opinion of Fitzherbert and the Judges of that time, That at the Common-Law licence was but a bare permiſſion, importing only impunity, in that the Law was ſilent before an expreſs Prohibition of the King, which is the loweſt degree of permiſſion taken notice of in Books of Law.

Grotius, in his Book De Jure Belli & Pacis, lib. fo. 3. No. 9. defines Permiſſion, properly ſo called, Permiſſio autem propriè, non actio eſt Legis, ſed actionis negatio, niſi quatenus aliud ab eo, cui permittitur obligat, ne Impedimentum ponat.

But this permiſſion of the Common Law goes not ſo far as to oblige or debar others from obſtructing the action, which may be impeded both by the King and other Nations, as I have ſhewn.

It carries only impunity with it, and this liberty of haunting or viſiting ſtrangers in amity, ſomething reſembles that liberty which the Common Law allows one ſubject towards another, viz. a free paſſage to his houſe, to ſpeak or treat with him, which ſounds only in excuſe of treſpaſs, and may be prohibited by the owner.

9 Ed. 4. fo. 4. par. 15. In treſpaſs for breaking his houſe, the defendant pleaded a licence from the plaintiff; who replied, That after the licence he prohibited the defendant to come.

For be the licence expreſs from the party or implied by the law, the owner might determine it by an expreſs Prohibition.

But tho' the Common Law did not expreſly prohibit the going beyond ſea without licence, ſo as to puniſh it as an offence criminally, yet it did diſcountenance all going beyond ſea without the King's licence, in adjudging their iſſue born there, after ſuch a departure, aliens, and not inheritable to the Engliſh Laws; as was reſolved inter Hide & Hill. Hillar. 25 Eliz. B. Rs.

3 Cro. 3. That if Baron and Feme go beyond ſea with licence, and tarry there after the time limited by the licence, and have iſſue born, they ſhall be aliens, and not inheritable.

Beſides thoſe Powers or Prerogatives wherewith the Common Law entruſts the King, for the defence of the Realm, viz. to prohibit and remove aliens, and to reſtrain from going, and to recall his own ſubjects when gone beyond ſea:

The Law reſts the ſole power of making leagues with foreigners in the King alone.

Which is the firſt ſtep towards a foreign trade:

The Common Law admitting of no trade with enemies, and enemies are made friends only by publick leagues to be made capable of being traded with.

And as the making of all leagues, ſo the modelling and limiting of ſuch leagues, are by the King alone.

As it is to be obſerved, that no leagues were ever yet made for an unlimited and univerſal trade, but in all leagues the particular municipal laws of each Country, are excepted; as for example, ſalt cannot be imported into France; and moſt French commodities are reſtrained from being imported hither.

So it was reſolved, Paſch. 36 Eliz. (4 Inſt. 5.) 3 Inſt. Henry de Vale and Tomlinſon, upon a ſeizure of French Goods, and a complaint to the Council upon it, That the laws of either Kingdom were excepted in the league.

Much leſs doth the King in any league conclude or build up his own prerogative towards his own ſubjects, in granting them licences to trade, or in reſtraining of them from going beyond ſea, tho' in order to trade.

Moreover, the rules of the Common Law are not adapted to determine matters of foreign trade, neither can foreigners be preſumed to have cogniſance of the municipal laws of this Kingdom.

The principal part of foreign trade is tranſacted beyond ſea, where the Common Law can have no cognizance, but is confined within the compaſs of the four ſeas.

The Law was ſo ſtrict, that an obligation bearing date at a certain place beyond ſea, could not be tried in England, 21 E. 4. fo. 74.

Service of a privy ſeal upon a ſubject beyond ſea, commanding him to return when certified into Chancery, and ſent by Mittimus into the Exchequer for ſeizing of Goods and Lands, is not traverſable, becauſe not triable in England, 2 Eliz. Dyer 176.

In the Caſe of the King and Cuſack, 17 Jacobi, Rolls Rep. 2 part, fol. 112. Serjeant Davies argues, that the municipal laws of any Realm are not ſufficient for ordering the affairs and traffick of Merchants.

And upon this ground, when the Staple was removed from beyond ſea to ſeveral Towns in England, by the Statute of 27 E. 3. it is provided, That the trade ſhould be governed by the ſame laws it was before.

And by 7 Chap. it is enacted, That all Merchants coming to the Staple, ſhall be ruled by the Law Merchant of all things touching the Staple, and not by the Common Law of the Land.

Whereby, in negative words, the Common Law was excluded from intermeddling in the affairs of Merchants; as not proper to decide thoſe controverſies, and whereof foreigners could have no cognizance.

By all which it appears, that the Common Law made no proviſion for foreign trade.

The Common Law therefore having given no right to the ſubjects to trade beyond the ſeas with foreigners, nor preſcribed any rules for the managing of that trade, but left that matter ſolely to the King, for the beſt profit of his people:

It may be proper to conſider upon what foundations the foreign trade ſtands.

The foundations are two.

1. Leagues made by the Kings of England with foreign Princes and States.

2. Royal licences, which are either ſolely by Grant, or by Act of Parliament.

For all Acts of Parliament in matters of prerogative, and which move only from the King, are by the King's Grants in Parliament, ratified into Law.

By leagues, foreigners are bound by publick compact to admit the King's ſubjects to a freedom to trade with foreigners beyond ſea.

I have already ſpoken of leagues, as the neceſſary preparatory to all foreign trade, and without which no foreign trade could be enterprized by the ſubject.

What

What I ſhall add, is only concerning the neceſſary dependance of that trade upon leagues, in it's continuance and regulation; if the league be broken, let the ſubjects right be what it will, to trade either ſingly by Grant, or by Act of Parliament, it is ſuſpended, and after Proclamation made, becomes unlawful and puniſhable, as trading with enemies.

The leagues and treaties with foreign Princes for trade and commerce, whereof the ſole power is in the King, to bind the ſubjects of England,

They are the only Laws betwixt Nation and Nation to direct their trade and commerce by.

And by the ſaid leagues, trade may be limited to certain places and commodities, or other reſtrictions, as the two Princes ſhall agree upon, who are the only maſters of their leagues.

A clear and full inſtance of this, is in the leagues for trade with Flanders and the Low-Countries, between the Kings of England and the Dukes of Burgundy; whereby the Staple was ſettled at Bruges; and that no Wools ſhould be ſold in Flanders, but what came out of England; and that no Engliſh Cloth ſhould be ſold in Flanders, on pain of forfeiture.

21 E. III. Complaint was made in Parliament by the Merchants, of ſeveral abuſes committed by the men of Bruges, in reſtraining our Merchants from ſelling their Wools to whom they pleas'd at Bruges; and pray'd remedy.

The King's anſwer was, that the ordinance of the Staple ſhould be view'd, and that Thomas Michelborne, with whom the Patent touching that ordinance was, be call'd to bring the ſame with him, and ſome of the Merchants of the country, who beſt underſtood this matter: and the King by advice of his Council wou'd provide remedy; Rot. Parl. 21 E. III. nu. 10.

22 E. III. Another complaint is made in Parliament againſt the men of Bruges, for prohibiting the Merchants to buy ſtaple Wares here, and pray redreſs.

The King anſwers that he will ſpeak with the Flemiſh Ambaſſador about it, 22 E. III. nu. 13.

8 H. V. A grievous complaint made in Parliament againſt the men of Flanders; that tho' Engliſh Merchants obſerved the ancient league, that no Wools but Engliſh ſhou'd be ſold in Flanders, and no Engliſh Cloth ſold there; yet they permitted the Wools of Scotland, Catalonia, Arragon and Spain, to be ſold there, and pray remedy.

The King anſwers, that ſearch ſhall be made for the alliance.

And upon the like complaint, 9 H. V. the Commons pray, the King would pleaſe to treat with the Duke of Burgundy, that no other Engliſh Wools ſhou'd be manufactur'd there, or that the Engliſh might ſell their Cloth there:

The King anſwers, he would treat that the Engliſh Cloths might be there ſold. Rolls prerogative, 1. fo. 14. title, League.

But this treaty came to little purpoſe, till after the Acts of Parliament were made, 27 H. VI. cap. 1. (20 H. VI. cap. 4.) 4 E. IV. cap. 5. for excluding all the commodities of Flanders, until the Duke of Burgundy recall'd his proclamation for baniſhing Cloths out of his Dominions.

Thoſe Statutes produced a firm league between the Kings and the Duke of Burgundy; who in the Record is call'd the Duke of Hans or of the Still-yard, from the Merchants his ſubjects, who had long in England obtain'd thoſe names.

By that league a free trade for Cloth was agreed upon for the Engliſh Merchants in Flanders, to continue for ever; and the King confirm'd to the ſubjects of the Duke, as well the liberties granted by Edw. I. to Merchants Strangers in general, by his Charta Mercatoria; as thoſe granted by Edw. II. to the Merchants of the Still-yard in particular: which league was confirm'd in Parliament, 13 E. IV. nu. 2.

Theſe leagues may ſuffice to ſhew the dependance foreign trade hath upon leagues, as to its continuance and regulation.

By this league the Staple at Bruges was taken off, and liberty granted to the Engliſh Merchants to ſell their Cloths in any part of the Duke's Dominions.

Who theſe Engliſh Merchants were, I ſhall in this place only make a ſhort remark; That they were the Company of Merchant-Adventurers, erected and licenſed for the better regulation of trade for Wool and Cloth, beyond the Seas by Letters Patent; 1 Feb. 8 H. IV. and confirm'd by other Letters Patent, 1 Oct. 1 H. V. which I ſhall ſpeak more largely to, when I come to ſhow the conſtant poſſeſſion the Crown hath had of licenſing Corporations for foreign trade, excluſive to others.

The other foundation, upon which all foreign trade ſtands, are royal licences.

I before ſhew'd that the licence, which the Common Law gave to trade with foreigners, was no ſure foundation of trade; becauſe it might by Law be interrupted by the King, and did in its nature import no more than a bare impunity.

But where the King grants licences to his ſubjects to trade with foreigners, they gain a right or intereſt to trade according to ſuch licences;

Which are either by Grant only, or by Act of Parliament. I will firſt conſider thoſe, that are ſingly by the King's Grants.

That as the King may at Common Law prohibit any of his ſubjects to go beyond ſea, ſo he may licenſe them to go for trade or otherwiſe, is unqueſtionable.

The Writ of Ne Exeat Regnum, and ſeveral forms of licences in the Regiſter, fol. 190. and multitudes of other authorities make it out.

The King may grant ſuch licences, not only where himſelf may prohibit, but where the Common Law, and Acts of Parliament do prohibit.

Alien Enemies are prohibited by the Common Law to come within the Realm; yet the King may licenſe them to come by his ſafe conduct, as fully appears by the Statutes made for the obſervation of ſafe-conducts.

And it is obſervable that ſuch ſafe-conducts, put the Alien Enemy into the condition of an Alien Amy, as fully under the King's protection, during the continuance of his ſafe-conducts.

No ſubjects could ſeize his goods or injure his perſon, but he was puniſhable for it, both at the ſuit of the King, and of the party.

For before the Statutes made, conſervators for truces and ſafe-conducts were appointed, appears by a Record of this Court, Paſch. 13 E. III. Banco Regis, Rot. 12. which I ſhall have occaſion to make uſe of to another purpoſe.

And that ſuch an Alien Enemy may bring his perſonal action for debt, or any injury, appears by the caſe of John Douglas a Scotchman, 20 E. IV. fol. 6. Pl. 6. and Moore 431.

The King may licenſe his ſubjects to trade with enemies prohibited by Common Law.

And

And for licences to come, go and trade both within and without the Realm, againſt expreſs Acts of Parliaments, the inſtances are infinite.

But for the better methodizing of theſe, I ſhall make uſe of precedents and authorities, to make out the exerciſe of the King's prerogative in all times, as to matters relating to Foreign Trade.

I ſhall reduce what I have to offer under theſe heads.

Firſt, That the Staples, which were the publick Marts for all Merchants to reſort to, were at firſt ſettled only by the Kings of this Realm, antecedent to any Act of Parliament.

Secondly, That after the Staple was eſtabliſhed at Calais by Act of Parliament; the King gave licence to trade to other places, which no ſubject could do without ſuch licence.

Thirdly, That the regulation and managery of Foreign Trade in all caſes, where Acts of Parliament have not particularly interpos'd, have been guided and governed by the King's prerogative, both in point of licence and inhibition.

Firſt Head; As to ſettling the Staple in the Dominions of foreign Princes, as in the inſtance of Bruges; that muſt be done by leagues, nor can it otherwiſe be.

But the appointing of the Staples in England, or in the Foreign Dominions of the King, was at firſt by the King alone.

This is expreſly ſo declared in the recital of the Statute, 2 E. III. cap. 9. whereby Merchants Strangers, &c. have liberty granted them to trade in England, according to the form of the great Charter.

By Merchants-Privy, diſtinguiſhed from Merchants ſtrangers, in this Law are plainly intended the Merchants of the King's foreign Dominions.

The Iriſh who by Ordinatio pro Statu Hiberniæ, 17 E. I. had liberty granted them to traffick into England, ſo as they gave ſecurity not to go unto, nor commerce with Scotland, nor other the King's enemies.

And the Gaſcoigners, and other the King's ſubjects in France, who had divers liberties of trade granted them by the King; as appears by a difference between them and the Londoners, decided judicially in Parliament, 20 E. I. Parl. fol. 180, and 130.

That by Merchants-Privy is to be underſtood of the King's foreign ſubjects, I collect from the reference, this Law hath to Magna Charta, which concern'd only foreign Merchants; whereby the King's power to reſtrain them was reſerv'd, and conſequently was reſerv'd by this Law; as is taken notice of by an Act not printed, 8 E. III. num. 20. that the Staple was during the King's pleaſure, and the King revoked the Staple, giving Merchant ſtrangers liberty to buy any Staple-wares, 1 E. III. Parl. Rot. pars 2 and 3. Memb. 24.

A Commiſſion iſſues to the Mayor of London to put in execution the orders made by E. II. for eſtabliſhing the Staple in ſeveral Counties of England, and for the rule and government of Merchants.

By 27 E. III. cap. 1. the Staple was ſettled in ſeveral Towns in England.

But that Law had no words to bind the King's prerogative to remove it, and of that opinion was the Parliament, 38 E. III. where the Commons pray that the Staple may always continue in England.

The King anſwers, it ſhall continue till the next Parliament.

The firſt of March in the ſame year, the King remiſed it to Calais; but 43 E. III. cap. 1. becauſe of a war that broke out with France, it is brought back: the Act recites, that it had been removed to Calais by the King, for the profit of the Realm and eaſe of the Merchants of England.

47 E. III. nu. 17. The Commons pray that the Staple may be only kept at Calais, and that no Grant be made to the contrary.

The King anſwers, that he will appoint the Staple, as by the Council he ſhall think beſt.

1 R. II. nu. 98. The Commons pray to know where the Staple ſhall be, if Calais haply be beſieged.

The King anſwers, in ſuch places of the Realm, as were laſt uſed.

By the conſtitution of theſe Staples, Merchants were not only licenſed, but obliged to repair thither, and reſtrained to export their Staple-wares to any other place.

And altho' many Statutes were made to fortify and ſtrengthen the Staple, by creating a forfeiture of all Staple-wares, if carried to any other place; yet by the Records I have produced, it is manifeſt that the ſole appointment and ordering of the Staples was in the King, and that by the acknowledgement of ſeveral Parliaments.

2 H. V. cap. 6. provides that merchandizes of the Staple ſhall not be exported to any other place without the King's licence, before brought to the Staple, on pain of forfeiture.

2 H. VI. cap. 4. provides that all Staple-wares ſhall be carried to Calais, ſo long as the Staple is there.

And 8 H. VI. cap. 17. provides that if Merchants export the merchandizes of the Staple to any other place, the merchandizes ſhall be forfeited; except the Merchants of Jeane and Venice. And cap. 27. ſeveral licences granted by the King to export to other places are revoked.

What theſe Staple-wares were, is fit to be known, they comprehending the greateſt part of the native commodities of this Realm, that were merchandizable in foreign parts.

By the Statute of the Staple, 27 E. III. the Staple-wares are Wools, Leather, Woolfels and Lead: to theſe are added, by a Statute made 50 E. III. Tin, Worſted, Butter, Cheeſe, Feathers and many other commodities.

This Statute, tho' it be not printed, yet is taken notice of as a Statute and Law of the Staple, by the Statute of 3 H. VI. cap. 4. whereby Butter and Cheeſe are recited to have been made Staple-wares by this Law.

The Record is 50 E. III. nu. 20. (or 200.) where the Commons of the Town of Calais pray that the Staple may be holden only there:

Which the King grants, that it ſhall be holden only there, and no where elſe beyond ſea; as well of all ancient Staple-wares, as of Tin, Worſted, Butter, Cheeſe, Feathers, &c.

The Staple was ſeveral times remov'd by R. II. but from 21 R. II. it continued at Calais, till that Town was taken by the French.

By all which it is manifeſt, upon what ſlender grounds the Statute of 15 E. III. cap. 3. that the Seas be open to all Merchants to paſs where they pleaſe, was urged and inſiſted upon to be a Law in force, or to have any influence upon this caſe.

For

For beſides what Mr. Sollicitor truly obſerv'd, that it was made for a ſpecial purpoſe, to take off the preſent Staple; to which all Merchants as well foreign as Engliſh, were confin'd to carry their goods, and was of the ſame purport, as the Statute of 8 E. III. nu. 20. I before mention'd, which open'd the then preſent Staple.

For by the ſeveral Laws I have mention'd, for fixing and ſtrengthning of the Staples, the Statute of 15 E. III. was abſolutely repeal'd and ſet aſide.

As to all Engliſh, Welſh, and Iriſh, by the Statute of 27 E. III. for ſettling the Staple in England, by chap. 1. whereof all Engliſhmen, Iriſhmen, and Welſhmen are expreſly prohibited to export any Staple-wares; and liberty given only to Merchants ſtrangers to do it.

And by 3 chap. it is made felony for the Engliſh, Iriſh or Welſh to export.

And when the Staple was return'd to Calais, it was a forfeiture, as I have ſhewn, to export thoſe wares to any other place without expreſs licence; for that the Mare Liberum, by the Statute 15 E. III. became Mare Clauſum long ſince by many ſubſequent Laws, and not to be open'd but by a royal licence.

1 H. V. nu. 40. The Commons pray all Merchants may export to any place beyond the Seas, or import any goods except goods of the Staple.

The King anſwers, he will adviſe with his Council.

The Parliament did not inſiſt upon any right, by 15 E. III. but pray'd it as an Act of Grace, and were modeſt in their requeſt, that the general licence deſir'd might be reſtrain'd to merchandizes, which were not Staple Commodities, yet it was denied by the King.

17 R. II. nu. 15. Several Towns in the Weſt prayed they might carry their Wool into Normandy.

The King anſwers, let them repair to Calais, as is appointed.

18 H. VI. nu. 50. The Commons pray that every Merchant may lawfully tranſport, all manner of Hides, Calves Skins, Coney Felts and Tallow, to what place him liketh, other than to Calais.

Which is denied by the King.

By 18 H. VI. cap. 6. Liberty is given to export Butter and Cheeſe to any other place beſides the Staple, in amity with the King, provided the King may reſtrain the ſame when it ſhall pleaſe him.

Where was the force of 15 E. III. if ſo minute a thing as Butter and Cheeſe, would not be freely exported without an expreſs Statute.

And that is obtain'd upon ſuch urgent reaſons as are mention'd in the Statute, and granted too, but conditionally with a ſaving of the King's right to reſtrain.

This may ſuffice for making out the firſt head, that the Staples to which all Merchants are obliged to repair, were principally inſtituted and appointed by the King alone; and that the Statute of 15 E. III. is wholly repealed by the Laws for ſettling the Staples.

Second Head; In the next place, I ſhall offer ſome authority to make out the King's undoubted right to grant liberty of trade to other places, after the Staple was fixed at Calais.

My Lord Coke in 4 Inſt. 282. is much in the right, in affirming the Staple was continued at Calais above 200 years, tho' he be miſtaken in another aſſertion, as I have fully ſhewed,

That it could not be removed but by Act of Parliament.

But I will admit the Staple at laſt fixed at Calais, by 21 R. II. and ſtrengthen'd and fenced under the penalty of forfeiture of the goods, by the Statutes, 2 H. V. and 8 H. VI.

Yet the Kings, by their prerogative, did and might lawfully grant licences to trade to other places.

I will not here trouble you with the general learning of diſpenſations with penal Laws, tho' our Books are full of it, and determine in favour of the Crown.

But I ſhall confine myſelf to inſtances of foreign trade, wherein it will appear, by what I have already ſaid, and ſhall further offer, that the Crown had a peculiar prerogative not diſputed, or drawn into queſtion in any times till of late.

The men of Berwick and Newcaſtle, have had ſuch licences granted them, which being found detrimental to the King's revenue, ariſing at the Staple, were revoked by Act of Parliament, 8 H. VI. cap. 31.

20 H. VI. cap. 4. Denizens, who ſhall take licences to export to any place but the Staple, ſhall pay Alien duties.

Here the King's right to grant ſuch licences, is acknowledged by the Parliament; 27 H. VI. cap. 1. upon complaint of the King's Officers in Parliament, that by the multitude of licences to export elſewhere than the Staple, the revenue of the Staple was ſunk from 68000 l. per Ann. to 12000 l. per Ann. All licences before granted are vacated.

In the year-book, 2 R. II. fol. 12. Parl. 16. and 1 H. VII. fol. 3. A licence granted to the town of Waterford, to carry goods of the Staple where they pleaſed, is allow'd; the Iriſh being bound to the Staple as well as Engliſh.

1 H. V. n. 15. which I before mention'd, the Commons allowed of the King's prerogative to licence ſtrangers to come into England, tho' prohibited by Act of Parliament.

Where the Statute 15 H. cap. 3. preſcribed a form of ſafe conducts, yet it was reſolved the King might grant them, as before at Common Law: Edw. IV. fol. 33. L. 340. and 13 E. IV. fol. 9.

Whereby 31 E. III. cap. 20. the exportation of all ſorts of Corn was prohibited, except to Calais and Gaſcoign.

Several Indictments were preferred, 36 Edw. III. againſt John Lamb, Andrew Taverner, and ſeveral other Merchants, for exporting great quantities of Corn and Grain. They ſeverally pleaded the King's licences mentioning the quantities, and in ſome of them the certain places to which the Corn was to be carried; but in others generally, ad quaſcunque Partes exteras, præter illas, quæ de Munitia Regis exiſtunt.

Which are allowed Treaſury, Int. Pl. Coronæ & totum, 36 E. III.

Whereas 5 Eliz. prohibited the exportation of Sheepskins.

Hillary, 3 Jac. I. Shaw brings his action againſt Hawes upon that Statute.

The Defendant pleads a licence, 19 May, 31 Eliz. to Gilbert Lee, his factors, executors, deputies and aſſignees, to export Sheep-skins for ten years, not exceeding 200000 in any one year; if it happen'd by any reſtraint, or any other cauſe, they ſhould ſhould not export that number, and pleads that Lee aſſigned to, and nominated Scot to execute the Letters Patent, with the contingent clauſes: And

That Scot aſſigns to the Defendant, without any expreſs mention of the contingent cauſe, and pleads he was hindred during the Term; and juſtifies for the exportation afterwards.

All the Court held, that this was a diſpenſation the King might grant to Lee the firſt Patentee.

But judgment was given againſt Hawes the Defendant upon theſe reaſons.

Firſt, Becauſe being a diſpenſation, it is not aſſignable.

Secondly, That tho' Scot might have the benefit thereof, as nominated, yet he could not nominate over.

Thirdly, The advantage of the future contingent is not aſſignable, Hillar. 3. & Paſch. 4 Jac. Banco Regis, Ro. 128. Hale's Common-place, tit. Monop. cu. 3.

Third Head; In the laſt place I ſhall ſhew, that the regulation and managery of the foreign trade in all caſes, where Acts of Parliament had not particularly interpoſed, hath been guided and govern'd by the prerogative of the Crown, both in point of licence and prohibition.

That the foreign trade was at firſt tranſacted and carried on by foreigners, is moſt evident from Magna Charta, which as to this trade, provides only for foreign Merchants.

And if any Engliſh had at that time exerciſed ſuch craft, or had had the leaſt pretence thereto; no doubt can be, but the great Charter of their liberties would have made ſome proviſion for them, as well as foreigners; which it doth not.

The Statute of Acton Burnell, 13 E. I. introduced the Statute-Merchant for the benefit of Merchant ſtrangers, for the more ſpeedy recovery of their debts.

For the only miſchief the Statute takes notice of, was, that the Merchants withdrew themſelves from coming into the Realm with their merchandize, becauſe there was no ſpeedy Law provided for recovery of their debts.

I have not met with any footſteps of any Record to make it out, that in the Reigns of E. I. or E. II. or before, any Engliſh Merchants ever enterprized the foreign trade.

But in thoſe Kings reigns, the foreign trade was managed by the King's Charters to foreigners; for tho' Magna Charta gave a general ſafe-conduct to Merchants ſtrangers, yet the King might prohibit them, and after ſuch prohibition might licenſe, as I have ſhewn he did.

And therefore the foreign Merchants had a recourſe to the King's Charters, viz. Charta Mercatoria, by E. I. and the Charter to the Merchants of the Hans, or the Still-yard, which I have mention'd.

And 6 E. II. the Gaſcoigners founded themſelves in their difference with the City of London, 20 E. I. upon their privileges granted them by the Kings of England.

Indeed the men of Guernſey, 32 H. III. obtained a licence from the King, to them and their heirs, freely to fiſh and to ſell their fiſh in any of the King's Dominions thrice in the week, between the feaſts of Michaelmas and Eaſter; Par. Roll. 32 H. III. mem.

The earlieſt attempt towards a foreign trade, I find enterprized by the Engliſh, is the fiſhing trade upon the ſeas, 11 E. III.

At which time the King granted licences to the men of Yarmouth, Scarborough, Whitby and Dunwich, to them and others repairing to theſe towns to fiſh; to fiſh in the ſea with veſſels of thirty tuns, Quibuſcunque inhibition' ſeu Mandatis MS. in contrarium factis non obſtantibus; Rot. Clauſo, 11 E III. pars ſecunda, Membr. 35.

Tho' theſe licences were intended only to extend to the narrow ſeas, whereof the Dominion was in the King;

Yet by colour of theſe licences, the Engliſh about the latter end of H. IV's reign, made fiſhing voyages to Iceland.

Whereupon H. V. at the inſtance of the ſubjects of the King of Denmark, prohibited the Engliſh to fiſh there.

And therepon the Parliament, 3 H. V. pray'd that it might be enacted, that the Engliſh might freely fiſh there.

Which was denied by the King, 3 H. V. nu. 33. Rolls Prerog. 170. whereby it is evident, they had no right to do it; but that the King might prohibit them, it being a foreign traffick, wherein no Act of Parliament had made any proviſion.

Afterwards the ſame King, in the 5th year of his reign, granted licences to Geoffry Pamping and John Haſtings of Yarmouth; John Statvill and Richard Pais of Winterton; William James and William Marriot of Carowmere; to go verſus Partes exteras to take fiſh. And

That every one of them might employ two ſhips called doggers, to take fiſh and bring it into England by themſelves, Attornies or Servants. Par. Rot. 5 H. V. membr. 34.

E. I. Before any Statute made therefore by Proclamation, prohibited the exportation of Horſes, Arms, Money, Gold and Silver Veſſels. Some men of Dartmouth were proceeded againſt by information in the King's-Bench, for exporting Money contrary to the Proclamation: Hill. 1 E. II. Rot. 38. amongſt the Records in the Treaſury.

The Crime in the Information is ſaid to be contra pacem Domini Regis, Contemptum & Inobedientiam Coronæque ſuæ pl. judicium & Pacis, ſive perturbationem manifeſtam.

To which, thoſe of the Defendants that were taken, pleaded not guilty, of whom one afterwards died, and another imployed by the King into Scotland. So the Record ends with a continuance of the iſſue.

Rot. Clauſo, 41 E. III. membr. 25. A Writ iſſued to the Mayor of Hull, that he permit no Alien Ship to be freighted there, till the Ships of the Town were freighted.

It is evident upon what I produced under the other head from the Records of Parliament, 1 H. V. nu. 41. and 18 H. VI. nu. 50. That the Engliſh Merchants had not then any right or general liberty to export to what places they pleaſed any ſort of merchandizes, tho' not Staple-wares.

But ſuch Petitions were denied in both theſe Kings reigns; yet at that time there was a Company of Merchants-Adventurers, licenſed to trade into Holland, Zealand, Brabant, Flanders, and other parts beyond the ſeas, erected for the rule and government of all Engliſh Merchants trading into thoſe parts; and all who ſhou'd trade there, enjoin'd to be obedient to the rules of the Company.

But it was not objected to thoſe Kings, that ſome were licenſed, and others, unleſs they would be ſubject to the rules of the Company, were reſtrain'd.

The Company was erected by Letters Patent, 5. Feb. 8 H. IV. and confirm'd by H. V. 1 Oct. 1 H. V. and confirm'd by H. VI. 6 July, 8 H. VI.

That

That the Merchant Adventurers enjoyed their privileges, and permitted none to trade within their limits, who ſubmitted not to the rule of the Company, and who ſhould not be contributors to their publick charges, is evident from the Stat. 12 H. 7. cap. 6. inſiſted on by Mr. Pollexfen; but was made uſe of by him, only for the hiſtorical part of it contained in the petition preſented by the Merchants to the Parliament for their liberty of trade; which, by what I have already ſhewed, could not be true, as to the ſtaple wares, unleſs they have licences from the King (which in all probability they had) to certain places.

And what is it they pretend to in their Petition? only freedom to repair to, and trade at the four general Marts, which being annually held and proclaimed, was an invitation to all neighbouring Nations to repair thither; and all Engliſh Merchants, as well as others, if they had lain under no reſtraint from the Company's Charter, or other Prohibition of the King, might have repaired thither with their cloth or other wares, not being ſtaple wares, without offence, as I before admitted.

In caſe there had been ſuch a right to a free trade to all Nations in amity, as the Petition ſuggeſts, (for as yet the Merchants retain ſome modeſty, not to pretend to a free trade with aliens not in amity, much leſs with Infidels, whom the laws of all chriſtian Countries adjudge alien enemies:)

This had been the proper time for the Parliament to have aſſerted that right, and adjudged the Patent illegal, as Parliaments have frequently done with Patents which have been againſt Law: But the Parliament knew no ſuch right, and therefore by the enacting clauſe, allowance is given to the Charter; only their immoderate demands of admittance fines are reſtrained, and the fine limited to 10 marks. And accordingly in their Charter afterwards renewed by H. VII. they are obliged to take no more of any perſon admitted into their Company than 10 marks.

Ph. & Mary, 26 Feb. 1 & 2 P. & M. erected a corporation of Merchants Adventurers to Ruſſia, and Parts adjacent, with licence to trade, and prohibition to others, upon pain of forfeiture of Ship and Goods.

That this forfeiture might be effectual, the Charter is confirmed by Parliament, 8 Eliz.

This Act takes notice that ſeveral perſons, after the trade was found beneficial at the coſt of the Company, for their peculiar gain, utterly to decay the trade of the Company, contrary to the tenor of the Letters Patent, in great diſorder traded into thoſe parts, to the great detriment of the common-wealth.

Here is a full deſcription (mutato nomine) of the defendant, and his interloping companions.

By the Judgment of the Parliament then, a limited trade, under the order and rule of a Company, as ſettled by the Crown, was thought moſt beneficial to the Kingdom.

And thoſe that traded contrary to the tenor of the Letters Patent, are reckoned diſorderly traders, in prejudice of the common-wealth.

So far was the Parliament from thinking all the ſubjects had a right to trade there.

After the taking of Calais, in the latter end of Q. Mary's reign, Q. Elizabeth and the Engliſh Merchants, were no doubt in great ſtreights what to do.

For by the Stat. 2 H. 6. all merchandizes of the ſtaple were to be carried to Calais, while the ſtaple was there, which ceaſed by the taking of Calais.

But by 2 H. 5. no merchandizes of the Staple could be exported without the King's licence, 'till brought to the Staple.

The Queen had no place convenient left for erecting the Staple at, beyond the ſeas. And tho' in R. II's time, when the Parliament demanded where the Staple ſhould be, if Calais were beſieged? the King's anſwer was ready, (viz.) At ſuch Places in England it was laſt at:

Yet now when Calais was taken, ſuch anſwer would not ſerve the turn; but the placing of it in England would be uſeleſs and ineffectual, and deſtructive to the Queen's revenues in her cuſtoms.

For by ſeveral laws made by E. 4. R. 3. & H. 7. moſt foreign manufactures were prohibited, and great diſcouragements put upon all foreign Merchants coming into England, but thoſe of the Hans and Stillyard.

And few foreign Merchants would repair into England to fetch our commodities, when they can bring little to barter with, but ready money.

And to have granted to every Merchant a ſeveral licence, as it would be chargeable to the ſubject, ſo it might prove miſchievous to the Kingdom, the ſubjects trading ſeverally, without any rule or government, in foreign Parts, upon the account of the general law of reprizals, which obtains in all Nations.

Whereby every ſubject and his goods are liable for the injuries and wrongs committed by any one; which, in the more barbarous Countries, is executed with great barbarity.

And therefore Q. Elizabeth, in the direction of foreign trade, inſtead of Staples, for the rule, order and government of Merchants, at certain places, followed the precedents of the Merchants Adventurers and Ruſſia Companies, by erecting corporations of Merchants for the rule and government of the foreign trade.

Which companies, as they are preſumed to have a better State to anſwer for injuries done in foreign Parts, than any ſingle perſon can be preſumed to have:

So in their very conſtitution are more reſponſible to the Law for their miſdemeanour, by Quo Warranto's, whereby they may loſe their liberty of trade.

It is very doubtful whether licences granted for trade to ſingle perſons, may be forfeited; they paſſing an intereſt, if the licence to go beyond ſea, to trade or otherwiſe, be for a certain time, as moſt licences were. It is held by the Judges, 2 Eliz. Dyer, 176. in the Caſe of Mr. Barnes and the Dutcheſs of Somerſet, that the licence is not revocable.

The Queen, in her reign, erected many corporations for foreign trade: I ſhall mention only ſome, which have been publickly taken notice of, and received allowance.

17 June, 2 Eliz. The Queen, by Letters Patent, incorporated ſeveral Merchants of Exeter, and gave them licence to trade into France; and that no artificer ſhould be admitted of the Companies.

The Prohibition was not general to her other ſubjects, but only to the men of Exeter.

The Company enjoyed their liberties all the Queen's reign, and flouriſhed under them 'till 3 Jac.

When by Act of Parliament the trade was opened, and general licence given to trade with France, Spain and Portugal, and the dominions thereof.

Whereupon a queſtion aroſe, whether their Charter was not ſet aſide by the general words of 3 Jac. and therefore 4 Jac. cap. 9. it is enacted and declared, That the ſaid general Act doth not nor ſhall diſſolve, annihilate, or impeach the ſaid Charter, or the ſaid Company, in any of their privileges, liberties or immunities, granted to them by the ſaid Charter, any thing in the ſaid general Act to the contrary notwithſtanding.

This Act added no new force to the Charter, but enacted and declared it to be out of the proviſion of 3 Jac. for general licence to trade into thoſe Countries.

Where, by the judgment of the Parliament, the Queen's power to grant ſuch Charters, is admitted. For if the Patent had been void in Law, before 3 Jac. to make an Act of Parliament only to declare it out of the proviſion of that law, were idle and illuſory.

The Queen's ſubjects, for their licence to fiſh at Iceland, paid the Queen a quantity of fiſh, called compoſition fiſh, by the Act of Parliament, made 5 Eliz. cap. 5.

Whereby, for the encouragement of the fiſhing trade, the purveyors are prohibited to take purveyance of ſea-fiſh; the compoſition fiſh, payable by the Queen's ſubjects, travelling to Iceland, are excepted.

The Patent of the Greenland Company to fiſh there, was held good, Rolls 1 pt. fo. 5. in the Caſe of the taylors of Ipſwich.

This trade, notwithſtanding the privileges granted to the Company, was almoſt loſt.

And thereupon 25 Car. 2. cap. 7. that trade is open, not only to the Engliſh, but to all foreigners reſiding in England.

The Eaſt-India Company was erected by Queen Elizabeth, 31 Dec. 43 Eliz. and renewed to them and ſucceſſors, 13 May, 7 Jac. with prohibition to all others to trade there, and confirmed to them by this King, 3 Apr. 13 Car. 2. upon which Patent the queſtion ariſeth about a foreign trade which hath been enjoyed by the Company above 80 years.

And its conſequence concerned the prerogative of the Crown, in all the Charters for foreign trade which have been granted.

Whenas I have ſhewn, the moſt conſiderable part of the foreign trade, hath in all times been managed under Grants from the Crown, in appointing the Staples for Merchants to repair to, in licencing trade to other places, notwithſtanding thoſe Staples; and in licencing and prohibiting foreign trade in ſuch Caſes where Acts of Parliament had not made ſpecial proviſion.

I now proceed to conſider of Royal Licences by Act of Parliament.

It will be infinite to take notice of the ſeveral Statutes made relating to foreign trade.

And therefore I ſhall at this time offer ſome general obſervations upon them.

Obſerv. 1. Upon examining into the ancient laws for foreign trade, it will be found that there are far more laws for reſtraining the exerciſe of foreign trade, by Engliſh-men, than there are for opening of it.

So much, that for a long time whilſt the Staple was in England, they were prohibited under ſevere penalties, not to export any ſtaple ware; and when the ſtaple was removed beyond ſea, they were confined to Calais, and ſuch liberty of trade to other places as the Kings from time to time had granted to corporations; and ſingle perſons were frequently taken off, though the King's prerogative to grant them was never yet impeached by any Statute.

The great diſcouragement to them by foreigners firſt began in the reigns of Ed. IV. R. III. and H. VII. But in thoſe Kings reigns, the Engliſh were ſtrictly held to the ſtaple, unleſs licenſed by the Kings.

This obſervation is made out of the ſeveral laws I have touched upon, and many others which are in the Statutes at large, that are printed.

Obſerv. 2. There was never yet any Statute made, that gave a general liberty of trade to Engliſh-men to or with all Nations; but what were made, were ſpecial and particular.

The only law that had any reſemblance to any ſuch purpoſe, was 15 Ed. 3. ſo much inſiſted on, which has been ſufficiently already ſhewn to import no ſuch thing; and the ſeveral attempts in Parliament to have introduced a greater liberty of trade with foreign Nations, in amity, and the particular laws that have been made for licenſing ſome trades, do fully argue that the law was never underſtood to intend any ſuch matter, as a general licence to trade every where.

Obſerv. 3. The ſeveral ſpecial Statutes that have been made for liberty of foreign trade to particular Countries, or for particular commodities, are introductive of a new law, and not declaratory; and do plainly argue the King's right before to prohibit ſome of them in expreſs terms, others by neceſſary implication.

I ſhall inſtance in ſome of them, the Stat. 17 Ed. 1. Ordinatio pro Statu, &c. Hiberniæ, opens the trade from Ireland to England and Wales, for the Iriſh commodities.

Whereby all Merchants have liberty granted them to import their merchandize into England, but ſo that they give good ſecurity, that they ſhall not go unto, nor commerce with our enemies of Scotland, nor others of our enemies.

This law reſtrained the ſubject of no liberty he had before; and therefore if the Merchant had before ſuch general liberty or right to import thoſe commodities, his right of trading would have excuſed his giving any ſecurity; which is not impoſed by law, otherwiſe than as a precedent condition to a right conferred by the Statute.

This law opened the trade from Ireland to England, as well to foreigners as Engliſhmen; but it extended only to Iriſh commodities: for the exporting of Engliſh commodities into Ireland, continued to be managed under the King's licences 'till Edward III.

And if any did to the contrary, he was ſubject to fine and ranſom for his contempt, as appeared by 34 Ed. 3. cap. 17. whereby the trade is opened for Engliſh and other commodities into Ireland.

By that law it is accorded, That all Merchants, as well aliens as denizens, may come into Ireland with their merchandize, and from thence freely to return without fine or ranſom.

This law extended not to the Engliſh Merchants, but only to the aliens and denizens.

In the next Chapter, cap. 18. the Engliſh are provided for, who had not ſo large a liberty granted them as the aliens and denizens had. The 18 chap. provides, That the People of England who have heritage and poſſeſſions in Ireland, may bring their corn, beaſts, and victuals, to the ſaid land of Ireland, and from thence to recarry their goods and merchandizes into England, freely, without impeachment.

The liberty of exporting into Ireland, granted to the Engliſh, is reſtrained both to ſuch Engliſh only who had lands in Ireland, as alſo in the ſorts of the commodities, viz. corn, beaſts, and victuals only.

But the liberty to export from Ireland, is larger, extending to all commodities, according to the latitude of Ordinatio Hiberniæ, which took in all Iriſh commodities.

38 E. 3. cap. 11. The King wills of his grace and ſufferance, That all Merchants denizens, that be not artificers, ſhall paſs into Gaſcoign to fetch wines; and that the Gaſcoigners, and other aliens, may import; always ſaved to the King, that it may be lawful to him, whenſoever it is adviſed by his Council, to ordain of this Article, as beſt ſhall ſeem to him for the profit of him and his Commons.

This is expreſs'd to be an Act of Grace, and contains a ſaving of the King's ancient prerogative, 18 H. 6. cap. 3. which I before mentioned: for liberty of exportation of butter and cheeſe, expreſly ſaves the King's right, provided the King may reſtrain the ſame when it ſhall pleaſe him.

To paſs by many ancient Statutes of like nature, the Act of tonnage and poundage, 12 C. 2. which gives liberty of exporting divers commodities, which the Kings of England might in all times prohibit, as to gun-powder, arms and ammunition, expreſly ſaves the King's right, to prohibit by Proclamation.

3 J. cap. 6. which is the largeſt licence for foreign trade that was ever given to any Engliſhmen in Parliament, by opening of the trade to Spain, Portugal, and France, and the dominions thereof, fully prove the King's prerogative in this matter, both in the title and body of the Act.

The Title of the Act is, An Act to enable all his Majeſty's loving Subjects of England and Wales, to trade freely into the dominions of Spain, Portugal, and France.

A very improper Title, if ſo be the King's ſubjects were before enabled to do it, and had a right to do it by the Common Law, as is pretended; and would not be reſtrained from it by the King.

And no doubt can be made, if ſuch right had been, but the Parliament would have ſeen it, being very inquiſitive at this time into all the ſubjects rights, and very jealous leſt any of the ancient rights of Engliſhmen ſhould be invaded by K. James coming from another Nation, and would not have complimented the King with the title of an enabling law.

The reaſons from the body of the Act are ſtrong; the reaſons offered for ſuch general liberty, are only politick, none drawn from the right or any ancient uſage the Engliſh could pretend to.

The Act in its recital admits, That by the Letters Patent for incorporating the Company to trade into Spain and Portugal, his Majeſty's other ſubjects were diſabled and debarred from the free enlargement of common traffick, into thoſe dominions.

Which were not true, if the other ſubjects had before a right to trade there, but the Patent would have been void againſt them.

3. There are no declarative words of any former right, but only of enacting, and proviſional for a future liberty, viz.

That it ſhall, and may be lawful from henceforth.

4. The Act, in expreſs words, provides only againſt the miſchief and inconveniences which may grow or redound upon the Patent, and to redreſs any injury done by the Patent.

5. The liberty granted, is reſtrained to be in ſuch ſort, and in as free a manner, as was at any time accuſtomed ſince the beginning of the King's reign, and before the late Charter of incorporation.

Whereby it appears, that the uſage to trade freely into theſe Countries without licences, was but from the entrance of K. James.

The Statute referring to no other free uſage: And therefore this Act did not over-reach any Charter granted by Queen Elizabeth, as was afterwards declared in the next Parliament, 4 J. cap. 9. in the caſe of the Charter to the Merchants of Exeter, for the French trade granted 2 Eliz. which I before mentioned.

Obſerv. 4. That all Acts of Parliament which grant licence of trade, do ſuppoſe the other foundation of foreign trade to have continuance, viz. according to leagues with foreign Princes.

For no Act of Parliament ever gave licence to trade with aliens not in amity; and if the league be determined, the liberty is ſuſpended, tho' granted by Parliament, till the league be renewed.

Obſerv. 5. The laſt thing I ſhall obſerve upon the laws that give licence of trade, is, that where liberty of trade is given by Act of Parliament, without any reſervation to the King of his ancient right, the King in ſuch caſe hath ſo bound up himſelf, that he cannot generally prohibit or reſtrain that trade wherein he hath granted his ſubjects an intereſt by a law.

For a general prohibition or reſtraint would amount to a repeal of a law, which the King cannot do without an Act of Parliament.

The law will be the ſame here as in the caſes where Acts of Parliament do generally prohibit, where general licences would be void, becauſe they tend to repeal a law.

Upon this ground the licence in Darcy's caſe, for that part which concerned the importation of foreign cards, was judged void in law, becauſe too general, not limited to any certainty.

But the King may in particular, and certainly, diſpenſe and licenſe againſt prohibiting Statutes.

And ſo he may in particular reſtrain the perſons of his ſubjects from going beyond the ſeas, notwithſtanding any of the laws which give licence of trade.

But cannot grant a reſtraint or prohibition generally, where Acts of Parliament have given a general licence, unleſs it be in ſpecial caſes; and for a time, where the intereſt of the publick requires it; as of the plague, and furniſhing out of the King's Navies, in time of war with any Prince. And therefore I ſhall admit, that if any publick law can be produced, which gives liberty of trade for all the King's ſubjects to the Judges, that this Patent will be void, as a reſtraint of that liberty againſt law.

Upon this ground the Canary Patent was held void, becauſe againſt the expreſs liberty, granted by by 3 Jac. and therein ſaved; or of the Common Law Monopoly, by reſtraining the right of others againſt an expreſs law, for the benefit of a few.

Upon the ſame reaſon, the Grant of Ph. and Mary, that all ſweet wines ſhould be landed at Southampton, was againſt ſeveral expreſs Statutes, and the rights of ſeveral free Ports, before granted by the Crown to the City of London, and others, as 27 Ed. 3. cap. 6. whereby Merchants ſtrangers had liberty granted to bring their wines to what Ports they pleaſed; and 43 Ed. 3. whereby the Engliſh, Iriſh, and Welſh, had liberty granted to fetch their wines and bring them to any parts of England, Ireland, and Wales.

And therefore was repealed in Parliament of 5 Eliz. Rolls 2. Rep. 112. whereby it appears, that the Parliament, in the Queen's time, were vigilant enough to take notice of Patents againſt law.

The like in the caſe of John Peachy, for the ſole ſelling of ſweet wines by retail, 50 Ed. 3. the Parliament ſet it aſide, as againſt law: Upon that Grant an Inhibition under the great ſeal iſſued, prohibiting all the citizens of London to ſell ſweet wines in London. The Inhibition was revoked, 50 Ed. 3. No. 13. and Peachy puniſhed for extortion, by colour of the Grant, 50 Ed. 3. No. 33.

This Grant was not only againſt many expreſs Statutes, ſome whereof have been cited in the arguments in this Caſe, which gave the Merchant Importers liberty to ſell their wines and merchandize to whom they pleaſed; and many expreſs Grants to the citizens of London, ſome whereof were confirmed in Parliament; but was againſt the rules of the Common Law, being a reſtraint and monopoly of an inland trade, as ſelling of wines in London and other parts of England, undoubtedly then was.

For when foreign merchandizes are brought hither to trade and traffick with, they fall under the rules and government of the Common Law, and the retailing of them here becomes an inland trade.

In Lambard 43 Ed. 3. lib. aſſ. fol. 276. Pl. 38. it was ruled, That when foreign merchandizes are brought in, a conſpiracy to inhance their prices is puniſhable.

At Common Law in like manner, as a deſign by falſe rumours, or otherwiſe to debaſe the prices of our inland commodities.

The reaſons of theſe caſes, which were the principal pillars to ſupport the arguments of the other ſide, prove nothing to our caſe, till they can produce ſome clearer Statute than 15 Ed. 3. for giving liberty of trade to the Eaſt-Indies.

Having conſidered of foreign trade with aliens in amity, and how it hath been managed in all times, I proceed in the laſt place to conſider what the law determines of trade and commerce with alien enemies, and conſequently with Infidels. Here the conſideration is far different from what it was in the former; in that, the Common Law was ſilent, until an expreſs Prohibition by the King.

But here the Common Law is a Prohibition of itſelf, and is at open war with alien enemies.

Whether the commerce with alien enemies without licence, be within the extent of aiding and comforting the King's enemies beyond the ſeas, within 25 Ed. 3. I ſhall not at this time argue. But it may be worth while for the interlopers who traffick into foreign Nations, not in amity with the King of England, without licence, well to conſider that point; but before the Statute at Common Law, it was criminal.

Paſc. 13 Ed. 2. Rot. 13. B. Rs. in the Treaſury. In an information againſt three perſons for trading into Scotland, then in enmity with the King of England; the defendants pleaded a licence from Cuſtodes Trenge, in the marches of Scotland; which was held nought, none could licenſe but the King: thereupon they obtained and pleaded the King's pardon. Rolls Prerogative, tit. Gaver reſſo. 173. Pl. 3.

I need not labour to clear a point which was not oppoſed by the defendant's counſel, but their endeavour was to exempt Infidels from being enemies; wherein they have a difficult task, in rowing againſt the ſtream of the laws of all chriſtian Countries.

In the great inſtance of the Jews, who have been expelled, and their eſtates ſeized, as of enemies almoſt in every chriſtian Country;

They call for authorities, but offer none themſelves; not ſo much as the opinion of any one learned man, to give countenance to the leaſt amity between the Engliſh laws and Infidels. I will not diſtruſt the memory of the Court to repeat the authorities which have been produced to aſſert the enmity between Infidels and the laws of this Realm; which are more than ſufficient, after ſuch ſolemn proceedings againſt the Jews in Edward the 1ſt's reign.

All which have received a very ſhort anſwer, That theſe Records are obſcure.

That time hath hid the Law from us, ſo that we cannot diſtinguiſh whether they were Acts of law, or Acts of violence.

And that the reaſon why Princes were induced to uſe them ſo, might be, becauſe they are under no government to vindicate them.

But why the Records ſhould be ſo darkened, and the Proceedings in ſo eminent a caſe as that of the Jews, ſo obſcure, ſince Edward I. more than the Common Law, in the diviſion of the right and properties of others; I could not hear any good reaſon given.

For I take it, the principles of law upon which the Jews were proceeded againſt, are as clearly laid down in our Law-Books, as any point of Law we have.

For the caſe of the Jews ſtood thus: They came over as Merchant ſtrangers, of ſeveral Countries in amity, both by ſpecial licences of ſeveral Kings, and under the general ſafe-conduct of Mag. Charta; whereby they were under the King's protection, and enabled to contract and ſue, as any other Merchant ſtrangers under ſafe-conduct: which the King might grant, as I have ſhewn, to an alien enemy. While here many of them were indenized, others born here, and had great poſſeſſions of lands, as well as leaſes and perſonal eſtates.

Then they are baniſhed by the King, by Proclamation, as well thoſe that were never indemnified upon the account of their religion, as infidels and enemies to the chriſtian religion.

To whom then will their lands, leaſes for years, credits, and ſuch perſonal eſtates as they had not liberty to carry out, belong?

The Law adjudged it all to the King. And the controverſies that aroſe about their eſtates, did not fall out between the King and the defenceleſs Jews, (as the defendant's counſel terms them) for they were gone; but the King, and ſeveral doctors of the Jews, who well knew the Law, and were able to defend their right.

To

To the dark Records (as they were ſtiled) I will add a caſe ſolemnly adjudged, between the King and a potent Subject, the Archbiſhop of York, 21 Edw. I. where the caſe was;

The Prior of Pidlington, was indebted to a Jew in 300 l. After the baniſhment of the Jews, the Jew met with the Archbiſhop in France, and prevailed with him to help him to the money; that Archbiſhop perſuaded the Prior, that he was bound in conſcience to pay the money to the Jew's Attorney; who did it accordingly.

And all this was after a Proclamation iſſued for diſcovery of the Jews debts.

For this concealment and treſpaſs, the Archbiſhop was ſued by the King, before the Council in Parliament, and laid it to his damage of 1000 l. To which the Archbiſhop appear'd and pleaded, and to avoid a Trial by a Country Jury; as the Record mentions, he was put upon his allegiance to tell the truth.

Whereupon he confeſs'd the Information, and Judgment was given againſt him, and the taxing the fine referred to the King.

The reaſons of the Judgment fully declare what the Law was; Quia idem Epiſcopus bene cognoſcit quod poſt exilium Judæorum à prædicto Judæo intellexit, quod pecunia prædicta ſibi in regno debebatur, & poſt eorum exilium omnia quæ ſua fuerunt, & in regno remanſerunt, tam debita quam alia bona quæcunque, ipſi Domino Regi remanſerunt, & catalla ſua fuerunt.

That he did not only conceal, but contrary to his faith, wherein he was bound to the King, perſuaded the Prior and Convent, for ſaving of their ſouls, to pay. Pla. Parl. 173.

The Archbiſhop did not doubt of the Law, tho' the Defendant's Counſel do; but a recourſe to Conſcience againſt Law, in deceit of the King, againſt his faith and allegiance.

This I hope will be allowed to be a Judgment, and a Judgment that declares the Law as plainly as ever Judgment did, and of a higher nature, than any Judgment in Weſtminſter-hall.

In the ſame year ſeveral mean Lords petition the King in Council for the arrearages, in rent and ſervices, of the lands the Jews held of them before their baniſhment.

The Council anſwered, that for the time the Jews held it, it was their fault not to collect them; for ſo long as the King held them, he would pay them; for the time they were in any Grantees hands, they ſhould have recourſe to his Grantees, Pla. Parl. Riley, fol. 129.

Here the King's title, to the real and perſonal eſtates of the Jews in England, is aſſerted by Judgment of the higheſt Court of Judicature in England.

The principles of Law, upon which the Judgment paſt againſt the Jews, are frequently laid down in our Book.

If an Alien Amy or Enemy purchaſe lands, the King ſhall have them, and may ſeize them at any time; and tho' the Alien died ſeized upon office found, the King ſhall have them, and not the Lord by Eſcheat.

This my Lord Coke reports to have been reſolv'd by all the Judges, Paſch. 29 Eliz. in Sir James Croſt's caſe, 1 Inſt. fol. 2.

There it was alſo held indeed, that if a Denizen died ſeized without heir, the Lords by Eſcheat ſhould have the land, and not the King; but that is in caſe of a compleated Denization, where the iſſue of the Denizen is capable of inheriting. But in caſe of Jews or Infidels, the Denization was void, being made to them as ſtrangers, without taking notice of their enmity to the Chriſtian Religion; and ſo the King deceiv'd in the Grant.

And an Infidel, though born in England, is not inheritable to the Laws of the land; if he ſhould, the land might ſoon be over-run with Jews and Infidels, and no redreſs to be had: ſo that neither denization nor birth did alter the ſtate of the Jews as to Inheritances within England, but they remain'd Aliens under ſafe-conduct only.

If an Alien Enemy had a leaſe of lands, or of a houſe for habitation, the King ſhould have it, within the ſame reſolution in Sir James Croſts's caſe, and not any ſubject that ſhou'd enter upon him.

Nay, if an Alien Friend, who ſhou'd take a houſe for habitation, ſhould die, or leave the lands, the King ſhould have the leaſe.

But then, how ſtands the Law for the goods of an Alien Enemy without the Realm?

Mr. Pollexfen, to argue Infidels to be no Alien enemies, urged from the miſchief that might enſue, that then every man might ſeize the perſons or eſtates of Jews and Infidels; becauſe by Law every perſon might ſeize the perſons and goods of Alien enemies: and for that, cited the authority of 7 E. IV. fol. 13. Co. 2 H. VII. fol. 15. b. which are but the ſame caſe, the authority of 7 E. IV. being only mention'd in courſe; argument in the Book of *H.*VII. The authority of 7 E. IV. is good Law, but miſapplied, in not obſerving the difference between the times of the enemy's, or his goods coming into the Realm.

After open War proclaim'd, whereby all the ſubjects have notice whom the King hath declared his enemies, and againſt whom they are to join in defence of themſelves and the Kingdom; if the perſons or goods of ſuch enemies come into the Kingdom, any ſubject may ſeize them, and gain a property in the goods, as a prize taken in open War, according to the authority of 7 E. IV. And indeed the Laws of all Nations; and that not only of enemies goods, but of Engliſhmens goods taken by the enemies; (whereby the property was left) and brought hither by the ſame authority of 7 E. IV.

Which plainly ſhows the meaning of the Book, to be of goods taken in open War; whereby the property of the goods reſts in the Captor, as lawful prize.

But when the perſons or goods of Aliens are in, or come into England under ſafe-conduct; and the ſafe-conduct be not determined by the King, either by Proclamation of open War, or otherwiſe, no ſubject can ſeize the perſon, or goods of ſuch Alien enemies.

Upon this difference the Law was ſettled, 36 H. VIII. by the Judges, Bro. Property, 38 in the abridgment of the caſe, 7 E. IV.

That where a Frenchman inhabited in England, and a War was afterwards proclaimed, no ſubject could ſeize his goods, becauſe they were here before.

But if he came after the War, any man may ſeize his perſon and goods, and ſhall have a property in them, and in ſuch caſe the King ſhall not have them.

And ſo was it put in practice, ſaith the Book, between the Engliſh and the Scots.

And when Bulloign was taken by the King's ſubjects, 19 Ed. IV. fol. 6. pl. 4. where a debt was owing by a ſubject of the King of Denmark's, and a war war breaks out, the ſubject ſhall not retain the debt, but the King ſhall have it.

22 or 2 E. IV. fol. 4, 5. pl. 9. In falſe impriſonment, the Defendant juſtifies under the King's Commiſſion for apprehending a Scotchman; there being a war between the King of England, and the King of Scotland.

I before ſhewed, that an Alien enemy, which came over by the King's ſafe-conduct, was as much under the protection of the Laws, as any Alien Amy whatſoever; and no ſubject could ſeize or moleſt his perſon or goods.

And the determining the ſafe-conduct by the King, left the Alien Enemy in the ſame condition as other Alien enemies, after war proclaimed; who were here before under the general ſafe-conduct of the Laws.

In which caſe the ſubjects had no liberty to ſeize either the perſons or goods of Alien enemies; but that power was reſerved by Law expreſly to the King.

Which, beſides the authorities I have produced, expreſly appears by Magna Charta, chap. 30. which provides, that if the Merchant ſtrangers be of a land which makes a war againſt us, and be found in our Realm at the beginning of the war, they ſhall be attached, without harm of body or goods, until it be known to us or our Chief-Juſtice, how our Merchants be intreated there.

So that the diſpoſal of their perſons and goods was wholly in the King. And the liberty the ſubjects had to intermeddle with foreign enemies, extended only to ſuch who came here after a war proclaimed.

By all which, the King's title to the lands, debts and perſonal eſtates of the Jews, after the King had determined their ſafe-conduct, by baniſhing them out of the Realm as Infidels, evidently appears; and thoſe dark Records refined in ſome meaſure from their obſcurity, by the conſtant tenor of the Common Law, practiſed ever ſince.

But doth not the making leagues with, and ſending of Ambaſſadors to ſome Infidel Countries, argue that Infidels are not Alien enemies? No, certainly.

But the practice of the Kings of England, and other Chriſtian Princes, fully argues the contrary; for the making ſuch treaties, in order to trade, proves that no trade could be managed with them, before the treaty concluded.

My Lord Coke (who was of opinion that an Infidel is perpetuus inimicus) yet agrees with other learned men, that a league of peace, (which is only a ceſſation of all hoſtility) and a league of commerce (which amounts to no more than a reciprocal and general ſafe-conduct to each other's ſubjects) may be made with an Infidel Prince, 4 Inſt. fol. 155.

But he is called perpetuus inimicus from the practice of the Kings of England, and other Kings and Princes, not to make any leagues of friendſhip or alliance with Infidel Princes; whether reſtrained from making ſuch leagues by the Municipal Laws of the ſeveral Chriſtian Countries, or the general Rights of Chriſtianity, is not to my purpoſe to determine.

But either a ceſſation of open hoſtility, or a general ſafe-conduct, by a treaty of commerce, binds up the ſubjects hands from intermeddling with the goods or perſons of Infidels.

And therefore the Act of Navigation, that mentions the goods of the Ottoman country, makes nothing to the caſe.

For by the treaty of commerce with the Ottoman Empire, they might be brought in, and by his ſubjects before, under a general ſafe-conduct. But as to the Mogul and other Indian Princes, there is no league of peace or commerce between them and the Kings of England.

Which makes the caſe of the Eaſt-India Company ſtronger yet, than that of the Turky Company.

Though I conceive, that upon theſe principles I have laid down Law ſtrong enough.

And herein the caſe of the Eaſt-India Company is particular, for the King hath made no league for them.

But by the Letters Patent, hath given them ſpecial power to make war or peace, with any Infidel Prince, for the benefit and better advantage of their trade.

So that all other ſubjects are meerly precarious, and have no pretence of taking any advantage of any Peace made by the Company.

So as to them, the Indians remain to all purpoſes Alien enemies.

Having now ſhown, that all foreign trade depends upon, and hath been managed by leagues and royal licences, either by Letters Patent, or ſpecial Acts of Parliament; and

That the King may prohibit generally, where no Act of Parliament hath intervened to the contrary; and the Common Law prohibits trade with Infidels, and no Act of Parliament has provided for it.

That that trade cannot be managed but by the King's licence, in ſome ſuch manner as is directed by theſe Letters Patent to the Company.

That the anſwers to all the authorities and arguments made uſe of by the Defendant's Counſel, which I have not anſwer'd, lie open for the authority of the Taylor's of Ipſwich caſe; and the ſeveral other authorities of mechanick trades, and of inland merchandize, to which the ſubjects have a right by Common Law, make nothing againſt our caſe of foreign trade, and to an Infidel country, to which I have argued the ſubjects had no right, but were prohibited.

The opinion of the Taylor's in Ipſwich caſe, that a Patent to hinder trade at ſea is void; that generally to hinder all trade at ſea, is no doubt good Law; becauſe many licences then in being, and ſeveral Acts of Parliament in many caſes had granted liberty of trade.

But in the ſame caſe the reſtraining of trade to a particular country, for which no Act of Parliament had made proviſion, is allow'd of in the caſe of the Greenland Patent.

There was no authority produced, and I believe cannot be, that gives the leaſt countenance for liberty of trade with Infidels, or to impeach the King's prerogative of prohibiting trade to foreign countries, whereto licence for trade hath not been granted by the King's Letters Patent, or by Acts of Parliament.

The arguments drawn from the reaſon of the Common Law were two.

Firſt, From the liberty the ſubject had to go and trade into all foreign parts, for which were cited Fitzherbert and Dyer.

That liberty, and thoſe authorities, I have already examined, and ſhewed that the ſubject had no liberty, but was prohibited by the Common Law to trade with Infidel countries.

And

And the liberty to trade with foreigners in amity, was but a bare permiſſion, till the King prohibited.

Secondly, The other ground inſiſted on was, that all ingroſſing of merchandize was unlawful at Common Law: and therefore a Patent leading to authorize an unlawful ingroſſing is void, as a Monopoly at Common Law, and declared ſo by 21 Jac.

Here I will join iſſue with Mr. Pollexfen, and do admit, that if it be an unlawful ingroſſing, whether by the Common Law, or any Statute in force, the Patent will be void.

And he muſt admit unto me, that if it be no unlawful ingroſſing, it is no Monopoly at Common Law.

As he did in his argument ingenuouſly admit, that if it were no Monopoly at Common Law, it is not within the Statute 21 Jacobi; ſo that the queſtion between us will turn upon this ſingle point:

Whether the ingroſſing the foreign merchandize of India, be unlawful?

Upon what I have already ſaid, it appears it is not. For I have ſhown that the Common Law regarded, and made proviſion only for merchandizes within the land; and though when foreign merchandizes came thither, they fell under the rules of the Common Law; yet the ingroſſing or ſole buying of foreign commodities beyond the ſeas, and ſelling in groſs, or by the Merchant-Importer, was no offence at Common Law.

Neither is there any Statute that makes it an offence at this day.

It is true the Statute of 37 E. III. cap. 5. prohibited Engliſh Merchants to ingroſs merchandizes.

But the Merchant ſtranger was not bound by that Law: and that Statute was the next year repealed, as to the Engliſh Merchants, 38 E. III. cap. 2. And that at preſent the Law is, that any Merchant may buy in groſs, and ſell in groſs, appears by the reſolution of all the Judges, Mich. 39 & 40 Eliz. Co. 3. Inſt. 196. in the chapter of ingroſſing.

And the reſolution goes a ſtep further than the Merchant-Importer.

That any perſon may buy in groſs of the Merchant-Importer, and ſell by retail.

And it follows by a clear conſequence, that if Engliſh Merchants in ſuch places, where by Law they have right to trade, may ingroſs the commodity of the place without offence; the ingroſſing foreign commodities of any place, where the ſubject cannot trade without licence, can be no argument to invalidate ſuch licence.

Becauſe ingroſſing of foreign merchandize, by any Merchant-Importer, is no crime, but lawful for every trader.

And then the conſequence of all ingroſſing, will be the raiſing the price of the commodity.

Yet it being a commodity of foreign growth, and not ſuch as the Law hath any where determined neceſſary for the ſupport of life, as victuals and ſuch like;

The Common Law hath no regard to the price, but leaves the Merchant free to make his advantage of his dangerous adventure.

The advantages that ſome ſubjects may receive by the trade, and others may be debarred from; which are alike hazardous, and depend upon a multitude of accidents, are no meaſures of right or wrong, to paſs a legal judgment upon.

But if the Company have a right to trade, and others have not, as I have argued, whatever their advantage may be, which cannot be eſtimated till they have wound up their bottom:

The ingroſſing of the Indian commodities, can't be infected with the taint of a Monopoly, which always ſuppoſes ſomething done againſt common right, which is altogether inconſiſtent with having a right due to the King.

For it is of the eſſence of a Monopoly, according to the definition thereof propos'd by Mr. Pollexfen, and taken out of my Lord Coke, viz. that it tends to reſtrain ſuch liberty and freedom the ſubject had before, or to hinder him in his lawful trade.

So that every ſole buying and ſelling a commodity, if it be lawful, can be no Monopoly, in the legal ſenſe of the word; which is evident in ſeveral land commodities, where the ſole buying and ſelling is coupled with a right.

The King may grant to farm his pre-emption of Tin, whereby the Grantee hath the ſole buying and ſelling, if he pleaſeth, of the whole commodity.

Such a Grant to Tidman a foreigner, was complained of in Parliament, 21 E. III. and prayed by the Commons, that no ſuch merchandize be ſold, but to the commonalty of Merchants.

The King anſwers, that it was a profit belonging to the Prince, and every Lord may make his profit of his own; 21 E. III. nu. 29.

That this ſole right of buying and ſelling, was ever enjoyed, appears by the caſe of the Stannaries, 4 J. Co. 12. fol. 10 & 11.

So of all Gold and Silver dug within the Realm, and of all royal fiſhes taken; the King and his Grantees ſhall have the ſole diſpoſal, or right of ſelling them.

It is no juſt anſwer to theſe inſtances, that they are inheritances and rights veſted in the Dukes of Cornwal and the Crown:

Which they may diſpoſe to whom they pleaſe. So is his prerogative of licenſing foreign trade. And as to the queſtion of a Monopoly, which implies a wrong in reſtraining the rights of others; there is no difference between having a right exiſting, which may be granted, and having a power or prerogative to confer a right on others.

For 'tis the having the right to do the thing, that makes it no Monopoly.

And therefore, if the King have a right to licenſe ſome of his ſubjects to do a thing, which other of his ſubjects cannot do, or are rightfully prohibited to do; whether the thing granted were before in eſſe or de novo conſtituted, it is all one as to the validity of the Grant. This is proved by the inſtance of Fairs and Markets.

Whether anciently in the Crown, or de novo erected and granted to any ſubject, the caſe will be the ſame, as to the ſubjects ſole right of holding the Fair and Market excluſive to others.

And rights conferred by the King's prerogative, are every whit as ſtrong as any right granted out of the Crown, which was before in eſſe there.

So that the pretence of an unlawful Ingroſſment and Monopoly being removed, by Mr. Pollexfen's admittance, 'tis not within 21 Jacobi.

And it is plain, it is not within the words of the enacting part of the Statute, without the aid of the Proviſo: for it is expreſly limited to Grants made, or to be made, for the ſole buying and ſelling, or uſing of any thing within the Realm. So that it was only the liberty of the inland trade and traffick, to which the ſubjects had right before, that was fenced

fenced and ſecured by this Statute. And this Patent is not for the ſole buying of any thing within the Realm; and though the ſelling be here, yet ſuch ſole ſelling was, and is lawful, notwithſtanding any Law or Statute made, as I have ſhewn.

And the Proviſo was only added, to manifeſt the plain intention of the Parliament, not to intermeddle with any juſt prerogative of the King, which he might and lawfully had exerciſed and uſed for the benefit of his ſubjects.

Beſides, to put it paſt all ſcruple, this Company is within the expreſs words of the Proviſo.

It was a Company in the reign of Queen Elizabeth and King James, as is recited in the declaration.

And by their Charter 7 Jac. had the ſole trade granted, with the excluſive clauſes to others.

And if the Parliament had not adjudged this Company, to be for the maintenance and enlargement, or ordering of that trade, as well as the other Companies, they would undoubtedly have made a difference between them, upon that Charter of 7 Jac.

For this very Parliament was inquiſitive into all illegal Patents, which in the leaſt tended towards a Monopoly.

And if they had thought that Charter ſuch, they would not have been tender of the point at that time.

The objection made from the different managery, by joint and ſeparate ſtocks, is of no great weight, becauſe it touches not the queſtion of right; whether a Company may have a ſole trade granted, excluſive to others.

For every Company draws a charge with it, which thoſe not of the Company are not liable to.

And if the ſubject have a right to trade without being of the Company, he can be no more compelled to be of the Company, which manages and trades upon ſeparate Stocks, than of one which trades upon a Joint-Stock.

And the objection, that ordering of trade within the Statute, cannot be intended of licenſing of ſome, with excluſion of others, is of no greater force; for it could not be intended of any others.

All the Patents for foreign trade before that time, and then in being, were Patents of excluſion of others than the Company.

And if it be well conſider'd, all the authorities, that allow there may be Companies erected for well-governing and ordering foreign trade, do admit, they may be excluſive to others;

It not being poſſible that a foreign trade can be under any rule or government, by any Letters Patent whatſoever, if carry'd on by perſons not ſubject to that rule and government.

And it is evident, that no rule of any Company, binds farther than thoſe of the Company; and if every man, not of the Company, may trade, ſuch trade will not be under any rules made for the Company, or by the Company.

So that ſuch Patent will be only for keeping ſome few perſons within rule and government, but not at all of the Foreign Trade.

Which of neceſſity muſt produce the ruin of the Company, and in all probability of the trade itſelf.

For if others trade without limitation, diſcharged of all the rules of the Company, and not be liable to the charges and expences, whereby the trade muſt be ſupported; they may and will both underſell the Company, and foreſtall and anticipate the Markets, than which nothing can tend more effectually towards the deſtruction of a trade, of that great concern both to King and Kingdom.

Beſides, the Factories and Stock of the Company in foreign parts, are obnoxious and liable for all injuries committed, either to the Natives or Government of the place, by any Interloper trading without rule, by the general Law of reprizals.

I will not further purſue the arguments of convenience or inconvenience, but do reſt upon the right, which I have endeavoured to make out by theſe ſteps.

Firſt, That the ſubject had no right to this trade at Common Law, as a foreign trade, but might be prohibited.

Secondly, That no league or royal licence hath introduced or given ſuch general right.

Thirdly, That foreign trade hath in all times been licenſed and managed by the undoubted prerogative of the Crown, in licenſing ſome, and prohibiting others. And that in all caſes not provided for by Act of Parliament.

And that ſuch Grants and Licences have received allowance in ſeveral Parliaments.

Fourthly, That no Act of Parliament ever gave a general liberty of trade, much leſs to trade with Infidels.

Fifthly, That the Common Law prohibits this trade with Infidels, as with Alien Enemies.

Sixthly, In the laſt place, I have applied anſwers to principal authorities and arguments made uſe of to impeach the Company's Patent.

Upon all which, I conclude the chief point of the caſe;

Firſt, That the Grant to the Company, of the ſole trade to India, excluſive to others, is good in Law.

Secondly, As to the ſecond point, whether the action will lie, admitting the Company have a right to the ſole trade there, by theſe Letters Patent;

I ſhall ſpend but a little of your time about it.

Becauſe if the Company have by Law the ſole right to the trade, the Law will give them a remedy to redreſs injuries done to their trade, for recovery of their damages.

Which is properly by an action of the Caſe, they having no other remedy to redreſs themſelves. For a proſecution for a contempt to the King, cannot be in ſatisfaction of the Company's damage.

I ſhall therefore reſt that point, upon the authorities already produced by the Plaintiffs Counſel.

I ſhall only apply anſwers to the objections made by Mr. Pollexfen.

Obj. 1. 'Tis not alledged the Defendants had no licence from the King.

Anſw. The Complaintants caſe is ſufficiently ſet forth, that they had the ſole trade to the Indies granted to them; and that the Defendant had notice thereof, and yet traded contrary to their Grant.

If the Defendant had had the King's licence to come on his part by Plea, then the validity thereof, as againſt the Plaintiff, wou'd have come into queſtion; but he reſts upon the licence, by Statute of 15 E. III.

Obj. 2. They have ſhewn no ſpecial loſs or damage.

Anſw. Neither need any be ſhewn, no more than in all other actions of the caſe, where the right of any perſon is injured, 19 Rep. 113. Mary's caſe of a Commoner who hath no estate in the land, nor the sole right in the profit apprender, comes not to the case; the Law denies such Commoner liberty of bringing his action, without a special damage, to prevent multiplicity of actions, which upon the same ground every Commoner would be intitled to.

But otherwise it is, where any hath the sole Piscary or Profit apprender; after setting forth the special case, and wherein his right is invaded, a general declaration to his damage is sufficient, and the examination of the particulars will belong to the Jury.

Obj. 3. That the action is grounded upon the restraints in the Letters Patent; and that restraint is not absolute, but upon pain of forfeiture of ships and goods.

Anſ. The first part is mistaken; for the action is grounded upon the Grant of the whole, entire and only trade and traffick to the Indies, inforc'd with the King's covenant, not to grant licence to any others.

And besides this clause of the prohibition, there is a distinct clause of Grant, that none of these countries or places shall be visited, frequented or haunted by any of the King's subjects, during the continuance of this Patent, which hath no penalty annexed to it.

Upon these Grants the action is grounded, and if there were no clause of prohibition, the trading to these Infidels by others without licence from the King, is enterprizing a trade not only against the prohibition of the Common Law, but the King's expres prohibition.

But the action is not founded upon this clause, but upon other clauses of conferring a right to the sole trade.

The authority cited by Mr. Pollexfen, as an authority in point, against the action out of 11 Rep. 88. and Rolls Abridgment, fol. 106. nu. 6. in Darcy's case, that admitting the grant or dispensation to Darcy, were good for importing foreign Cards, contrary to the Statute of Ed. 4. yet the action would not lie; reacheth not our case of a right conferred by the King's prerogative, and not of any dispensation from a penal Law.

Before the Statute of Edw. IV. every subject might import foreign Cards; the Statute restrains that liberty under penalty of forfeiture.

The dispensation of one subject from the Law, works no Interest but a bare exemption from the penalty.

Which in the case of Shaw and Hawes, was held could not be assigned over; and therefore Grants that are merely Dispensations, convey no Interest against any other subject, who is no otherwise restrain'd from doing the thing, than by the Statute under a penalty.

But where the King by his prerogative may grant the sole use of a thing, (as in case of new Inventions) the Grantee hath an Interest sufficient to support an action upon the case, as Rolls is of opinion. The next Paragraph, fol. 106. nu. 17. That if the King grant that none shall use such a thing, (whereof the King hath power to grant,) but the Grantee, reserving a rent, if another use it, an action upon the case will lie.

Which is a stronger authority in point for the action, than that of Darcy's case of a mere dispensation is against it.

And therefore having proved the Grant of the sole trade to be good, the action is well brought for damages.

And pray Judgment for the Plaintiffs.

Mr. Williams's Argument.

De Termino S. Michaelis, Anno Regni Regis Car. Secundi, xxxvi. Annoq; Dom. 1684.

The East-India Company against Thomas Sandys.

THE Questions in this Case, are two.

1. Whether this Grant of sole trading to this Company, excluding all other his Majesty's subjects who are not members of this Company, or within the qualifications of this Grant, be a legal Grant?

2. Admitting it a legal Grant, if this action be maintainable by the Company, against the Defendant?

That this Grant is legal in all its parts, I do not find that the counsel that argued for it, have endeavoured to maintain.

Mr. Attorney hath admitted in his argument, it is not.

That some parts of it are against law, is manifest, viz. it inflicts illegal penalties upon persons offending against it, by creating a forfeiture of their goods and merchandize, which shall be brought into the Realm, or any of the dominions thereof, contrary to this Grant.

It also creates a forfeiture of the Ships, with the furniture thereof, wherein such goods shall be imported or found; the one half to the King, the other half to the Company.

It grants, That the offenders against it shall be imprisoned during the King's pleasure, and not to be delivered out of prison until the offenders become bound to the Governor, in the sum of 1000 l. at least; that such person shall not at any time after sail or traffick into any places mentioned in the Grant.

It gives the Company liberty to license persons to trade within the limits of this Grant; and that the King, his heirs and successors, shall not, during these Letters Patent, license any person to sail or trade there.

In these things the property and liberty of the subjects, are put into the power of the Company; and they are to dispose of the liberty and property to serve their own Company, and not the publick.

If this Company may seize Goods and Ships, and imprison the King's subjects, according to their Grant, they will have a greater prerogative over the subject than his Majesty hath; they have power to seize goods, and imprison persons, without trial, without legal proceeding, which the King cannot do; and I humbly conceive, cannot grant to any subject or corporation.

The Judgment upon the Canary Patent, which I shall have occasion to mention more largely herein, by the opinion of all the Judges, damned the penalties of that, agreeing in substance with these. The substance of this was admitted, at least not defended, by Mr. Attorney General.

This Grant does not only give this Company dominion over the properties and liberties of the subject, and invest the Company with the prerogative of the Crown to license men and ships to trade in these limits, but it doth divest the Crown, the King, his heirs and successors, of a high prerogative; That the King shall not license, as I take it, the King shall not trade in these limits without the licence of this Company. For as this great and mighty Charter is penned, it doth not only inveſt the Company, but diveſt the King of his prerogative.

Mr. Attorney and the King's counſel could not argue for the Company in this matter, without arguing againſt the prerogative of the King. They are of the King's counſel that argued for this Grant, but it's not to be believed they were of the King's counſel, or friends, that drew it or adviſed it.

We that argue for Mr. Sandys, argue for the King's prerogative: That the King, notwithſtanding this Grant to this Company, may licenſe Mr. Sandys, or any other ſubject, to trade in theſe limits; and it doth not appear upon this Record but Mr. Sandys hath the King's licenſe to trade in thoſe places, he may licenſe any other ſubject to trade there.

And that the King by his Grant cannot exclude himſelf of this prerogative.

It will ſerve our turn, for the defendant in this caſe to avoid the plaintiffs action. If the plaintiffs ought not by law to have the ſole licenſing of traders in theſe limits; for the ſtinging part of their declaration is laid in this, That the Defendant traded without their Licence:

There was greater care had to greaten this Company, than to preſerve the prerogative of the King in this Grant; and the prerogative is named in this caſe, to ſerve the Company, and not the King: and they that drew this Grant, did neither conſult the honour nor prerogative of the King, the liberty or property of the ſubject, the trade of the Kingdom, nor the law of the land: But their buſineſs was to greaten this Company, to the detriment of the King, the Law, and the Subject; as I hope to make out in this caſe.

In my way to the particular Queſtions in this caſe, I ſhall obſerve, 1. That the plaintiffs in their declaration do alledge, That they have eſtabliſhed and managed, and do manage a great trade of merchandize to the Eaſt-Indies, with the inhabitants there, who at the time of the making the Letters Patent, were not, and ever ſince are not chriſtians; but then were, and now are infidels, and enemies to the chriſtian faith.

Yet they do not alledge, nor can ſay that theſe Indians are in enmity with the Crown of England, or that they are alien enemies to England.

2. Tho'the preſent inhabitants of theſe places are Infidels, and enemies to the chriſtian faith, yet it may be, and we hope there may be an univerſal converſion to the chriſtian faith; and we are taught by the Church to pray for it, and to uſe all manner of means to bring it to paſs.

Why may not theſe places, or ſome of them, become inhabited with chriſtians, as Spain and Portugal are now inhabited by chriſtians, where infidels did inhabit about 200 years ago?

3. This Grant doth not exclude a trade with infidels only in theſe places, but with all perſons in theſe places.

I do not obſerve, that any of the Company's counſel that argued before Mr. Attorney, have denied Engliſhmen the liberty of trading with chriſtians in any part of the world, without licence from the King. Herein I take him to be alone.

4. They ſay, this trade cannot be managed but per corpus corporatum.

Yet have they an excluſion of all perſons, and bodies politick and corporate, to trade, or manage a trade in theſe places without their licence; and by this means exclude the King from conſtituting any other company within the limits of their Grant, or in any part of it, which may be very neceſſary for the Government, and publick trade of the King.

1. It may be, the Indians may inſiſt upon ſome ſuch Company to be inſtituted by the King, by ſome treaty of commerce.

Now hath the King by this means, not only excluded his ſubjects from the trade of this Place; but he hath excluded himſelf of the liberty of making or conſtituting any other Company for trade or commerce, in all, or any of theſe places.

2. Perhaps the government and good management of trade in theſe places, may in time require more companies to be inſtituted, in all, or ſome of theſe places; and the Company's counſel, except Mr. Attorney, are now arguing the King by his prerogative, out of his prerogative.

That the King had prerogative enough to make this glorious Company the ſole traders, and managers of trade in theſe places, and to exclude himſelf and his ſucceſſors, and all the reſt of his ſubjects, from this trade and management.

3. And by this means conſtitute a ſort of Republick for the management of trade in theſe places, borrowing perhaps from Hamborough and other republican places, the ways and methods of managing trade upon a common ſtock, in fraternities and companies; and by this experiment alter the conſtitution of England in the management of trade, by altering the nature of our Engliſh properties in our goods veſted and placed in perſons, and placing our properties in companies and fraternities; and by fixing the myſtery of trade in companies, to the prejudice of ſingle perſons; and may in time turn to ill example, and endanger the Government in its other parts, as well as the trade of England.

The main queſtion in this caſe doth turn upon the power of the King;

If the King by his royal power may appropriate this trade in theſe Infidel places to this Company?

Firſt, That the King hath power to do this, by the advice of his great Council the Parliament, is not doubted. So there is no defect or want of power in the King to do this by the Law of England, the exceptions in the Statute of 21 Jac. cap. 3. do except ſuch Grants out of that Statute.

The queſtion is only a queſtion of the manner of doing this by the King.

Secondly, Whether he may do it, without the advice of his Great Council in Parliament.

As there is no defect or want of power in the King, ſo there is no defect in the Law of England.

Thirdly, But if there be a neceſſity or a conveniency to the doing of this for the Crown, or for the government, for the ſubject or for trade;

Fourthly, It is not to be ſuppoſed but that the Lords and Commons in Parliament, will and ought to aſſent to ſuch a Grant in Parliament as much as the Privy-Council, or any other of the King's Council, are obliged to adviſe it out of Parliament; and it ought to be ſo preſumed by the conſtitution of England.

And I take this to be one of the Arduæ Regni, which is a ſubject matter fit and proper for the conſideration and deliberation of a Parliament, and ought not to paſs by any Grant without them.

The trade of England, the property and liberty of the ſubject, the King's revenue by Tonnage, Poundage Poundage and Cuſtoms, the prerogative of the King, are under great reſtrictions by this Grant.

This work is too heavy for the pen of an Attorney, or Sollicitor, to put into a bill for the Great Seal, without the deliberation of a Parliament.

The King cannot naturalize an Alien, but by Act of Parliament, the Law doth intruſt the King by his Letters Patent, to make Denizens of Aliens, but not to naturalize them.

It may be too much for me to give the reaſon of this, why the King hath not power to naturalize Aliens, as well as to denize them.

I humbly take the reaſon to proceed from the intereſt of the Subject, that the right of the Subject is immediately concerned in letting in Aliens to have the ſame right, liberty and freedom with Engliſh ſubjects in England, and that this ought not to be granted to Aliens, not by the King under his Great Seal, without the conſent of the Lords and Commons, the Repreſentatives of the Subjects in Parliament.

There may be high State-Policy, ſometimes to naturalize an Alien, and that perhaps it cannot always wait the meeting of a Parliament, yet hath the Law placed this truſt in the King; to be exerciſed by the King, with the advice of the Lords and Commons in Parliament, and no otherwiſe.

The right of every Engliſhman in his freedom of trade in theſe parts, is concerned in this Grant, and every Engliſhman not admitted to trade by this Grant, is excluded of his freedom; and the King diſables himſelf to licenſe any other Engliſh ſubjects to trade in theſe parts.

If the King had made ſuch a Grant to Aliens, and excluded all his Engliſh ſubjects from trading in theſe places, or if the King had granted only to his Iriſh or Scotch ſubjects, and excluded his Engliſh ſubjects, had theſe been good Grants or legal?

If the King has the prerogative, the Company's Counſel urge in this caſe, all this might have been done, and theſe Grants had been legal, tho' excluſive of all his Engliſh ſubjects.

It is enough, I humbly conceive the King hath the prerogative of granting and conſtituting ſuch Companies, and making ſuch Grants in Parliament; and the Law allows no more in caſes of this nature, which concern the right of every ſubject in England, and therefore ought not to be taken from him, but by his conſent in Parliament.

I think it may be admitted, the King may by his Great Seal, without the advice of the Lords and Commons in Parliament, conſtitute a Company for the good management of trade in theſe parts, or any part of the world.

But he cannot, as I humbly conceive, by any Grant under his Great Seal, totally exclude his ſubjects of their right and liberty of trading, in any place upon the ſeas or beyond the ſeas.

Rolls 1. Rep. fol. 4. The Taylor's of Ipſwich caſe; the King may grant a Charter for good ordering of trade; this is for the benefit of the ſubject, 2 Ed. III. Briton's caſe.

The good management of trade is for the benefit of the ſubject.

I ſhall endeavour to maintain, that the ſubjects of England had a right to trade in theſe parts, before the making of this Grant, or the conſtituting any Company by the Crown in the Eaſt-Indies, and without any licence from the Crown; and by conſequence this Grant appropriating this trade to this Company, and excluding the reſt of the King's ſubjects from their right and liberty of trade there, is an illegal Monopoly in trade, condemned both by the Common Law and Statute Law of England: and the Infideliſm of the Inhabitants of theſe places, is no bar or impediment to the trade and commerce of Engliſh ſubjects in theſe places, without leave or licence from the Crown, no more than in Chriſtian Countries.

That the prerogative of the Crown, to grant and iſſue out writs of Ne Exeat Regnum, againſt this or that ſubject, is no argument for this power to make ſuch a Grant as this, or to exclude his ſubjects from trading in Infidels Countries.

The Ne Exeat Regnum, is a writ that may be granted by the Keeper of the Great Seal, without any expreſs warrant or command from the King, upon ſome ſuggeſtion, that the party may be required to give caution not to leave the Kingdom, till he anſwers ſuch a ſuit or the like.

This writ is never granted without ſome ſpecial reaſon or cauſe in a particular caſe; the ſubject complained of, may appear in Chancery, and anſwering the cauſe, may diſcharge the writ.

Such a Grant under the Great Seal, for ſome of the King's ſubjects to go abroad, and for the reſt to ſtay at home; I conceive, would not be good in Law. No parity of reaſon, becauſe the King may by his writ of Ne Exeat Regnum, ſtay a ſubject from going out of the Kingdom, that therefore the King may by his Grant hinder him to trade out of the Kingdom. Men may, and do trade by their factors and correſpondents, and do not ſtir out of the Kingdom; their perſonal attendance in their trade in places remote is not neceſſary.

The ſubjects of England trading in merchandize, have, and always had a right to trade upon the ſeas, and beyond the ſeas, without licence from the Crown.

That they had ſuch liberty to trade with all Chriſtian Countries, I do not find it denied by any of the Company's Counſel, but Mr. Attorney; he hath yielded ſomething the other Counſel have denied, and denied what others have admitted; and in ſomething in his argument, he is, as I conceive, inconſiſtent with himſelf.

That trade is as free to all men as the air, that the ſeas are like the highways, free and open to all paſſengers.

By his opinion there's a community for all loyal ſubjects to trade on the ſeas, and not to be appropriated to a few.

I do agree that the King hath a prerogative in the ſea, and that the ſea is within the King's leigeance; and that by this prerogative, Wrecks, and Sturgeon and other great fiſh in the ſea belong to the Crown. Stat. 17 Ed. II. cap. 11.

But the King hath not any prerogative that I meet with, to exclude the ſubject from the benefit of his right of community in the ſeas, as fiſhing and trade.

As the King hath his ſovereignty upon the ſeas, and his ſubjects owe him leigeance there; ſo have they their rights and properties in and upon the ſeas, and they are not to be invaded.

Stat. 5 R. II. cap. 2. Doth affirm this by the exception in that Statute.

Dyer, fol. 165, & 296. agrees with Nat. Br. and ſays further, that no Merchant pays at the Common Law, any Cuſtom for any wares or merchandize whatſoever, except three, viz. Wool, Woolfells and Leather, expreſs for all Merchants, and confirmed by Stat. 5 R. II. cap. 1, & 2.

Rolls 1. Rep. fol. 4. Taylor's of Ipſwich caſe, 12 Jac. Banco Regis; no trade mechanick or merchandizing, ought to be hindred by the King's Patent in any ſort, but by Act of Parliament.

9 H. III. cap. 30. A Charter to hinder trade at ſea is void; a Charter that only 100 perſons ſhall trade, is void in itſelf; and he was Chief-Juſtice at this time. 2 Inſt. 57. The Patent to Greenland was allowed, becauſe the trade was found at the peril of the party's life, who firſt diſcovered it.

Taylor's of Ipſwich caſe, where there is no new Invention, the King by his Charter cannot hinder trade.

The Patent to the College of Phyſicians, that no perſon ſhall practiſe Phyſick without their licence, would have been void, had it not been confirmed by Act of Parliament; yet this concerned not all the ſubjects of England: and is a myſtery, and the profeſſors thereof, fit to be approved by perſons of skill in it.

It may be admitted, that the King for ſpecial cauſes may prohibit this or that ſubject, perhaps, to trade in ſome certain places.

As the King may inhibit a ſubject's going beyond the ſeas; and if a perſon goes beyond the ſeas after ſuch an inhibition, it is a crime in the ſubject, for which he is puniſhable.

But it is hard to infer from ſuch particular inhibitions of particular perſons, to trade in particular places or countries, or to inhibit particular perſons from going beyond the ſeas, to infer univerſally that the King may inhibit all his ſubjects to go beyond the ſeas, or that he may inhibit all his ſubjects except ſome few to trade.

There is a great difference between an inhibition from the Crown, to this or that perſon to go beyond the ſeas, and an inhibition for all perſons to trade, except ſuch a Company.

This Grant imports a reſtraint upon trade, and upon the common liberty of the ſubject, for the benefit of ſome few of the ſubjects, without any benefit to the Crown, or ſecurity to the Kingdom, as in the caſe of Ne Exeat Regnum.

The Company may licenſe aliens only, and exclude ſubjects. No truſt is placed in the Company, which the Law places in the Crown.

For the allay that is offered to this excluſion of trading for Engliſhmen, and Engliſh Merchants in theſe places;

Obj. 1.

Obj. That they are excluded only from trading in the East-Indies with Infidels, and the Inhabitants there, who are enemies to the Christian Faith and Religion.

And that it is for the common safety of the Christian Religion, that this is done to avoid the danger of corrupting and perverting Christians to Infidelism.

I do not meet with any authority for this power given to the King.

But that English subjects have the same freedom of trade with Infidels as they have with Chhistians in places beyond the seas; so they be not in enmimity with the Crown of England.

Michelborne's case, Brownlow 2d Rep. 296. that case hath been observed already to have no authority, nor the Book authentick, and at best but some sayings of my Lord Coke, in a matter not then in judgment before the Court, and that perhaps mistaken by the Prothonotary.

I oppose to the probability of this saying, the report of the Taylor's of Ipswich case, in Rolls Rep. fol. 4, 12 Jac. The Lord Coke was then Chief-Justice of the King's-Bench, and says in the resolution in that case, that no trade mechanick or merchantable can be hindred by the King's Patent not in any place, without an Act of Parliament; a Charter to hinder trade at sea is void.

How can this stand with what is published in Brownlow, that my Lord Coke should say in the Common-Pleas, before this time, that an English subject cannot trade with Infidels, without licence from the King; and that he had seen a licence in the time of Edw. III. to that purpose?

The reason given for that saying, is as weak, because they are common enemies to the Christian Faith.

They may be enemies to the Christian Religion, and not enemies to the Crown of England, or to the trade of England.

The Law denies trade and commerce only with enemies to the Crown, not with enemies to the Christian Religion.

It is sufficiently oberved already, by the Council that have argued on this side, that there are treaties of trade and commerce between the Crown of England, and these places of Infidels, and that there are leagues and embassies between them. 4 Inst. 155. allows leagues of commerce and trade, and peace with Infidels.

And what may be the consequence, to declare that to be Law, that they are incapable of the benefit of the Law of England, allowed to other Aliens, and that they are not to be protected from personal injuries by our Law?

12 H. VIII. 4. A Pagan beaten in England, cannot sue, quia perpetuus inimicus.

And to put them in the same condition with outlawed and excommunicated persons, how this doth consist with the common Justice of Nations, or with the policy of trade in an Island.

Obj. By Mr. Sollicitor, 5 Inst. fol. 32. A Jewess born in England, marrying a converted Jew, not dowable.

Mr. Sollicitor hath cited many Cases and Records out of Mr. Prynne's Collections, and from the Rolls themselves, how the Jews were treated in England in trade; what restraints and taxes were laid upon them by the Crown.

I do not take it, that any of these Records reach the reason of restraint of trade, imposed upon English subjects by this Grant.

There's no restraint but that English subjects might trade with Jews in their own countries.

That Jews were used thus in England, is no argument that the East-India Company may use English subjects like Jews abroad in other Countries.

St. Paul's first epistle to the Corinthians, cap. 6. reprehends the Christians for going to Law one with another before Infidel Judges, who were their enemies; calling it a fault, and he speaks it to their shame, that they would not rather receive wrong, or make Arbiters of their own to judge between the brethren, than to go to Law one with another, and that before unbelievers; but there's no reproof to the Christians for conversing or trading with Infidels.

4 Inst. fol. 155. Darcy and Allen's case, Moor's Rep. fol. 674, and 675. are Authorities for leagues and commerce with Pagans, which signify leagues of commerce with Infidels.

Lord Coke cites several texts out of the holy Writ to justify it, out of the Books of Joshua, Kings and Chronicles.

If it be true, there was such freedom of trade by the Common Law for all English subjects with Infidels and Christians in all parts of the World, and that without licence from the King;

To restrain this freedom of trade to a Company of English subjects, excluding all others the King's subjects, from their ancient liberty and freedom of trade; I take to be a Monopoly, and comes within the description and reason of the odiousness of Monopolies, so largely argued by Mr. Pollexfen, that I shall not take up the time of the Court in repeating what he hath said, and I cannot add to it.

Neither will I trouble the Court, with mentioning the authorities he hath cited for that purpose; but refer myself to the same authority in that matter.

Yet I take it, under correction, that it is fit to be very well considered, if this Patent be not a Monopoly, and an ingrossing and appropriating of trade to few persons; which did belong and was common to all Englishmen, tho' a licence from the Crown was necessary for their exercise of this trade; yet every Englishman was capable of such licence, and was intitled to such licence from the Crown, and had a right to it.

Now hath this Grant put it out of the King's power to grant such licences, and hath placed this power, and the exercise of it in this Company, and by this means hath by this Patent granted and appropriated a trade to this Company, which was common to all his subjects; and hath given to this Company the sole licensing of traders in these parts, excluding all the subjects of England, which shall not be licensed by this Company, to trade in these parts: I conceive this makes this Patent and Grant illegal and void;

And makes this restraint in trade, which was common to all with the King's licence, now peculiar to this Company; and doth monopolize the trade and the means of trading, by placing it in the sole hands and power of the Company, even the sole licensing of traders; and they may by this Grant license Aliens only to exclude English subjects.

My Lord Coke's description of Monopolies and Monopolists, Projectors and Propounders, doth sufficiently illustrate this, with reflecting upon what Mr. Pollexfen hath said in his argument, without repetition of them to the Court.

The

The Statute of Magna Charta declares the liberty and freedom Merchants have to buy and ſell without reſtraint, by the old and rightful Cuſtoms, except in time of war.

2 Inſt. cap. 29 & 30. Stat. 9 H. III. 30. Niſi publicè prohibentur, ſaith my Lord Coke, is intended a prohibition by Act of Parliament.

Yelverton, 10 Jac. is of the ſame opinion with Lord Coke in his Book about impoſitions upon trade; as I have it from a Gentleman in our profeſſion. Vide his Manuſcripts.

21 Jac. cap. 3. Declares all Monopolies to be againſt Common Law.

Coke 11. Caſe of Monopolies, 84 Moor's Rep. 673. nay, Darcy's Grant for the ſole importing of Cards from beyond the ſeas, and ſelling them for twenty-one years, 44 Eliz. prohibited and judged a void Grant.

Stat. 2 E. III. cap. 9. confirms Magna Charta, for going and coming with merchandize to and from England, according to Magna Charta.

9 E. III. cap. 1. Damns all Charters to the contrary, as illegal and oppreſſive to the people. 4 E. III. cap. 2. confirms alſo Magna Charta. 25 E. III. cap. 2. doth the ſame, and makes Letters Patent to the contrary void.

11 R. II. cap. 7. 12 H. VII. 6. for free paſſage, &c. ſuch Letters Patent reſtraining trade have been purſued in Parliament, with hue and cry, in all Parliaments and Ages.

Obj. This Grant is made to a Company for good government, and for the ordering of trade and no Monopoly, and it is within the Proviſo of the Statute, 21 Jac.

Anſ. Allowed in Darcy's caſe by the arguments for that Grant, that if it be not for publick good, the Grant is illegal.

If this Grant be neither good for the King, nor for the ſubject, nor for the trade of England; it cannot be ſaid to be for the publick good.

It cannot be good for the King, for it reſtrains him in his prerogative, as you would have it the King had power to licenſe every ſubject; by this Grant he hath excluded himſelf of all power of licenſing. He can licenſe no ſubject to trade in theſe parts.

The King ſuffers in his Cuſtoms and in his Navigation.

The ſubject is excluded from trading in theſe places, without the licence of this Company.

Trade itſelf is reſtrained, for it is reduced and appropriated to a Company, and to few perſons, which was common to all the King's ſubjects.

2 Inſt. fol. 57. Lord Coke's reaſon againſt it, for all the ſubjects are concerned in trade, therefore all ought to conſent to it in Parliament.

Tho' they are a Company, they are not conſtituted by this Grant, to regulate and manage trade for England, but for themſelves and their Company.

The heightening, the lowering of commodities, the raiſing, the leſſening the rates of all the commodities of theſe places, the ingroſſing of all the trade of theſe places, is in their power and in their pleaſure.

There are no rules or qualifications in this Grant, injoining to admit numbers into this Company, or directing or requiring their licences for this trade. They have the trade in themſelves without any check or controul from his Majeſty or the Government; they are independent from the Government by this Grant, they are without appeal.

Obj. That they are a Company, and that this Grant to them, is within the exception of the Stat. 21 Jac. cap. 3.

Anſw. 1. Becauſe that exception doth not reach to Letters Patent made to Corporations, after the making of that Act.

No words of ſaving to any Corporation, that ſhould be afterwards erected or granted.

2. This Proviſo doth not make them better than they were before the making of the Act, only leaves them as they were before, and as it found them.

If they were legal before, they continue ſo; if illegal, they are ſo notwithſtanding this Act.

Obj. That many Grants of this nature, have been made to ſeveral Companies; to the Turky Company; Muſcovy and Hamborough Companies.

Anſw. They do not trade in Joint-Stock, and monopolize as this Company doth; they do not exclude perſons from their Company, as this doth. Mr. Pollexfen hath differenced them at large.

That there have been many Monopoly Grants in all ages from the Crown, appears by the Statute of Magna Charta, by other Statutes made in E. IIId's time, R. II. H. VII. and King James's time; and by the judgments given on Monopoly Patents in all ages.

In the caſe of Monopolies. In the Taylor's of Ipſwich caſe.

Peachy's caſe, 5 E. III. ſeverely puniſhed for procuring a licence under the Great Seal, that he only ſhould ſell ſweet Wines in London, &c.

Inſt. 3. fol. 181. Darcy and Allen's, Mar. Rep. 44 Eliz. Oppreſſion is older than the Law made to puniſh it: Monopolies are as old as the Laws made to puniſh them; it is no argument to juſtify injuries by their ages.

Sir Arthur Ingram's Patent, 17 Car. II. for the Canary Company, granting them the ſole trade there. There are glorious recitals in that Patent, of advantage to the King's ſubjects, and for the regulation of trade; making the Company a body politick, that they ſhould have the ſole trade to thoſe Iſlands, excluding all others under pains and forfeitures, with a non obſtante to the Statute againſt Monopolies; Judgment was given againſt this Patent, Mich. 20 Car. II.

11 Rep. fol. 54. Taylor's of Ipſwich caſe, compare this caſe with the Company of Taylors caſe; for the good of Trade and Company, and the Orders and By-Laws fair and plauſible, yet damned, becauſe a reſtraint on trade.

The Company had the profit of the reformation. No other difference between the caſes, than that this is a mighty, that a petty Company.

14 Car. II. cap. 24. That Statute provides, that perſons by having Stocks in this Company, ſhall not be adjudged traders within the Statutes againſt Bankrupts, which is called by Mr. Sollicitor the Judgment of the Parliament for this Grant.

Says Mr. Sollicitor, Stat. 14 Car. II. cap. 24. takes notice of this Company, and that it is an advantage to the Nation and Trade of it.

Stat. 29 Car. II. 1. takes notice of this Company, and taxes every Capital Stock in the Company, at 20*s.* for every 100*l.* Capital Stock in the Company.

Anſ. This Poll-Act taxes all Guilds and Fraternites, Bodies Politick and Corporate; this doth not make them legal Corporations, Guilds or Fraternities.

The

The Judgment the Parliament had of this Grant, doth better appear upon the Journals of the Houſes of Parliament, of the complaints made to the Parliament, that this Grant was a grievance.

It is no new thing to mention proceedings upon Journals of Parliament: and the Judges take notice of them. Hob. Rep. & Rolls.

And in a cauſe of this conſequence, it may be proper to adjourn it to Parliament, where it may receive the Judgment of his Majeſty in Parliament.

This will be a ſafe eſtabliſhment of the Law in this great caſe, which concerns the King's prerogative, the right of the ſubject, and of the whole Kingdom in the trade of the Nation.

It will meet there with a Judgment that will certainly eſtabliſh it, if it be for the Intereſt of the King and Kingdom; but if for the enlarging of this great Company, it will meet with the common fate of projecting Patents, againſt the intereſt of the King and Subject.

It is a mighty argument for the reputation of this Patent had with the Parliament, and the opinion they had of it, by taxing their Capital-Stock, at 20*s. per Cent.*

So they do reputed Eſquires, at 5 l. by the head.

Sollicitors, Attorneys, and oppreſſive Uſurers, have the like eſteem with this Act of Parliament.

Stat. 3 Jac. cap. 6. This Statute is but declaratory of the Common Law, and made to avoid queſtions and ſuits in Law; which might be occaſioned by Charters of impropriating the trade of Spain and Portugal, and then in making for the trade of France.

If the miſchiefs recited in that Statute, and the evils happening to England and the King's ſubjects be true, without all heſitation;

Thoſe Charters mentioned in that Statute, and condemned by that Statute, were not only grievous, but illegal, and Monopolies.

It appropriating the trade of theſe Dominions to few Merchants, and excluding all other his Majeſty's ſubjects from the trade;

Debarring the King's ſubjects in England, from that free and common traffick, which his ſubjects in Ireland and Scotland had;

To the manifeſt impoveriſhing of Maſters, Owners of Ships, Mariners, Fiſhermen, Clothiers, Tuckers, Spinſters, and many thouſands of handicrafts men.

The decreaſe of his Majeſty's Cuſtoms, Subſidies, and other Impoſitions.

The ruin and decay of Navigation.

The abating of the prices of our Wool, Cloth, Corn, and ſuch like commodities.

The enhancing of all French and Spaniſh commodities, that all Owners and Mariners, with divers others, ſhall be cut off from their ordinary means of maintenance, and preſerving their eſtates.

And all French and Spaniſh commodities, ſhall be in a few hands.

To the hurt and prejudice of all the ſubjects; therefore enacts, it ſhall be lawful for all his Majeſty's ſubjects in England and Wales, to have free liberty to trade into, and from Spain, France and Portugal, in ſuch ſort as was accuſtomed at any time in his Majeſty's time.

Stat. 4 Jac. cap. 9. Made to confirm the Charter to the Company of Exeter Merchants, upon ſingular reaſons recited in the Act of Parliament, declaring the Stat. 30 Jac. cap. 6. ſhould not impeach that Charter, being for publick good.

Stat. 45 Ed. III. cap. 4. That no impoſition ſhall be charged upon Wool in no ſort, without the aſſent of the Parliament: this Stat. was not made out of neceſſity, for it was the Common Law; yet it was thought fit by the Parliament at that time, to declare the Law by an Act of Parliament.

Stat. 1 H. IV. cap. 16, 17. Againſt Letters Patent made to ingroſs trades, &c.

So ancient was the Monopoly, and ingroſſing of trades by illegal Letters Patent.

When illegal things turn to a grievance, 'tis uſual to ſuppreſs them by Acts of Parliament, and not to leave their Judgment to the ordinary Courts of Juſtice, without declaration firſt had in Parliament.

Stat. 21 Jac. cap. 3. This Statute takes notice, tho' the King's Diſpoſition, Judgment and Declaration was, that all Monopolies were againſt Law; and that no ſuitors ſhould move for ſuch Grants, yet upon miſinformations and untrue pretences of publick good, many ſuch Grants have been unduly obtained, and unlawfully put in execution to the great grievance and inconvenience of the ſubject, contrary to the Laws of the Realm.

For the avoiding whereof, that Statute is made againſt all Grants to any perſon or perſons, bodies politick or corporate, of any Monopoly; and declares the ſame illegal.

This Statute doth quadrate with the deſcription of a Monopoly.

So doth the Eaſt-India Company's Charter in all its points and parts, and in the exerciſe of it, quadrate with theſe Monopolies, and their deſcriptions in our Law-Books and Caſes;

With my Lord Coke's deſcription of a Monopoly, in his 3*d Inſt. cap.* Monopolies.

If Mr. Sandys be pictured in Mr. Attorney's argument, I take it the Eaſt-India Charter is pictured in this Statute.

The Act of Tunnage and Poundage, 12 Car. II. ſays, The Commons in Parliament repoſing truſt and confidence in your Majeſty, in and for the ſafe-guard of the ſeas, againſt all perſons intending, or that ſhall intend the diſturbance of your Commons, in the intercourſe of trade, and the invading of this your Realm; give and grant for every Tun of Wine of the growth of France, that ſhall come into the Port of London, by your natural-born ſubjects, 4 l. 10*s.* by ſtrangers and aliens, 6 l.

The like notice taken of Poundage, to be paid by ſubjects and aliens.

Fol. 67. Rates in Wares, Silks imported in Ships Engliſh built, directly from the Eaſt-Indies, the pound weight containing ſixteen ounces; Subſidy duty 15*s.*

Of the Manufacture of Italy, imported from thence in Engliſh built Ships, the pound weight containing ſixteen ounces; Duty 1 l. 13*s.* 4*d.*

This Act diſtinguiſhes between Subjects and Alien Importers, between Engliſh and Foreign Ships, not between the Eaſt-India Company only, and Aliens: ſhall this Law made for England, be now appropriated to this Company, and the reſt of England excluded by this Grant againſt this Statute?

This Law is made for all the King's ſubjects and their Engliſh-built Ships.

The conſideration of this Subſidy moves from all the ſubjects, the Grant is by all, and the benefit ought to be for all the ſubjects of England.

The Law is the ſame as to foreign importation from the Indies, as to importation from Italy, to which this Company doth not pretend.

The

The Act for incouragement and increaſing of Shipping for Navigation, 12 Car. II. the beſt Law that ever was made for England in that Parliament, except the Laws for the prerogative:

The Proviſo in it follows: Provided, that this Act, nor any thing therein contained, extend not, or be meant to reſtrain the importing of any Eaſt-India commodities, laden in Engliſh-built ſhips; and whereof the Maſter and three fourths of the Mariners at leaſt are Engliſh, from the uſual place or places of loading them, in any part of the ſeas, to the Southward or Eaſtward of Cabo Bona Speranza, although the ſaid parts be not the places of their growth.

This Law made for the increaſe of Engliſh Shipping and Navigation, doth this Company invade and appropriate this Shipping and Navigation to themſelves, by excluding all other Engliſh ſubjects.

Is this for increaſe or decreaſe of Engliſh Shipping and Navigation, to confine it to few hands, excluding many?

There is neither Common nor Statute Law can hold this Company.

I hope the Judgment of this Court will bind them; and that this Act of Parliament will prevail againſt this Company.

The Proviſo is for all Engliſhmen to carry in all Engliſh-built Ships, any Eaſt-India commodities brought from Infidels.

The Charter ſays, this Company, and the Ships and their men ſhall only carry; which ſhall prevail, the Act of Parliament or the Charter? Theſe laſt mention'd Acts of Parliament diſtinguiſh between Subjects and Alien Importers, between Engliſh and Foreign Ships.

Not between the Eaſt-India Company only, and Aliens: ſhall theſe Laws made for England, be now appropriated to this Company?

Shall they have the benefit of it? Can the King's Grant take from his ſubjects, the advantages given by Acts of Parliament, and appropriate to ſome, what is granted to all?

I crave leave to obſerve ſome things, by way of anſwer to Mr. Attorney's poſitions and inferences in his argument yeſterday.

He diſtinguiſhes between inland and foreign trade, he did allow the ſubject the benefit of a home trade without reſtraint.

That the Husbandman might plough.

That one Engliſhman might privately ſell to another by the Common Law, without licence from the Crown.

Yet one ſubject could not buy, ſell, or trade with another publickly in an open fair or market, without licence from the Crown, and this for the preſervation of the peace, to prevent publick aſſemblies and meetings: And that no Fair or Market could be kept, but by licence from the Crown.

I think there are Fairs, Markets and Corporations in England by preſcription, and their beginning is not known, and ſuch are allowed by Law.

And preſcriptions are compared to the head of Nile, which could never be diſcovered.

And that ſuch ancient preſcriptions are as ancient as the Grants of Kings or Inhabitants in the World.

And for foreign trade: He laid it down for a poſition, that no ſubject could trade abroad without the King's licence in any part of the Chriſtian World.

I do not find any authority for this, practice is againſt it.

The reſt of the Counſel that argued for the Company did not inſiſt upon it; nay, they did ſeem to admit a trade for Engliſh Merchants with Alien Chriſtians, without the King's licence.

This is againſt the authority of F. N. Br. 85. Dyer 165, 296. againſt Lord Coke's opinion, Roll. Rep. Taylor's of Ipſwich, Stat. 9 H. III. cap. 30. Magna Charta, 2 E. III. cap. 9. 18 E. III. cap. 3. 25 E. III. cap. 2. 38 E. III. cap. 2. 5 R. II. cap. 2. 12 H. VII. cap. 16.

Stat. 26 H. VIII. cap. 10. Raſtall 566. which gives the King for a limited time, power to licence trade and traders in ſome meaſure, in ſome parts, in ſome commodities. Vide the Statute.

His diſtinction for Merchants to trade, without coming to the Staple: and therein he diſtinguiſhes between Merchants and Traders, who are obliged to come to the Staple.

What warrant hath he for this diſtinction? The prayer of the Commons to the King in Parliament: the petitions of Merchants to the King: the King's reſtraint of Merchants in their trade, notſtanding Acts of Parliament: the continuing of the Staple, notwithſtanding Acts of Parliament ſeeming to the contrary, give him a handle for this argument.

1 H. V. 7. The prayer of the Commons to the King, to ſend foreign Merchants out of the Kingdom: the King's anſwer, Roy adviſera. 2 H. V. cap. 5.

Thoſe were Bills in Parliament preſented to the King for the royal aſſent; ſo were many of the Rolls of thoſe ages, preſented to the Kings for their royal aſſent, eſpecially in things which any way concerned the King in his prerogative.

The Commons did not demand their rights in their Bills, but by Petition claim their right.

Such anſwers of Roy adviſera, are no argument againſt the right of the ſubject.

Neither is the petition or prayer of the Commons in Parliament, in any matter that is their right, to the Crown, any argument againſt their right.

This was the uſual method, and ancient courſe of preſenting Acts of Parliament to the Kings, eſpecially in Rich. II's time; H. IV. and part of H. V. then corrected upon ſome complaints in Parliament, tempore H. V. and H. VI. which may be read at large in the Rolls of Parliament.

It is their uſual way to ſecure their right thus, ſo is the Petition of Right in Car. I.

The Prince's caſe, Co. Tit. 8. fol. 19. ſhews the various forms of Acts of Parliament, in the ſeveral reigns of Kings, ſometimes by way of Grants, &c.

That the Staple did continue till loſt, by the loſs of Calais.

Stat. 2 E. III. cap. 9. That the Staples beyond the ſeas, and on this ſide the ſeas, ordained by Kings in times paſt, and the pains thereupon provided ſhall ceaſe, &c.

This Statute took away the Staples ſet up by the Kings.

But there was a Staple ſet up by Act of Parliament, and reformed and altered by ſeveral Acts of Parliament, did continue notwithſtanding the Act of 2 E. III.

But Engliſh Merchants are not within any of thoſe Statutes, or the meaning of them.

And

And I do not find that Mr. Attorney gives any account how theſe Staples were taken away by Law, but vaniſhed at the taking of Calais; he hath not told us the beginning or ending of the Staple by Law, I know no common Law for them, or his diſtinction.

Rolls Abr. Prerogative, Title Proclamation, pl. 6. 27 E. III. by the Statute of the Staple, it was ordained, that Merchants Aliens might bring from beyond ſeas, merchandize of the Staple, but not Merchants Denizens.

Becauſe Merchants Denizens doubted to be impeached in time to come for their merchandize, which they paſſed by virtue of ſuch Grant and Proclamation, foraſmuch as they were made out of Parliament.

Ideò it is granted in Parliament, 34 E. III. cap. 2. Stat. 5 R. II. cap. 2. This Statute prohibits the exportation of Gold or Silver, and that no perſon other than Lords and great Men of the Realm, true and notable Merchants, and the King's ſoldiers, go out of the Realm, without the King's licence.

This is declared to be after publication of this ordinance, which implies ſuch licence was not neceſſary before the making of this Statute.

Mr. Attorney was pleaſed to allow, licences to particular perſons to trade were not revokable; but Companies having ſuch licences may be diſſolved by Quo Warranto.

Therefore more ſafe to fix trade in Companies than perſons.

Then doth this Charter do the greater wrong to particular perſons, who by Law may have ſuch licences which cannot be taken from them.

And it doth not appear, but Sandys hath ſuch licence, or may have, and ought not to be reſtrained therein by any Grant.

Mr. Attorney did turn this matter upon a queſtion of fact, which will, or will not make this Company and their Grant a Monopoly.

Viz. Whether this Company and their Grant be a publick good and advantage to the trade of England.

This is a matter not to be decided in this Court, I ſuppoſe, and we cannot come at this queſtion in this caſe; therefore not fit, ſafe or wiſe to determine the Law in this caſe, till the fact be cleared and ſettled, and that in ſuch a Judicature where this queſtion may be determined and ſettled, and the Law thereupon declared and eſtabliſhed.

It appears to the Court, there are many illegal things in this Grant.

That the Grant is a reſtraint to the trade of Engliſh Merchants.

That it is a new Grant.

That it may be dangerous to eſtabliſh ſuch Grants by Judgment in a Court of Law.

That there are ſome things in the Canary Patent, in Darcy's Patent, nay, in the Patent for ſweet wines, that were commendable and uſeful; yet that little good did not prevail, but the whole periſhed, and was poiſoned in the Monopoly of thoſe Grants.

It is adviſeable how this Court, in this action, can adjudge for the Plaintiffs upon this Record, where the whole Grant is ſet forth upon Record in pleading; and it appearing to the Court, that ſome parts of this Grant are manifeſtly illegal, and may occaſion oppreſſion to the ſubject, and that the beſt parts of this Grant are doubtful, if good or uſeful for England, or the trade of it:

It cannot appear upon this Roll, for what part of this Grant, the Court ſhall adjudge for the Plaintiffs, and againſt the Defendant.

And it cannot appear what part of it doth appear to the Court to be illegal.

This may turn to a precedent for the whole Grant in after-ages, ſince we judge by precedents: And this precedent may occaſion more Monopoly Patents, and this Judgment give them ſanction.

As for the ſecond point in this caſe; whether this action be maintainable by the Company againſt the Defendant Sandys, admitting their Grant to be good:

1. To allow ſuch an action in a Court of Law for this Company againſt a ſingle ſubject, will be to give them opportunity to ruin any ſubject, that ſhall oppoſe them in trade.

They that are too great for all other Companies in England, muſt be too ſtrong for any private ſubject in conteſt.

2. If their Grant be a legal Grant, they have ſufficient pains and penalties in it to reduce any perſon to compliance with their Grant, without the aid of actions in Weſtminſter-hall.

And the Grant which makes them a Company, and doth conſtitute them and their power, doth direct the remedies, ways and methods to ſupport and maintain them in their Power and Company, in all the things granted them; and there being no remedy given them by action, I think it may be hard to adjudge, that an action will lie for them in this caſe againſt the Defendant.

In caſes of new Injuries created by Grants, or by Act of Parliament, and Remedies created to repair ſuch Injuries in the Grants and Acts that create them, ſuch remedies are to be purſued, and not new remedies to be given in Courts for ſuch new created Injuries.

This is an action brought upon the Grant, where no ſuch remedy is provided by the Grant, and other penalties are provided by the Grant.

The Grant directs and gives forfeiture of all the goods imported againſt it, and the Ship wherein they are imported; but the Grant doth not expreſs the offender to anſwer damages to the Company, which is required by this action, and no ſpecial damages are laid in the declaration.

This is like a penal Statute, which creates an offence, and adds a penalty.

The party ought to ſue for ſuch penalties, and not to ſue for damages in an action upon the caſe.

This may be the caſe upon the Statute, 2 E. VI. for tithes, it gives debt and no damages; ſo the caſe doth not lie upon that Statute.

Upon the Statute for forcible entries, and upon all other penal laws, which give penalties by ſingle, double, or treble damages;

It was never practiſed to bring actions upon the caſe, upon ſuch Statutes, unleſs in Darcy's caſe, which action miſcarried, Moor 671.

I humbly conceive this action is not like actions upon the Cuſtom of London, or upon Duties to the City of London, which have been brought by way of Indebitatns for the duty.

In all theſe caſes there was a certain duty created by the Grant, Cuſtom or Charter, which made the party Debtor to the Corporation; but in this caſe here is no duty created.

Only an injury declared, and a penalty directed, which ought not to be turned to an action upon the caſe, in my opinion.

I hope the Court will not make a precedent, for the Company to multiply actions, againſt all perſons that they conceive to be interlopers or aggreſſors upon their Grant, Company or Trade.

There is no ſpecial damages laid in the declaration to accrue to the Company:

Only in general, that the Defendant, contrary to the form and effect of theſe Letters Patent, did trade within the limits of their Grant, without licence of the Company, with a Ship called the Expectation, to the prejudice of the Company.

Williams's caſe, 2 Co. 5. fol. 72. Defendant being Vicar of Alderbury in Com. Salop. is obliged by himſelf, or his Chaplain, to celebrate divine ſervice at Woolaſton, and within the pariſh of Alderbury every Sunday, and to adminiſter the ſacrament to the Plaintiff, his ſervants and tenants within his ſaid Manor, time out of mind.

And that the Defendant had not celebrated divine ſervice, or adminiſtred the ſacrament to the Plaintiff, his ſervants and tenants for a certain time, ad damnum of the Plaintiff. Non cul. pleaded, verdict for the Plaintiff, moved in arreſt of Judgment, that an action upon the caſe doth not lie. Had this been a private Chapel for himſelf and family, an action upon the caſe had lain; for then no other perſon could have brought an action but himſelf, his ſervants could not.

But in this action, his tenants might bring their actions.

Which may occaſion multitudes of ſuits, for one default in the Plaintiff.

The ſame may happen in this caſe; every Member of this Company may bring the like action againſt this Defendant.

And as in that caſe the Plaintiff had not his remedy in the Eccleſiaſtical Court;

So hath the Company their remedy, as the King had againſt offenders, in trade without licence.

If licence was neceſſary by Law, by contempt to his royal prerogative, or proclamation;

Compare it to the caſe of a nuſance in the highway, no action lies for it, without ſpecial damages.

They do not aver in the declaration, that this trade cannot be managed without their Company.

If there be any legal puniſhment provided for ſuch offenders, ſuch puniſhments are to be purſued, and not new remedies by actions created, to the grievance and oppreſſion of the ſubject.

Williams's caſe, 5 Co. p. 72. Mary's caſe, lib. 9. publicum damnum is not to be reformed by action upon the caſe, but by publick proceedings, by indictment; or the like caſe lies pro privato damno.

The proceeding of the Company in this action, is ſuppoſed to be to right the publick in the name of the Company; not for the reparation of private damage, but to repair the publick in their Company.

The Company is in the nature of the late fancy'd Cuſtodes Libertatis Angliæ; a notion to ſerve the publick as they would have it.

And not to be uſed to recover damages for private injuries, but to ſupport and ſave the trade in publick actions.

This Charter reſtrains the King in his prerogative, the Kingdom in its trade, the ſubjects in their freedom to trade; the King is concerned in his revenue, the ſubject in his right in this queſtion.

What the Company cannot accompliſh by the forfeitures, powers and penalties of their Charter; they deſign to eſtabliſh by the Judgment of the Court, in this action for the Company.

I know the Juſtice of this Court is ſuperior to this Company, and it is placed in ſafer and better hands than trade or regulation of it in the Company for England.

I therefore pray your Judgment againſt the Company, and their action, for the Defendant.

Term. Hill. 36 & 37 Car. II.

This Term the Judges * delivered their opinions ſeriatim in this great caſe. Walcot was but ſhort, and his reaſons being included in thoſe of Holloway's, &c. who ſpoke after, I have omitted them, to avoid repetition.

Holloway ſaid, all might be reduced to one ſingle point, which was, whether the Charter granting a ſole trade to this Company, excluſive to all other, be good.

That this was a great point, both in regard of the King's prerogative, and the People's liberty.

He divided all trade, ut ſupra was done per Sawyer Attorney-General.

Foreign trade with Chriſtians, hath been open'd by ſeveral Acts of Parliament; and at Common Law 'twas an inherent prerogative in the Crown, that none ſhou'd trade with foreigners without the King's licence. And the King having this prerogative at Common Law, an Act of Parliament is neceſſary to diveſt him of it; which none hath done but to ſome particular places.

Michelborne's caſe, cited by thoſe that argued for the Company, hath not in any ſort been anſwer'd by the other ſide.

This is a trade not to be carried on but by a Company; and none can erect a Company but the King.

The King hath the ſole power of this trade, as of war and peace; and by declaring a war, he may determine a publick trade, tho' ſettled by Act of Parliament.

No Parliament ever look'd on this as a Monopoly, nay, ſo far from it, as in the 14 Car. II. cap. 24. this Company, &c. are ſaid to be an advantage to the publick; and that Act was made, that the perſons of this Company, &c. ſhould not be diſcouraged in thoſe honourable endeavours, for promoting publick undertakings; then how can this be a Monopoly?

It never hath been queſtioned as ſuch by Parliament, though they have look'd narrowly into the King's prerogative, even to the queſtioning ſome things that were his undoubted right; and concludes pro Quer.

Withins. Here are two points;

Firſt, Whether Letters Patent giving a ſole trade to a Company, excluſive to others, be good?

Secondly, Whether, in caſe if they be good, an action lies?

He thinks there is but one queſtion, and that whether the action will lie or not, as the Company hath an intereſt or not. For if they have an intereſt by theſe Letters Patent, then the action will unqueſtionably lie.

The

* Skinner's Reports, p. 223, 224, 225, 226.

The case depending solely on foreign trade with Infidels, he shall apply to that, and not meddle with inland trade.

'Tis is a great point as to the King's prerogative, and the people's liberty.

First, He takes it, that by the Common Law the King has a prerogative to restrain all his subjects from going beyond sea, as F. N. B. 85. 'Tis true F. says, every subject may go out of the Realm to merchandize, &c. but that is to be understood, he shall not be punish'd for so doing, but the King may prohibit him, as appears by the same Book; and that three ways, (i. e.) by the Great Seal, the Privy-Seal or Signet, or by Proclamation. And tho' in Dyer 165. cited by Mr. Williams, 'tis said, that before R. II. subjects may go beyond sea, yet 'tis there agreed, the King may prohibit; and a quære is made, if a going over without a licence be not a contempt, though there was no prohibition. Afterwards in the same Book 296. 'tis holden such departure before express prohibition is no contempt; but all the Books say, when there is a prohibition, then it is a contempt.

As none may go against, or without the King's licence; so if they are gone, the King may recal them, as appears by Dyer 375.

'Tis objected, the King may prohibit some particular persons by writ; but he cannot prohibit all his subjects.

Answered, There are several ways of prohibiting by writ, which is directed to particular persons; and by proclamation, which is general.

And all the King's subjects are bound to take notice of the King's Great-Seal and Privy-Seal.

Secondly, The King hath the controuling power over all trade with Infidels; he may say, over all foreign trade in general: he saith, Michelborne's case goes farther than Fitzherbert's N. B. and he hath not heard any authority offer'd against Michelborne's case, as to trade with Infidels; and the opinion in that case seems to be given upon such a question as this. So that 'tis the judgment of the Court in a like case, for he who was then Chief-Justice deliver'd it, and none of the Court oppos'd it.

The prerogative of making leagues is in the King, and he may make them as he pleases; then it wou'd be hard, the Law shou'd give the King a power to make leagues, and yet the subjects should have a right to do such things to break them. But though the subjects may not trade with Infidels, yet the King may license them, or trade himself; as the Jews were prohibited commerce with the Nations, yet Solomon traded with Hiram King of Tyre for Gold.

The several Licences and Petitions, cited and shewn by the Plaintiffs Counsel, tho' they prove no right in the Crown, yet are evidences of it; for to what purpose shou'd there be so many licences from the Crown, and petitions from the Commons to the King, for liberty to trade, unless the King had such a right? Therefore, unless where the Parliament hath open'd it, the King hath power to controul all foreign trade, especially with Infidels.

Objection. But though the King had such right, yet now the prohibiting part of the Patent is void by the Statute of E. III. which is pleaded; and the enabling part of the Patent is void by the Statute of Monopolies.

Answer. As to the first, that Statute relates not to this trade.

First, Because no such trade then in being; so that the Parliament could have no regard to it, unless by prophecy, neither could they know whether it would prove hurtful or beneficial to the Kingdom. But take the Act at the largest, yet you must take it to relate to the subject matter, which was for Wool; so that the words shall be open, may be taken free from Custom, and to have no other impositions upon them.

As to the second, whether a Monopoly; he says, a Monopoly is no Immoral Act, but only against the politick part of our Law; which if it happen to be of advantage to the publick, as this trade is, then it ceases also to be against the prohibiting part of the Law, and so not within the Law of Monopolies.

The Company hath been in possession of this trade near one hundred years, and that possession will in time give a right; and cited Grotius de Jure Pacis, &c. and concludes pro Quer.

PLEA.

1. DEfendant demands Oyer of the Letters Patent which are set forth in hæc verba: In which (as it hath been observ'd) the penalty of forfeiture of ship and goods, one moiety to the King, and the other to the Company, and imprisonment, is omitted.

2. There is a clause, that the Company may license strangers or others, and that the King will not without the consent of the Company give licences, &c.

3. That none shall have a Vote in the General Assembly, but he that hath 500*l.* Stock.

4. And there is another clause, which hath not been mention'd by the Counsel on either side; that if it shou'd hereafter appear to his Majesty or his successors, that that Grant, or the continuance thereof, shall not be profitable to his Majesty, his heirs, and successors, or to this Realm, that after three years warning under the Privy Seal or Sign Manual, the same shou'd be utterly void.

For Plea, the Defendant says, by an Act of Parliament, made 15 E. III. it is enacted, that the sea shall be open for all Merhants to pass with their merchandizes where they please; and that the Defendant by virtue of that Act, and according to the Common Law of England, did traffick within those places mention'd in the declaration, without any licence, and against the will of the Company, as the Plaintiffs have declar'd, prout ei bene licuit.

Plaintiff demurrs.

In the debate of this case, at the bar, there were several matters discours'd of; but at length by the conſent of both ſides, as I apprehend, the caſe was reſolv'd into theſe two points.

1. Whether theſe Letters Patent giving or granting licence or liberty to the Plaintiffs, to exerciſe the ſole trade to the Indies, within the limits of their Grant, with prohibition to all others, be good in Law?

2. Admitting the Grant good, whether this action be maintainable for the Plaintiffs?

Now to let me into the debate of theſe two points: I think not amiſs to remember ſome things that have been mention'd by the Counſel, that I think are no ways in queſtion.

I. At this time I conceive, therefore, that whether the King may prohibit his ſubjects from going beyond ſeas by writ or otherwiſe, by his abſolute prerogative, without giving any reaſon, is not the queſtion; nor ſure was it ever thought a queſtion, till it was lately ſtirr'd at the bar. For the writ in Fitz. N. B. 85. and the Regiſter import no ſuch thing; and our Books ſay, the ſurmiſes mention'd in thoſe writs are not traverſable: ſo is Dyer 165, & 296. For ſurely the King may reſtrain his ſubjects from going beyond ſea, and is not bound to give any reaſon for his ſo doing; but that is not now in queſtion.

II. In the next place, I do not conceive there is any difference (tho' much diſcourſe hath been about Indians and Infidels) whether the Eaſt-Indies were, at the time of the Grant of this Patent, inhabited by Chriſtians or Infidels; tho' by the way, in the debating of this caſe, I ſhall ſhew perhaps that matter may in ſome meaſure affect the Defendant, but will not at all affect the Grant to the Plaintiffs. So that I conceive, that whether this country or place, or any other inhabited by Chriſtians or Infidels, that is not otherwiſe provided for by Act of Parliament, will make but the ſame queſtion.

III. Whether every clauſe and article in theſe Letters Patent, viz. touching forfeiture of ſhip and goods, impriſonments, or divers other clauſes contain'd in the Charter, be legal or not, is not now in queſtion. For ſurely it would be hard to maintain them all, and therefore the Plaintiffs Counſel have avoided thoſe queſtions, by bringing this action; and tho' the Defendant's Counſel have mentioned them, yet ſurely it was only intended to ſully the cauſe, and not that they thought them to affect the queſtion.

IV. Nor is it the queſtion, whether by this Grant to the Plaintiffs, the King has fetter'd or confin'd his prerogative, by putting in a covenant to exclude himſelf from granting licences to others of his ſubjects, to trade within the limits of the Plaintiffs Charter; tho' Mr. Williams (always a friend to the King's prerogative) in tenderneſs and care thereof, ſeem'd to be ſurpriz'd by the inconſiderate extravagancy of the Grant; and wou'd have us believe, that he was afflicted with the diſmal conſequences that muſt neceſſarily enſue by the King's parting with ſo great a prerogative; and that either by the advice, conſent, or the inadvertency of his Attorney-General, and the reſt of his Counſel, by having a greater regard to the Eaſt-India Company for the ſake of their money, than they had to the King in diſcharge of their duty. To acquit them and us, therefore, of that dilemma, I am of opinion, though it makes nothing to the queſtion that is now before us, the King may grant licences to any of his ſubjects to trade to the Eaſt-Indies, notwithſtanding the Charter, or any article, clauſe or condition therein contain'd, to the contrary; and notwithſtanding any caution or advertiſement, that in his argument he gave to the King, or his reflection that he made upon his Counſel, either for their ignorance or haſty inadvertency in the paſſing of that Grant. And I am the rather induc'd to be of that perſuaſion, for that the moſt learned of our Profeſſion whoſe opinions have been quoted by him and others that have argu'd on the Defendant's ſide, were then of the King's Counſel, and were privy to, and advis'd both theſe Letters Patent, and all others of the like nature, that have been granted for theſe hundred years laſt paſt. I therefore think fit to ſay, that I believe Mr. Attorney-General, and the reſt of the King's Counſel, have diſcharged their duty as well to the King, by maintaining of this Grant, as Mr. Williams has in this inſtance manifeſted his loyalty, by endeavouring to deſtroy it. In ſhort therefore, as I ſaid before, every clauſe in this Charter is not to be maintain'd, and therefore is not to affect the queſtion now to be determin'd.

V. Whereas it has been objected, that though upon the pleadings it is agreed, that the Defendant never was a member of the Eaſt-India Company, nor had any licence from them to trade to the Indies, yet he might have a licence from the King; which, as I conceive, the King is not debarr'd to grant by any clauſe in the Letters Patent; yet I am of opinion, that if the Defendant had any ſuch licence, it ought to have been ſhewn on his part, which not being done, it ought to be taken by us, as I believe the truth of the fact is, the Defendant never had any ſuch licence.

VI. It was obſerv'd, that the Plaintiffs in their declaration had alledged, that this trade cou'd not be managed but per hujuſmodi Corpus Corporatum; and by this means they had excluded the King from conſtituting any more Companies to trade within their limits, tho' perhaps the advantage of this Kingdom might hereafter require it. Nay, tho' the Indians might deſire a further treaty of commerce, or that the trade of theſe places might require more Companies to be erected; yet ſay they, this Grant hath made the Plaintiffs a mere Republick, and thereby has alter'd the conſtitution of England, in the management of trade by Commonwealths, by placing it in Companies, who (were they independent upon the Crown) are truly ſo call'd. Yet in as much as I did before obſerve, that the King is not by this Grant either excluded from making any new treaties with the Indians, or from making any Corporations, or granting any other licences to any of the reſt of his ſubjects, notwithſtanding any of the clauſes in the Charter; ſo I am of opinion that that objection alſo does not affect the queſtion now to be determin'd: and for that reaſon, amongſt others, I thought it not improper to mention that clauſe in the Charter that was omitted at the Bar, which the King has annexed as a condition to his Grant; that if it ſhould hereafter appear to his Majeſty or his ſucceſſors, that that Grant, or the continuance thereof, in the whole or in any part, ſhould not be profitable to his Majeſty, his heirs and ſucceſſors, or to this Realm; that after three years warning by warrant, under the King's ſeal or ſign manual, it ſhould be made utterly void. So that it appearing that the King hath neither diveſted himſelf of the power, nor at the time of the Grant did deſign to be prevented to ſhew his inclination for the promoting of the advantage of his Kingdom, has given himſelf ſcope enough to obviate all thoſe emergencies. Yet by

by the way I cannot but obſerve, that Mr. Williams, to ſhew his diſlike to a Commonwealth, declared it to be abſolutely oppoſite to the intereſt of a ſingle perſon; but the ſingle perſon he concern'd himſelf for, was not the King and his prerogative, but his Client the Defendant, and his trade; who, tho' I cannot in propriety of ſpeech call a Commonwealth, yet I cannot but think, this oppoſition of his ſeems to proceed from a Republican principle. For he by his interloping has been the firſt ſubject, that within this Kingdom for near an hundred years laſt paſt, hath in Weſtminſter-hall publickly oppoſed himſelf againſt the King's undoubted prerogative in the Grant now before us: and I hope, by this example, the reſt of his Majeſty's ſubjects will be deterr'd from the like diſobedience.

There were ſome other ſuperfluous objections made againſt the clauſes in the Charter, and againſt the formality of the pleadings, which I think not neceſſary to remember; and therefore having thus premiſed, I ſhall now deſcend to thoſe points I think only material in this cauſe.

1. The firſt and great point in this cauſe, is, whether this Grant of the ſole trade to the Indies, to the Eaſt-India Company excluſive of all others, be a good Grant in Law or not; and I am of opinion it is. And by the way, I cannot but make the ſame remark in this caſe, as my Lord Chief-Baron Fleming made in the great caſe of Bates in the Exchequer, Lane, fol. 27. that it is a great grace and eminent Act of condeſcenſion in the King to this Defendant, that he does permit this great point of his prerogative to be diſputed in Weſtminſter-hall; but by this he does ſufficiently ſignify to all his ſubjects, that he will perſiſt in nothing, tho' it ſeem never ſo much for his advantage, but according to the Laws of the land. I ſhall therefore endeavour to make it appear, that he is inveſted with this prerogative by the Law of this nation: but by the Law I do not only mean the cuſtomary Common Law or Statutes of this Realm, which are native and peculiar to this Nation, which, as Mr. Attorney well obſerved, are not adapted to this purpoſe. But ſuch other Laws alſo as be common to other Nations, as well as ours, and have been received and uſed time out of mind, by the King and People of England in divers caſes, and by ſuch ancient uſage are become the Laws of England in thoſe caſes; namely, the general Law of Nations, the Law-Merchant, the Imperial or Civil Law, every of which Laws, ſo far forth as the ſame have been receiv'd and us'd in England time out of mind, may be properly ſaid to be Laws of England.

And for the better communicating my thoughts upon this ſubject, I will proceed by theſe ſteps:

1. I will very briefly conſider of the inland trade within this Kingdom, and the foreign trade with other Nations; and therein obſerve, that the King's prerogative is concern'd in both, and that there is a great difference between both, allow'd by the Municipal Laws of this Kingdom.

2. I ſhall ſhew that the liberty of foreign trade may be reſtrain'd.

3. That foreign trade and commerce being introduc'd by the Law of Nations, ought to be govern'd and judg'd according to thoſe Laws.

4. That by the Laws of Nations, the regulation and reſtraint of trade and commerce is reckon'd inter Juris Regalia, i. e. the prerogative of the ſupreme Magiſtrate.

5. That tho' by the Laws of this Land, and by the Laws of all other Nations, Monopolies are prohibited, yet Societies to trade, ſuch as the Plaintiffs, to certain places excluſive of others, are no Monopolies by the Laws of this Land, but are allow'd to be erected both here, and in other countries, and are ſtrengthen'd by the uſage and practice of both, in all times.

6. I ſhall ſhew the authorities that are exant in our Books, together with precedents, and reaſons both publick and politick; for, as my Lord Fleming ſays, that ſuch reaſons are good directions for our judgment in ſuch caſes as theſe, being demonſtrations of the courſe of antiquity; and therein alſo obſerve the neceſſity and advantage of ſuch Societies, and by the way endeavour to anſwer the ſeveral Acts of Parliament, precedents and authorities, with all other the objections that have been made againſt my concluſion.

Firſt, then to conſider the difference between the inland and the foreign trade allow'd of in our Books, and that the King's prerogative doth affect both. As to manufactures, under which all ſorts of Artificers are concern'd, I think they remain with the moſt liberty by the Common Law; and, as Mr. Attorney obſerv'd, the publick weal is little concern'd therein, only to preſerve every one in the quiet enjoyment of the fruits of his own labour and induſtry, yet even in that the King's prerogative hath not been totally excluded: for as it is taken notice of in our Books, all things that are at this day enjoy'd by cuſtom or preſcription, had their commencement by royal Grant; and by that means no Artificer within the City of London can at this day uſe two trades, i. e. a Carpenter cannot uſe the trade of a Joyner, or a Bricklayer of a Plaiſterer.

2. As to the trade of merchandize or inland commerce, generally ſpeaking, it had the next freedom by the Common Law, but was ſubject nevertheleſs to be limited or reſtrain'd by the King's prerogative in ſeveral particulars; as for inſtance, to prevent all foreſtalling and ingroſſing. So Mr. Attorney did well obſerve, that numbers of people could not meet to traffick or merchandize, without being in danger of being puniſh'd as unlawful aſſemblies; the Crown therefore granted the liberties of Fairs and Markets, for the ſake of commerce and trade; all which did originally proceed from the Crown, and therefore by abuſing thoſe liberties may ſtill be forfeited to the Crown; and paſſing by all other inſtances, I ſhall only inſtance one, taken notice of in our Books, which well conſider'd may go a great way in the caſe at the bar. Regiſter, fol. 107. the King grants to the Abbot of Weſtminſter and his ſucceſſors, that they ſhould hold a Fair at Weſtminſter thirty odd days together, with a prohibition that no man ſhould buy or ſell within ſeven miles of that fair during that time; and the King does there command the Sheriffs of London by his writ, to ſeize the body of an inhabitant of Salisbury, for ſelling clothes in London within the time of the Fair. Now here is a Charter granted to a particular perſon excluſive of others, for a time ſubject to more objections than the Charter now in queſtion, yet approved of by our Books. Hence it came, that Corporations were erected, and trade confined to places and perſons excluſive of others; for all ſuch came originally from the Crown, and, as I ſaid before in the caſe of Fairs, ſo I may now ſay in the caſe of Corporations, that though they claim liberties and privileges by preſcription, yet theſe originally proceeded from the Crown, and are therefore forfeitable to the Crown: an eminent inſtance hereof, is that caſe of the City of London, for abuſing their liberties, which they claimed by preſcription, confirmed by divers Charters and Acts of Parliament; by Judgment of this Court, their liberties and franchiſes were ſeized into the King's hands, and therefore remain as a Vill to all intents and purpoſes, till his Majeſty ſhall be pleaſed of his bounty to reſtore them. Now that the inland traffick is moſt concern'd, either in Corporations, Markets or Fairs, which all proceed from the Crown; does plainly evince, that the King's prerogative has a more immediate influence over dealings in merchandizes, than it has over other mechanick crafts and myſteries: and that, as Mr. Attorney did well obſerve, to prevent frauds, deceits, and other abuſes either in weight, meaſures or otherwiſe, which would certainly interrupt ſuch commerce. But our Law goes yet a ſtep further, and allows further difference between inland merchandize and foreign, and allows a different way of determining controverſies that ariſe thereupon; the Common Law and Statutes of this Realm, allowing the Law-Merchant, which is part of the Law of Nations, ſhould decide ſuch controverſies. Decimo tertio H. IV. fol. 19. a complaint made to the King and Council of ſome goods taken away from a Merchant; it was moved in that caſe, that the matter might be determined at the Common Law: but the Lord-Chancellor ſaid, that the ſuit being brought by a Merchant, who is not bound to ſue according to the Common Law, to have his cauſe tried by twelve men, and to obſerve the other ſolemnities of our Law; but ſhall ſue in Chancery according to the Law of Nature, which is the Univerſal Law of the World. And it is in that caſe agreed by all the Judges, that if foreign merchandize were ſtol'n or waifed, they could not be ſeized, as other Engliſh merchandizes might be by the rule of the Common Law, as waifs and ſtrays: which ſhews plainly there is a difference in the conſideration of our Law, between foreign merchandizes that croſs the ſeas, and other inland goods and commodities. If two Merchants be partners in merchandizes, one ſhall have an action of accompt againſt the other, ſecundum Legem Mercatoriam, ſays the Regiſter, fol. 135. and F. N. B. 117. D. And yet by the rule of the Common Law, if two men be jointly poſſeſſed of other goods, which are no merchandize, the one cannot bring an action of account againſt the other; if one of the Merchants die, the Executor may bring his account againſt the ſurviver, for his moiety, Reg. 135. F. N. B. 177. But if it were a copartnerſhip for other goods, it would ſurvive per jus accreſcendi, according to the rules of the Common Law.

In an action of Debt upon a ſimple Contract, the Defendant may wage his Law; but it is otherwiſe in a Contract about Merchandize, in Lane's Reports Bates's Caſe agreed, Reg. 260. A. at Common Law, the Goods of Eccleſiaſtical Perſons were excuſed from toll; but ſays the Writ, Dum tamen Merchandizas aliquas non exercitat de iiſdem. It ſhews, that when they fall under another conſideration; if one man wrongs another man of his Goods, here an action of Treſpaſs will lie: But if a Merchant's Goods be taken upon or beyond the Seas, there muſt be a Writ of Reprizal to obtain ſatisfaction; the Parl. Roll. 3 Ed. 1. M. 19. in Archivis Turris Londini, where the bailiffs of Southampton are commanded by Writ, quod omnes Mercatores Leodienſes ad partes Angliæ accidentes per bona & catalla ſua diſtringantur ſecundum Legem Mercatoriam & Conſuetudinem Regni, ad ſatisfaciendum Mercatoribus Florentinis, &c. Where, by the way obſerve, that Lex Mercatoria, which differs from the ordinary Common Law, is ſaid to be Conſuetudo regni Angliæ; by which we may obſerve, that foreign merchandizes and trades differ from others in the eye of Law, even by the allowance of Common Law it ſelf.

Several Acts of Parliament have been alſo made for the more ſpeedy recovery of debts contracted for merchandizes, as the Statute of Acton Burnel, the Statute de Mercatoribus, and the Statute Viceſimo Septimo Ed. 3. cap. 2. amongſt other things it is enacted, That for Merchandizes taken away, the Party ſhall be arreſted, and ſpeedy and ready Proceſs ſhall be againſt him from day to day, and from hour to hour, according to the Law Merchant, and not at the Common Law. So the Statute for erecting the Court of Inſurance, deſigned for the ſpeedy eaſe of Merchants, has left the determination, according to the Law of Merchants; and therefore hath ordered the Judge of the Admiralty Court always to preſide in thoſe commiſſions. By all which I think I may fairly conclude, there is a great difference allowed of, between the inland and foreign commerce; and that,

2. I ſhall endeavour to prove, that the liberty of foreign trade may be reſtrained.

And here I muſt premiſe, that as at firſt all things were promiſcuouſly common and undivided to all, ſo the free exerciſe of this univerſal right, was then inſtead of property; but as ſoon as the number of men increaſed, and they found by experience the inconveniency of holding all things in common, things were reduced into property by agreement and compact; either expreſs, as by partition; or implied, by premier Occupancy.

After this Government was eſtabliſhed, and laws were made, even for the ordering thoſe things to which no man had any right; as for example, deſarts, places uninhabited, iſlands in the ſeas, wild beaſts, fiſhes, and birds; the former were uſually gained and diſpoſed of, by him that had the ſovereignty over the People; the latter by him that had the dominion over the Lands and Waters, who might forbid all others from hunting, fiſhing, &c.

And in virtue of this univerſal Law, his Majeſty and his Predeceſſors have always diſpoſed of the ſeveral Plantations abroad, that have been diſcovered or gained by any of their ſubjects, and may do for the future, in caſe any other be diſcovered and acquired. For tho' the laws of Nations can command nothing which the law of Nature forbids, yet they may bound and circumſcribe that which the Law of Nature leaves free, and forbid that which naturally may be lawful. Now to apply this to our preſent purpoſe of trade and commerce, Mr. Williams quoted that common ſaying, Commercia debent eſſe libera; from whence he infers, that by the law of Nature and Nations, the ſea and trade, and traffick ought to be free as the air; and for that he has cited Grotius de Jure Belli ac Pacis, cap. 3. Welwood's Abridgm. of the ſea-laws, in his Epiſtle to the Lord Admiral; Grotius de Mari libero, where he ſays, Mare & Littora Maris Jure Gentium ſunt communia. Britton, cap. 33. De purchaſ. le Mere & le air ſunt thores Common; Sir John Burrough his Sovereignty of the ſeas; Baldus de rerum Dominiis. But I think none of thoſe Books can warrant his concluſion; for ſurely that expreſſion, Commercia ſunt libera, cannot poſſibly be underſtood in ſuch

a literal ſenſe, That every man in every Nation ſhould be at liberty to trade, either in what commodities, or to what place, or at what time ſoever he ſhall think fit. For I took it to be granted by all that argued for the Defendant, that trade and commerce muſt be ſubject to ſome laws; and Grotius, in his Book de Mari libero, propoſes this main deſign, to prove, that any one Nation had not power to hinder another Nation from free commerce; and that the Spaniards therefore had no right to prohibit the Dutch from trading into ſuch parts of the Indies, whereof the Spaniards were not poſſeſſed, upon pretence that they had the dominion of thoſe ſeas: Inter nos & Hiſpanos, ſays he, hæc controverſia eſt, ſitne immenſum & vaſtum Mare regni unius nec maritimi acceſſio? Populóne unquam jus ſit volentes populos probibere ne vendant, ne permutent, ne denique commeent inter ſeſe. And for the benefit of his Countrymen he doth therefore aſſert, licere cuivis genti quamvis alteram adire, cumque ea negotiare; which, taking that to be true, which by the law of Nations is certainly otherwiſe, yet nothing can be inferred from thence, but only the queſtion of commerce between one Nation and another. And how that was before leagues and treaties were made, little may perhaps be found, as Mr. Attorney well obſerved, beſides the laws of hoſpitality, which do not give any demandable right; but ſurely Grotius there hath no particular reſpect to particular ſubjects, of this or any other Nation, how far the ſupreme power of any Nation may erect a ſociety of trade to a certain place, and for certain commodities, excluſive of all other ſubjects of their own.

And that plainly appears, both from the ſcope of his Book, as alſo for that for ſeveral years, both before and at the time of publiſhing that Treatiſe, the Dutch Eaſt-India Company was eſtabliſhed; which I ſhall have farther occaſion to diſcourſe of by and by.

As for Welwood's Epiſtle, I have ſeldom obſerved that Epiſtles have been cited in Weſtminſter-hall as authorities: Yet ſuppoſing it to be ſo, That all loyal ſubjects ſhall have their Petitions granted to ſafety and ſecurity in their trade; I ſuppoſe Welwood little dreamt of Interlopers, when he talk'd of loyal ſubjects: if it can be meant only of ſuch who may trade by law, that is to beg the queſtion in reſpect of the Plaintiff and Defendant. As to that of Britton, That the ſea is common, it is anſwer'd by what hath been ſaid before; and Welwood, pag. 66. ſays, That by Commune or Publicum, is meant, a thing common for the uſe of any one ſort of People, according to that Saying, Roma Communis Patria eſt, but not for all of all Nations; Welwood, pag. 66. That paſſage of Burrough is only obſerved, to prove the King's prerogative within the four ſeas; and tho' Mr. Williams would have inſinuated, as if the Sturgeons, and other great fiſh, and wrecks, and the like, had come to the King by the Stat. of 17 E. 3. c. 2. that Act was but a declaration of the Common Law; for he had it by the right of this prerogative; Plowden's Commentaries, in the caſe of Mines; Coke 5. Sir Henry Conſtable's caſe; theſe things were veſted in the King, by his prerogative by the Common Law. Yet I cannot but obſerve, that the Treatiſe of Mare Liberum, on which Mr. Williams ſo much rely'd, was craftily writ, to overthrow the King's prerogative in that beneficial part thereof, relating to the fiſhing on the Engliſh coaſts; and contains a plain Proclamation for all perſons of any Nation, indifferently to fiſh in all kinds of ſeas; for, ſays cap. 5. fol. 10. Quæ autem navigationis eadem Piſcatus habenda eſt ratio, ut communis maneat omnibus. And herein tho' Mr. Williams intends to make good the premiſſes, I preſume that Mr. Pollexfen, that argued on the ſame ſide, has a greater concern for his friends in the Weſt, than to join with him to make good that concluſion. And before I go off from this point, I think it not amiſs, the better to clear the way to my concluſions, to give ſome inſtances wherein other Nations, as well as our own, have not only thought it legal, but neceſſary for their ſeveral publick advantages, to put reſtrictions upon trade, and did not think it injurious to natural equity, and the freedom of mankind, ſo much diſcourſed of on the other ſide. To give ſome few inſtances; Videmus Jura Commerciorum, ſays Bodin de Repub. lib. 1 cap. 7. non ſolum omnibus populorum principumque inter ſe conventis, verum etiam ſingularum Statutis, &c. And after he has enumerated the compacts for trade between the Pope and the Venetians, between the citizens of the Hans Towns, and the Kings of England, France, and Spain, and ſeveral other Countries; Illi, ſays he, inter ſe Commercium multis modis perſonarum, mercium, locorum, temporum atque omni alia ratione coarctarunt. So is Marguardus, fol. 155. and Buchanan in his 7th Book de Rebus Scotiæ; and in all Countries, the importation and exportation of ſome commodities are prohibited, as ſalt from France, horſes from other Countries, wool from hence. In whomſoever that power of reſtraint does remain, the power of licenſing ſome, and reſtraining of others, ſurely does alſo remain by parity of reaſon; but of that more by and by. And as Mr Attorney did truly obſerve, upon peruſal of the Statutes that are now in print relating to trade, the Parliaments have in all ages, even to this King's reign, ſince his reſtoration, thought fit to make more laws to prohibit foreign trade, than to increaſe it; as looking upon it more advantageous to the common weal. And thus having obſerved that other Nations, as well as we, have not only thought it legal, but neceſſary, to make laws for the reſtraint of trade; and thereby thought they did no injuſtice to the liberty of mankind:

3. I proceed to the next ſtep. I ſhall therefore, thirdly, endeavour to prove, that foreign trade and commerce, being introduced by the laws of Nations, ought to be governed and adjudged according to thoſe laws; and I do not know of any Statute or Book of the Common Law now in print, that doth oppoſe this aſſertion. Coke 3 Inſt. fol. 181. in the margin, cited by the Defendant's counſel at the bar, Commercium, ſays he, Jure Gentium eſſe debet; nay, it is the expreſs text of the Law, ex Jure Gentium Commercia ſunt inſtituta: which being laid down as undeniably true, and ſo admitted to be by the Defendant's counſel; I would infer from thence, ſince commerce and traffick are founded upon the law of Nations by the natural reaſons of things, all controverſies ariſing about the ſame, ſhall be determined by the ſame laws, eſpecially where there is no poſitive and expreſs law in that Country where ſuch controverſies do ariſe, to determine them by: and Mr. Williams ſeems to allow, that there are no ſuch laws in this Kingdom; for he thinks that the controverſy now before us, is not to be decided but by Parliament.

All other Nations have governed themſelves by this principle; and upon this ground ſtands the Court

Court of Admiralty in this Kingdom, viz. That there might be uniform Judgments given there to all other Nations in the World, in causes relating to commerce, navigation, and the like. And in as much as the Common and Statute Laws of this Realm, are too straight and narrow to govern and decide differences arising about foreign commerce; and can never be thought to bear any sort of proportion to the universal law of all Nations, as the interests of all foreign trade do necessitate them to contend for: It will become us that are Judges in Westminster-hall, for the better determining this case, to observe the methods used by our Predecessors in determining such like causes, and take notice of the law of Nations.

The Common Law, by the several authorities I cited before, takes notice of the Law Merchant; and as the Book of Ed. 4. before cited, says it is part of the law of Nations, and leaves the determination to be according to that law; the several Acts of Parliament I before cited, make a particular provision, that matters of this nature should be determined according to the Law-Merchant, which is part of the law of Nature and Nations; and is universal, and one and the same in all Countries in the World. And therefore Cicero speaking of this law, says, Non erit alia Lex Romæ, alia Athenis, alia nunc, alia posthac; sed & inter omnes gentes & omni tempore una eademque Lex obtinebit. And I the rather thought my self obliged, more industriously to search into the Law of Nations, the better to enable me to give judgement in this case; the consequence whereof will affect the King's subjects in all parts of the World; and I was minded thereof, particularly, by my Lord Chief Baron Fleming, in the giving Judgment in the great case of Bates, about the imposition upon currans, Lane, fol. 27. and does not only affirm it as necessary, but the common practices of all Judges, in all Ages.

Do not we leave the determination of Ecclesiastical causes, to be decided according to the Ecclesiastical Laws; foreign matters, matters of navigation, leagues, truces, embassies; nay, even in the case at the Bar, the stopping of the Defendant's Ship by an Admiralty Process, was left, by the opinion of all this Court, and afterwards by the Courts of Common Pleas, and Exchequer, to be decided in the Admiralty; and by virtue of a process out of that Court, his Ship is detained to this day. And, as I said, that Court proceeds according to the law of Nations, and the matters before specified are not to be controuled by the rules of the Common Law.

And if customs make a law, then the custom of Nations is surely the Law of Nations; which brings me to my next particular, which is the main thing upon which this cause will turn.

Therefore, 4thly, I conceive, that both by the Laws of Nations, and by the Common Law of England, the regulation, restraint and government of foreign trade and commerce, is reckoned inter Jura Regalia, i. e. is in the power of the King: and 'tis his undoubted prerogative, and is not abridged or controuled, by any Act of Parliament now in force.

This question is not concerning the consequences of this power, or any inconveniences that may happen thereupon; because upon inconveniences arising, the King is to be supplicated to redress them: which I shall farther take notice of, when I come to answer the particular objections made against this Grant.

Commerciorum Jura sunt privilegiata, ac non nisi iis concessa qui exercendorum Mercatorum licentiam Principis indultu & authoritate meruerunt, is the very express Text of the Civil Law; and so is Carpzovires, Const. n. 5. Bodinus de Republica, lib. 1. c. 7. says, Quæ tametsi Jure Gentium esse videantur prohibere, tametsi sæpe à Principibus videmus. And in c. 6. quoted by Mr. Attorney, That the Laws of commerce are contained in the particular compacts and agreements of Princes and People. So Salmasius, pag. 236. Mercatura est res indifferens, in qua Magistratus vel in vetando vel permittendo suam pro Commodo Reipublicæ potest imponere authoritatem. So Carpzovires, a famous German Lawyer, in his decisions, lib. decis. 105. N. 13, & 14. Exempla haud rara sunt, uli Privilegio & Edicto Principis commercia ad certas personas certave loca restringere videmus. These Rules and Principles, asserted to be the Laws of Nations, agree with the Principles of our Laws. Mr. Attorney, in his argument in this cause, cited many Records and Precedents to make good this assertion; which I think he did with great clearness. I therefore will content my self with as few of them as I can; and only remind you of such as I think absolutely necessary to make good my assertion, which I will do by these steps. I conceive the King had an absolute power to forbid foreigners, whether Merchants or others, from coming within his dominions, both in times of war and in times of peace, according to his royal Will and Pleasure; and therefore gave safe-conducts to Merchants Strangers, to come in, in all ages, and at his pleasure commanded them out again, by his Proclamation or Order of Council; of which there is no King's reign without many instances. And the Statute of Mag. Chart. c. 30. so much insisted on by the Defendant's counsel, is but a general safe-conduct; Omnes Mercatores nisi publice ante prohibiti fuerint, habeant salvum & securum conductum, &c. Where, by the way I must observe, that Mercatores, says my Lord Coke, in his Comment upon the Chapter, is only intended of Merchants Strangers; for I cannot find, that in those days any of the subjects of this Kingdom did apply themselves to foreign trade; or at least the trade was not so considerable, as to be taken notice of in any Book of Record that I can meet with. And before the making of that Statute, my Lord Coke, 2 Inst. fol. 57. does agree, that the King might, and did prohibit Strangers at his pleasure: But he conceives, and (with great respect be it spoken to his memory, I think without any colour of reason) would make these words, nisi publice prohibeantur, to intend only a prohibition by Parliament; and his reason is, for that it concerns the whole Realm. Now did the coming in of strangers concern the Realm after the making of the Act, more than it did before? Surely no. Doth not the power of making war and peace, absolutely belong to the King, by his prerogative? And is not that of publick concern to the Kingdom? And is not the prohibition of strangers a natural dependant upon that prerogative? If the word publice there had been out, there had been no colour for that conceit; and surely the King's proclamation will make the matter as publick, as an Act of Parliament can do: nay, and I may say more, for Acts of Parliament anciently were made publick by Proclamation; for in our Books we have many instances of Writs directed to Sheriffs of Counties, to cause Acts of Parliament to be published by Proclamation; and so was the conſtant and ancient uſage. And is it not more natural for ſtrangers that are abroad, to take notice of the King's publick Edicts, which are known to be of great importance in all Countries, more than they would of an Act of Parliament that affects the King's own dominions only? Beſides, it appears more impertinent, if you turn thoſe words into a Proviſo; and then it will amount to no more in plain Engliſh, than this, provided that this Law ſhall continue, except it be hereafter repealed; which ſurely would be very ridiculous.

Mr. Attorney, and Mr. Sollicitor, both in their arguments, quoted ſeveral Records and Precedents, where the King, in all times after the making of that Act, did prohibit ſtrangers from coming in, and did command them out when they were here, at pleaſure. I ſhall not trouble you with the repetition of the Records, for they were many; nay, the King, when Acts of Parliament had prohibited, did grant ſafe-conduct; and of that ſort, in Rolls Prerogative, 180. you will find ſeveral inſtances; and in the ſeveral Acts of Parliament cited by Mr. Attorney, to confirm the King's prerogative, as to ſafe-conducts, it doth appear. Syderfin, fol. 441. it is ſaid, that the King by the Common Law, might prohibit the importation of foreign goods; and whoever acted againſt ſuch Prohibition, forfeited his Ship.

The King might prohibit any of his ſubjects from going beyond the ſeas at pleaſure, and recall them again as he thought fit; and that, as I have ſaid before, without giving any reaſon. The Books of Fitzherbert's N. B. and Regiſter, before recited, make this evident. Mr. Attorney indeed cited many inſtances wherein the Kings had made uſe of their prerogatives, as 7 Ed. 2. M. 10. Quadrageſimo Ed. 3. M. 24. Stat. 5 R. cap. 2. which confirms it, 3 Inſt. 179. Viceſimo quinto Ed. 3. M. 10. with many more *; and indeed I think it was not denied, but that after a Prohibition it was an offence admitted of by the Defendant's counſel, for any ſubjects to go beyond the ſeas, Dy. 165 & 296. agrees it.

And that is ſufficient for the preſent purpoſe, there being a Prohibition in the Charter in queſtion, to all perſons that are not there mentioned. What influence the King's prerogative muſt neceſſarily have upon foreign trade and commerce, appears by his frequent granting Letters of Mart and Repriſal: Theſe are not allowed of by the Law of Nature, Civil, or Common Law; for thereby no man is bound by another's act, without his conſent, but by the general conſent of Nations, humana neceſſitate exigente. The King only has the power of making leagues and truces with foreign Princes, upon which only all foreign trade does depend; and thoſe leagues are made upon ſuch terms and conditions, and under ſuch limitations, as both Princes think fit: Many inſtances to this purpoſe were alſo cited by Mr. Attorney, to which I refer my ſelf; and the differences that ariſe from Merchants beyond the ſeas, are to be determined according to thoſe leagues, and cannot be decided by the municipal laws of this Realm, which cannot be put in execution in foreign parts.

Fourthly, The King is abſolutely Maſter of war and peace; which he could not be, in caſe he had not a power to lay reſtraint upon his own ſubjects in relation to foreign commerce; ſince eo ipſo, that war is proclaimed, all publick commerce is prohibited: and the counſel that argued for the Defendant, admitted, That the King might prohibit his ſubjects to go or trade beyond the ſeas, in caſes of wars or plagues. How ſtrangely prepoſterous then would it be for a man to imagine, that the King ſhould have an abſolute power of war and peace, and yet be denied the means to preſerve the one, and prevent the other! Is not that therefore the great reaſon why the King is at ſo great expence in maintaining ambaſſadors and envoys in all the trading parts of the World, without which we ſhould be in a perpetual ſtate of war? Would it not be monſtrous, that when the King is entred into league with any ſovereign Prince, in a matter of trade very advantageous to his People, to have it in the power of any one of his ſubjects to deſtroy it? As for inſtance, Suppoſe a league between our King and the Emperor of Morocco, for a trade to Tangier, were made upon condition, That no Engliſh Ship coming there for commerce, ſhould be above a hundred ton, and a fleet of merchant-ſhips within that condition, were in Port at Tangier; and Mr. Sandys, with the ſame obſtinacy as he ſeems to appear in this caſe, ſhould have gone with a Ship of above a hundred ton to Tangier; that would have been an abſolute breach of the league, we ſhould have been immediately in a ſtate of war, the merchant-ſhips and goods abſolutely forfeited to the Emperor by the law of Nations, and they and their families thereby undone, without any remedy, till Mr. Sandys ſhould be pleaſed to return into England; and alſo bring with him an eſtate ſufficient to make them a recompence: and then alſo perhaps it would be difficult to contrive ſuch an action in our Law, to compel Mr. Sandys to do it. Beſides, the King has no other way, if his ambaſſadors and miniſters in foreign parts, cannot prevail that right ſhould be done to his ſubjects; or if Mr. Sandys's interloping Ship, and all its cargo, had been wrongfully taken away from him by any foreign Prince, but by the King's declaring of a war, and compelling them to make reſtitution by force, the conſequence whereof will affect more than foreign traders would be then concerned, both in their perſons and purſes; and it would be very hard for all the King's ſubjects to lie under the burthen and charge, and the profits and advantages accrue only to a few. And here by the way I think it not improper to take notice of an objection that was made by the Defendant's counſel, of the unreaſonableſs that the King ſhould be entruſted with this prerogative; for as well as he may reſtrain perſons trading to the Indies, he may alſo reſtrain them from trading into any other part of the World. The very objection ſeems to carry an unſavoury, as well as unreaſonable miſtruſt in a ſubject to his Prince. For as it is a maxim in our Law, the King cannot be preſumed to do wrong; and I am ſure the conſtant practice of our preſent King has not given us the leaſt umbrage for ſuch diffidence: and I think I may truly ſay, we are as ſafe by our Prince's own natural inclinations, as we can be by any law in this particular. The King has the abſolute power of pardoning all offenders, by his inherent prerogative, which an Act of Parliament cannot deprive him of, the caſe of murder is a full inſtance of that; nor was that prerogative ever diſputed in any age, tho' never ſo troubleſome; ſaving in that ſingle caſe of the Earl of Danby, and that without any reaſon, that I could ever hear of. Is it therefore to be objected and preſumed, that the King will pardon all the traitors, murtherers and robbers, and other felons, and make uſe of his prerogative to let all malefactors eſcape?

The King is the fountain of honour, as well as of juſtice, and in virtue of that prerogative, may ennoble as many of his ſubjects as he pleaſes; and thereby exempt them from arreſts, and other common proceſſes of the Law, by means whereof men do more ſpeedily recover their juſt debts, and have redreſs for injuries. Is it therefore to be preſumed the King will make ſuch a glut of noblemen, becauſe he may do it? And as this is againſt his inclination, ſo certainly it is againſt his intereſt, to make ſuch Grants as the Defendant's counſel ſeem to fear; for it is more for the King's benefit than it can be for his ſubjects, the greater the importation of foreign commodities is; for from thence ariſe his cuſtoms and impoſitions, thoſe neceſſary ſupports of the Crown: and therefore in ſome ſenſe the King is the only perſon truly concerned in this queſtion; for this Iſland ſupported its Inhabitants in many ages, without any foreign trade at all, having in it all things neceſſary for the life of man.

Terra ſuis contenta bonis, non indiga mercis, ſays the Poet. And truly, I think, if at this day moſt of the Eaſt-India commodities were abſolutely prohibited, tho' it might be injurious as to the profit of ſome few traders, it would not be ſo to the generality of the Inhabitants of this Realm. And therefore as I have offered theſe few inſtances to prove the King ſhould have ſuch a prerogative; in the next place I come to ſhew, that the Kings of England have exerciſed this their prerogative in all ages: and as the King has the power of reſtraint of foreign trade, ſo he is the only Judge when it is proper to uſe that power, which ſeems plainly to be for the ſame reaſon. And I think Mr. Williams's remark of the difficulty of this caſe, that it ſhould neceſſitate the King to call a Parliament to aſſiſt him with power to determine this queſtion, is not to be paſſed by without ſome obſervation.

God be praiſed, 'tis in the King's power to call and diſſolve Parliaments, when and how he pleaſes; and he is the only Judge of theſe Ardua Regni, that he ſhould think fit to conſult with the Parliament about. And Mr. Williams would do well to ſave himſelf the trouble of adviſing the King of what things are fit for him to conſult with his Parliament about, 'till ſuch time as he be thereunto called. But it hath been too much practiſed at this and other bars in Weſtminſter-hall, of late years, to captivate the Lay Gens, by leſſening the power of the King, and advancing, I had almoſt ſaid, the prerogative of the People: and from hence comes the many miſchiefs to the King's ſubjects in parts abroad, by making the power of the King thought ſo inconſiderable, as tho' he were a mere Duke of Venice, being abſolutely dependant upon his Parliament. Would it not be mightily for the honour and dignity of the Crown of England, think ye, that the Emperor of Fez and Morocco, or any Prince of the remote parts of the World, ſhould be told, That Mr. Sandys, one of the King of Great Britain's ſubjects, came into the Emperor's Territories againſt his Prince's conſent, and that he had no power to hinder him unleſs he would conſult with all his Nobles, and the Repreſentatives of all his common ſubjects, to aſſiſt therein? Would not the Emperor believe Sandys to be the greater Prince of the two? But tho' ſuch ſort of declamations are ſo much for the ſervice of the Crown, and for the honour of the Kingdom, as they would have it believed; yet I think they have the ſame tendency of duty and ſervice to the King, with ſome other matters that of late have happened amongſt us, viz. Some have been ſo concerned, as well for the ſafety and ſecurity of his Majeſty's ſacred Perſon, and to make him formidable to his rebellious ſubjects at home, as to deſire that his guards might be diſcharged, becauſe it looked as though he deſigned to rule by a ſtanding army; and to ſhew their tenderneſs to his ſacred Life, would have him removed from the aſſiſtance of evil counſellors, as they called them; and put himſelf into the hands of aſſaſſinates, as tho' one murdered Prince were not ſufficient to ſatisfy that piece of ſtate-policy, in one and the ſame age. And in order that he might have ſufficient to ſupport the neceſſity as well as the dignity of a Crown, which all good ſubjects are zealous for; ſome, of late, have induſtriouſly endeavoured to have prevented him from being able to borrow any money upon the credit of any part of his revenue, a privilege that the meaneſt of the perſons concerned in that queſtion, would think themſelves highly injured to be debarred of.

Theſe, and the like attempts, if not prevented, will render the King and his Government low and deſpicable in all other parts of the World: And as for the inſtance between a Denizen and a man naturalized, I think it rather makes againſt, than for Mr. Williams's concluſion, as to the main queſtion. For tho' the King cannot naturalize a man, and thereby give him inheritable blood, as a natural born ſubject to inherit lands; yet he may make an Alien a Denizen; and by that means he becomes to have as much privilege as any of the King's natural ſubjects hath, as to trade and commerce, which is the only queſtion now before us: And I cannot help being of opinion, that this Kingdom was in greater regard abroad, and the Inhabitants thereof more proſperous at home, when the prerogative of the Crown was more abſolute than now it is: therefore it is our duty as good Judges, as well as good Subjects, to endeavour to ſupport it as much as we can by Law. And ſo I proceed to mention ſome precedents and authorities, whereby the Kings of England have in all ages exerciſed this part of their prerogative, of reſtraining, diſpoſing and ordering matters of commerce and foreign trade, by Royal Licences, Charters, and Diſpenſations.

And herein I ſhall content my ſelf with as much brevity as I can, only in producing ſome few of thoſe many inſtances, which were with great care and induſtry found out by Mr. Attorney, and Mr. Sollicitor; and by them ſo learnedly and properly applied to the caſe in queſtion.

1. Therefore it has been well obſerved, that the Staples, which were the common and publick Marts for all Merchants to reſort to, were firſt erected by the King's prerogative, without any Act of Parliament; as it doth plainly appear by the ſeveral Acts of Parliament mentioned at the Bar, either for ſetting the places, or enlarging the commodities that were permitted to be brought to the Staple; for ſurely in all times, when the Staple was fixed in the dominions of any other Prince, that muſt be done by league; which none can make but the King. To inſtance one authority for all, the Stat. 2 Ed. 3. cap. 9. expreſly ſays, It is enacted, That the Staples beyond the ſeas, and on this ſide, ordained by Kings in time paſt, &c. Mr. Attorney and Mr. Sollicitor cited ſeveral Records, and other Acts of Parliament, that allow this to be the King's prerogative abſolutely; which I ſhall only name, they having opened the particulars at large, viz. Viceſimo E. 3. Plac. Parl. Rolls Abr. fol. 108, 130. Octav. E. 3. *num.*20. 27 *E.*3. cap. 1. 43 *E.*3. c. 1. 47 E. 3. N. 17. Prim. R. 2. N. 98. with many more; which did not only licenſe Merchants to repair to their ſeveral Staples, but prohibited them from carrying their ſtaple commodities to any other places. And the ſeveral Acts of Parliament made touching the Staple, only inflicted greater forfeitures upon the Perſons offending, more than the King by his prerogative did inflict; but neither added to, or diminiſhed any part of the power of the Crown: the truth whereof will alſo farther appear by the conſent of the Parliament, plainly declared in ſeveral Statutes following, viz. 2 *H.*5. c. 6. 2 H. 6. c. 4. 8 H. 6. c. 17, & 27. by which, and ſeveral other inſtances, both by Mr. Sollicitor and Mr. Attorney, I do conceive it does plainly appear, that the Statute of 2 *Ed.*3. c. 9. Nono Ed. 3. c. 1. decimo quarto Ed. 3. c. 2. the Stat. of decimo quinto Ed. 3. mentioned in the Defendant's Plea, decimo 8 Ed. 3. c. 3. which the Defendant's counſel have ſo much inſiſted on, for the opening the liberty of trade, only concerned Merchants of the Staples; and by the Acts of Parliament made relating to that trade, ſince particularly mentioned by Mr. Attorney, ſtand now repealed.

And tho' the place of the Staple, as well as the commodities, were aſcertained by Acts of Parliament, yet the King granted to Merchants, licences to trade elſewhere; which prerogative is allowed of by Acts of Parliament, and other authorities in our Books: for inſtance, amongſt many others, the Stat. 8 H. 6. 21. 22 Hen. 6. c. 4. 15 Hen. 6. c. 3. 27 H. 6. c. 1. 1 H. 7. fol. 3. A. 13 Ed. 4. *fol.*3. l. 5. *E.*4. 33.

And as the King, before thoſe Acts of Parliament mentioned, ordered the merchandizes of the Staple; ſo all other foreign trade, not taken notice of by Acts of Parliament, were begun and abſolutely diſpoſed of by the King's prerogative; for as my Lord Coke, in his Comment upon Mag. Chart. c. 30. does truly obſerve, That by Mercatores there, only is meant Merchant Strangers; for as I ſaid, I do not find that any of the ſubjects of this King meddled in foreign trade, in many years after the making of that Act: The firſt inſtance I meet with, is in Malin's Lex Mercatoria, fol. 150. of the ſociety of Merchants, which is the Staples Adventurers, made by a Grant from K. *Ed.*3. and were called the Brotherhood of St. Thomas a Becket of Canterbury, 'till the time of Hen. 7. who confirmed their Charter, but changed their name to that of Merchant Adventurers, by which name they continued a corporation.

And that the King did ſhut and open foreign trade at his pleaſure, by many inſtances mentioned by Mr. Attorney and Mr. Sollicitor, does farther appear, 33 Hen. 3. memb. 1. 2 E. 3. pars ſecunda memb. 35. 3 H. 3. N. 33. Rolls Prerogative 170, & 214. before cited, primo H. 5. 41. decimo octa-vo H. 6. N. 60. and the Stat. of 12 H. 7. c. 6. which I have cauſed to be ſearched. And in Plowden's Commentaries, in the great Caſe of Mines Royal, it is ſet down as a Rule, That ancient Charters and Grants of the Crown, are the beſt evidences of the Prerogative. Phil. and Mary erected the corporation of Ruſſia Merchants, by Charter, with a prohibiton to others, with the like conditions within mentioned in the Charter at the Bar; and was afterwards approved of in Parliament, in 8 Eliz. and the forfeiture mentioned in the Letters Patent made more effectual. And as Mr. Attorney did truly obſerve, that when Calais was taken, and thereby the Staples unſettled, Queen Elizabeth thought, according to the precedent of the Ruſſia and other Companies, it was moſt advantageous for the carrying on of trade and foreign commerce, to erect ſocieties and corporations; which was well approved of in thoſe times, and ſo has continued ever ſince undiſturbed, until this preſent queſtion; which I ſhall more particularly inſiſt upon, when I come to diſcourſe of the next Head.

And here by the way, I ſhall only remember, that there were many Records and Books cited by the counſel at the Bar, to prove the difference between alien enemies, and alien amies; and how theſe infidels are in law looked upon as perpetual enemies, and the many caſes that were cited about the Jews, and others, I think will not be neceſſary to be farther inſiſted upon; for I conceive they do not concern the queſtion that is now before us. For were not the Charter now in queſtion, in being, it would be worth while for Mr. Sandys to conſider, how far he might be obnoxious to puniſhment, for trading with infidels, who are in law called perpetui inimici. And therefore I conceive, it is as penal for any of the King's ſubjects to trade with infidels, who are alien enemies, without a royal licence, as it is to trade with alien amies, contrary to a royal prohibition. And I cannot conjecture how he will avoid this rock, notwithſtanding his pretended skill in navigation, without making uſe of this Charter as a ſafe-conduct to him, by implication; though he ſeems here ſo much to ſtruggle againſt it: and how far that would prevail for his benefit, may be alſo conſidered. But as I ſaid before,

4. The true queſtion is, Whether this be a good Grant to the Plaintiffs, of a ſole trade to the Indies, were the Inhabitants thereof chriſtians or infidels, excluſive of others?

And therefore I proceed to the next ſtep, That though unlawful engroſſing, and Monopolies, are prohibited by the laws of this, and all other Nations; yet I do conceive, that the Charter now in queſtion, of a ſole trade excluſive of others, is no ſuch unlawful engroſſing, or Monopoly, but is ſupported and encouraged, as conducing to publick benefit by the Law, Practice and Uſage, of this and other Countries. And herein by the way, though the word Monopoly, or Engroſſing, generally ſpoken of, is odious in the eye of our Law, yet ſome Engroſſings, and ſo ſome Monopolies, are allowed of in our Books; and ſo I deſire to be underſtood, when I ſay a lawful or unlawful Monopoly, or a lawful or unlawful Engroſſing. And in as much as this is the great, and, as I think, the only objection that either hath, or can be made againſt the preſent Charter, I ſhall be the more particular in giving my opinion therein; with the reaſons and authorities that have induced me thereunto.

I premiſe only this, that in all thoſe Countries where ſocieties of trade are erected by the ſupreme Power, excluſive of all others, (as the caſe at the Bar, Monopolies are forbidden; and are as ſeverely puniſhed by their laws, as they can be by the Common and Statute Laws of England, (viz.) in Holland, Germany, France, and Spain, &c.

And ſo wherever the Civil Law prevails, Monopolies are puniſhed with confiſcation of Goods, and baniſhment. C. de Monopoliis & Cenſ. forenſ. part 1. fol. 497.

Now though Monopolies are forbidden, yet that cannot be underſtood to be ſo univerſally true, (as no general Law can ever be) that it ſhould in no reſpect, and upon no occaſion or emergency whatſoever, admit of any exception or limitation.

The exceptions thereof may be ſuch as theſe:

1. Though no private Perſons can have the ſole trade to themſelves, by their own private authority, yet this may be granted to a publick ſociety, by the prerogative of the Prince; if,

2. It be upon good cauſe, and for the publick advantage of the Kingdom.

3. From the neceſſity of beginning and carrying on ſuch trades and foreign commerce, which can be only done by Companies and Societies.

4. Such Companies and Societies ought to be continued and ſupported upon the natural equity and juſtice, that no other perſons ſhould be permitted, either to reap the profit, or to endanger the loſs of what hath been begun, and been carried on by them, with great hazard and expence.

Now in as much as foreign trade can never be of advantage to this Kingdom, except the ballance be kept equal between this and other Countries; which can never be done, but by keeping up to proportionable rules for the regulation thereof, with the other Countries: And becauſe, as I ſaid before, the municipal laws of this Realm ſeem too ſcanty for that purpoſe, I will therefore firſt conſider how this queſtion ſtands, as to the Law of Nations; and then how it is conſidered by our Law, producing authorities in both to make good my aſſertion. And becauſe I thought the former more natural and effectual for the deciſion of this queſtion, made me more inquiſitive than otherwiſe I ſhould have been. Cujacius lib. 16. Obſer. 23. diſtinguiſhes inter Monopolia licita & illicita.

Licitum Monopolium, ſays he, eſt, ſi certis perſonis vel quod potius eſt certo Collegio conceſſerit Princeps ut ei ſoli jus ſit vendendi certæ mercis; and therefore recites a law of the Emperors Theodoſius and Valentinian, by which certain Governors of Commerce were appointed; Edictali Lege ſancita, ut nulli Mercatori niſi ad deſignata loca temporibus præſtitutis ad negotiationis ſuæ ſpecies diſtrahendas paſſim liceret accedere, &c.

Carpzovires, in his deciſions before mentioned, lib. 2. Deciſ. 105. N. 13, & 14. makes this no new caſe; Et certe (non eſt novum) modum commerciis (quæ tamen liberrima eſſe debent) poni ex cauſa nimirum publicæ utilitatis vel neceſſitatis, ex quo Monopolia alias prohibita jure ſubſiſtunt.

And again, Exempla haud rara ſunt ubi neceſſitate & Edicto principis Monopolia quandoque probari: Commercia ad certas Perſonas & Loca reſtringi videmus.

Idem, Deciſ. 4. N. 10, & N. 13. Nimirum Exercitium ac permiſſio Monopoliorum à Principis arbitrio dependet, &c. Scacca de Commerciis Q. 7. fol. 301. N. 15. Hoc non procedit in Monopolio, autoritate Principis ſive Reipub. contracto, quia ſicut monopolia, privatâ autoritate contracta Reipub. ſunt perniciosa: Ita hæc quæ Legis Autoritate, ex juſta contrahuntur, Cauſa Reipub. valde utilia ſunt.

Grotius de J. B. & P. lib. 2. cap. 12. Sect. 16. Monopolia non omnia cum Jure naturæ pugnant: nam poſſunt interdum à ſumma poteſtate permitti, juſta de cauſa & pretio.

He gives amongſt others theſe two Examples:

1. From the Hiſtory of Joſeph, when he was Vice-roy in Egypt; which is, ſays he, an illuſtrious inſtance of this matter.

2. That under the Romans, the Alexandrians had the ſole trade for all Indian and Ethiopick commodities.

So Thuanus, lib. 32. gives an inſtance of a Grant from the French King, Ann. 1604. for the ſole trade into Canada, or New France; for which he gives this reaſon, Ne gravis eſſet ærario ad ſublevandos navigationis illinc inſtitutæ ſumptus.

Which I conceive will go a great way in ſupporting all ſuch trading companies as cannot be begun but by a publick expence.

C. de Monopoliis, the prohibition is expreſly limited, Niſi Privilegium vel alia conſuetudo in utilitatem publicam vergens reſiſtat.

And then as to the uſage:

Hæc eſt communiſſima omnium, nullo prorſus reluctante Doctorum ſententia, quod jura hujuſmodi Emporalia & Regalia poſſunt acquiri non modo per Conceſſionem ſummi Principis, ſed etiam Conſuetudine & Præſcriptione. Leſſius de Juſtitia, lib. 2. c. 22. Dub. 21.

By the Imperial Laws, commerce and traffick have received ſeveral other limitations; ſometimes the ſubjects of the Empire have been forbidden to trade to certain places, particularly named; and in general by other conſtitutions, forbidden to export coin, gold, or arms, to any of the barbarous Nations.

And that the law or cuſtom of Nations is ſo, the practice does evince.

And firſt in Germany, where the Law prohibiteth all Monopolies; yet ſee how the Law there ſtands in reſpect of our caſe.

Circa Monopolia autem, quæ exercentur adverſus Cives, obſervandum, non eſſe illicitum, ſi non cuivis quodvis negotiationis genus exercere conceditur, ſed illis duntaxat qui ad idem exercendum juxta inſtituta Civitatis ſibi jus quæſiverunt, quemadmodum in rebus pub. This as to Corporations.

As

As to trading Societies thus:

Sed & fieri poteſt, ut à ſumma poteſtate Societati mercatorum indulgeatur certum genus Mercium ex certis locis advehere, excluſis reliquis, cujus privilegii concedendi variæ poſſunt eſſe cauſæ.

I. Nam Commercia quæ ad loca remotiſſima inſtituerentur, priuſquam rite ſtabiliantur magnos requirunt ſumptus & ancipiti eventui initio ſunt obnoxia; ergo Authoribus talium Commerciorum cavendum eſt, ne quod ab ipſis conſtitutum magno cum periculo, & ſumptu ſunt, alii gratis intercipiant.

II. Ac præterea ejuſmodi Societates privilegiatæ opibus ſuis Reipub. exigente neceſſitate, felicius poſſunt quam ſingula ſuccurrere.

III. Videntur etiam meliori fide Commercia tractari, ac majorem Copiam Mercium hoc modo poſſe advehi, neque de tot fraudibus & compendiis cogitare neceſſum habent, quorum lucrum in commune velut ærarium redactum æqualibus portionibus diſtribuitur.

Puffendorf de jure Naturæ & Gentium, lib. 5. fol. 655.

A learned Author does more at large deſcribe it.

It has been a queſtion ſometimes debated, whether the Society entered into by the Hanſe Towns were not againſt Law, Quippe quod ſpeciem Monopolii præ ſe ferre videtur, ut certis locis merces emant confœderati quæ rurſus pretio eo, quo volunt, vendant.

This is the ſame objection now made againſt the Charter at the bar.

But the anſwer given was twofold, and will come home to this caſe.

I. That the Emperor Charles IV. has given his approbation, and made it lawful by his authority.

II. That they had continued in poſſeſſion of this Society ſo long, that now the length of time (together with the Prince's conſent) removed all doubt whatſoever; Carpſovires de lege Regia Germanorum, cap. 6. ſect. 10. And the Charter now in queſtion, and other Charters of like nature granted by the Kings of England, which I ſhall have occaſion to remember by and by, remained undiſturbed without the leaſt interruption, as long as this Society did before this queſtion was ſtated.

And though, according to the rules of our Laws, ſuch a length of time does not obtain the credit of a preſcription; yet by the Law of Nations, and the practices of all other countries, which are only adapted for this purpoſe, it is otherwiſe. Præſcriptio enim tam longi temporis vim legis obtinet, imo tollit omne vitium.

Præſcriptio temporis immemorialis, quæ privilegiata eſt, & ex vitioſo etiam titulo dominium & jus tribuit, omneſque Solemnitates, etiam extrinſecus, negotio acceſſiſſe præſumit tanti temporis Antiquitas, num. 10. n. Atque omnem Monopolii reſpectum conſuetudo Immemorialis vel Cæſarum approbatio excludit. n. 10.26.

Quia conſuetudo Immemorialis Cæſarum ſcitu & conceſſu hæc antiqua Societas fulcitur omnis Monopolii reſpectus etiam minimus læſerat. Marg. lib. 4. cap. 7. n. 50.

And as theſe Hanſe Towns were one of the firſt Corporations of trade I have read of, ſo was it thought the intereſt of England to ſupport and encourage them. I find above ſixty (ſome ſay eighty) Towns and Cities united their Stocks, making Lubeck, Brunſwick, Dantzick, and Cullen, the chief places of their reſidence; and ſo great was their trade and credit under that conſtitution, that many Princes granted them large privileges, and they kept Courts by their Deputies and Councils at Bergen.

By the Laws of Spain, all Monopolies are forbidden, and under the ſame penalties appointed by the Civil Law: yet there alſo a right may be acquired to a ſole trade, by licence obtained from the King, or by preſcription.

Quinta partida Tit. 7. leg. 2. membris hoc Commercium Maritimum excluſis cæteris ad 20. annos concederetur. Neque ulla re ſe magis prodidit Imperii odium Batavicæ noſtris diebus, (Deo ita volente) conſtituti magnitudo, & felicitas, quam Navigationum in Indias Orientales ſuſceptarum conſtantia & ſucceſſus, ad quas ut ærario parceretur Societates inſtitutæ, cautumque tandem, ut ſub unam Societatem omnes coirent, quod alioqui experimento conſtitiſſit, Aromatum pretia ab Inſulanis obemptorum Frequentiam augeri, & cum alii aliis prævertere, & lucrum ad ſe aliorum damno derivare ſatagerent, ubi concordia maxima eſt opus, æmulationum & diſſidii ſemina ſpargi.

I come in the next place to make it appear, that as the Law of Nations, and the practice of all other countries, warrants the like grants and reſtrictions with the caſe at the bar; ſo I conceive this Charter of ſole trade to the Indies, excluding others, is neither oppoſed by the Common Law, or prohibited by any Act of Parliament; but is ſupported by both, as will more evidently appear by the practice and conſtant uſage in all times.

Therefore, tho' ingroſſing be a crime, odious in the Law, and puniſhable; yet all manner of ingroſſing is not.

Therefore in the caſe of foreign trade, which is only applicable to the caſe at the bar; it was reſolved by all the Judges of England, 3 Inſtit. 196. That Merchants may buy beyond ſea in groſs, and ſell here again in groſs alſo. I ſay, that all Monopolies are not unlawful. Generally ſpeaking they are, and therefore, I will admit the deſcription of an unlawful Monopoly, made by my Lord Coke, 3 Inſtit. 181.

A Monopoly is an inſtitution or allowance by the King, by his Grant, Commiſſion or otherwiſe, to any perſon or perſons, bodies politick or corporate, of, or for the ſole buying, ſelling, making, working, or uſing any thing; whereby any perſon or perſons, bodies politick or corporate, are ſought to be reſtrained of any freedom or liberty they had before, or hindred in their lawful trade.

Now if the ſubjects of England had not before this Grant, a freedom and liberty to trade to the Indies, againſt the King's royal pleaſure, the Charter at the bar will be no Monopoly within that rule.

Now that they had no ſuch liberty, hath been ſufficiently proved by the ſeveral prohibitions mentioned before; and the many more inſtances thereof, cited by Mr. Attorney, and Mr. Sollicitor; and it would be very ſtrange, that the King might prohibit Foreigners from coming here into England, and not prohibit his own ſubjects from going into foreign countries.

And it is not denied, but if the King ſhould proclaim a war with the Indians, that then it would be a prohibition to all his ſubjects to have any commerce with them, nay, and he might continue that war as long as he pleaſes; and by that means all his ſubjects would be as well prevented of any of the commodities of that country; and alſo of exporting any of our commodities thither. So that ſurely this Charter, with theſe reſtrictions, is much better than a total excluſion; and therefore foreign trade is not like our home trade, to which the word

Monopolies

Monopolies is properly applicable; for that cannot be totally excluded for any time, tho' never ſo ſmall, by any Act of Prerogative.

Object. Ay, but, ſay the Defendant's Counſel, tho' the King can by his prerogative prohibit all trade to any country, upon ſuch great emergencies as war and plague, &c. yet to grant liberty to ſome, and exclude others, that makes the Grant at the bar be thought a Monopoly. Which is ſtill begging the queſtion; for if the King by his prerogative, have the power of reſtraining and diſpoſing foreign trade, where Acts of Parliament have not interpoſed; as by the precedents already cited, I conceive clearly he has, as inherent to his Crown; therefore, as he may reſtrain all, ſo he may reſtrain any part by the ſame parity of reaſon.

If the King proclaims a war with any country, which is a general prohibition of trade, and ſhould order that John a Style, or a dozen or any greater number of his ſubjects, &c. and give them inſtructions to treat for a peace, and the perſons ſo appointed ſhould carry on a trade; would not Mr. Sandys, do you think, have as much reaſon to murmur, that he was none of thoſe Ambaſſadors, as he has now by being not comprized within the Charter? And would it not be thought an arrogancy and ſaucineſs in him, to demand an account of the inſtruction given by the King to ſuch Ambaſſadors? Or durſt he trade there till a peace were proclaimed with that country?

And the gloſs of that Law ſays, Mercatores non faciant inter Monopolium de re non vendenda niſi pro certo pretio, vel de non exercendo officium niſi per eos recipiatur Officiales & Socios: Poſſunt tamen hæc facere cum conſenſu & ſcientia Regis & contra facientes perpetuo exulabunt, & eorum bona Regi applicantur. Ex privilegio ergo Regis poſſunt ſimiliter & conſuetudine vel præſcriptione, quia quod privilegio acquiritur, etiam præſcriptione acquiri poteſt.

And there quotes ubi dicitur, quod poteſt concedi privilegium; quod quis ſolus piſcetur in certa parte Maris, & aliis poteſt prohibere.

In France Monopolies are prohibited alſo, Sub pœna Confiſcationis corporis & bonorum indict. Conſt. Fr. 1. Art. 191.

Notwithſtanding which, there are eſtabliſhed ſeveral Corporations for trade; I will name but two. Anno 1657, the French King makes a grant of the ſole fiſhery in his Dominions, to a Society, excluding others upon pain that Interlopers ſhall incur the penalty, de Confiſcation des Vaiſſeaux & Merchandizes & de dix mille Livres d' Amende. Aytz. vol. 4. pag. 207. And in the year 1664, the Eaſt-India Company by his declaration, with an excluſion to all others, like our Eaſt-India Company, page 74, 75.

In the United Provinces, the Laws againſt Monopolies are the ſame, yet there always ſeveral were trading Corporations excluſive of all others. 3 June 1621. in the Charter of the Dutch Weſt-India Company, it is granted thus; And in caſe any one ſhall go to, or negotiate in any of the aforeſaid places granted to this Company, and without conſent of the ſaid Company; it ſhall be upon pain and forfeiture of ſuch ſhip and goods, as ſhall be found to trade in thoſe Coaſts and Places, which being preſently and on all ſides, on the behalf of the ſaid Company, ſet upon, taken, and forfeited, ſhall be and remain to the uſe of the ſaid Company. Aytz. vol. 1. p. 62. ſect. 1.

And in caſe ſuch ſhips or goods be ſold, or fly into lands or havens, the Riggers and Part-Owners thereof ſhall and may be diſtrained to the value of the ſaid ſhip and goods.

That the aforeſaid Company ſhall within the ſaid limits make Governors, Officers of War and Juſtice; and for the other neceſſary ſervices for the preſervation of the places, and maintaining of good order, policy and juſtice, and the advancement of their trade, ſhall appoint, diſpoſe and diſplace, and ſubſtitute others in their places, as they ſhall find their affairs do require.

All ſhips coming to any place where the Company have their Garriſon and Government, ſhall not tranſport thence any men, goods or money, without leave and conſent of the Council, upon the pain and forfeiture of ſix months wages, &c.

In the Grant to the Dutch India Company, 20 Mar. 1602. that no body, of what quality or condition ſoever, ſhall for the ſpace of twenty-one years, paſs Eaſtwards of the Cape of Good Hope, upon forfeiture of ſhips and goods. Aytz. 1 vol: fol. 157.

That the ſaid Company may appoint governors and offices of war and juſtice, and for other neceſſary ſervices, for the preſervation of their places and maintenance of good order, policy and juſtice.

The ſaid officers to take the oath of ſupremacy to the States-General; and of fidelity, as to what concerns trade and traffick, to the Company.

And afterwards, the 9th of Sept. 1606. a Placaert was publiſh'd, that no body, directly or indirectly, ſhall paſs or trade beyond the Cape of Good Hope, upon pain of death, and forfeiture of their ſhips or goods, which ſhall be found to have done or to do ſo. And tho' they ſhould abſent themſelves out of the United Provinces, yet the ſentence ſhall go on, and be decreed and executed, with the preſent confiſcation and ſelling of their goods, actions and credits.

Idem, page 158. and ſurely the Dutch have been always by us eſteem'd, as our greateſt and moſt dangerous rivals in trade.

And as for the reaſon and neceſſity of eſtabliſhing this way of trading by Companies, ſee the judgment of Thuanus, lib. Hiſt. 124 and 130, where making mention of the Eaſt-Indies, he ſaith thus: Diverſis itineribus hujus Regionis Incolarumque Ingeniis cognitis tanta frequentiâ à privatis hæc ipſa Navigatio & Commercium exercitum fuit, ut alter alterum fere iviſſet perditum. Ad obviandum itaque huic malo viſum fuit, An. 1602. quibuſdam hujus Navigationis mercatoribus, præpotentum ordinum conſenſu certum conſtituere corpus, cujus tantummodo, &c.

The Indians being Infidels are by Law eſteem'd common enemies, and the opinion of my Lord Coke in Michelborne's caſe, I think, therefore, to be Law, notwithſtanding the objections that have been made againſt it, which none of our books warrant; now the King by his Charter makes the Plaintiffs as it were his Ambaſſadors to concert a peace, and Mr. Sandys murmurs becauſe he is not one of them.

The King may grant a Fair or Market to every ſubject he has, but becauſe he grants that privilege to ſome of his ſubjects, have the reſt any juſt ground of complaint? Becauſe the King may pardon every offender, but will not pardon any Highwayman now in Newgate; muſt thoſe goal-birds, therefore, think themſelves injur'd in their liberty and property? Becauſe the King granted to his Town of Hull, that no other ſhips ſhould be there freighted for foreign parts, till the ſhips of that town were firſt freighted; as he did, Rot. Clauſ. 41 E. III. memb. 25. did London, Dover, or any other town of trade complain? Would any of theſe Gentlemen that contend for this liberty of trade, adventure with their fortunes to Algiers, and when they are ſeized upon by the Algerines, tell them we are Engliſhmen, and we have by the Common Law of England, and many Statutes of our Kingdom, which ſupport the liberty of the ſubject, a freedom to trade wherever we pleaſe? Or would not they rather ſay, we have a paſs from the King of England, and rely upon that, which preſumes treaties, leagues and truces between Princes; and in caſe that will not prevail, the King will ſee them righted. And in the Charter that is now before us, there is a particular reſtriction and limitation of trade to any Prince in amity with our King. Now as the conſtant uſage and practice of other countries, warrants ſuch ſocieties as theſe, ſo does ours too: For, as I ſaid, the Hanſe Towns were ſome of the firſt Corporations of trade that we read of in hiſtory; ſo was it thought the intereſt of England to ſupport and encourage them.

that

King H. III. gave them great privileges and the Still-yards for their reſidence, which they enjoy'd near 300 years, managing their trade by an Alderman and Council call'd, The Guild of the Hanſe, ingroſſing the trade of England for Grain, Cables, Maſts, Pitch, Tar, &c. and under that colour the Jacobſons at this day claim ſeveral privileges.

It is obſerv'd by many hiſtorians, that the moſt flouriſhing trades have been begun by united Stocks and Policies.

In this Kingdom a Patent was firſt obtained for the erecting the Staple, from E. III. before any Act of Parliament intermeddled in that trade, and proceeded under ſeveral regulations till the time of Queen Elizabeth. In the Book I cited before Malyn's Lex Mercatoria, fol. 150. ſays, this Company of Merchants are above 400 years ſtanding, as that Book reckons from 1248. when the ſaid Merchants obtain'd privileges of John Duke of Brabant; and were call'd, the Brotherhood of St. Thomas Becket of Canterbury: which were confirm'd by King E. III. H. IV. H. V. H. VI. E. IV. R. III. H. VII. who gave them the name of Merchant-Adventurers; and after him confirm'd by H. VIII. E. VI. Q. M. Q. Eliz. and King James, not without many enemies, and oppoſers; eſpecially, ſays that Book, of late taxing them to be Monopolies and unprofitable to the Commonwealth, being that all our cloths are not dreſs'd and dy'd in England; yet it ſtill prevailed, as being thought for the publick good.

And it's obſervable, that Queen Elizabeth did not only confirm what was done by her predeceſſors, but augmented and greatly enlarg'd the privileges of this ancient Company; and confirm'd the Charter on the Muſcovy Company, granted by Philip and Mary; and ſet up ſeveral other Companies, as that of Exeter, mentioned at the bar; the Eaſt-India Company, and the Levant and the Eaſtland Company. And altho' that ancient and beneficial Company of Staplers, was often oppos'd by particular perſons, and complain'd of as a Monopoly intrenching upon the liberty of the ſubject, in ſeveral Parliaments, in the time of H. IV. H. VII. E. VI. and Queen Mary: yet all parties being heard, theſe complaints were fully anſwer'd, and the Company's privileges ratified and enlarg'd.

Again, in Queen Elizabeth's time, the Clothiers having prevailed againſt the Company; the clothing countries were almoſt quickly ruin'd, and reduc'd to that extremity, that in 29 Eliz. the Lords of the Council ſent for the members of that Company, deſiring them to reaſſume their privileges, and chearfully to proceed in their ſociety; with aſſurance of all countenance and aſſiſtance from the Government. And in the reign of King James, after ſeveral Interlopers had endeavour'd to deſtroy the Company; the King publiſh'd his Proclamation to reſtore the Company to its ancient privileges.

So did King Charles I. 7 Dec. 1634. reciting, "Whereas we have taken into our princely conſi-"deration, the manifold benefits that redound to "this Kingdom; and finding how much order and "government will conduce to the encreaſe and ad-"vancement of the ſame; we have thought fit, "with the advice of our Privy-Council, &c." There he gives an eſtabliſhment to the Company, and prohibits any to intrude upon their privileges, upon pain of ſuch puniſhments as the Star-Chamber ſhall inflict.

Since this, it may be worth conſideration, whether the breaking of this Company, has not occaſion'd the great decay of our trade in Wool: it being agreeable to reaſon, that as no Law can be effectual without Courts of Juſtice to put them in execution; nor a ſtraggling army ſubſiſt without diſcipline: ſo a ſtraggling trade manag'd by particular perſons, whilſt every one ſtrives to advance his own private intereſt, will ruin the trade in general, eſpecially ſuch a hazardous trade as this to the Eaſt-Indies, which already hath been ſo chargeable, and can only be prevented by the conduct and government of a publick ſociery: and ſurely to look after and ſettle theſe matters, properly belongs to the care and prudence of our Governors.

Now I ſhall obſerve, how the practice has been both in Queen Elizabeth's time and ever ſince, and that altho' many Charters like ours at the bar have been granted; and none ever demanded by a Judgment in Weſtminſter-hall, or ſo much as objected againſt, ſave only that of the Canary Patent, till this cauſe at the bar: and tho' ſeveral attempts have been made, both in Parliament, and in the Courts at Weſtminſter-hall, againſt Monopolies; yet this Charter, and others of the like nature, were never look'd upon under that character. For inſtance,

1. A Charter was granted 2 Eliz. to the Merchants of Exeter for the ſole trade of France, excluding all other Merchants of Exeter not of that Company; continued undiſturbed, and prevailed againſt a great oppoſition that was made againſt it in Parliament. King Edward VI. and King Philip and Mary, having granted a Charter like ours to the Ruſſia Company, which continued in peace till the eighth of Queen Elizabeth; when the Parliament taking notice of that Patent, thought fit to confirm it with all the commendations imaginable; and was ſo far from thinking it a Monopoly, that it ſays, the Commonwealth before that time had received great advantages by it; and grants, and inflicts greater and other penalties than were or could be inflicted by the Letters Patent: and it is obſervable, that there were ſome Interlopers upon that trade in thoſe days, and had been liable to the forfeitures inflicted by thoſe Letters Patent, and were therefore forced to apply themſelves to that Parliament; and did obtain a ſpecial Proviſo to excuſe thoſe forfeitures, which had not that Act of Parliament been made, they had been liable to; which I take to be an authority full, as to the caſe at the bar.

Queen Elizabeth, during her reign, granted ſeveral Charters of the like nature, which paſs'd the peruſal of her Attorney and Sollicitor, learned men in our profeſſion. In the beginning of her reign my Lord Chief-Baron Weſton was Sollicitor, Sir Gilbert Gerrard Attorney-General, and paſſed thoſe Patents both to the Ruſſia and Exeter Companies. 23 Eliz. my Lord Chief-Juſtice Popham was Attorney, and Lord-Chancellor Egerton Sollicitor, in whoſe time ſome few ſuch Charters were alſo granted like to this at the bar. And then my Lord Coke was Attorney-General, and my Lord Chief-Baron Fleming Sollicitor-General, who approved thereof; and it is obſervable, that in the 43 and 44 of the Queen, the Parliament took notice of many Patents of Monopolies, as it appears by the Book, cited at the bar; Townſend's Collections, 244, and 245. The Parliament ſeemed to be as high as ever they were in any age before, and particularly were incenſed by thoſe Patents. A liſt of all were brought in by Mr. Secretary Cecil, that were thought grievous or prejudicial to the Commonwealth; and though there were a catalogue of forty or fifty, amongſt whom that of Darcy is one, yet the Parliament nor none other complained of any Charter granted to Corporations, but they continued undiſturbed. And by the way it is not amiſs to obſerve, that Darcy's Patent was not immediately damned in Parliament, but referred to take its fate in Weſtminſter-hall; the great reaſon that guided that Judgment was, the reſtraint that was put upon the home trade; and ſo it appears in More's Reports 672. And thus ſtood theſe Charters; the China Charter, the Turky Company, the Barbary Company, the Guinea Company, all Charters of ſole trade, excluding others, remained in trade during all Queen Elizabeth's time.

But in the third year of King James, was the firſt Act made for opening a general trade to Spain, Portugal and France, to all the King's ſubjects; which could not be done in Weſtminſter-hall, as appears by the preamble to that Act; nor does that Act call thoſe Charters Monopolies, or open a free trade to any other parts of the World, but leaves all Charters of foreign trade, ſave to Spain, Portugal and France, to remain as they did before. And in the 4*th* of Jac. cap. 9. there is notice taken particularly of the Charter granted to the Exeter Merchants of the ſole trade to France; and becauſe it was thought to be damned by the general words of that Statute E. III. yet it is there enacted and declared, that the ſaid Statute of Patents, neither did nor ſhould diſſolve, annihilate or impeach the ſaid Charter, or the ſaid Company in any of their privileges, liberties, or immunities granted unto them by the ſaid Charter, any thing contained in that general Act to the contrary, notwithſtanding; and from this Act of Parliament, I obſerve two things:

I. That the Parliament thought that the Charter to Exeter for ſole trade to France, excluſive of others, was for the publick benefit and weal of that City.

II. That the Letters Patent were good in Law, and did not want the aſſiſtance of an Act of Parliament to ſupport them; for that Act does not confirm thoſe Letters Patent, but provides only that the Statute 3 Jac. ſhould not by general words be thought to impeach or deſtroy them. Now had the Parliament thought the Charter void or infirm, they might have confirmed or ſtrengthned it, as the Ruſſia Patent was; but they concluded, that had it not been for the Statute of tertio, the Charter was good to all intents and purpoſes: and this I take to be full authority in the caſe at the Bar. But to proceed, the Greenland Patent for ſole fiſhing excluſive of others, granted by Queen Elizabeth, is held good, Rolls, part. 5. fol. 3: Taylor of Ipſwich's caſe, and the caſe of the Abbot of Weſtminſter, is agreed to be Law; in Darcy's caſe, More 673. by Mr. Juſtice Dodderidge: and by the way he gives good advice to all perſons that diſpute the King's prerogative; and for the friendſhip I bear to Mr. Sandys and others that are now in Court, and I think need the advice, I ſhall read the very words of the Book: he that hews above his hands, chips will fall into his eyes; Et qui Majeſtatem ſcrutatur principis, opprimetur ſplendore ejus.

In King James's time, many Grants like ours were made, but particularly in 7 Jac. the Patent granted to the Eaſt-India Company by Queen Elizabeth, was, the advice of all her Council as well as by my Lord Hobart then Attorney-General, and Sir Francis Bacon Sollicitor-General, confirmed and allowed with the ſame clauſes as the Charter at the Bar; and ſo remained undiſturbed and uninterrupted all King James's reign, and was not thought to be any whit touched or aimed at, by the Proviſo in the Statute, 43 Eliz. cap. 1. ſect. 9. that Act only pointing at the Monopoly Patents, complained of in that Parliament of 43 of the Queen, which I mentioned before. Then comes the Statute ſo much inſiſted on by the Defendant's Counſel commonly called the Statute of Monopolies, Stat. 21 Jac. cap 3. which certainly doth not at all affect the caſe at the Bar. For firſt, this Charter is not a general Grant for the ſole buying, ſelling, making, uſing of any thing within this Realm, which are the very words of the Acts: nor does this Charter give the Eaſt-India Company, licence or toleration to do, uſe, or exerciſe any thing againſt the tenor or purport of any Law or Statute, which are the only things provided againſt by that Act. But the Parliament then ſeemed to take the ſame general care of all ſuch Charters as this at the Bar, as the Parliament did in 3 Jac. of that particular Charter of Exeter; and therefore to the end that thoſe words in the beginning of this Act of Monopolies, might not be thought to extend to Charters to Corporations for trade; there is a Proviſo, ſect. 9. that that Act ſhould not extend to any Corporations, Companies or Fellowſhips, &c. erected for the maintenance, enlargement or ordering any trade or merchandize, but leaves the ſame as they were before that Act, without any immutation: and it is obſervable, that the Parliament then thought a general ſaving ſufficient to ſupport thoſe Charters that were then in being, to Corporations for trade and merchandize; but made particular Proviſo's for the ſaving of Patents for inland commodities, viz. ſuch as Salt, Gunpowder, Ordinance, Shot, and the like.

So that this Company was in full poſſeſſion of their privilege of ſole trade, excluſive of others, all King James's, and King Charles Iſt's time; till all the prerogatives of the Crown were invaded, and the crown'd head too was taken off by Traitors and Rebels. But the providence of God having reſtored us our King, and re-inveſted him with all his undoubted prerogatives, as well as reſtored us to our ancient rights and privileges, and ſcarce, as I may ſay, warm in his Throne, but amongſt the other conſiderations that he had for the publick weal of his ſubjects, he conſiders the publick advantage of this Kingdom ariſing by trade, and amongſt them, one of his firſt thoughts are fixed upon this Company. For 3*d* of April 1661, he by his Letters Patent taking notice of the Charters of Queen Elizabeth, and King James granted to the Eaſt-India Company, and of the injuries that were done to them by the late troubles; with the advice of his Council, and approbation of Mr. Attorney Palmer, and my Lord-Chancellor Finch, he granted and confirm'd to them all their privileges. The 27*th* of May, in the 20*th* of his reign, Lord-Chancellor Finch being Attorney, and my Lord-Keeper that now is, Sollicitor, he confirms this Charter; and grants to the Eaſt-India Company other privileges, by another Charter in the 28*th* year of his reign; at which time the Lord-Keeper was Attorney, and Sir William Jones Sollicitor; he confirms the former, and grants more privileges: and in the 25*th* year of his reign, by the Charter now in queſtion, paſs'd with the approbation of the preſent Attorney and Sollicitor, men of great ability in their profeſſions, and of whom, were they not preſent, I ſhould ſay much more; the Charter to this Company was confirm'd with additional privileges.

Nor has this Charter paſs'd only the approbation of his Majeſty and Council, ſince his happy reſtauration, but the Parliament has likewiſe taken notice of it; the Statute 14 Car. II. cap. 14. takes notice of it to be of great advantage to the publick. The Stat. of the 29*th* of this King for poll-money, taxes them at twenty ſhillings for every hundred pound in Stock. In the great caſe between Skinner and the Eaſt-India Company, the Houſe of Commons defended them, even to an eruption between the two houſes.

Mr. Jenks and ſome other Linnen-Drapers and Tradeſmen of London, taking the advantage of the heats that too frequently poſſeſſed the Houſe of Commons of late years, eſpecially againſt the point of prerogative, did furiouſly attack the Eaſt-India Company, but without any ſucceſs: and this Company was never aſſaulted in Weſtminſter-hall till this cauſe at the Bar. I cannot help therefore this obſervation, that as the King by his Charter 1667, takes notice, that the Charters granted by Queen Elizabeth and King James remain'd uninterrupted till the late rebellion; ſo the Interlopers againſt the King's prerogative in this particular, and the horrid conſpirators againſt the King's life, in this laſt helliſh conſpiracy, firſt appear'd in Weſtminſter-hall about the ſame time.

As to the objections I have not yet given anſwer to, I think they are but few: my Lord Coke's opinion, cited by Mr. Pollexfen, 2 Inſt. 540. where my Lord obſerves new things, which with fair pretences prove hurtful to the Commonwealth; and amongſt them reckons that new Corporations trading into foreign parts and at home; which under the fair pretences of order and government, in concluſion tend to the hindrance of trade and traffick, and in the end produce Monopolies; does not at all concern the caſe at the Bar. For this Charter that hath continu'd for an 100 years without any interruption till of late, can neither be thought a new Corporation, or hindrance of trade; and Sir Edward Coke, when he was Attorney-General, and paſt this Charter, was as learned in the Law, as he was when he publiſh'd that Book, and was turned out of being Chief-Juſtice, did not think this Charter needed that caution.

As to the caſe of the Canary Patent between Horn and Ivy, that cannot affect the caſe at the Bar.

I. For firſt, the Judgment in that caſe was given upon the point of pleading, and not upon the validity of the Patent.

II. That Patent was in perfect oppoſition to the Statute, 3 Jac. that open'd a free trade to Spain, and therefore cou'd not be reſtrained by the King's Letters Patent, but there is no ſuch objection to our caſe.

The Counſel that argu'd for the Defendant ſeem'd to allow the Charters to the Virginia, Turky and Eaſtland Companies, which are excluſive of others, to be good; becauſe they're manag'd by a Regulation, and not by a Joint-Stock, which ſurely can make no difference: for it is a Grant of a ſole trade to them, excluſive of others, as well as the caſe at the bar. And it's as hard to get into the Turky Company, as it is into this; and may be more chargeable: for you cannot be a member of the Turky Company, but you muſt be a Freeman of the City of London; and makes you liable to all the great offices of charge in that government. But a freedom of the Eaſt-India Company, may be purchas'd at a much eaſier rate; the members of the Eaſt-India Company are as viſible as thoſe of the Turky. And tho' it was ſaid, the Eaſt-India Company were ſometimes inviſible, yet were the Turky Company infected with ſo many Interlopers as the Eaſt-India Company have; they wou'd not appear ſo glorious and ſplendid as they now do, and as I heartily wiſh they may long continue. But the King by this Charter has reſerved to himſelf a power to deſtroy and alter the whole Charter, or any part thereof, ſo as to put it into a way of regulation inſtead of a Joint-Stock, in ſuch manner as he ſhall in his great wiſdom think fit; therefore it becomes us in duty and modeſty to wait till we receive his further royal pleaſure therein. And whereas it was objected at the Bar, becauſe the King cannot lay any impoſition upon foreign trade, therefore he cannot reſtrain it:

I do not know to what end that objection was made, becauſe it does not affect the queſtion at the Bar; but leſt it may obtain the effect, that I preſume was aim'd at; I think it not amiſs to ſay, that even at this day there is much more may be ſaid in the maintenance of the King's prerogative in Weſtminſter-hall, in that caſe, than can be offer'd againſt his prerogative in this. But in as much as that and ſeveral other objections againſt the Charter proceeded from an unreaſonable as well as unmannerly miſtruſt they have of the Crown; I cannot but remember that his ſacred Majeſty was not ſo miſtruſtful of them. For he ſince his reſtauration has beſtow'd upon his ſubjects more than all his predeceſſors, put them all together, ſince the conqueſt, ever did. Nay, he in a moment frankly beſtowed upon us more than ever he deſires he ſhall be truſted with again; for by his Act of Indempnity he beſtowed upon his ſubjects their lives, liberties and eſtates, which were all juſtly and legally forfeited to him by the late rebellion; the conſideration whereof will prevent all fears and jealouſies, and promote in all loyal hearts a firm reſolution to ſacrifice their lives and fortunes, ſo freely beſtowed upon us by him, to maintain the Crown and juſt Prerogatives thereof; ſo that it may have a perpetual continuance in that royal Family, in a lawful ſucceſſion ; which I heartily pray may be ſo long as the ſun and moon endures.

From what hath been ſaid, I hope it doth plainly appear, that ſince the Law of this Land, and the Law of Nature and Nations, allow the power of making companies to manage traffick, excluſive to all others, to be in the Prince ; that this is reckoned to be inter Jura Regalia ; that no Act of Parliament does reſtrain this prerogative ; that the practice of all Europe has been accordingly ; that particularly ſuch companies have been erected in England, and thoſe companies have been in quiet poſſeſſion of their privileges, for ſuch a number of years ; that they have paſſed the approbation of many learned men ; that they have been thought for the publick advantage of the Nation, by ſo many Kings and Princes, with the advice of their council both in and out of Parliament ; that all Statutes and Authorities of Law that we can meet with in our Books, affirm it, and none that I can meet with oppoſe it.

That the Eaſt-India Company have ſolely run the hazard, and been at great expences,

In diſcovering places,
Erecting Forts, and keeping forces,
Settling factories,
And making leagues and treaties abroad :

It would be againſt natural juſtice and equity, (which no municipal law can take away) for others to reap the benefit and advantage of all this.

Eſpecially ſince all this has been occaſioned by an Act of the publick, and by the juſt prerogative of the Crown, under which they claim.

So that now, ſuppoſing the matter had been doubtful at the beginning (as yet the contrary is evident) yet after ſo many years undiſputed, and uninterrupted prerogative of the King, and the poſſeſſion of the Companies purſuant thereunto ; and yet the laws having always been open to any ſubjects who conceive themſelves grieved ; that ſpeech which Joſephus records of King Agrippa, to thoſe Jews, who after many years endeavoured to recover their loſt pretence, may be applied to theſe clamorous Interlopers :

Intempeſtivum eſt nunc libertatem concupiſcere, olim ne amitteretur certatum oportuit. Non amantes libertatis dicendi eſtis, ſed ſubditi contumaces.

And ſo the Romans anſwered Antiochus, (to ſhew the injuſtice of his demands) That he required thoſe Cities which his Predeceſſors for ſo many years had never enjoyed.

And Queen Elizabeth pleaded againſt the King of Denmark, for the rights of fiſhing upon the coaſts of Norway and New-Iſland, That neither his great-grandfather, grandfather, nor father, had exacted any thing for it ; and therefore concluded it to be unjuſt. Cambd. Eliz. ſub ann. 1600.

So that I conclude, the firſt, and, as I conceive, the only point in this caſe, that Letters Patent which give licence and liberty to the Plaintiffs to exerciſe their ſole trade to the Indies, within the limits of their Grant, excluſive of all others, is a good Grant in law.

2. I do conceive, that the Defendant trading to the Indies, contrary to this Charter, may be puniſhed by information, at the ſuit of the King ; and that this action by the Plaintiffs, is alſo well brought ; but in as much as I have detained you ſo long upon the firſt point, I ſhall treſpaſs upon your patience but a few words to this.

1. Therefore I conceive, the Plaintiff need not alledge any ſpecial damage, no more than the Grantee of a fair, market, or any other franchiſe.

2. The action is brought, and grounded upon the Grant of the ſole and intire trade ; which, as I conceive, is a franchiſe the King may grant, and is like the caſe of new inventions ; upon which Letters Patent actions are brought by every day's experience ; and the prohibiting clauſe is added, only to make the thing more notorious ; and that Interlopers, in caſe they ſhould be proſecuted at the King's ſuit, ſhould be more inexcuſable. And until you can imagine there be as many Eaſt-India Companies, as there are commoners and ſchool-maſters in England, Mary's caſe, Coke 9. can never be thought an objection. As to the objection in the 11 Rep. 88. Rolls Abridg. part 1. p. 106. Darcy's caſe, that admitting the Grant or Diſpenſation to Darcy had been good, for the ſole importing of foreign Cards ; yet that being only a Diſpenſation to the Stat. of Ed. 4. and did only exclude Darcy from the penalty of that Act, he could not maintain the action : But if in caſe that Grant had veſted an intereſt, as our Grant at the Bar does, he might have brought an action, as, my Lord Rolls ſays in the next paragraph, may be collected out of Darcy's caſe.

The caſe upon Patents of new inventions, are full authorities in the caſe at the Bar : And ſo is that caſe of the Abbot of Weſtminſter, wherein the Grant of the market for thirty days, excluſive of others, is particularly ſet forth in the action. And the Salisbury man that brought cloth to London, and ſold the ſame, contrary to that Charter, is proſecuted in an action of treſpaſs upon the caſe, at the ſuit of the Abbot ; and the writ concludes, (ſuppoſing the Grant good) In noſtri contemptum & prædicti Abbatis grave damnum ac Fr. & libertatum ſuarum prædictarum læſionem manifeſtam ; which is an authority full, as to this point.

Upon the whole matter, I am of the ſame opinion with my brothers ; and do conceive, that that Grant to the Plaintiffs, of the ſole trade to the Indies, excluſive of others, is a good Grant, and that the action is well brought :

And therefore let the Plaintiff take his Judgment.

Mr. Serj. Stringer. MAY it pleaſe your Lordſhip, and you Gentlemen of the Jury, I am of Counſel in this Caſe for the Plaintiff; and the Queſtion will be, whether the Leſſor, or the Plaintiff, hath a good title to the Tenements in queſtion; which are about three or four hundred tenements, near Radcliffe, in Shadwell Pariſh; and the ground thereof is, ſay we, the ancient Inheritance of the Church of St. Paul's, who have had the poſſeſſion thereof for four or five hundred years*. We ſhall prove leaſes down for ſome hundreds of years, till we come to that made to the Leſſor of the Plaintiff; under whom we claim. We will begin with the laſt leaſe of Dean Stillingfleet, 30 Sept. 1678. upon the ſurrender of the leaſe made by Dean Sancroft, now Lord Archbiſhop of Canterbury.

Swear Jeoffry Willan, (which was done;) it is a Church-leaſe, but yet he is a witneſs to it.

L. C. J. What Book is it? How do you prove it to belong to the Dean and Chapter of Paul's? Then Mr. Spencer was called, but could not readily come in by reaſon of the Crowd. Mr. Porter was ſworn.

Mr. Serj. Stringer. Mr. Porter, What ſay you to this Book?

Porter. Since the beginning of this ſuit, this Book was found among the writings of the Dean and Chapter of Paul's.

* The State of the queſtion being, Whether the ſeven acres in Shadwell, was part of the ancient Inheritance of the Dean of St. Paul's, to whom Mr. Neale was Leſſee, and ſo now Leſſor of the Plaintiff; or part of Wapping Marſh, that had been drein'd by one Vanderdelf, and after ſold to the Stephens's, under whom the Lady Ivy did claim.

Mr. Att. Gen. How long ago, Sir, upon your oath?

Porter. About a year ago.

L. C. J. That is but a ſlovenly account of ſuch a Book as this.

Mr. Williams. It is plain, my Lord, it is not a new Book made on purpoſe.

L. C. J. It is plain, that in this ſlippery age we live in, it is very eaſy to make a Book look as old as you would have it.

Mr. Serj. Stringer. We will go on to the leaſe made to Marcellus Hall.

Then Mr. Spencer came in and was ſworn.

Mr. Williams. Pray, Sir, when firſt ſaw you that Book?

Spencer. Seven years ago.

Mr. Att. Gen. Where, Sir?

Spencer. Among the evidences of the Dean and Chapter of Paul's.

L. C. J. What is it you would read in it? an entire leaſe, or what?

Mr. Serj. Stringer. 'Tis a ſhort note of a leaſe. Clerk reads.] A tenement with a water-mill——

L. C. J. See if the Book have any title.

Clerk. No, my Lord.

L. C. J. Let me ſee it. (which was done.)

Mr. Serj. Stringer. The 23d of Feb. 5 Ed. VI.—

L. C. J. You, Spencer, have you ſeen in any of the Books an entry of any leaſe made by Dean Collet?

Spencer. I have not obſerved that I have ſeen any leaſe of Dean Collet.

L. C. J. Have you ſeen any leaſe made by Dean Collet, in the time of Henry VIII. about any of the Church's lands? I ask you the queſtion, becauſe I obſerve here in this Paper, in two places here is the Word Dean Collet, writ with another hand than that of the Book; but Nowell is writ with the ſame hand as the other. And ſo Nowell ſeems to have been put for the maker of this leaſe, as being put upon the top; when in truth he was not Dean till long after. Upon your oath, in whoſe name was that leaſe lett that is here ſpoken of?

Spencer. I know not, my Lord, that is the Book I ſaw then.

L. C. J. Is this leaſe in your Book of leaſes?

Mr. Att. Gen. Pray, Gentlemen, you did produce before your original Deed of purchaſe, where is it now?

Mr. Williams. That Book was produced and read at the firſt trial.

L. C. J. What firſt trial? not that laſt Term.

Mr. Williams. It was in Court at that time.

L. C. J. I believe not, you are miſtaken in that; for I have brought the notes I took then, and I find no ſuch thing here.

Mr. Att. Gen. They produced then the firſt purchaſe of the Dean.

L. C. J. Is there any leaſe of Henry VIIIth's time in that Book?

Spencer. I do not remember any leaſe of Henry VIIIth's time of this land; but I have ſeen that Book ever ſince I belonged to the Dean's buſineſs.

L. C. J. Have you not a Book of the ſucceſſion of your Deans? When was Collet Dean?

Mr. Williams. In 1505.

L. C. J. When was Nowell Dean?

Mr. Williams. In 1560.

L. C. J. Then I aſſure you this Book is grandly ſuſpicious.

Mr. Att. Gen. They threaten us with forgeries, and I know not what; I believe it will be found on Mr. Neale's ſide.

L. C. J. If in caſe you come and produce a Book, and you value your ſelves upon the antiquity of it, as an evidence that this land did belong to the Dean and Chapter, and leaſed by them, 5 H. VIII. and in that Book Nowell is written by the ſame hand as the reſt of the Book, as Dean then; but becauſe you find Collet was then Dean, and Nowell not till threeſcore years after, Nowell is turned by another hand to Collet; it draws a great ſuſpicion certainly upon your Book, as ſet up for a purpoſe.

Mr. Williams. It is true, my Lord, if we did that, it were ſomething; but we find an old Book among the evidences of the Church, and we produce it as ſuch; we have not altered it, therefore it cannot be done for our purpoſe.

L. C. J. Who knows who did it? but done it is.

Mr. Att. Gen. And your title is under the Dean and Chapter of Paul's.

L. C. J. Who keeps the evidences that belong to the Dean and Chapter of Paul's?

Spencer. They are kept in the Chapter-houſe.

L. C. J. I am perſuaded there may be an ancient Book, and this may be ſuch an one; but it looks a little untoward in this particular. You, Spencer, did you look upon thoſe two particular paſſages?

Spencer. No; I did not obſerve it.

Mr. Serj. Stringer. My Lord, our next leaſe in the Book recites one made by Collet.

Mr. Att. Gen. Come, upon your oath; did not Mr. Baron, or Mr. Neale, come to ſearch in this Book?

Spencer. Yes, they did.

Mr. Serj. Lutwich. How long ago was that?

Spencer. As to Mr. Baron or Mr. Neale themſelves, I did never ſee them come to ſearch; but ſome for them have.

Mr. Williams. Do you believe the Book was thus as it is now, before you came at firſt to it?

Mr. Serj. Lutwich. You ſay they did not come to ſearch, what did they come for then, to drink?

Spencer. They have come to the Officer, Mr. Porter, but I never ſaw them ſearch.

Mr. Williams. But I ask you again, was it ſo when you found it firſt?

Spencer. I believe it was, I know of no alteration.

Mr. Serj. Stringer. But to put it out of doubt, we have this ſecond leaſe, which does recite this leaſe of Collet's.

Mr. North. Nay, my Lord, we have another piece of evidence that will fortify that Book to be true, as to the foundation of it; that ſuch a leaſe was then made as the Book ſays: for we have a kind of Particular, or Catalogue of the evidences of the Dean and Chapter. It is an ancient writing ——— And in this there is mention particularly made of a leaſe made in 5 H. VIII. Pray, Sir, look upon that, and give an account of it.

Spencer. I have ſeen this among the reſt of the evidences of the Dean and Chapter of Paul's.

Mr. Att. Gen. How long ago?

Spencer. I cannot directly tell.

Mr. Pollexfen. How long do you think, upon your oath?

Spencer. Two years ago.

Mr. Att. Gen. That is ſince this conteſt.

L. C. J. Ay, That is a little too lately for an ancient writing.

Mr.

Mr. Serj. Lutwich. Did you ſee it before Mr. Neale or Mr. Baron ordered a ſearch there?

Spencer. I cannot ſay particularly I did: I have ſeen this paper——

Mr. Att. Gen. Paper, man? It is a Parchment, pr'ythee mind what thou ſayſt: How long is it ſince you firſt ſaw that Parchment?

Spencer. I believe I have ſeen it this ſeven years; but not that I can ſwear to have taken any particular notice of it.

Mr. Att. Gen. Where did you ſee it firſt, upon your oath?

Spencer. Among the reſt of the Deeds and Evidences that belong to the Dean and Chapter of Paul's.

Mr. Att. Gen. Upon what occaſion did you take notice of it firſt?

Spencer. Upon ſearching among the writings.

Mr. Att. Gen. Who did ſearch with you at that time, upon your oath?

Spencer. Mr. Porter.

L. C. J. Read it.

Mr. Att. Gen. Was it delivered to Mr. Neale before it was brought hither?

Spencer. It is brought here now among the Dean's other writings, we never uſe to deliver any out.

Clerk reads.] This is dated 2 Eliz. 1559. Books and other writings appertaining.

Mr. Serj. Stringer. Now we will read the leaſe to Marcellus Hall; wherein this is recited to have been made.

(The leaſe in the Book was read, dated 23 Feb. 5 Ed. VI. for five and forty years, at 10 l. rent.

Mr. Serj. Stringer. Then the next leaſe is in 2 & 3 Phil. & Mar. [Which was read.

10 Dec. 2 & 3 Phil. & Mar. from Dean Fecknam to Marcellus Hall for ninety years from Michaelmas before.

Mr. Att. Gen. There is a licence to alter the mill, which we ſhall prove he afterwards did.

Mr. Serj. Stringer. Your Lordſhip obſerves here were grounds, and ſeveral houſes at this time lett, with the mill, and ponds, and ditches to receive the water. After this, Marcellus Hall aſſigned to Adrian Moor; he in the year 1618, deviſeth it to his Wife Mary Moor; and in 1630, ſhe ſurrenders, and hath a new leaſe for lives.

Mr. Att. Gen. Shew your aſſignments, Mr. Serjeant, from Marcellus Hall.

Mr. Serj. Stringer. That we cannot do, nor need we; for we are not to derive our title that way, but the Church's title is ours. We will ſhew you Dean Donne's leaſe to Mary Moor, upon her ſurrender.

Which leaſe, dated 14 May, 1630. 6 Car. I. for three lives at 10 l. &c. was read.

Mr. Serj. Stringer. Then Mary Moor, ſix years after, ſurrenders this leaſe, and takes a new leaſe for three lives in Dean Winneff's time, at 10 l. a year rent, and 40 s. increaſe.

Which leaſe dated 5 Aug. 1636. 6 Car. I. was read.

Then another leaſe dated 5 March, 1640, 16 Car. I. by Dean Winneff to Samuel Whitwick, and John Winterburn, at 10 l. the ancient rent, 40 s. before increaſed, and 4 l. more now increaſed.

Mr. Serj. Stringer. Thus far it ſtood upon leaſes for lives: this leaſe continued till 1669, till Mr. Neale bought this land, and then he renewed it from the now Archbiſhop, then Dean Sancroft, who raiſed the rent to 80 l. during the life of Freak, who was the ſurviving life, and to 100 l. after.

Which leaſe, dated 12 July, 21 Car. II. 1669. was read.

Mr. Serj. Stringer. We have brought it home now, my Lord, to the Leſſor of the Plaintiff: For we have ſhewn this leaſe was ſurrendered to Dean Stillingfleet; and thereupon he made a leaſe to Garrard and Cratford, which we have given an account of before. And ſo we have ſhewn a ſucceſſion of leaſes from the Church, for 130 odd years.

L. C. J. The laſt leaſe is at the rent of 240 l. a year, I think.

Mr. Serj. Stringer. Yes, my Lord.

Mr. Serj. Maynard. Have you done, Gentlemen?

Mr. Serj. Stringer. Yes, we have, till you give us farther occaſion, brother.

Mr. Serj. Maynard. Then, may it pleaſe your Lordſhip, and you Gentlemen of the Jury, I am of counſel in this cauſe for the Defendant, my Lady Ivy. The Plaintiffs have given you a ſort of evidence for a title; but the truth of it is, all that they ſay will not make a concluſion, ſuch as they would have from their Premiſſes: For all that they have proved, is, that the Deans of Paul's, ſucceſſively one after another, have made leaſes. They did in the beginning tell you, they had had this land hundreds of years: But what have they had? and what leaſes have they made? But only a mill, a bakehouſe, a trough of lead, and all houſes, lands, meadows and paſtures thereto belonging. We do not deny but that they are to have a mill; their leaſes are all ſo, even the new ones do moſtly follow the track and words that were uſed in Queen Mary and Henry the eighth's times. But here is the truth of our caſe: That the Dean and Chapter had a mill, we agree; nay, more than that we agree that they have eighteen acres that lie on the north ſide of Ratcliffe high-way; and alſo that they have another parcel of land, called the Lynches. That this may be underſtood, we now crave leave to deliver maps to the Court and the Jury.

Mr. Serj. Stringer. And we deſire ours may be ſeen too.

Mr. J. Withins. Aye, deliver in your maps, this is the only fit place for them.

Which was done on both ſides.

Mr. Serj. Maynard. Then, my Lord, I will go on. We agree, I ſay, they had a mill, which is now taken down and put in another place: We ſhall ſhew them where it did ſtand, and that was no part of the land now in queſtion. The Jury have ſeen the place, and I hope have had a ſatisfactory view of it. There was once a mill ſtanding, and there was once a pond, but that mill and pond do ſtand elſewhere. The land in queſtion we ſay was anciently marſh ground, and ſubject to the overflowing of the Water, and it is ſo to this day. In H. VIIIth's time, it was by one Vanderdelf, a Dutchman, drained. This, by Act of Parliament, Richard Hill was made owner of, and he convey'd it to Stepkin, who was the Defendant's anceſtor, and whoſe heir ſhe is. And the boundaries are ſet down in that, and the ſubſequent conveyances, which cannot poſſibly ſtand with thoſe that their mill is ſaid to ſtand in. We ſhall ſhew by ſeveral Records the Queen had a title to it by a conveyance in way of mortgage to her; and this afterwards was conveyed back again to the anceſtor of my Lady Ivy. We yield they had a mill, and they have increaſed the rent ſufficiently upon it, not to need

need other mens land. They have houſes built upon it, I know not indeed how much, but I think it is near 1000 l. a year that it yields to them. If then we can demonſtratively ſhew you where our ground is, and where theirs is, and if we affirm our title by Records and good Conveyances; then by a pretence to a mill I hope they ſhall not grind us, or take away all our land.

Mr. Att. Gen. My Lord, and Gentlemen of the Jury, I crave leave to anſwer the evidence that has been given, before I enter upon our title. They have ſpent a great deal of time to derive down a title to the Dean and Chapter of Paul's, to a mill, a bake-houſe, and ſome little ground thereto belonging. And truly, as Mr. Serjeant ſays, no man ever queſtioned the Dean and Chapter for their mill, and bake-houſe, and leaden trough. But the thing in queſtion is, ſeven acres and an half of land, which in the memory of man was marſh-ground: If you obſerved it, Gentlemen, upon the view how it lies, you know the North bound is the Dean's Lynches, the South bound is the Thames Wall, the Weſt bound Foxes-lane, and the Eaſt bound is the Hilly ground that is called Cock-hill. And we ſay as to all this land, it is none of the Dean and Chapter's, nor ever did paſs, or was enjoyed by this leaſe; but we ſhall ſhew you it was under another leaſe. I muſt obſerve, that it is very ſtrange upon their own evidence, that a mill, cum Pertinentiis, ſhould paſs ſeven acres of ground; and a mill that was demoliſhed ſo long ago as in Queen Mary's time, (for ſo we ſhall plainly ſhew you it was) and that theſe lands, containing ſo conſiderable a revenue, ſhould not have a ſurvey taken of them, or a boundary made of the land, that they might know what was theirs, and what their neighbours. For your Lordſhip and the Jury may obſerve in all the leaſes and conveyances down to this time, in Dean Collett's leaſe, and onward, there was nothing mentioned but a mill with the appurtenances, or a tenement with the appurtenances. But they have not one fixed boundary of their lands; and really it cannot be preſumed the Dean and Chapter ſhould be ſo ignorant. Beſides, in the ancient leaſe that they produce of Ed. VIth's time, there was a covenant to pay the quit-rent, as for lands holden of the manor of Stepney. And we did expect that they would have brought ſome of the Rolls and Records of that manor; and out of ſome ſurvey there remaining, would have given a particular teſtimony of what lands belong to the Dean, and what do not. But in truth, we ſay this is properly marſh-land, for that will be your queſtion, Gentlemen, that you are to try, I believe, at laſt: Whether theſe ſeven acres, thus bounded on Foxes-lane, Weſt; on the Thames, South; on the hilly way, called Cock-hill, or Mill-ditch, Eaſt; and on the Dean and Chapter's Lynches, North, be marſh-ground? The Dean and Chapter have given evidence of ſome leaſes, which upon the ſurrenders were delivered up to them; but there are none produced, they only read the entries in their Books. Now we ſhall demonſtrate that this mill of theirs was an overſhot-mill; for there is mention made of a leaden trough, which is the only proper inſtrument of an overſhot-mill. Therefore we will firſt ſettle (becauſe they themſelves will not) what is theirs; and then we doubt not to give you ſatisfaction that this was never any of theirs, but the undoubted Inheritance of the Stepkins; and not a foot of it belongs to any other man living. But further, ſince they will not, we ſhall produce a piece of evidence, which indeed we muſt thank Mr. Neale for; for he blabbing it about that he had a ſurvey of the manor of Stepney, which would do our work, put us upon ſearching there for it; and we have it here: and there you will find a particular of all the Dean's lands, under 33 s. and 4 d. quit-rent. And the particulars are thus deſcribed in that Book, (which ſhews that there was a tenement that ſtood by the mill, and that paid a quit-rent, and the other lands came under that quit-rent) Twenty acres, called Shadwell-field, that lieth on the North ſide of Ratcliff high-way, known at this day; and all this piece of ground, of twenty acres, is built upon and improved; which was one part of the land that came under a quit-rent, but not pretended to be any part of this. The next is five acres, called the Lynches; and it appears by the Record to be but five acres, and ſo it is meaſured now. Ratcliff high-way went on the top of the hill, and this is called the Lynch-way, not improved nor built upon; and is exactly abutted according to our Records, and decyphered by acres to an acre. Then comes the third parcel, and that only concerns you to enquire of, whether theſe ſeven acres and an half be parcel of that: And that is deſcribed in the Record to be a tenement, called Derrick-hills, which is a bake-houſe with a mill, and the lead and trough, the appurtenances of the mill, at the rent of 33 s. and 4 d. Theſe are all the parcels named of the Dean and Chapter's lands. And at the laſt trial when they produced the deed of purchaſe, whereby this was conveyed to the Dean, which I think was in H. III's time, it yielded but 3 l. a year in the whole, and now in time it is come to 2000 l. a year, without this great gobbet, which they intend now, if they can, to ſwallow up. And now as to this parcel, all they can claim is but a mill, and in the later leaſes, it is a houſe where the mill ſtood, and that we ſhall ſhew by Records where it ſtood; and it is ſaid to be called Derrick-hills, and ſituate on the Eaſt end of the marſh now in queſtion. And to go a ſtep farther, we ſhall ſhew that this was altered in Queen Mary's time; for in 5 Ed. IV. the Book wherein their leaſe is, makes mention of the mill as ſtanding; then in 10 Dec. 2 & 3 Ph. & M. there is a kind of myſtery which we ſhall by our evidence unriddle: For then though the tenant had above forty years in being and to come, he muſt renew his leaſe from Dean Fecknam at that time. Now we ſhall ſhew that the 20th of the ſame December, this place where the mill then lately ſtood, was let to John Carter, Oar-maker. There are in that place at this day, lands and houſes that yield the Dean and Chapter an hundred pounds a year, diſtinct from the Lynches and the North ground of Ratcliff high-way, and that is a very good improvement for a mill, and a bakehouſe, and a leaden trough, and a ditch for the water. Now by their leaſe in 1630, they recite that the mill was not worth the keeping up, and according to the power given them by the leaſe, 2 & 3 Ph. & Mar. to pull down the mill, it was pull'd down and built upon, and it came to yield them 100 l. a year, as it doth at this day. After this we ſhall call witneſſes to ſet forth, that in this place, in the Eaſt end of Cock-kill, in the memory of man, there was found the floor of the old mill; and there are thoſe living that can atteſt it. So we ſhall ſhew they are fiſhing in a wrong pool; they have ſufficient to anſwer their deed of purchaſe; and all the evidence that hath been given you, will appear to be only to entertain the Court with an amuſi ng nothing; and to take up the time. But we ſhall go yet a ſtep further, and ſhew beyond all peradventure, that this land in queſtion was marſh-ground: And the other ſide muſt admit, that if it be marſh-ground, the Dean and Chapter have nothing to do with it, never pretended to a foot of it, nor doth any tittle of their evidence mention marſh-ground. And truly we will admit it to them, if it be not marſh-ground, we have nothing to do with it. So that, Gentlemen, your great queſtion is, Whether this be marſh-ground, or not? And thereupon the main of the queſtion will be about the Eaſt boundary alone, and no other: For that Wapping-marſh bounded South on the Thames, North on the Lynches, and Weſt on St. Catherine's, is no queſtion, nor ever was in all the trials that have been. Therefore the only point that the evidence is to be applied unto, is about the Eaſtern boundary. That we lay to be Cock-hill, anciently called the Hilly-way, or Mill-bank, now Cock-hill; and in the Records of Stepney manor, it is called Cornhill: And it is a riſing hilly ground, it appears to be ſo to this day; I appeal to the Jury who have ſeen it. Now that this was marſh-ground, and the Inheritance of the Stepkins's, we ſhall prove by theſe ſteps. Firſt, we ſhall produce an Act of Parliament made in 27 Hen. VIII. wherein the bounds appear to be plainly the ſame as now we ſay they are at this day; only now it is all built, that is all the difference; and the marſh doth thereby contain 130 acres. Now by that Act, the whole marſh is veſted, as to one moiety, in Richard Hill, as aſſignee of Vanderdelf the Dutchman, who had drained it, and for his pains was to have one half; and he agreed with the participators, among whom Stepkins was one, and had 53 acres, and particularly this land. So that the Dean of Paul's muſt derive a title from this Act, if he will have the land. But we ſhall ſhew how they colour their poſſeſſion. Afterwards Richard Hill, 11 Nov. 37 H. VIII. he doth make a leaſe to the Dean and Chapter's miller, and that for thirty four years, wherein you will exactly ſee the boundaries of the Act are purſued. After he had leaſed it thus to the Dean's miller, he paſſeth away the inheritance to Thomas Stepkins, in time, 16 Apr. 6 Ed. VI. Marcellus Hall the miller, after Stepkins had obtained the Inheritance upon agreement between them, gets a leaſe from Stepkins of 128 years of the lands in queſtion, as you may ſee by the bouuds they are exactly the ſame; and this was in time 20 Apr. 6 Ed. VI. So the miller had now ground on both ſides the way that is called Cock-hill; on the Eaſt ſide by leaſe from Hill, on the Weſt ſide by leaſe from Stepkins. Then in point of time we ſhall come to ſhew the leaſe made to Roper. For Marcellus Hall, after he had taken this long leaſe from Stepkins, 30 Nov. 2 & 3 Phil. & Mar. doth demiſe the land in queſtion to Richard Roper, for twenty four years: And we ſhall ſhew that in all the Queen's time Roper was tenant. Then Jaſper Hill, who was the heir of Richard Hill, in 12 Nov. 5 & 6 Ph. & M. by deed, and afterwards 3 Eliz. by fine and common recovery, conveys all theſe lands particularly by name, and releaſeth them to John and Macheline Stepkin, and the heirs of John; and ſo lodged the inheritance in the Stepkins's all but that which was thus out in a long leaſe to Marcellus Hall. We ſhall prove that before Richard Hill died, he entred into a Statute to Vivold and Salvago, for a great ſum of money; and this ſtatute comes to be extended 3 Eliz. and there this land, notwithſtanding theſe leaſes, is ſeized and extended as Hill's lands. We ſhall ſhew all this land upon a commiſſion of ſewers, had a ſurvey taken of it. When we have ſhewn all theſe Records, and proved that this is marſh-ground, and not a witneſs of theirs but muſt acknowledge it to be marſh-ground, (for that place of Fox's-lane, was raiſed at leaſt nine foot, and ſo proportionably was the reſt of the ground; and it appears at this day, that upon a high tide all their cellars are overflown) I think then you will make no doubt, whether this be our land or no. And to proceed in this order that I have opened, we will firſt ſhew you the ſurvey. There was one thing I forgot about the eleven acres—

Mr. Serj. Stringer. What is it you read firſt, Sir?

L. C. J. What do you begin with, Mr. Attorney?

Mr. Att. Gen. Your Lordſhip obſerves they ſhew a leaſe from Dean Fecknam, the 10 Dec. 2 & 3 of Ph. & M. Now on the 22 Dec. in the ſame year, we ſhall ſhew Marcellus Hall, by leaſe to Carter, butts it upon the Eaſt ſide of the mill.

L. C. J. I took the notes the laſt time of your evidence, and it began in H. VIIIth's time.

Mr. Att. Gen. My Lord, when we come to our title, we ſhall go on in the ſame method we did then; but now we are only ſhewing where the lands are.

L. C. J. Go your own way.

Clerk reads.] This Indenture, made the 22d day of December, in the ſecond and third years of the reigns of our ſovereign Lord and Lady Philip and Mary, by the Grace of God, King and Queen of England, Spain, France, both the Sicilies, Jeruſalem, and Ireland, Defenders of the faith, Arch-Dukes of Auſtria, Dukes of Burgundy, Millain and Brabant; Counts of Haſpurg, Flanders, and Tyroll; between Marcellus Hall of Ratcliff, miller, of the one part, and John Carter of Ratcliffe, oar-maker of Stebunheath, of the other part; witneſſeth, That the ſaid Marcellus Hall hath demiſed, granted, and to farm lett unto the ſaid John Carter, that his wharf lying in Ratcliff, where late the mill ſtood, called Ratcliff-mill, adjoining on the Weſt upon the Eaſt ſide of the mill-ditch, alias mill-dam, reaching from thence Eaſtward 30 foot; and from the North-Eaſt corner of the ſaid mill-dam, Southward to the River of Thames, 20 foot; to have and to hold, all and whole the ſaid wharf, as is before ſpecified, with all commodities and profits belonging to the ſame, to the ſaid John Carter, to his heirs, executors, and aſſigns, from the feaſt of St. Mary the Virgin, immediately following the date of theſe preſents, until the end and term of 30 years.

L. C. J. This leaſe was read the laſt time.

Mr. Serj. Stringer. Yes, it was ſo, my Lord.

Clerk reads.] ——to be fully compleat and ended, yielding and paying therefore for the ſame, unto the ſaid Marcellus Hall, his heirs, executors, and aſſigns, ten ſhillings of lawful money of England, yearly; that is to ſay, at the feaſt of the Annunciation of St. Mary the Virgin. L. C. J.

L. C. J. For how many years is that?

Mr. Att. Gen. Thirty years.

L. C. J. What is demiſed by this leaſe?

Mr. Att. Gen. Read the particulars again.

Sir J. Trevor. My Lord, we would gladly know where they had this leaſe, that ſo it may appear whence it came; for we know they have an excellent art at finding out of Deeds.

L. C. J. Ay, come, ſhew where you had it. Let me ſee it.

Mr. Att. Gen. We did produce it at the laſt trial, and at the firſt too.

L. C. J. But that this Jury knows nothing of, and they call for ſome account of it on the other ſide.

Mr. Att. Gen. Mr. Knowles, do you know any thing of that Deed? When did you firſt ſee it?

Mr. Williams. And where had you it?

Knowles. My Lord, I had it in a garret, in a kind of a nook, about ſix foot long, and three foot and an half wide, in my own houſe, in the garret among other writings.

L. C. J. How came you to have them?

Knowles. As I was Executor to Winterburn.

Mr. Powis. Pray Mr. Knowles, will you tell upon what occaſion you looked there and found them?

Mr. Serj. Pemb. Ay, pray give an account of the whole.

Knowles. My Lord, upon the 2d of Auguſt, 1682, was the firſt time I ever ſaw my Lady Ivy to my knowledge; and ſhe was informed by one Mr. Viccarer, that I had ſeveral writings of Winterburn's: I told her I had ſo, and my Lady deſired me to ſearch among them, if there were any writings that concerned Stepkins's eſtate; I told her it would take up a month's time to look them all over, for there was a great quantity of them. She ſaid, I would do her a great kindneſs if I would look; I promiſed her I would: And upon the fourth of September, I think I found the Deed.

L. C. J. How was Winterburn concerned?

Mr. Att. Gen. They have ſhewn that he was owner of the land once.

Mr. Williams. Did you ever read over that leaſe?

L. C. J. I ask you again, how was Winterburn concerned?

Knowles. He was partner with Wright, who ſold the eſtate to Mr. Neale.

Mr. Soll. Gen. Wright ſold it to Neale, Winterburn died, and this man was his Executor, and ſo he came to the writings.

Mr. Att. Gen. But pray Mr. Knowles tell us, were theſe writings ever ſhewn to Mr. Neale?

Knowles. In the year 1669, when Mr. Neale bought this Eſtate of my Uncle Wright, the writings were all to be looked over; and upon Mr. Neale's requeſt, all the writings were ſent to his counſel, a Gentleman in Grays-Inn, one Cage, I think his name was, or ſomething like it; and there they were left three months, and I believe in my ſoul that Deed was among them.

Mr. Att. Gen. Were they brought back again?

Knowles. There were two hampers brought back.

Mr. Att. Gen. Had you any diſcourſe with Mr. Neale about this buſineſs?

Knowles. I was arreſted upon his account in an action of 2000 l. and he preſently after came and got me off from that action, and told me, Mr. Knowles, I am ſorry you were arreſted upon my account. So am I too, Sir, ſaid I; ſaid he, I do believe really you found that Deed; I did ſo, Sir, ſaid I: But, ſays he, pray will you anſwer me one queſtion ſeriouſly? That I will, two or three, if I can, Sir, ſaid I. Says he, did not my Lady Ivy, or Baniſter, foiſt the Deed into your houſe? No, ſaid I, for before ever I ſaw either of them, I had ſeen that Deed. Then I am undone, ſays he.

Mr. Williams. Who was by, pray, when this diſcourſe paſt between you and Mr. Neale?

Knowles. There was none but he and I.

Mr. Williams. It was at the tavern; Mr. Neale, I ſuppoſe, will not deny this.

L. C. J. Will he not? Will you take his word for it?

Knowles. I do ſay, I found that Deed there.

L. C. J. Read it, read the demiſe. But Mr. Knowles, let me ask you a queſtion or two: As I underſtood, you ſaid my Lady Ivy deſired you to look among Winterburn's writings, for deeds that concerned Stepkins's Eſtate?

Knowles. Yes, my Lord.

L. C. J. Where was that?

Knowles. That was at her houſe.

L. C. J. And when did you find this deed?

Knowles. I found the deed in September, before any body came to look with me, or was in the place with me.

L. C. J. Was there any body with you when you found the deed?

Knowles. No.

L. C. J. Then you found it your ſelf.

Knowles. Yes.

L. C. J. Did you read it?

Knowles. I did, the outſide; what was I concerned further?

L. C. J. Nay, do not be angry; when thou art moſt calm, thou ſpeakeſt ſo faſt a man can ſcarce underſtand thee; anſwer my queſtion fairly: you ſay you read it, what part was it you read?

Knowles. The backſide, the outſide.

Mr. Williams. There is nothing writ upon the outſide.

L. C. J. How did you gather by reading the outſide, that it concerned my Lady Ivy?

Knowles. I only read Stepkins's name.

L. C. J. Stepkins's name, you ſay?

Knowles. What deed do you ask me upon?

L. C. J. That deed, the only deed you have ſeen here. What is your chriſtian name?

Knowles. Stephen Knowles.

L. C. J. If I miſtook you, I beg your pardon; our queſtion is concerning this very deed now ſhewn to you.

Knowles. I thought you had meant the leaſe of 128 years.

L. C. J. Well then, let that paſs for a miſtake; I would know of you now ſomething concerning this deed. Look upon it—(which he did—) upon your oath when ſaw you that deed firſt?

Knowles. I cannot ſay what day it was.

L. C. J. But, look you, if I miſtook you not, (if I did, I ask your pardon again) did not you ſay you found that very deed among a great many other writings of Winterburn's, in a room, ſo many foot long, and ſo many foot wide, in your garret? Did not you ſay, that in time you ſaw my Lady Ivy firſt, upon the 2d of Auguſt, 82, that you found that deed in September following? And did not you tell us, that you did believe in your conſcience, that in the year 1669, Mr. Neale had this writing among others, ſent to the chamber of ſuch a Gentleman in Grays-Inn; that they remained there three months, months, and then were brought back again to you; and you believe in your conſcience this was one of them? And did not you ſay, when I asked you, how you came to know this belonged to my Lady Ivy; you ſaid, becauſe my Lady Ivy had ſpoke to you to look if there was any thing belonging to Stepkins, and you read the outſide of the deed, and found Stepkins's name, and ſo you knew it to concern her? Did not you ſay all this?

Knowles. I believe I did.

L. C. J. Now tell me then by the outſide of that deed, how thou can'ſt tell that belonged to Stepkins; for if thou canſt, thou art more crafty than any body here, I believe?

Knowles. I thought it had been the long leaſe, for that has Stepkins on the outſide.

L. C. J. Well, let that paſs for a miſtake; we muſt now begin again upon a new matter. When firſt ſaw you that deed?

Knowles. In September, 1682.

L. C. J. How do you know that?

Knowles. I put my hand to it.

L. C. J. Did you read the inſide of that deed?

Knowles. No, I did not.

L. C. J. Look you then, we ask you how you came to know it was a deed belonging to Stepkins?

Knowles. I read the backſide, and put my hand to it.

L. C. J. How came you to put your hand to this deed as belonging to Stepkins, when you never looked into the deed?

Knowles. When I found this deed to have written upon it, Marcellus Hall, I did believe it was ſomething that concerned the Stepkins's.

L. C. J. Let us ſee the deed now —(which was done)—You ſay that was the reaſon upon your oath?

Knowles. Yes, it was.

L. C. J. Then look upon it again, and do not be ſurprized, but let us have truth come out, in God's name. Was that the reaſon?

Knowles. It was, my Lord.

L. C. J. I would fain ſee Mr. Sutton, I have a queſtion to ask him.

Mr. Att. Gen. Here he is, my Lord.

L. C. J. Give Mr. Sutton his oath —(which was done)—Look upon the outſide of that deed, and upon your oath tell us whoſe hand-writing that is.

Sutton. All but the word (Lect.) is my hand-writing.

L. C. J. Are not the words Marcellus Hall all of your hand-writing?

Sutton. It is.

L. C. J. Then how could'ſt thou know this to belong to the Stepkins's by the words Marcellus Hall, when you firſt diſcovered this deed in September, 1682. and you found it by your ſelf, and put your hand to it; and yet that Marcellus Hall be written by Mr. Sutton, which muſt be after that time?

Mr. Att. Gen. He ſays he knows it, becauſe he put his hand to it, I ſuppoſe he read ſomewhat of the inſide.

L. C. J. He ſaid the backſide, the outſide; he did not read the inſide.

Mr. Att. Gen. My Lord, I deſire our evidence may not be anticipated.

L. C. J. Mr. Attorney, I would not anticipate your evidence; but I muſt tell you by the way, your evidence anticipate themſelves: And this fellow Knowles, without any more ado, has proved himſelf an errant notorious knave. And if your evidence will blunder and ſpoil themſelves, I cannot tell how to help it. I knew, as ſoon as I ſaw the deed, that that was Sutton's hand; I know his hand, as well as that you are Mr. Attorney.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Pray, my Lord, give me leave to ask him a queſtion, which I hope may clear all this matter, for it is plain the man is miſtaken.

L. C. J. Miſtaken! Yes, I aſſure you very groſly. Ask him what queſtions you will; but if he ſhould ſwear as long as Sir John Falſtaffe fought, I would never believe a word he ſays.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Did you look into the middle of one of the deeds?

Knowles. Yes, I did.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Can you tell which you looked into the inſide of, and which you did not?

Knowles. The leaſe and ſome others I did, but I cannot particularly tell.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Then, my Lord, here is the caſe: Here are multitudes of deeds, and a man looks on the inſide of ſome, and the outſide of others; is it poſſible for a man to ſpeak poſitively to all the particular deeds, without being liable to miſtake?

L. C. J. Mr. Sollicitor, you ſay well; if he had ſaid, I looked upon the outſide of ſome, and the inſide of others, and where-ever I ſaw either on the outſide, or in the inſide, the name of Stepkins, or Marcellus Hall, I laid them by, and thought they might concern my Lady Ivy; that had been ſomething. But when he comes to be asked about this particular deed, and he upon his oath ſhall declare that to be the reaſon why he thought it belonged to Stepkins, becauſe of the name of Marcellus Hall on the outſide, and never read any part of the inſide, when Sutton ſwears Marcellus Hall was written by him, what would you have a man ſay?

Mr. Sol. Gen. My Lord, I have but this to ſay; if there were never a deed delivered by Knowles to my Lady Ivy, or Sutton, where Marcellus Hall's name was written on the backſide of it, but by Mr. Sutton; I confeſs it were a ſtrong objection. But where there are other deeds, and a great many, a man may eaſily be miſtaken. It is impoſſible for any man in a multitude of deeds that he finds among a great parcel, and delivers many of them out, to take it upon his memory particularly, which he looked on the inſide of, and which he looked on the backſide or outſide of.

L. C. J. Did he not give it as a particular reaſon of his Knowledge, that they belonged to my Lady Ivy: For wherever he ſaw Marcellus Hall, or Stepkins, he thought that belonged to her.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Wherever he ſaw thoſe names, that is, either in the inſide or outſide.

L. C. J. Under favour, Sir, he did not ſay ſo; but poſitively ſaid, he knew it by that name. And you ſhall never argue me into a belief, that it is impoſſible for a man to give a true reaſon, if he have one, for his remembrance of a thing.

Mr. Sol. Gen. I beg your pardon, my Lord; as I apprehend him, he ſwore he looked into the inſide of ſome, and the outſide of others, and there were a great many of them.

L. C. J. And I beg your pardon, Mr. Sollicitor, I know what he ſwore as well as any body elſe: If indeed he had ſworn cautiouſly, and with care, it might have been taken for a ſlip, or a miſtake.

Mr. Att. Gen. My Lord, we muſt leave it upon its own weight; but we are not come to our title yet: I have the deed in my hand, which is a very old one, and therefore needs not ſuch exact proof.

He is mistaken, we do own it; and I must appeal to the Court, whether a man may not be mistaken in a great multitude of deeds.

L. C. J. Well, now after all this is done, let him give an account how he came to know this to belong to Stepkins, or my Lady Ivy, if he can. I speak it not to prejudice your cause, but only to have the truth come out. But for the witness that swears, it may affect him, I assure you. Give him the deed, and let him look upon it--Look upon the inside, and look upon the outside too.

Knowles. I believe, my Lord, upon better consideration, I have read this deed before now.

L. C. J. Very well, and yet you swore the contrary just now.

Knowles. I was in a maze, my Lord.

L. C. J. I am sure thou sworest wildly.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Pray what deed did you take it to be at first?

Knowles. The lease of 128 years.

L. C. J. Pr'ythee read it now to us.

Knowles. Reads—This Indenture made the 22d day of Dec.—

L. C. J. Between whom?

Knowles. Reads. — Between Marcellus Hall of Ratcliff, miller, of the one part, and John Carter, oar-maker, of the other part, witnesseth, that the said Marcellus Hall hath demised, granted, and to farm letten to the said John Carter, all that wharf lying in Ratcliff, where late a mill stood, called Ratcliff mill.----

L. C. J. Can you say you ever read so much before?

Knowles. I believe I did.

L. C. J. When was it?

Knowles. In September, 1682.

L. C. J. Then you read it before you shewed it to my Lady Ivy?

Knowles. Yes, my Lord.

L. C. J. And you found what the contents were by reading?

Knowles. Yes, my Lord.

L. C. J. Did you read it through?

Knowles. No, I did not, I believe.

L. C J. How far do you think you read?

Knowles. As far as I have read now.

L. C. J. Did you find any thing there of the name of Stepkins?

Knowles. No, not in that I did not.

L. C. J. I would desire to know of you, who it was that came to my Lady Ivy, to inform her you had such and such writings?

Knowles. It was one Mr. Vicarer, about a trial that was to have been two or three years ago, at the bar of the Court of King's-Bench here; but the cause did not then go on: After that, Mr. Vicarer did tell my Lady, that one Knowles had a great company of writings that were Winterburn's; and she desired him that he would please to talk with me, to see if I could do her any kindness or service in any of those deeds. The first time that I saw her was the 2d of August, as near as I can remember, and then I told her, I was Executor to Winterburn, and had a great many writings; said she, do you know the hand of Stepkins? if you do, and can find any writings that relate to Stepkins, you will do me a great kindness.

L. C. J. Did she name any body else to you?

Knowles. She named one Lun, and one Barker, and one Holder, and several others; I do not remember all.

L. C. J. Was there any mention made of one Collet?

Knowles. No.

L. C. J. Was there of one Donne?

Knowles. Of one Lun there was.

L. C. J. Of one Fecknam?

Knowles. No.

L. C. J. Of one May?

Knowles. No.

L. C. J. Of one Joan Hall?

Knowles. No.

L. C. J. Was there any mention made of any Hall?

Knowles. Yes, there was.

L. C. J. What Hall did she speak of?

Knowles. I am not certain whether any Hall was named or no.

Mr. Att. Gen. He says, he is sure there was of Stepkins, and several others, but not of any Hall.

L. C. J. He does so, Mr. Attorney. But now I would ask him this question; If there were no mention of any Hall, how came you to find out that this lease from Marcellus Hall to Carter, should affect Stepkins, or my Lady Ivy?

Knowles. My Lord I will give you an account of that.

L. C. J. Ay, do if you can.

Knowles. This was at the first time that I saw my Lady Ivy, that this discourse was between us; upon another discourse at another time, Hall was mentioned to me.

L. C. J. How many names did she tell you of at first?

Knowles. I cannot remember them all.

L. C. J. He remembers as punctually as can be the 2d of August to be the first time that ever he saw my Lady Ivy; and then she spoke to him of looking for writings that concerned Stepkins, and Lun, and Barker; and he remembers such a day, the fourth of Sept. 1682, he found the deeds; but he will not give any account how he came to know by Hall's name, that this belonged to Stepkins. I would fain know when you first heard of the name of the Halls?

Knowles. It was all within a month's time.

L. C. J. Who was it first spoke to you to enquire about the Halls?

Knowles. My Lady Ivy spoke to me about Hall when I gave her account of some deeds I had found.

L. C. J. How often did you look over the writings?

Knowles. Several times.

L. C. J. The first time did you give my Lady Ivy an account that you had found any thing?

Knowles. Yes, I gave her an account of the lease of 128 years.

L. C. J. Did you find nothing else but that?

Knowles. Yes.

L. C. J. What did you find else?

Knowles. Several: I cannot give an account of all.

L. C. J. Did you find that lease, or this deed first?

Knowles. The lease.

L. C. J. When did you first find this deed?

Knowles. The 4th of September I found the lease, and within fourteen or fifteen days after I found the rest.

L. C. J. How many deeds did you find out?

Knowles. Half a score.

L. C. J. Who was by when you found the deeds the second time?

Knowles.

Knowles. When I had found the leaſe for 128 years, I laid it by, and looked further for other things, and found a mortgage which concerned my ſelf, and that made me more eager to look for what might concern me beſides; that I was not ſo careful as I ſhould have been of the leaſe of 128 years, but mixed it among the writings again: but I told my Lady I had found ſuch a deed, and ſhe ordered Mr. Baniſter to help me to find it again.

L. C. J. Prithee anſwer me once more? Who firſt put you in mind of looking after the Halls?

Knowles. My Lady Ivy.

L. C. J. Was any body by, when ſhe ſpoke to you to look after the Halls?

Knowles. Yes, Mr. Baniſter was by.

L. C. J. Who elſe?

Knowles. Several of my Lady's ſervants.

L. C. J. Name ſome of them that were by.

Knowles. There was Mr. Baniſter's wife and his daughter by.

L. C. J. What day was it my Lady Ivy firſt ſpoke to you to look after the Halls?

Knowles. Within a week after I firſt ſaw her.

L. C. J. Was it before you found the leaſe, you ſpeak of?

Knowles. Yes, it was before.

L. C. J. How comes it to paſs then, that you did not find it at the firſt looking, which was the 4th of September, when you found that leaſe, you ſay?

Mr. Att. Gen. We muſt lay aſide the teſtimony of this man.

L. C. J. Ay, ſo you had need.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Pray leave the deed in Court, we ſhall have Mr. Neale too buſy with it elſe.

Mr. Att. Gen. We ſhall deſire your Lordſhip to conſider all the uſe we make of this deed, is to prove, that the mill was removed to another place.

L. C. J. I do not know what it proves, but if you had kept your witneſs Knowles, in the mill, I think you had done better than brought him hither.

Mr. Att. Gen. Swear Mr. Baniſter and Mr. Clerk. (which was done.)

Mr. Sol. Gen. Did you examine that with the Roll, Sir? (ſhewing him a paper.)

Mr. Clerk. Yes, Sir, I did examine that with the Book that Mr. Northy ſhewed me; I think they ſay he is ſteward of the manor of Stepney; he read in the book, and I read the copy; and it is a true copy of a ſurvey of that manor, taken 25 Eliz.

Mr. Att. Gen. I heard ſay you have the books of the manor here, pray let them be produced.

Mr. Williams. You are merry, Mr. Attorney, if it is a true copy, pray let it be read.

Clerk reads.] The Dean of St. Paul's holds freely of fee one field, containing by eſtimation—

L. C. J. Who is Lord of the manor of Stepney now?

Mr. Powis. My Lady Wentworth is Lady of the manor.

Clerk reads.] The Dean of St. Paul's holds.

L. C. J. This bounds it on the Eaſt, on the Dean and Chapter of Paul's lands, and ſo doth you no good.

Mr. Williams. Let them go on, my Lord.

Mr. Att. Gen. With ſubmiſſion, theſe are our exact boundaries.

L. C. J. Well, go on.

Mr. Att. Gen. We ſhall go on; and with ſubmiſſion theſe bounds exactly agree with the bounds that are ſet by the Act of Parliament for dreining the marſh. Here is nothing that we can ſee that they can claim but a mill and bake-houſe, and they are all bounded on the Weſt by Wall Marſh; and the Lynches are bounded in part upon the North, and in part upon the Weſt; and there was a little part of the marſh did run into the North bounds. But now we ſhall come to our evidence; and firſt we ſhall ſhew the Act of Parliament.

Which being Anno 22, H. 8. was read.

Mr. Att. Gen. Next, we ſhall ſhew Richard Hill's conveyance by mortgage, to Vivold and Salvago.

Which Indenture of mortgage was read.

Clerk reads.] This Indenture made the eighth day of November, in the 32d year of our ſovereign Lord King Henry the eighth, between Richard Hill citizen and mercer of London, on the one party, and Anthony Vivold, and Henry Salvago, Merchants, of of the other party; witneſſeth, That where the ſaid Richard before time was indebted unto the ſaid Anthony Vivold, and H. Salvago in the ſum of 560 l. of lawful money of England, whereof they of their free will have pardoned 280 l. The ſaid Richard Hill by theſe preſents All that moiety of marſh-ground being 130 acres, lying and being that is to ſay, from Ratcliffe mill, that joins to the Hilly Lynch to Ratcliffe Town, on the party of the Eaſt; to Graſh Mill by the Hermitage, on the party of the Weſt; on the high-way, leading from London to Ratcliff, on the party of the North; and on the River of Thames, on the party of the South given and aſſured to the ſaid Richard Hill, by authority of Parliament in the 27th year of the moſt noble Reign to have and to hold—

Mr. Att. Gen. This doth veſt the lands in queſtion, with others, in Vivold and Salvago, as a ſecurity for their money.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Now we ſhall ſhew a leaſe from Hill to Marcellus Hall.

Clerk reads.] This Indenture made the eleventh day of November, in the thirty ſeventh year of the Reign of Henry the eighth; between Richard Hill, citizen and mercer of London, of the one party, and Marcellus Hall of Ratcliff, miller, of the other party; witneſſeth, That the ſaid Richard Hill, for the ſum of ſix pounds of lawful money of England, to him in hand paid, at the enſealing and delivery hereof, whereof the ſaid Richard Hill hereby acknowledgeth himſelf to be fully ſatisfied, contented and paid; and whereof he doth clearly acquit and diſcharge the ſaid Marcellus Hall, his Executors and Adminiſtrators by theſe preſents, hath demiſed, granted, and to farm letten, and by theſe preſents doth demiſe, grant, and to farm lett unto the ſaid Marcellus Hall, a parcel of marſh-ground, lying and being at the Eaſt end of the marſh that butts on Ratcliff hilly marſh wall-bank, or wall belonging and the well Shadwell, containing by eſtimation eleven acres and an half, more or leſs, abutting on the Thames Wall, on the party of the South; to the lands called the Dean's Lynches, on the party of the North; and on the wall that reaches from the Lynches to the Iſland, by the pond on the Weſt, with all the foreland and ſoil. All which marſh-land is in the Pariſh of Stebunheath to have and to hold the the marſh-land foreland and ſoil to the ſaid Marcellus Hall, from the feaſt of the Annunciation of St. Mary the Virgin next coming, for thirty and four years—

Mr. Att. Gen. This was a leaſe made to their miller, and contains eleven acres and half an acre, which we ſhall ſhew is juſt exactly the contents of our land. Next then we ſhall come to the conveyance made to Thomas Stepkin, which will bring us to our title.

L. C. J. Read the reſervation of that leaſe.

Clerk reads] Yielding and paying therefore yearly, and every year unto the ſaid Richard Hill, his Executors and Aſſigns, three pounds of good and lawful money of England, at four terms of the year, that is to ſay, the feaſt of the Nativity of St. John the Baptiſt, St. Michael the Arch-angel, the Birth of our Lord, and the Annunciation of St. Mary the Virgin.

Mr. S. Pemberton. Pray, my Lord, we deſire they may give ſome account of this leaſe, where they had it, and how they came by it.

Mr. Att. Gen. You have had it in your hands, you ſee what it is.

Mr. S. Pemberton. Yes, and therefore we deſire to know ſomething about it, becauſe we find Knowles's hand to it.

Mr. Att. Gen. We can give you a better account of it than you think for, but that will let you into an hour's wrangle more, which is all you have to ſay for your ſelves. We have it, diſprove it.

Mr. S. Pemberton. You have it, we ſee; but remember you will give no account where you had it. But then we deſire to ask Mr. Knowles a queſtion, Whether my Lady Ivy was with him—

Mr. Att. Gen. My Lord, we deſire we may go on and give our evidence intire; they would fain break in upon us, and take up another hour in quarrelling with our witneſs. When we hear them in their time offer to impeach the validity of the deed, then will be our time to juſtify it; and I doubt not but we ſhall give a ſatisfactory account of it. Pray will you give an account of the deed you ſnap'd up the laſt time.

L. C. J. Nay, nay, Gentlemen, we cannot take up our time in your dialogues and little heats. Do you not hinder them, and we ſhall ſee they ſhall not hinder you when it comes to your turn.

Clerk. This deed has been read for the Plaintiff and Defendant, and is marked ſo.

Mr. Att. Gen. It has been twice read before.

L. C. J. Well, will you go on, Gentlemen?

Mr. Sol. Gen. Then we ſhall ſhew this deed-poll next.

Clerk. This alſo is marked to have been read twice. (Reads) This is dated, 16 Apr. in the 6th year of King Edward the ſixth.

To all faithful People to whom this preſent writing ſhall come, I Richard Hill, citizen and mercer of London, ſend greeting in our Lord God everlaſting. Know ye that I the ſaid Richard Hill, for the ſum of one hundred and thirty pounds of lawful money of England, by Thomas Stepkins, alias Stipkin, of the Pariſh of St. Mary Matfellon alias Whitechappel, in the County of Middleſex, beer-brewer, unto me the ſaid Richard Hill in hand paid, wherewith I confeſs my ſelf to be well and truly ſatisfied.

L. C. J. Upon whoſe account is it that my brother Gregory comes here?

Mr. Serj. Stringer. My Lord, Mr. Baron Gregory was deſired by the Plaintiff to be here; and as ſoon as we come to our reply, we ſhall ask him ſome queſtions; if he pleaſe to ſtay, we will diſpatch him ſo ſoon as we can.

Mr. Att. Gen. Nay, rather than trouble Mr. Baron to ſtay, we yield he ſhould be examined now.

Mr. Bar. Gregory. I am not in ſo much haſte, my Lord, but I can ſtay a while, and not break in upon the middle of an evidence for me.

L. C. J. If you pleaſe, they conſent you may be examined, and they may be long.

Mr. Bar. Gregory. I would not interrupt the courſe of evidence.

L. C. J. Nay, we will take you at your word; but if it be long, pray remember we would have eaſed you, but you complimented yourſelf out of it; now you are like to abide by it a while, I aſſure you, brother. Go on.

Mr. Serj. Pemberton. I hope they will give ſome account of this deed firſt.

Mr. Att. Gen. When you ſay any thing againſt it, Mr. Serjeant, we will; but we deſire now to go on with our evidence. Read that deed.

Clerk reads.] This has been read before, and is marked.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Now read the Proviſo.

Clerk reads.] And the ſaid Marcellus Hall for himſelf, his executors, and aſſigns, covenanteth and granteth to and with the ſaid Thomas Stepkins, his Heirs and Aſſigns; that he the ſaid Marcellus Hall, his Executors and Aſſigns, ſhall and will bear all manner of charges—And it is further covenanted, granted, and agreed between the ſaid parties, that it ſhall not be lawful for the ſaid Marcellus Hall, his Executors or Aſſigns, to alienate or aſſign this preſent term of years, or any part thereof, without the ſpecial licence and conſent of the ſaid Thomas Stepkins, his Heirs and Aſſigns——

Mr. Williams. Pray, my Lord, will you give me leave to ask a queſtion of Mr. Baniſter?

Mr. Att. Gen. My Lord, he has not been examined yet, they cannot, under favour, ask him any queſtions.

Mr. Williams. You have ſworn him, and ſo he is under an oath, and we may doubtleſs examine him as your witneſs to this deed that you have read. Is that your name, Sir? [ſhewing the deed of 16 April.

Baniſter. This is my name, written by my own hand.

Mr. Williams. When did you write your hand there, Mr. Baniſter?

Baniſter. The 16th of April, 1682.

Mr. Williams. Pray Sir, look upon it again.

Baniſter. This is my hand, and I writ it my ſelf when the deed was found; I writ a paper of ſuch deeds as were found at the ſame inſtant of time.

Mr. Williams. And you writ it when you found it?

Baniſter. I writ that name at that inſtant of time.

Mr. S. Pemberton. When was it, do you ſay?

Baniſter. The 16th of Sept. 1682.

Mr. Williams. Are you ſure of it?

Baniſter. Yes, I am ſure of it.

Mr. S. Pemberton. Juſt now it was April.

Baniſter. It was in September, 1682. I writ this paper at the ſame time.

L. C. J. Where did you write this name to this deed?

Baniſter. At Mr. Knowles's houſe.

L. C. J. When was the firſt time that you ſaw that deed?

Baniſter. The very ſame day that I writ my name and this paper.

L. C. J. Did he find the deed or you? Let me ſee it. (which was done.

Baniſter. He had found that deed before, but had miſlaid it, and deſired my aſſiſtance to find it again.

L. C. J. Where did you find it?

Baniſter. In a garret in Mr. Knowles's houſe.

Mr.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Were there not a great many deeds there?

Baniſter. Yes, there were a great many.

L. C. J. Prithee look upon it again, and conſider what thou ſay'ſt.

Baniſter. This is my name.

L. C. J. Very well; and how came thy name there?

Baniſter. This is the very deed I looked upon at that time.

L. C. J. Where did you firſt ſee that deed?

Baniſter. I was at the finding of it in a garret at Mr. Knowles's houſe.

L. C. J. That was in Sept. 1682, you ſay.

Baniſter. Yes, in Sept. 1682. I never ſaw it before.

L. C. J. Pray who are parties to that deed?

Mr. Williams. My Lord, it is the purchaſe of the Inheritance.

L. C. J. It is ſo; and how ſhould that come to be in the poſſeſſion of Knowles?

Baniſter. I never ſaw it before that time.

L. C. J. Read it again.

Clerk reads.] —This is dated the 16th of April, in the ſixth year of Edward the ſixth. To all faithful—

Mr. Sol. Gen. Certainly, my Lord, he is under a miſtake.

L. C. J. Ay, ſo he is ſure enough, but a very foul one upon my word: But let us ſee if we can bring him out of it. Mr. Baniſter, let me ask you a queſtion.

Baniſter. Yes, my Lord, if you pleaſe.

L. C. J. Then pray mind what I ſay, and conſider of it. The 16th of September, 1682, was the time that you went on purpoſe to look for deeds at Mr. Knowles's houſe?

Baniſter. I was there on the ſeventh day of September, and that was the firſt day that ever I came into Mr. Knowles's houſe in my life.

L. C. J. There were ſome deeds, it ſeems, that Mr. Knowles had found before.

Baniſter. So Mr. Knowles ſaid.

L. C. J. What became of thoſe deeds he had found before?

Baniſter. As he told me, he had miſlaid them.

L. C. J. And when did you come to have an account that he had found thoſe deeds firſt?

Baniſter. It was after I had paid him 3 l. for water.

L. C. J. When was the firſt time that he ſpoke of it?

Baniſter. It was the fifth or fourth of September.

L. C. J. And when did you firſt go thither?

Baniſter. On the 7th of September he deſired me to come and help him, and aſſiſt him in finding out the deeds that he had miſlaid.

L. C. J. What do you know of this deed?

Baniſter. We found one deed—

L. C. J. Look upon that carefully, is that your hand?

Baniſter. That is my hand.

L. C. J. Do you remember when you put your hand to that deed?

Baniſter. The paper I have in my hand was written at the ſame time.

L. C. J. Look upon that paper, and conſider it well; and now tell us whether you found that deed firſt, or Mr. Knowles.

Baniſter. Mr. Knowles.

L. C. J. Now look upon it, and look upon it carefully, when was it?

Baniſter. This deed came into my hands the ſame day that I writ this note.

Mr. Att. Gen. My Lord, we deſire we may go on with our evidence, and not have them break in upon us to examine any ſuch thing till their time comes; if they have any thing to object againſt our witneſſes, let them take their time.

Mr. S. Pemberton. Mr. Attorney, we are very regular ſure in what we do; you produce a deed, and we deſire an account how you came by that deed; and finding Mr. Baniſter's name, who is your witneſs, and ſworn by you, we would know of him what he knows of it.

L. C. J. Ay ay, let truth come out in God's name. Look upon it, Mr. Baniſter, once more. What ſay you to it?

Baniſter. This is the ſame deed, and my hand.

L. C. J. Upon your oath, Sir, when did you firſt ſee that deed?

Baniſter. This deed I ſaw the 7th of Sept. 1682.

L. C. J. Where?

Baniſter. In the garret at Mr. Knowles's houſe.

L. C. J. Did you find it firſt, or Mr. Knowles?

Baniſter. I cannot tell, it may be I might.

L. C. J. Are you ſure you then put your name to that deed?

Baniſter. I did put my hand upon this ſame deed the 7th of Sept. 1682.

L. C. J. Prithee look upon it again, and look very carefully upon it. [Which he did for a good while together.

L. C. J. Now look upon your note again.

Mr. Att. Gen. Pray do ſo, and peruſe it carefully, and ſee whether that Deed be in your note.

L. C. J. Nay, good Mr. Attorney, let us have no directions. What ſay you?

Baniſter. I ſet my hand to ſeveral deeds that I found there, to ſome writings on the 7th of September, and to others on the 16th.

L. C. J. Now tell us, which of them it was that thou didſt put thy hand upon, this deed?

Baniſter. I believe it might be the 7th.

L. C. J. Didſt thou not ſee that deed before the 7th of September, 1682, upon thy oath?

Baniſter. No, never.

L. C. J. Who was with you when you firſt found that deed?

Mr. Att. Gen. Pray, my Lord, let this note be read, and that will clear all.

L. C. J. No, by no means, Mr. Attorney; he may make uſe of what notes he pleaſes, to refreſh his own memory; but we will never ſupport or prop up a perjury at that rate, I aſſure you, by a note. Was Mr. Knowles with you when you found that deed?

Baniſter. He was.

L. C. J. Do you take it upon your oath that that deed was found the 7th of September, 1682, in the garret at Mr. Knowles's houſe?

Baniſter. I cannot tell which of the two, it was the ſeventh or the ſixteenth.

L. C. J. Was it one of the two, upon your oath?

Baniſter. It was one of the two.

L. C. J. Now call Mr. Knowles again.

Mr. Williams. There he is, my Lord; if your Lordſhip pleaſe to look upon the deed—Knowles's name was to it likewiſe, but ſcraped out.

L. C. J. Well, we will ask him about it. But Mr. Baniſter poſitively ſwears he was at the finding of this deed. What ſay you Knowles?

Knowles. I know nothing of it, my name is not to it.

Mr.

Mr. Williams. Was your name ever to it, or not?

Knowles. No, never.

Mr. Dobbins. But it was to it at the trial in Michaelmas term.

L. C. J. Did you ſet your name to all the deeds you found in the garret?

Knowles. Yes, I did.

L. C. J. Upon your oath, Baniſter, did you ſet your name to any deeds that he did not, that were found there?

Baniſter. I believe I might do ſo, I would not ſwear punctually to it.

L. C. J. Was he with you?

Baniſter. He was with me in the very ſame chamber.

Knowles. I do not know that ever I put my hand to that deed in my life.

L. C. J. Did you ever ſee that deed?

Knowles. I cannot ſay I did, I remember nothing of it.

L. C. J. I ask you once again, when you found this deed, was he with you?

Baniſter. Yes, Sir.

L. C. J. You, Knowles, did you ever truſt him to look and ſearch any deeds in your garret, but when you were by your ſelf?

Knowles. No, my Lord.

L. C. J. Then I would ask you upon your oath, becauſe you are the perſons that had theſe deeds in your cuſtody; was there any deeds delivered out of your hand that you did not ſet your hand to?

Knowles. I believe there was never an one.

L. C. J. How came this deed which he ſwears was found there, not to have your hand to it?

Knowles. I do not know that ever I ſaw it.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did Mr. Knowles ſay he was looking for deeds of his own concern when he found the firſt deed?

Baniſter. He did ſay he had looked before, and had found ſome of theſe deeds, and then miſlaid them, and deſired my aſſiſtance to find them again.

L. C. J. What did he ſay to you at firſt?

Baniſter. He ſaid he had been ſpoken unto by my Lady Ivy, to look for deeds that might concern her anceſtors; and he had found ſome: But finding ſome alſo that concerned himſelf, he had miſlaid my Lady's, and deſired me to help him to find them again.

L. C. J. What employment have you under my Lady Ivy?

Baniſter. I am her rent-gatherer.

L. C. J. Her bailiff, I ſuppoſe: But now you ſpeak of what my Lady Ivy deſired of Knowles, I would ask you a queſtion, leſt it ſlip out of my memory. Were you preſent at any time when my Lady Ivy ſpoke to Mr. Knowles to look after any deeds?

Baniſter. Yes, I was.

L. C. J. Pray tell us whoſe deeds ſhe deſired him to look?

Baniſter. The deeds he ſaid he had miſlaid.

L. C. J. What were they?

Baniſter. The deed of Richard Hill, and the deeds belonging to Stepney and Shadwell.

L. C. J. What names did ſhe mention to him, that ſhe would have looked after?

Baniſter. She did mention ſome.

L. C. J. Upon your oath, did ſhe mention any deeds made by Dr. Donne Dean of St. Paul's?

Baniſter. No.

L. C. J. By one May, Dean of St. Paul's?

Baniſter. No.

L. C. J. Was one Lun named?

Baniſter. No.

L. C. J. Or one Holder?

Baniſter. Not that I know of.

L. C. J. Did ſhe mention one Joan Hall?

Baniſter. I do not know that my Lady Ivy gave particular order for any of theſe names.

L. C. J. Did ſhe, upon your oath, name Marcellus Hall to you?

Baniſter. No, my Lord.

L. C. J. Upon your oath, Knowles, was not he by when my Lady named Marcellus Hall to you?

Knowles. He was, my Lord.

Baniſter. I did not hear my Lady name that name at all.

L. C. J. No; he heard her give order for no particular deeds, neither for Holder, nor Lun, nor Marcellus Hall, but only concerning Stepney and Shadwell.

Sir Edw. Herbert. Baniſter, did he ſay he had before found them, and miſlaid them?

Baniſter. Yes.

Mr. Att. Gen. Upon your oath, what deed do you take that to be, which is produced?

Mr. Powis. Can you read it, yea or no?

L. C. J. Mr. Powis, do you think my Lady Ivy ſent Baniſter to look after deeds that he could not read? that were very pretty.

Mr. Att. Gen. What deed do you take it to be?

Mr. Sol. Gen. Let me ask you one queſtion, Mr. Baniſter; Did you ever ſet your hand to any deeds that were not found at Mr. Knowles's?

Baniſter. Yes, I have.

Mr. Lutwich. Upon what occaſion did you put your hand to them?

Baniſter. Becauſe they were ancient deeds, and I was to look out where the hands were that they did concern.

Mr. Att. Gen. Pray now anſwer my queſtion; look upon it, and tell me what deed do you take it to be?

Baniſter. It is a deed of ſale to Stepkins.

L. C. J. It is ſo, you are in the right of it; and now upon your oath, where did you find that deed of ſale?

Baniſter. My hand is to it, and this is one of the deeds, I take it to be ſo, that was found in the garret at Mr. Knowles's houſe.

L. C. J. He has ſaid ſo, I know not how often.

Mr. Att. Gen. He is not himſelf.

L. C. J. How can I help that, Mr. Attorney? But what he ſays, is plain.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Pray read over the note you have in your hand to yourſelf, and remember all the deeds that are particularly therein contained.

L. C. J. Let him read his note, (which he did) and now ask him what you will.

Mr. Att. Gen. Is there any deed of the 16th of April, 6 Edw. 6. from Hill to Stepkins, in that note?

L. C. J. That is no fair queſtion, Mr. Attorney.

Mr. Att. Gen. With your favour, my Lord, I conceive it is; for that will make it plain that he is miſtaken.

L. C. J. I believe he is; but with your favour, it is not a fair queſtion; you are only to ask him, whether that deed given in evidence be there?

Mr. Sol. Gen. I would ask him one ſhort queſtion, my Lord, and I think it is a fair one.

L. C. J. Ay, in God's name ask what fair queſtions you will, but no leading ones.

Mr.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Your witneſs is drunk, Madam—(To my Lady Ivy.)

Mr. S. Lutwitch. My Lord, he does not underſtand what he ſays, that is plain.

L. C. J. Brother, all knaves are fools in one kind too.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Have you read the date of that deed?

Baniſter. Yes.

Mr. Att. Gen. My Lord, if you pleaſe, we will go on with our other evidence a while, and let him recollect himſelf and conſider of it.

L. C. J. With all my heart; but I think the more he conſiders, the worſe he is; and ſo he will be to the end of the chapter.

Mr. Att. Gen. They have called to us, my Lord, for an account of this deed; we ſhall now prove that Mr. Neale knew of this deed before. Swear Mr. Butler; (which was done.)

L. C. J. What is your name?

Butler. William Butler.

Mr. Att. Gen. Pray, Sir, will you tell the Court and the Jury, what diſcourſe you had with Mr. Neale, and what he ſaid about a deed, and when?

Butler. I never ſaw the leaſe; but as I was here at the laſt trial, when there was a verdict for this Eſtate to be my Lady Ivy's: and afterwards, the 22d of December laſt, I had an opportunity of being with Mr. Neale, he being with Mr. Brian, my Lady's husband, ſince dead, at the King's-Head tavern, with whom I had ſome buſineſs. Mr. Brian was there firſt, (I ſuppoſe it was by appointment they met) and in half an hour Mr. Neale came up ſtairs. After they had changed two or three complements, they came to talk about meeting at Mr. Attorney-General's chamber, in the Temple, to treat about their controverſy. Says Mr. Neale, let there be a forfeiture upon it of 50 l. to be paid by him that fails. No, ſays Mr. Brian, I will make no forfeiture, but I will certainly meet there. Says Mr. Neale again; And I queſtion not but to give ſuch ſatisfaction, as whereby to convince you and my Lady, that this is not her Eſtate. I ſhould be glad to hear that, ſays Mr. Brian: why, I hope you do not think the deeds are forged? No, ſays Mr. Neale, I do not think they are forged. Mr. Knowles offered me a long time ago, to ſhew me that deed, and I might have had it in my poſſeſſion; but I would not: for if I had, I ſhould have been the apteſt man in the world to burn it. This is all I can ſay.

L. C. J. And what is this to the purpoſe, Gentlemen? Alack-a-day, this is very thin; a ſlight diſcourſe in a tavern: How can any anſwer be given to ſuch an evidence? tho' indeed it does not need any. Pray let not our time be taken up with ſuch trifling ſtories of a cock and a bull; go on to that which is material.

Mr. Att. Gen. Now we ſhall produce a leaſe from Marcellus Hall to one Roper, of part of this eleven acres and an half.

Clerk reads.] This Indenture made the 13th day of November, in the 2d and 3d years of the reigns of our ſovereign Lord and Lady Philip and Mary, by the Grace of God, King and Queen of England, Spain, France, both the Sicilies, Jeruſalem, and Ireland; Defenders of the faith, Arch-Dukes of Auſtria, Dukes of Burgundy, Millan, and Brabant; Counteſs of Haſburg, Flanders, and Tyrole; between Marcellus Hall of Ratcliff, miller, of the one party, and Richard Roper, citizen and ſalter of London, of the other party, witneſſeth, that the ſaid Marcellus Hall, for the ſum of ſix pounds of good and lawful money of England, to him by the ſaid Richard Roper in hand paid; whereof the ſaid Marcellus Hall clearly acquitteth and diſchargeth the ſaid Richard Roper, his executors and aſſigns, and every of them, by theſe preſents; hath granted, demiſed, and to farm letten, and by theſe preſents granteth, demiſeth, and to farm letteth, to the ſaid Richard Roper, a parcel of marſh-ground, lying and being in Wapping marſh, at the eaſt end of the marſh, beginning at the weſt ſide of the well, which lieth by the way that leadeth up to the Lynches, called Shadwell, meaſured by a ſtrait line from the Lynches, by the weſt ſide of the well, to the Thames wall, and reacheth weſt to the way that leadeth up into Radcliff high way, containing by eſtimation of meaſure, ſeven acres, little more or leſs, and the pond; all which marſh land abutteth north upon the Lynches of the Dean and Chapter of the Cathedral Church of St. Paul, and ſouth upon the Thames wall; and alſo all the Thames wall belonging to the ſeven acres, with the foreland and ſoil, down to the low-water-mark of the River of Thames: All which marſh-lands are lying in the pariſh and manor of Stebunheath, alias Stepney, in the County of Middleſex. To have and to hold the ſaid parcel of marſh-ground, wall, foreland and ſoil, with the appurtenances, to the ſaid Richard Roper, his executors and aſſigns, from the feaſt of the Annunciation of our bleſſed Lady St. Mary the Virgin, next coming, unto the end and term of four and twenty years from thence next enſuing, and fully to be compleated and ended; yielding and paying therefore yearly, during the ſaid term, to the ſaid Marcellus Hall, his executors and aſſigns, three pounds of good and lawful money of England, at four terms of the year——

L. C. J. What date is that deed of?

Clerk. The 13th of November, in the 2d and 3d years of King Philip and Queen Mary.

Mr. Att. Gen. Now we ſhall read Stepkins's licence to Hall, to alien his term.

Clerk reads.] To all manner of people to whom this preſent writing ſhall come; I Thomas Stepkins alias Stipkins, of the pariſh of Stebunheath alias Stepney, in the County of Middleſex, beer-brewer, ſend greeting in our Lord God everlaſting. Whereas I the ſaid Thomas Stepkins on the 16th of April, in the ſixth year of Edward the ſixth, have betaken eleven acres and an half of marſh-land with all the bank with the foreland and ſoil, down to the low-water mark of the River of Thames that he ſhould not alien or aſſign the ſaid leaſe or term of years, without the ſpecial licence or conſent

Now know ye, That I the ſaid Thomas Stepkins, for divers good cauſes give leave and licence to the ſaid Marcellus Hall, to the right worſhipful Mr. Dean of the Cathedral Church of St. Paul with the wall, foreland or ſoil under ſuch covenants, as is reſerved and contained——

Mr. Williams. I would ask Mr. Baniſter ſomething about this deed; look upon it, Sir.

Mr. Att. Gen. We have not done with him yet. Pray take that deed out of his hand.

Mr. S. Pemberton. You will let him give ſome account of it firſt, Mr. Attorney.

Mr. Att. Gen. You would fain confound him.

Mr. S. Pemberton. He is confounded enough already.

Mr.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Now Mr. Baniſter you have conſidered of it, pray once more look upon the deed again—(which he did)—Was that deed one that you ſigned then or no?

Baniſter. This is my name, but I cannot find the date of this deed in my paper. I cannot tell now whether it be one I found then or no.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Did you ſet your hand to any deeds that were found there, which you did not ſet down in your paper?

Baniſter. No, not that I know of, I do not know I did.

L. C. J. Prithee where didſt thou ſet thy hand to that deed?

Baniſter. I ſet my hand to the deeds that were found there, at the houſe.

L. C. J. Did you ſet your hand to none elſe but what were found there?

Baniſter. I have ſet my hand to divers deeds beſide, but they are none of thoſe deeds that are in my paper.

L. C. J. Where did you ſet your hand to any deeds beſides?

Baniſter. To divers deeds I have ſet my hand at home.

L. C. J. Have you to any relating to the lands in queſtion?

Baniſter. I do not know that I have ſet my hand to any deeds relating to the lands in queſtion, but at Mr. Knowles's.

L. C. J. To what purpoſe did you ſet your hand and name to the deeds you found at Knowles's?

Baniſter. To the ſame intent to teſtify that I was at the finding of them.

L. C. J. To what end did you ſet your hand to any other deeds?

Baniſter. To the intent that I knew better where the lands did lie than ſhe did, and when my Lady found any deeds, I ſet my hand to them, and then found the places where the lands lay.

L. C. J. Thou haſt had a fair time to conſider of that deed; canſt thou ſee here to what place that deed relates, by this mark?

Baniſter. I cannot find the date of the deed in my paper.

L. C. J. But where do you think you did put your name to that deed?

Baniſter. I cannot tell whether I did it at that time or no, but this is my name.

L. C. J. I know thy name is there, man; I read it two hours ago: but did you put your hand to that as one of the deeds that you found in September, 1682, when you were at Mr. Knowles's, or not?

Baniſter. I cannot tell.

L. C. J. Doſt thou believe thou didſt not?

Baniſter. I cannot tell.

L. C. J. Canſt thou tell the reaſon why thou didſt ſet thy hand to it?

Baniſter. Certainly, becauſe I was at the finding of it; I know no otherwiſe.

Mr. S. Pemberton. Now pray look upon this deed —(ſhewing him another)—and ſee whether that be your name or not.

Baniſter. Yes, my Lord, I will.

Mr. S. Pemberton. Is that your name?

Baniſter. Yes, it is; this is one of the deeds that was found at Mr. Knowles's.

Mr. S. Pemberton. You ſaid ſo as to the other too.

Mr. Att. Gen. But he was not ſo poſitive in it.

Baniſter. This is rat-eaten, and ſo I know it again; and there is a rat-eaten deed ſet down in my paper.

L. C. J. Let him be as poſitive as he will, he has been forſworn five times.

Mr. Sol. Gen. He was confounded with a miſtake of the deeds, he having ſet his hand to ſo many.

L. C. J. They are perjured both of them plainly, that is the truth of the matter.

Mr. Att. Gen. I hope the folly of our witneſſes in ſuch circumſtances, ſhall not rob us of our own land, and that it appears to be plainly.

L. C. J. God forbid but you ſhould have your own land; but by the Grace of God, if I can help it, you ſhall never have a foot of land by forſwearing and perjury.

Mr. Williams. When did you find that deed?

Baniſter. The 16th of September.

Mr. Williams. Where?

Baniſter. In the garret at Mr. Knowles's.

Mr. Williams. Are you ſure of it?

Baniſter. Yes, I am ſure of that deed, becauſe it is rat-eaten.

Mr. Williams. Knowles, pray do you look upon it, what ſay you to that deed?

Knowles. This is my hand, and this is one of the deeds that was found there at that time.

Mr. Williams. Pray read the date of that deed there.

Clerk reads.] This Indenture made the 13th day of November, in the 2d and 3d years of Philip and Mary.

Mr. S. Pemberton. That is a deed from Marcellus Hall to Roper; how ſhould that come to be at Knowles's?

L. C. J. They have ſworn it.

Mr. Att. Gen. They go about to blemiſh our deeds by the folly of our witneſſes, which we cannot help. We however leave the deeds to the Jury, and let them ſee if thoſe ſeals and other things look like counterfeit.

L. C. J. Well, go on, the Jury will have the deeds with them.

Mr. Att. Gen. My Lord, we did before produce a conveyance from Richard Hill to Stepkins. It reſted not there, that conveyance had no legal execution, thereupon there was a fine and recovery by the heir of Hill; and what was the occaſion of that, will appear by the deed.

Clerk reads.] This Indenture made the twelfth day of November, in the 5th and 6th years of the Reigns of our ſovereign Lord and Lady, Philip and Mary, by the Grace of God King and Queen of England, Spain, France, both the Sicilies, Jeruſalem and Ireland, Defenders of the faith; Arch-Dukes of Auſtria, Dukes of Burgundy, Millan and Brabant; Counts of Haſpurg, Flanders, and Tyrol: between Jaſper Hill, ſon and heir of Richard Hill, late citizen and mercer of London, of the one party; and Macheline Stepkins, late wife and executrix of the laſt will and teſtament of Thomas Stepkins, and John Stepkins, ſon and heir apparent of the ſaid Thomas, of the other party, witneſſeth, That whereas the ſaid Richard Hill, father of the ſaid Jaſper amounting in the whole to the ſum of 2000 by the ſaid Macheline And where variance concerning all that parcel of marſh-land unto St. Katherine's, which the ſaid Richard Hill bought of Cornelius Vanderdelf for the aſſuring all that Wapping-marſh, the ſaid Richard Hill ſtands ſtands bound in an obligation of which condition, that he ſhould make by a certain day, a good, ſure, ſufficient indefeaſible of and in all thoſe parcels of marſh-land, lying in Wapping-marſh, that is to ſay, all that with ſix acres of marſh, now in the tenure or occupation of one Knevett, or his aſſigns, and all thoſe lying in the Eaſt and in the tenure of one Miller; that is to ſay, all the bank, containing by eſtimation three acres and an half; and all thoſe next adjoining, by meaſure ſix acres or more and two acres by eſtimation of meaſure, lying in the bottom of the Lynches, and reacheth from the Lynches to the Iſland by the pond; and alſo all that parcel divided into twain ſix acres; and alſo that holds in his own hands, that is to ſay, all that parcel with the iſland and pond, containing by eſtimation of meaſure, five acres and of, and in all thoſe parcels lying on the weſt ſide of the pond, containing in the whole ſixteen acres by meaſure; all which ſaid ſixteen acres to Gravel-lane, the ſaid Richard Hill had in his own occupation reaching to Gravel-lane, ſometime plowed and ſown by one Richard Clayton, and now in the occupation of one Cooper, butcher, and lying on the eaſt ſide of Gravel-lane towards London fields, which was conveyed to him from one Richard Tyrrell; and alſo all that marſh in the tenure of one Clayton, butcher, one William Cound, butcher, ſeventeen acres and of Edward Aſh, four acres; and alſo all the lands, tenements, rents, houſes, ponds, fiſhings, mills, to the low-water-mark of the River of Thames, and all trees

For the appeaſing all variances and ſuits, the ſaid parties to this Indenture have fully condeſcended and agreed in form following; that is to ſay, the ſaid Jaſper Hill, for the ſum of 1200 l. of lawful money of England, in which he acknowledgeth himſelf to be truly indebted to the ſaid Macheline and John Stepkins, doth give, grant, bargain, ſell to the ſaid Macheline and John Stepkins all the ſaid marſh-ground lying in Wapping-marſh, with all manner of lands, tenements forelands, ways, trees to the low-water mark with the appurtenances lying and being in without or elſewhere within the pariſhes their heirs and aſſigns for ever, all the right, title together with all evidences and writings diſcharged of all former charges, incumbrances by the ſaid Jaſper Hill ——

Mr. Att. Gen. Next, we ſhall ſhew that Marcellus Hall, that had this long leaſe, and had demiſed the ſeven acres down from Shadwell to Roper, doth on the 14th of November, in the 5th and 6th years of Philip and Mary, ſurrender the remaining four acres to Thomas Stepkins; and then we ſhall ſhew it was demiſed to Fox, who was the firſt builder, and made Fox's-lane.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Your Lordſhip doth obſerve, that the licence was to aſſign the whole eleven acres and an half, but he did aſſign but ſeven.

Clerk reads.] This is dated on the 14th of November, in the 5th and ſixth years of King Philip and Queen Mary.

To all to whom this preſent writing ſhall come; I Marcellus Hall of Ratcliff, miller, ſend greeting in our Lord God everlaſting. So that neither I, my executors or aſſigns, any right claim, demand or any part thereof but from all ſhall be utterly excluded and debarred for ever——

Mr. Att. Gen. Here is a fine levied, Quin' Trin' 3 Eliz. they had beſt ask where that was found too: Is not that forged?

The Fine was read.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Here is a Recovery alſo, and a deed to lead the uſes: In which recovery the tenants vouch Jaſper Hill, who voucheth over the common vouchee.

The Recovery was read.

L. C. J. Read your deed to lead the uſes.

Clerk reads.] This Indenture made the 12th day of May, in the fourth year of the Reign of our ſovereign Lady Elizabeth, by the Grace of God, Queen of England, France and Ireland; Defender of the faith, &c. between Macheline Stepkins of the one party, and Edward Buggin

And it was fully agreed between the ſaid parties, that the ſaid recovery ſhould be to the uſes

Mr. Williams. Mr. Baniſter, pray Sir, look upon this deed, and ſee whether your name be to that deed or no. (ſhewing him the ſurrender of Hall.)

Baniſter. This is my name.

Mr. Williams. Was Mr. Knowles's hand to that deed?

Baniſter. I cannot tell.

Mr.

Mr. S. Pemberton. Did not he and you put your hands together to it?

Baniſter. I did not make it, I did not forge it.

Mr. S. Pemberton. No, I do not think you did, you have not brains to do it.

Mr. Williams. Where did you find that deed?

Mr. S. Pemberton. How came you to put your hand to it?

L. C. J. Is it one of the deeds of purchaſe?

Mr. S. Pemberton. Yes, it is; and therefore we would know, ſince Mr. Knowles's name is to it, how it came there.

L. C. J. Is it the ſurrender made by Marcellus Hall to John Stepkins?

Mr. Williams. Yes, my Lord, it is.

L. C. J. Let me ſee it—His name, I believe, has been there.

Mr. Williams. Do you know any thing of the raſing of it out?

Baniſter. No, not I.

Mr. Williams. You Knowles, were you at the finding of that deed?

Knowles. I ſet my hand to none but what I found.

L. C. J. But what do you ſay to that deed?

Knowles. I do not remember this deed at all; I cannot ſay any thing to it.

L. C. J. Was your name to it?

Knowles. Here is my name, but I do not know who put it there.

L. C. J. Is that your writing, Baniſter?

Baniſter. That on the backſide is.

Mr. Williams. Look into your note, that you may not out-run your ſelf. Why did you ſet your hand to it?

Baniſter. I ſuppoſe it was one of the deeds found there.

Mr. Williams. How ſhould it come there? it belonged to the purchaſer.

Mr. Att. Gen. Now we ſhall go to matter of record again. Richard Hill, it ſeems, before the leaſe made to Marcellus Hall, entred into a Recognizance in 4 Eliz. this is extended, and that will ſhew it to be Richard Hill's eſtate.

Mr. Powis. Can you object any forgery of Records, pray?

Mr. Sol. Gen. Pray Sir, look upon that (to the Witneſs) where did you examine that?

Witneſs. I examined this at the Rolls.

Mr. Williams. Is it a true copy, upon your oath?

Witneſs. It is.

L. C. J. Read it.

Clerk. This is teſted at Weſtminſter, 17 Jan. 4 Eliz. And here is an inquiſition taken the 6th of April, in the ſame year.

Mr. Att. Gen. We will read that part of the Inquiſition that concerns our queſtion; for the eaſt bound is only in queſtion now. (It was read.)

Mr. Att. Gen. Was this produced at the former trial, the firſt trial?

Sutton. No, I think not in Michaelmas Term.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Then we ſhall ſhew an Inquiſition upon a commiſſion of ſewers.

Mr. Att. Gen. The land in queſtion is every foot of it in the marſh; and that they muſt acknowledge they have no title to.

Mr. Williams. This is an Inquiſition which they produce, taken before a commiſſion of ſewers. I deſire to know how that comes to lie in a private hand, for it is the original Inquiſition, and ought to remain with the officer.

Mr. Att Gen. The whole intereſt of the marſh was ours, therefore it might well be left with us.

Mr. S. Pemberton. Under favour, good Mr. Attorney, ſuch things ſhould be kept by the Clerk to the Commiſſioners.

Mr. Att. Gen. How many trials has this been produced at?

Mr. S. Pemberton. With ſubmiſſion, my Lord, this that they produce being an Original, may very well come under great ſuſpicion, in regard it ought to be brought in by the officer, in whoſe cuſtody it ought to remain.

Mr. Williams. It is not a thing of bare intereſt between party and party, but a thing that concerns the publick, and therefore ſhould be brought in the officer's cuſtody.

L. C. J. Read it de bene eſſe, let us ſee what it is.

Mr. Att. Gen. My Lord, I would ask Mr. Sutton, was not this produced and read before the trial in Michaelmas-Term laſt?

Sutton. It was produced in Court twelve years ago.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Was it allowed as evidence?

Sutton. Yes, conſtantly.

Mr. Att. Gen. Pray read it.

Mr. Williams. Pray who has had it in keeping all this while?

Sutton. My Lady Ivy brought it to me among her writings at firſt.

L. C. J. Read it.

Clerk reads.] The verdict and preſentment of us the Jurors, as well of all defects, annoyances, within the limits or bounds of Wapping, and Wapping marſh, from Graſh mill to the mill at Ratcliff, that is to ſay, the 20th of December, Anno Dom. 1572, and in the 14th year of the Queen's Majeſty's Reign that now is.

The names of the Free-holders within Wapping-marſh, and the number of acres contained within the ſame marſh, with all the names of the occupiers thereof.

Firſt, John Stepkins Gent. Freeholder, for a parcel containing twenty two acres, in the tenure of Richard Ew Benedict Gent.

Mr. Att. Gen. You may skip over a great deal, and read only that which conduces to the queſtion.

Clerk. No one can read it very well, I think. (Reads) On the weſt ſide of Gravel-lane, containing 68 acres—Is that it?

Mr. Att. Gen. No, go to the eaſt ſide

Clerk reads.] —Freeholders; one parcel containing ten acres, in the tenure of John Hodges and John Gee, John Stepkins, Gent. two parcels, containing twenty acres, in the tenure of John Cooper, and John Harding, John Stepkins, Gent. One parcel, containing four acres, in the tenure of John Stepkins. One parcel, containing twelve acres, in the tenure of John Roger James, Freeholder. Two parcels, containing ſix acres, Robert Hemmings and John Stepkins. One parcel, containing one acre and an half, Richard Roper. One parcel, containing ſix acres, in the tenure of Richard Roper.

All which parcels be on the eaſt part of Gravel-lane, containing ſixty acres—Then here is ſomewhat interlined and ſtruck out again.

Mr. Williams. This doth not concern the Church.

Mr. Att. Gen. No more it doth not, as you ſay, indeed; for they cannot claim any of the marſh. Now we ſhall ſhew a warrant three years after, from the Commiſſioners to ſurvey.

Clerk reads.] —This is dated the 18th of July, in the 17th year of the moſt proſperous Reign of our ſovereign Lady Elizabeth, by the Grace of God &c. And it is directed,

To our well-beloved John Stepkin and John Osborn, Surveyors. Whereas, the Queen's Majeſty by a commiſſion of ſewers, bearing date the 23d day of April, in the year of her Reign; hath authorized us to ſurvey and view from Buttolphs-Wharf by St. Katherine's, near the Tower of London unto Ratcliff-mill not only to conſider of the decays and ruines of the ſame, but alſo to take order for the ſpeedy repairing as to our diſcretions ſhall ſeem good

We therefore ſufficiently informed of your wiſdom and diſcretion, appoint you ſurveyors willing and commanding you, by virtue of the ſaid commiſſion to ſee whether the work be accompliſhed according to ſuch ordinances and decrees as we have appointed, and from time to time ſhall make and appoint; and to ſee who we have made expenditor for ſuch ſums of money for the payment of workmen may by your warrant be diſburſed and payed accordingly; and further, we give you power and authority to give to provide for a competent and ſalary, at reaſonable prices, all workmen boats, lighters, carts, carriages, trees, pales as to your good diſcretion ſhall ſeem meet; and for your ſo doing, this ſhall be your ſufficient warrant.

Mr. Att. Gen. We ſhall now go a ſtep farther, as I opened in the beginning, and ſhew that this was mortgaged by Stepkins to the Queen, and a fine was levied upon that mortgage.

Clerk reads.] This Indenture made the 4th day of June, in the 15th year of the Reign of our ſovereign Lady Elizabeth, &c. between the right honourable Sir William Cecil, Knight; Lord Burleigh, and Lord High Treaſurer of England; the right honourable and one of her Highneſs's moſt honourable privy-council; Sir Gilbert Gerard, Knight; her Majeſty's Attorney-General, for and on the behalf of the Queen's Majeſty, and to her uſe, of the one party, and John Stepkins Whereas William Pat one of the tellers at and upon the determination of his account, made and ended at the 25th day of December is indebted in the ſum of 7928 l. 7 s. and 11 d. ob.

And whereas our ſaid ſovereign Lady the Queen the 16th day of June, in the 9th year of her Reign, hath commanded the ſaid Sir William Cecil Sir Gilbert Gerard, and Sir Thomas Bromley to take order from time to time with ſo many of the debts owing, or that after ſhould be owing and for the ſure payment and contentation of the ſaid ſum of 7928 l. 7 s. 11 d. ob. covenanteth with them the ſaid that he the ſaid John Stepkins, his heirs, executors ſhall and will not only ſatisfy and pay the ſaid ſum into the receipt aforeſaid but alſo for the better ſettlement ſhall and will make and cauſe to be made by one fine in good form of law of, and in one cloſe within the pariſh manor of Yewel; and one great garden And of, and in one tenement, with the appurtenances in now in the occupation of John Stout; and 19 acres of meadow in Wapping marſh, parcel of the ſaid manor Richard Roper.

Mr. Att. Gen. Where is the copy of the fine?

Sutton. Here.

Clerk reads.] This is the final Concord, &c. Menſ. Mich. 14 Eliz.

Mr. Sol. Gen. This was afterwards regranted from the Crown; and there is the Regrant.

Which being under the Great Seal, and teſted 6 Julii, Anno 7 Jacobi Regis, was read.

Mr. Att. Gen. Part of this marſh was by our anceſtor conveyed to one Eaſt.

L. C. J. Ay, I have the note of ſuch a conveyance in my notes of the laſt trial.

Mr. Att. Gen. Mr. Sutton, is that a true copy?

Sutton. Yes, it is.

Mr. Williams. A copy of what? where did you examine it, Sir?

Sutton. At the Rolls Chapel.

Mr. Att. Gen. It is a deed enrolled, and I hope you do not think the Record is forged, Mr. Williams.

Mr. Williams. I know not what you forge or do not forge; pray read it, let us ſee what it is.

The copy of a deed enrolled, dated 27 July, 3 Eliz. was read.

L. C. J. Then the next thing that you produced, was a bond dated the 25th of January, 4 Eliz. wherein Stepkins was bound to Spinola, who was Adminiſtrator of Vivold and Salvago, upon the recognizance of Hill to them.

Mr. Att. Gen. We did ſo, my Lord; but that we cannot now readily find, I think: Here however is Spinola's diſcharge.

Clerk. This is ſigned by me Benedict Spinola, and dated the 25th of Feb. 1561.

Mr. Att. Gen. Here is the bond, read the condition of it, though it is not material.

L. C. J. That is true; but it was read the laſt time, I find by my notes.

Clerk. This is a bond of 300 l. The condition of this obligation is ſuch, That whereas one Recognizance, made and entred into by Richard Hill 3 Dec. in the 32d year of the late King Henry VIII. taken and acknowledged—

Mr. Att. Gen. There is enough, for it makes not at all to the purpoſe, but to confirm the belief of our purchaſe. Here is alſo Jaſper Hill's receipt of the purchaſe-money.

Clerk reads] This is dated the 28th of January, in the 13th year of Queen Elizabeth. Be it known unto all men by theſe preſents, that I Jaſper Hill of Wormley have had before the enſealing hereof, of Macheline and John Stepkins for the diſcharge of a certain Statute the full ſum of 1338 l. of lawful money of England, in full ſatisfaction and payment of all ſuch purchaſe-monies.

Mr. Att. Gen. Then the 16th of Auguſt, 13 Jacobi, Fox conveyed to John Stepkins; but that is left at home.

L. C. J. Well, then there is an end of that; what do you do next?

Mr. Att. Gen. We have done with our evidence by Deeds and by Records, and now we ſhall come to our evidence by witneſſes, Viva Voce. And firſt we ſhall begin with Mr. Knowles; who will prove the value of the land by the rents, and particularly what the rents are of Derrick Hills.

L. C. J. Prove what you will.

Mr.

Mr. Att. Gen. Mr. Knowles, have you received the Dean's rents?

Knowles. For the uſe of Mr. Neale, I have.

Mr. Att. Gen. What are the rents of the eaſt ſide of Cock-Hill?

Knowles. About 100 l. a year.

Mr. Sol. Gen. What are they?

Knowles. Houſes.

Mr. Att. Gen. All houſes?

Knowles. Some houſes, ſome ground-rents.

Mr. Att. Gen. What is the rack rent?

Knowles. About 100 l. a year.

Mr. Williams. Which houſes do you ſpeak of, Mr. Knowles?

Knowles. On the eaſt ſide of Cock-hill.

Mr. Att. Gen. Do you know the Lynches?

Knowles. Yes, I do.

Mr. Att. Gen. Who receives the rents of that ground?

Knowles. Mr. Neale did.

Mr. Att. Gen. Have you received the rents of the twenty acres?

Knowles. Yes, for Mr. Neale I have.

Mr. Att. Gen. Theſe three together, what are they all?

Knowles. About 2000 l. a year.

Mr. Att. Gen. All this the Church of Paul's has, beſides the lands in queſtion.

Mr. Williams. You ſay that part is worth 100 l. a year.

Knowles. Yes.

Mr. S. Stringer. How much land might it contain?

Knowles. It is a matter of the length of the hall.

L. C. J. And how broad is it?

Knowles. Not very broad.

Mr. Att. Gen. Now then to come to the lands in queſtion; Do you know Mariner's-ſtreet?

Knowles. Yes.

Mr. Att. Gen. Who is in poſſeſſion of that, and receives the rents of it?

Knowles. Mr. Neale.

Mr. Att. Gen. What ſay you to Griffin's-alley?

Knowles. Some of it is in mortgage; Mr. Babington had it, but for Mr. Neale's uſe.

Mr. Att. Gen. What ſay you to the water-houſe?

Knowles. That Mr. Neale himſelf has.

Mr. Att. Gen. Theſe are the things in queſtion; do you know that which is called New——?

Knowles. That is Mr. Neale's too.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Our leaſe of 128 years expired but in the year 1680; and we could not come at it till then, and we had it not till 1682; and that anſwereth their poſſeſſion.

Mr. Att. Gen. Now we ſhall call our witneſſes to prove it marſh-ground. Swear Thomas Hughes, (which was done) —Do you know Wapping marſh?

Hughes. Yes.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Do you know the houſes in queſtion?

Hughes. Which houſes?

Mr. Sol. Gen. The houſes now in ſuit for?

Hughes. Yes, I do.

Mr. Att. Gen. How long have you known them?

Hughes. There was no houſes when I knew it firſt.

Mr. Att. Gen. Do you know Cock-hill?

Hughes. Yes.

Mr. Att. Gen. Do you know Foxes-lane?

Hughes. Yes; I did know it before it was built.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did you know the houſes that lay on the eaſt ſide of Foxes-lane?

Hughes. What houſes there?

Mr. Att. Gen. Did you know any houſes there formerly?

Hughes. I know not what you mean.

Mr. Att. Gen. I ask you again, do you know Foxes-lane?

Hughes. Yes, it was a bank before it was built.

Mr. Powis. Do you know the Lynches?

Mr. Att. Gen. Nay, let us ask but one at once, pray. I will ask you a plain queſtion; Did you know the marſh before it was built upon?

Hughes. Yes, Sir, that I did.

Mr. Att. Gen. How far did the marſh-ground go?

Hughes. To Cock-hill Eaſtward, as far as the broad bridge; Weſtward, as far as Foxes-lane.

Mr. Att. Gen. Was all that marſh-ground?

Hughes. The River of Thames did flow round about it, and there were boggs, trees and buſhes, and ſuch things.

Mr. S. Lutwich. Did you know the place where Ratcliff-mill ſtood?

Hughes. According to report I did.

Mr. S. Lutwich. Ay, where was that?

Hughes. Juſt at Bell-wharf.

Mr. S. Lutwich. Upon which ſide of Cock-hill?

Hughes. In Shadwell-Hamlet.

Mr. Att. Gen. That is right.

Mr. Powis. Was that like the other end of the marſh?

Hughes. The River came in there wholly.

Mr. S. Lutwich. At high flood does the water come in there at this time?

Hughes. It did at every tide high and low formerly, now it is dam'd up.

L. C. J. Did the tide come up to that you call Foxes-lane?

Hughes. Yes.

L. C. J. Then that makes an end of the queſtion: It cannot be as you ſay.

Mr. Att. Gen. How ſo, my Lord?

L. C. J. How could it be an overſhot-mill? how could the mill be turned but with the tide?

Mr. Att. Gen. Their evidence makes it appear ſuch by the leaden trough, which is an inſtrument belonging only to an overſhot-mill?

L. C. J. Tell not me of the leaden trough, Mr. Attorney; look you upon the ſurvey you produced, and take notice of the laſt paragraph, and there you will find the words, Prox' adjacent' cuidam tenemento, &c. What make you of that?

Mr. Att. Gen. Pray, my Lord, let it be read.

L. C. J. I will in the mean time ask your witneſs a queſtion. Friend, thou ſeemeſt to be a man that underſtands ſomething. Thou ſayſt Foxes-lane was a bank before it was built, and the tide before that time came up to that bank, both high and low. Now ſuppoſe there had been a mill in that ground, how ſhould it have been driven?

Hughes. I will tell your honour: My Lord, by report, and I ſuppoſe it may be true, the mill ſtood all the tide of flood, and when the flood was at high water, there was a dam which kept it in, and it went out again at ebb-tide, and ſo the mill was drove.

L. C. J. There is your overſhot-mill gone then, Mr. Attorney.

Mr. Att. Gen. If ever ſeven or eight acres of ground can be the appurtenances of a mill, I ſhould much wonder.

L. C. J. Mr. Attorney, I can tell you of a mill over againſt this place, which I my ſelf, and we all can remember. All the eſtate about it was in the

Traps

Traps family, he was a Gentleman of our houſe; all the water that drives that Mill, and two or three Mills that ſerve that ſide of the river, is taken in as the tide comes in, and is pent in as he ſays by a dam; and when they open that, the Mill turns back again. For I would fain have all theſe things, that ſeem to be dark, cleared by the way as they go. I will ſuppoſe all the Records you have read to be right, and that it is called Ratcliff-Mill, and then there is the Mill-bank, and the Hilly-bank, and the Hilly-way; it is plain then there was a Mill-bank, or a Hilly-bank, or whatever you call it. It ſo falls out that the thing now in queſtion is made plain upon your own evidence, there was really ponds and gutters, and thoſe things that were to ſatisfy the Mill. This Mill comes to be plucked down, and the ponds and all the ſluices come now to be built upon: this is not like your Marſh-ground that is on the weſtern part of the bank, but it is a parcel of meare or marſh, as the pond and the reſt ſtifled up by thoſe things, that till ſuch time as the Mill was taken away were receptacles for to pen up the water that came in with the tide. What is the meaning of thoſe words in the ſurvey that I ſpoke of before, and the ſeveral tenements and orchards, and ponds, and ſewers, &c. and all thoſe things? Would you have it that this ſhould all point to the ſcite of the Mill, as though all the boundaries ſhould extend to the eaſt-end of the Mill?

Mr. S. Stringer. That was the reaſon why I asked but now, how big the whole was.

L. C. J. And will what you would have, Mr. Attorney, a ditch or two, ever anſwer the words in the ſurvey?

Mr. Att. Gen. Nor will all their words amount to divers cloſes of ground, as this muſt make in the whole.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Their twenty acres elſewhere anſwers all they can claim.

L. C. J. But this you yourſelf ſay, is the Dericks-hills, in the ſurvey; and you do take it as ſoon as the Mill was pulled down in one place, it was ſet up in another.

Mr. Att. Gen. After he had taken our long leaſe he erected one, we ſay, upon our ground; for he had pulled down the old Mill, and let that to Carter.

Mr. Sol. Gen. My Lord, it is plain that the old Mill and the new Mill were not upon the ſame ground, from Carter's leaſe.

L. C. J. Mr. Sollicitor, you indeed agree among yourſelves that it is plain, but alas the fact is quite contrary.

Mr. S. Maynard. My Lord, we do make our argument for the Defendant's title as your Lordſhip does apprehend it. The boundaries towards the eaſt is made the Mill and Ratcliff-Town. This place that contains ſeven acres, though it had paſſages for the water, is not the Mill, and it can never be, that ſo much ground can be reckon'd to be lands belonging to the Mill: it is the Mill itſelf that is the eaſt bound.

L. C. J. No, it is the Mill and the Mill-bank, brother.

Mr. S. Maynard. With ſubmiſſion, my Lord, it is Ratcliff-Mill.

L. C. J. Is there no Mill-bank in any of the deeds?

Mr. S. Maynard. Not that I remember.

L. C. J. At the peril of my diſcretion be that, brother.

Mr. S. Maynard. Take it to be ſo as your Lordſhip ſays, that there is mention of a Mill bank, that cannot lie eaſt, for it lieth in a little pond——

L. C. J. Good brother, let us not puzzle that which is as plain as that the ſun ſhines. The controverſy is about all the weſt part of Foxes-lane.

Mr. Att. Gen. No, it is the eaſt bound that we contend for.

L. C. J. Mr. Attorney, if you will miſtake the point, I cannot help it, I aſſure you I do not. Pray take notice of it, it is called 130 acres in your Act of Parliament.

Mr. Att. Gen. Yes, my Lord, 130 acres.

L. C. J. Now then the eaſt of your land by your own ſhewing is Mill-bank; the eaſt of Mill-bank is the Mill, whereas the weſt part is St. Katherine's, ſo all your deeds and records ſay; but the eaſt part of the land is Mill-bank.

Mr. S. Maynard. No, my Lord, Ratcliff-Mill.

L. C. J. But I ſay, ay, brother. Then how broad doth Foxes-lane extend?

Mr. Att. Gen. 'Tis reckoned 30 foot in Carter's leaſe, I think.

L. C. J. That is a leaſe that I perceive there is ſome controverſy about, therefore I do not ſo much mind that: it is a perch of land I think in ſome of your evidences.

Mr. Att. Gen. Where Foxes-lane is, is the four acres that were ſurrender'd; now that being the weſt bound of the eleven acres, where then are the other ſeven?

L. C. J. Read the deed poll again, the particulars and bounds only.

Clerk [Reads.] All thoſe my four and twenty acres and an half——

Mr. Att. Gen. The eaſt bound your Lordſhip ſees is the Mill: now your Lordſhip makes an objection, that if it were as we ſay, an overſhot Mill, it could not have been driven——

L. C. J. Do not, pray, make any ſilly objection for me, and then think to anſwer it. I tell you I do ſay, that it is impoſſible there could be any Mill there, but a Tide-Mill: the thing is as plain, Mr. Attorney, as any thing in the world can be; go on with your evidence.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Pray Swear John Somerly—— [Which was done]—— Howlong have you known the place in queſtion?

Somerly. I have known it about 27 or 28 years.

Mr. Att. Gen. Do you know where the Mill ſtood, or was reported to ſtand?

Somerly. I know where it was reported to ſtand, but I never knew the Mill myſelf, it was demoliſhed before my time.

Mr. Att. Gen. Where was it reported to ſtand?

Somerly. As it was reported, it ſtood about half the length of the hall off the bank, rather leaning to the river of Thames than the highway.

Mr. Att. Gen. Where was the way to the Mill?

Somerly. At Cock-hill.

L. C. J. That your own evidence ſay, was on the weſt-ſide of the Mill.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did you know Shadwell?

Somerly. I know that that is called Shadwell. Do you mean the well?

Mr. Att. Gen. Yes; how far is the well from Cock-hill?

Somerly. Half the length of the hall.

Mr. Williams. How far is it eaſt of Foxes-lane?

Somerly. Truly, I cannot well tell.

L. C. J.

L. C. J. The queſtion is, whether that be the well that is mentioned in the evidences?

Somerly. I never knew any other well; I paid for filling of it up.

Mr. Williams. What was it? Was it not a pond formerly?

Somerly. It was a well.

Mr. Att. Gen. What was it called?

Somerly. Shadwell it was called, I knew no other name it had; and that well was wharfed about, and there was a piece of wood about ſix foot long put into it, and it was on the hide of the hill; a Cooper had it in his poſſeſſion, and he uſed to put his hoops into it——

Mr. Att. Gen. Do you remember the ditch that run under the Lynches?

Somerly. I remember there was a ditch that run a long way, there were three or four bridges over it.

Mr. Williams. Was that a wide ditch?

Somerly. It had planks to go over, and it was a deep ditch.

Mr. Att. Gen. When you knew it, did cattle feed there?

Somerly. Not in my time.

Mr. Sol. Gen. When you firſt knew that well, was it reputed an ancient well?

Somerly. I knew it not till I came to buy it.

Mr. Att. Gen. What do you know of the raiſing of Fox's-lane?

Somerly. I lived there 26 years ago, and in the time ſince I lived in it, it is raiſed the length of my ſtick and more: for when the tide came in ſtrong, it uſed to drive ſtones and planks in at the windows. There was a Waterhouſe erected upon Wapping-wall, and they went to lay pipes along the ſtreet, but they could not lay them there, for they found great pieces of timber, and other things in the ground that hindred it; and upon that they raiſed the ground.

Mr. Williams. Was not there a dam made at the end of Fox's-lane to keep out the tide?

Somerly. I never knew of any.

L. C. J. Was not Fox's-lane reputed an ancient way?

Somerly. I ſuppoſe they were continually paving it, to raiſe it higher and higher.

Mr. Att. Gen. When you knew it firſt, was it higher than the marſh?

Somerly. It was all built when I came thither. It is ſix yards higher at one end than the other.

Mr. Att. Gen. Swear John Holmes —— [Which was done.]——Do you know the houſes in queſtion, between Fox's-lane and Cock-hill?

Holmes. Yes.

Mr. Att. Gen. How long have you known it?

Holmes. I have known the place a matter of 28 years, or more.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did you know it before it was built?

Holmes. No, I did not take notice of it, to ſay notice.

Mr. Att. Gen. Do you know that place that is called Shadwell?

Holmes. No.

Mr. Sol. Gen. What do you know of the raiſing of Fox's-lane?

Holmes. I never did know of raiſing the lane.

Mr. Att. Gen. Not at all?

L. C. J. Was it not all the time you knew it a common paſſage?

Holmes. Yes, a common highway.

L. C. J. Shew, if you can, that there was any highway from North to South, but Fox's-lane.

Mr. Att. Gen. Do you know Cock-hill?

Holmes. That is quite off from it.

L. C. J. Let me ask you a queſtion. Suppoſe you were to go for the purpoſe from Shadwell down to the river of Thames, would you go to Cock-hill or Fox's-lane?

Holmes. If I had occaſion to go down to Pelican-ſtairs, then I would go to Fox's-lane; but if I were to go to Bell-wharf, I would go to Cock-hill.

L. C. J. That is quite another way.

Mr. Sol. Gen. It is ſouthward of Cock-hill where the Mill ſtood.

Mr. Att. Gen. That adjoined juſt upon the way.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Doth not Cock-hill lead to the Thames?

Holmes. Cock-hill is the firſt beginning of the going down to Bell-wharf.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Swear Eleanor Barefoot and Mary Day. [Eleanor Barefoot was ſworn.] Do you know Fox's-lane?

Barefoot. Yes, I know it very well.

Mr. Att. Gen. How long have you known it?

Barefoot. Threeſcore and almoſt ſix years.

Mr. Att. Gen. Then you knew it before it was built?

Barefoot. Yes.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did you know the old Mill?

Barefoot. Who, Sir?

Mr. Att. Gen. Do you remember who firſt built there?

Barefoot. I cannot tell.

Mr. Att. Gen. Pray, when you knew it firſt, what was it, and whoſe?

Barefoot. It was a Marſh-ground from Cock-hill to Fenner's-field, it was counted and known to be Mr. Stepkins's; he was a great Freeholder, and Owner of all the ground up to Eaſt-Smithfield.

L. C. J. How? Why is not the Lynches between Cock-hill and St. Katherine's?

Barefoot. The upper ground was only belonging to the Dean of St. Paul's.

L. C. J. Do you remember that which is now called Fox's-lane?

Barefoot. Yes.

L. C. J. Was it a lane at that time?

Barefoot. Yes, it was.

Mr. Att. Gen. Do you remember how the water came in there?

Barefoot. Yes.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did it come up to the bank?

Barefoot. At high tides it came over, ſo that none could paſs.

L. C. J. But at common tides?

Barefoot. It came at common tides till it was raiſed.

L. C. J. But it was an uſual paſſage for Carts and Carriages?

Barefoot. Yes.

Mr. Att. Gen. How was the Mill driven that was there?

Barefoot. There was a Mill in my time, that went with the tide, and all the water that came down from that Mill, came into a pond, and ſo to the Mill-dam, and ſo drove this Mill.

L. C. J. Which Mill doſt thou ſpeak of? Didſt thou know Ratcliff-Mill?

Mr. Att. Gen. Did you know Cock-hill-Mill?

Barefoot. Yes, that I ſpeak of.

L. C. J. And how was it driven, doſt thou ſay?

Bare-

Barefoot. It was driven by the water that came from the river in a ſluice.

L. C. J. It came out of the Thames?

Barefoot. Yes; with the tide.

L. C. J. How did it run?

Barefoot. It had a great huge ſluice.

Mr. Williams. Was that in the Lynch-ditch, or other way?

Barefoot. It ran into a pond.

Mr. Att. Gen. Where did that pond ſtand?

Barefoot. In New Gravel-lane.

Mr. Att. Gen. Where was the head of the pond?

Barefoot. It went out with the tide.

Mr. Williams. Where?

Barefoot. Between the ſtreet and the mill.

Mr. Att. Gen. How near was the pond to Fox's-lane?

Barefoot. A quarter of a mile off.

Mr. Williams. Weſt of Fox's-lane?

Barefoot. Yes.

Mr. Att. Gen. Do you know Green-bank?

Barefoot. Yes.

Mr. Att. Gen. How far is that from Fox's-lane?

Barefoot. Half a mile off.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did you know the well called Shadwell?

Barefoot. Yes, I did.

Mr. Sol. Gen. On which ſide of Fox's-lane did Shadwell ſtand?

Barefoot. It was between the mill and Broad-bridge; eaſtward of Broad-bridge.

Mr. Att. Gen. How far was it from the mill?

Barefoot. A pretty way.

Mr. Att. Gen. How far do you think?

Barefoot. About 40 or 60 foot: the well was between the mill I ſay, and Broad-bridge; Fox's-lane ſtood weſt.

L. C. J. When you knew Fox's-lane firſt, what was it between the Lynches on the north, and the Thames on the ſouth?

Barefoot. A place for Carts and Horſes to go.

Mr. Att. Gen. And you ſay it was all marſh-ground from Cock-hill to St. Katherines?

Barefoot. Yes, it was all a low ground.

Mr. Att. Gen. Whoſe ground was it counted to be?

Barefoot. Mr. Stepkins's.

Mr. Att. Gen. Had the Dean ever any thing to do there?

Barefoot. The upper-ground was the Dean of Paul's, but the lower-ground was Mr. Stepkins's.

Mr. Williams. Was there a bridge over the Lynch ditch at the end of Fox's-lane?

Barefoot. There was a bridge and a cart-way.

L. C. J. Do you know it was marſh ground on the eaſt-ſide of Fox's-lane? Did it ever lie under water?

Barefoot. At high tides and ſuch as that it was over-flowed.

L. C. J. But at common tides did it uſe to go over Fox's-lane?

Barefoot. I cannot tell that truly, it is now raiſed very high, it was much lower; but I am ſure the tide ſometimes came beyond.

Mr. Att. Gen. When the water was in the great pond, did not it come by the Lynch-ditch.

Barefoot. It came out of the Thames.

L. C. J. Do you remember any way that led up to the Lynches by the well?

Barefoot. The Lynches did not belong to Mr. Stepkins; there was the mill.

L. C. J. But anſwer me, was there any way that went up to the Lynches by the well?

Barefoot. There was no paſſage to go through, but at Fox's-lane.

Mr. Att. Gen. Was there not a way at Cock-hill?

L. C. J. That is farther eaſt than the mill.

Mr. Att. Gen. Shadwell is the bounds of our land.

L. C. J. But where is that? That is the queſtion, Mr. Attorney. I remember what the woman ſaid indeed the laſt time, if there were as many wells as there were panes in the glaſs-window here, that was the right well. But that will not decide the controverſy.

Mr. Att. Gen. Swear Auſtin Cope —[Which was done]—Do you know Cock-hill?

Cope. Yes, I do.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did you not know a mill that was at Ratcliff?

Cope. There was one at Bell-wharf.

L. C. J. How long ago is it, that you remember it?

Cope. Threeſcore years ago.

L. C. J. How was that mill driven?

Cope. With the tide.

Mr. Att. Gen. Where did the tide come in?

Cope. At Frying-pan-ſtairs.

Mr. Att. Gen. Whither did it go?

Cope. It went into the dam, and ſo drove the mill. There was an iron-mill built by one White twenty years after.

L. C. J. How far did the tide go up from Ratcliff-mill weſtward?

Mr. Att. Gen. As near as you can remember, what was it that ſtopped the tide?

L. C. J. Ay, how far did the tide go before it ſtopped?

Cope. Almoſt as far as New Gravel-lane.

L. C. J. Did the tide come up as far as Fox's-lane?

Cope. It flowed over at ſome tides.

L. C. J. What did it at uſual and common and ordinary tides?

Cope. It never came ſo high.

Mr. Att. Gen. How high did it come then?

Cope. Hard by it came.

Mr. Att. Gen. How near?

Cope. Within forty foot upon reaſonable tides.

Mr. Att. Gen. And did that help to turn this mill?

Cope. Yes; it went to the dam, and ſo it drove it.

L. C. J. Where was your way from north to ſouth?

Cope. At Fox's-lane.

Mr. Att. Gen. Was there a bridge there, over which the carts went into the lane, under which the water did run?

Cope. Yes; there was.

L. C. J. What is it that lies beyond the mill?

Cope. Ratcliff-Town.

L. C. J. Which was further eaſtward, Cock-hill or the mill?

Cope. Cock-hill.

L. C. J. So it is by your own map; and then where can the mill-bank be but Fox's-lane?

Mr. Att. Gen. Shadwell is our bounds.

L. C. J.

L. C. J. Robin Hood upon Greendale ſtood; therefore this muſt be your land: that is all the argument I can make of it. Your boundaries do make it as plain as the noſe in a man's face.

Mr. Att. Gen. Swear Mr. Holwell——[Which was done.]——How long have you known this place, the lands in queſtion?

Holwell. Not above a year.

L. C. J. He is your Surveyor, I think.

Mr. Att. Gen. He is ſo, my Lord. Pray you Cope, which way did the water go?

Cope. Weſtward.

L. C. J. But which way did you uſe to go to the river from the Lynches?

Cope. We ſometimes went the lower way, and ſometimes the higher way.

L. C. J. Which was the higher way?

Cope. Ratcliff-Highway.

L. C. J. And which was the lower way?

Cope. Through Wapping and Shadwell: Shadwell is the lower way.

L. C. J. Thou talkeſt of the north-weſt way; but if you were to go directly from north to ſouth, which way would you have gone?

Cope. Down Cock-hill, or down Broad-bridge.

L. C. J. Where is that?

Cope. Beyond Cock-hill.

L. C. J. Whereabouts is it?

Cope. Within a little of Fox's-lane.

L. C. J. When you went down Cock-hill, upon which hand did you leave the mill?

Cope. If I went the lower way, I left the mill on the left-hand.

L. C. J. But when you went the higher way down Cock-hill?

Cope. Then we left the mill behind us.

L. C. J. What doſt thou mean by behind thee?

Cope. I left it north.

L. C. J. That could never be, man.

Mr. Att. Gen. Yes, my Lord, he is right.

L. C. J. But I ſay he is not right, Mr. Attorney, for Cock-hill is north of the mill,

Mr. Att. Gen. Cope, do you know Fox's-lane?

Cope. Yes, very well.

Mr. Att. Gen. Is it raiſed?

Cope. Yes; eight or nine foot.

Mr. Att. Gen. What was the reaſon of its being raiſed?

Cope. It was not fitting for carts to go over.

L. C. J. Why ſo?

Cope. The water came upon it.

Mr. Att. Gen. And then to come to the admeaſurement, taking in the place in queſtion, it makes juſt 130 acres, which is our number, and no more.

L. C. J. Then you will leave the Dean nothing.

Mr. Att. Gen. Yes, he has 2000 l. a year.

L. C. J. Where?

Mr. Att. Gen. In the eaſt, beyond this place.

L. C. J. Why, would you have any of the land that belongs to the mill?

Mr. Att. Gen. We claim this as marſh-land; which they have nothing to do with, and the number of acres will not be anſwered without it. Mr. Holwell, have you admeaſured the marſh?

Holwell. Yes; I have, Sir.

Mr. Att. Gen. From whence did you begin?

Mr. Att. Gen. Within what bounds?

Holwell. That which they call the Lynches and the marſh to St. Katherine's from the well?

Mr. Att. Gen. And how much doth it make?

Holwell. Beſides the well and the Lynches, I find it ſomething above 130 acres.

L. C. J. Somewhat above, how much pry'thee?

Holwell. Not an acre above.

Mr. Williams. Pray, Sir, how many acres lies eaſt of Gravel-lane?

Holwell. Beſides the well and the Lynches, I can make but fifty acres and an half.

L. C. J. Where did you reckon up the whole?

Mr. Att. Gen. To make up the 130 acres, he find took in the mill and all.

L. C. J. That is very well.

Mr. Att. Gen. Why, my Lord, it is no more than 130 acres, and ſo much we muſt have.

L. C. J. Look into the ſurvey that you produced, and ſee what that ſays; Beſides all——

Mr. Att. Gen. Thoſe lie eaſtward of the mill.

L. C. J. Pray did you meaſure the wall?

Holwell. Wapping wall is 20 acres.

Mr. Att. Gen. If they will conſent, the Jury ſhall have the ſurvey with them.

Mr. Williams. With all our hearts, let them have it.

L. C. J. Gentlemen, both ſides conſent, you ſhall have the ſurvey with you; but without that conſent you could not have had it, it not being under ſeal.

Mr. Att. Gen. Then we deſire our laſt verdict may be read. Mr. Sutton, was it a verdict upon full evidence?

Sutton. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Att. Gen. How many hours did it laſt?

Sutton. Five or Six.

Mr. Att. Gen. Was there a view in it?

Sutton. There was ſo.

L. C. J. Read it——[Which was done]——Mr. Holwell, how much pray, is the land between Fox's-lane and the mill?

Holwell. Below the Lynches I find it to be ſeven acres and an half.

L. C. J. Can you expect then that all thoſe words of gardens, orchards, &c. ſhould be anſwer'd under ſeven acres and an half? Beſides, the firſt and ancient reſervation of rent was 10 l. a year, after it was increaſed to 16 l. a year, and it doth appear the mill turned to ſo little account, that it was pulled down, and ſo the land was to anſwer the rent; which for, a ground-rent upon a Church-leaſe, in thoſe days, was very great. Have you done now?

Mr. Att. Gen. We have done for the preſent, my Lord.

L. C. J. What ſay you to it then for the Plaintiff, Gentlemen?

Mr. S. Stringer. May it pleaſe your Lordſhip, and you Gentlemen of the Jury; if we ſhould give no further evidence at all than what we have already given, but leave it upon this, I dare affirm it plainly appears that they have no title at all to this land. As to their laſt piece of evidence I would firſt give an anſwer to that, and that is their verdict; and that which I would obſerve upon it, and ſay to it, is this; it was a verdict obtained upon forged Deeds: Deeds found, as is pretended, and as you have heard from their two ſpecial witneſſes, in a very extraordinary manner, found in a garret. But by what art prepared, and that they are forged, I queſtion not but we ſhall give you ſatisfaction. But beſides, as to their admeaſurement, it ſeems as they would have it, 130 acres is the queſtion about the extent of the marſh. So much they claim, and we ſhall bring two Surveyors that will give you an account upon their oaths, that between Fox's-lane, which we ſay is the weſt boundary of our land, and the eaſt of theirs, and Hermitage Dock, where the marſh ends, there is above 130 acres; and ſo they do not want their number. For all the evidence that they have given out of Records, we agree them to be as they ſay; and by that agreement ſhall do ourſelves no harm at all, for they all do confirm our aſſertion. They place the eaſtern bound of the marſh at Ratcliff Town; now at Fox's-lane doth Ratcliff Town begin. The art has been to confound the Cauſe by puzzling boundaries, when it is a plain apparent miſtake they run upon; and indeed I may very well ſay, a wilful one too. They would have us confine all to a mill and a little ditch, when there are at leaſt ſeven acres always enjoyed with it, and all called the mill; which had a pond, gardens, orchards, tenements, &c. And now there are very large dreins neceſſarily made, to keep the water from annoying the Inhabitants, and to carry it away. But for a further evidence of our title, we ſhall firſt prove, that upon a Bill exhibited in the Exchequer by Mr. Attorney General, againſt Stepkins their anceſtor, to know what incroachments had been made, what belonged to the Dean of Paul's, and what to Mr. Stepkins, are fully ſet out. There it is proved, that the bounds of the marſh were Wapping wall, alias Fox's-lane. The marſh was continually overflown with water; but now in our ground there was a great many ditches and places to keep the water for the ſervice of the mill. When we come to build upon our ground, which was 15 Jacobi, (then it began) then he brought an action, and did pretend that we did incroach the wall ſomewhat into the marſh; there we had a verdict upon a view, and after a non-ſuit upon full evidence. There was likewiſe a Bill exhibited in Chancery againſt Stepkins the father; wherein the bounds are ſet forth, and he in his anſwer particularly enumerates the boundaries. And it has been conſtantly the reputation of the Place, that this was the Dean's lands, ſurveyed as the Dean's lands, ſold in the late times of uſurpation as the Dean's lands. The firſt thing, my Lord, which they produced, and that we did then, and do now controvert, is Carter's leaſe: This, they ſay, was found in the garret; and they bring two witneſſes for it: But how they have behaved themſelves! What confuſion there is in their evidence! You ſee——

L. C. J. Brother Stringer, if you have any evidence to give, pray give that firſt, and leave your remarks till the laſt; you ſhall then ſay what you will, but firſt give your evidence.

Mr. S. Stringer. My Lord, we ſhall purſue your direction: We ſay, upon Fox's building, Stepkins ſurmiſing that the wall belonged to him, comes and brings an action of ejectment againſt Fox's tenants, for this wall, and upon trial the verdict went againſt him. Then there was another action brought, and he was non-ſuited upon that. Afterwards there was a bill preferred againſt him, and in his anſwer he confeſſeth that his wall-marſh bounded upon Fox's-lane. Here are the bill and anſwer.

Which were read.

As likewiſe copies of two Records, one in the Common Pleas; the other in the King's-Bench.

Hill. 12 Jacobi Ejectment; George Boſwell, Plaintiff, againſt Tho. Fox, Defendant; not guilty, pleaded, a verdict for the Defendant.

Mich. 14 Jacobi Ejectment; William Sorrel, Plaintiff, againſt Tho. Fox; Not-guilty pleaded, and the Plaintiff became Nonſuit.

Sir John Trevor. My Lord, we have this further piece of evidence; we have here a leaſe made by Stepkins, of ſeven acres of land, weſtward of Fox's-lane, which divides the marſh from the mill-ditches, and there is a covenant, that if he recover any part of the wall, marſh-wall, the tenant ſhall have the advantage of it, and increaſe his rent.

Which Leaſe, bearing date, 16 Aug. 13 Jac. Anno Dom. 1615, was read.

Mr. Williams. This was in time between the non-ſuit and the verdict.

Mr. S. Stringer. My Lord, as I did open it, there was an information exhibited by Mr. Attorney Gen. Noy, 7 Car. I. againſt our tenants and theirs, and upon that information there were examinations of witneſſes, and all the bounds of both parties particularly ſet out; which make it all as plain and clear as can be. This cannot be ſet up to ſerve a turn; it was in 7 Car. I. ſo long ago; and when that ſhews the wall to be the inheritance of the Dean of Paul's, it anſwers all their pretence of a leaſe——

L. C. J. Look you, brother, that cannot be given in evidence, and I will tell you why; if it were an information againſt Stepkins himſelf, he being the party under whom they claim, no doubt it were evidence. But it is againſt the tenants of the one, and the tenants of the other; who only could ſupport their own tenancies, but they could not know their landlords particular titles; and then this cannot be evidence to bind their inheritance.

Mr. S. Stringer. We ſubmit it to you, my Lord. Then we ſhall offer you a ſurvey. In the year 1649, this was expoſed to ſale as Church-lands, and a ſurvey taken, and found to be the inheritance of the Church of Paul's; and as ſuch ſold for 9500*l.* and enjoyed by the purchaſers till the reſtoration.

Mr. Williams. Yes, and to that very perſon ſold from whom they ſay they had theſe leaſes, which they have produced. That is, to Winterburn, whoſe Executor Knowles was, as he ſays; and if he had ſuch a leaſe, which had then been forty years in being, would he have given ſo much money, or ventured to purchaſe it as the inheritance of the Church?

Mr. S. Stringer. Here is the ſurvey then taken.

Mr. Att. Gen. We oppoſe the reading of your ſurvey, becauſe it had not any authority to warrant it.

L. C. J. Nay, Mr. Attorney, though there was no ſufficient authority, yet ſuch things have always been allowed as evidence. You cannot but remember it was done in the caſe of Finsbury Rotten-Row, as they called it White-croſs-ſtreet.

Mr. Att. Gen. Then let them read the commiſſion it was made upon.

Mr. S. Pemberton. We have none; there were many things done then of this nature, without commiſſion under ſeal.

L. C. J. Ay, they did them by orders from Committees. Read it.

It was read, dated Dec. An. 1649.

Mr. S. Stringer. Now we will ſhew the deeds of purchaſe, which was by deed enrolled.

Dated 22 Nov. An. 1650. for 9540*l.*

Mr. S. Stringer. My Lord, becauſe they pretend this to be an overſhot-mill, as they call it; though it be plain it could not be by the place, yet we have three tide-millers that we would trouble you with a little: but firſt here are ſome others, Bland, Marr, and and Leburn, who will give an account of it—(They were ſworn) —Bland, do you know the houſes in queſtion?

Bland. Yes.

Mr. Williams. How long have you known them?

Bland. Thirty years.

Mr. S. Pemberton. Pray what is the common reputation whoſe the lands were?

Bland. It was always taken to be the Dean's lands.

Mr. Williams. Who were the tenants?

Bland. Mr. Whitwick and Mr. Winterburn.

L. C. J. Prithee canſt thou tell what was taken to be the eaſt boundary of Wapping-marſh?

Bland. Fox's-lane.

L. C. J. Was that the reputation upon your oath, in all your time?

Bland. Yes, ever ſince I knew it.

Mr. Williams. Bland, pray do you know the pond?

Bland. The ponds were filled up; but there were ditches in my time.

L. C. J. How near were the ditches to Fox's-lane?

Bland. Within ten foot.

Mr. Williams. What was the uſe of thoſe ditches?

Bland. The water came in at Bell-wharf, and filled up the ditches with the tide, and ſo it went back again.

Mr. S. Stringer. Can you tell who purchaſed theſe lands of the State in the late times?

Bland. Whitwick and Winterburn.

Sir John Trevor. Swear William Kemp and Curtlett. (which was done.)

Mr. Williams. Hark you, Mr. Curtlett, we would ask you a queſtion. My Lord, your Lordſhip obſerves, there is a well called Shadwell, that is at the eaſt end of their marſh. We ſhall ſhew where that well is: there was a well very lately juſt by wall-marſh, hard by the place where the Church is now built, which was called Shadwell, and from which the Church has its name. Curtlett, do you know Fox's-lane?

Curtlett. Yes, I do.

Mr. Williams. How long have you known it?

Curtlett. I have known it ſixty years.

Mr. Williams. When you firſt knew it, whoſe land was it?

Curtlett. I am ignorant of the original title, or the derivative title, I know not whoſe it was, or is.

Mr. S. Pemberton. But whoſe was it reputed to be, that we mean?

Curtlett. Sometimes it was reputed Mrs. Moor's, ſometimes Winterburn's, ſometimes one's, ſometimes another's.

Mr. Williams. Do you remember the mill that was in this ground in queſtion?

Curtlett. Yes, very well.

Mr. Williams. How was that mill driven?

Curtlett. The water came in at Bell-wharf, eaſtward, out of the Thames into the pond, and ſo run beyond Broad-bridge, and vented it ſelf into divers ditches; and when the tide went out, it returned back again, and employed the mill.

Mr. Williams. How far went the ditches?

Curtlett. Some of them to Fox's-lane; and one principal ditch turned up half way the lane, that People were forced to have boards and planks to go over it.

L. C. J. The thing is very plain; had it been as they ſay, an overſhot mill, this proviſion that was made of water for it, for aught I ſee, would have drowned all the ground round about it.

Curtlett. When I was a boy we uſed to ſwim in that place that was near Shadwell, in the eddy; there I have ſeen the water as it went out, and the mill wrought with it as it went back again.

L. C. J. Was there not a way, when you knew it firſt, from North to South?

Curtlett. I cannot well tell.

Mr. Att. Gen. Was there not a way from Ratcliff high-way at Cock-hill, to the river of Thames?

Curtlett. There was a common way for carts and horſes down to the Ballaſt-wharf, and there was a great vacant place——

Mr. Att. Gen. Pray let me ask you, did you ever hear theſe lands reputed to be Stepkins's when you knew them firſt?

Curtlett. We have heard talk of that Gentleman.

Mr. Att. Gen. How long ago?

Curtlett. I have not heard of him this twenty years.

Mr. Att. Gen. Have you above twenty years ago?

Curtlett. If I did hear of him, I do not believe then it was in his poſſeſſion; I cannot tell whoſe title is beſt: You have, I ſuppoſe, both of you better witneſſes than I; conveyances and deeds.

Mr. Att. Gen. He is a wiſe witneſs, he will not ſwear whoſe it is.

L. C. J. He is ſo, Mr. Attorney; I wiſh yours were ſo too.

Mr. Williams. Pray what was it beyond Shadwell, and how near was Shadwell to Marſh-wall?

Curtlett. Shadwell was on the further ſide, near Fox's-lane.

Mr. Williams. To the Eaſt or Weſt of Fox's-lane?

Curtlett. To the Weſt.

Mr. Williams. Did you know the well that is called Shadwell?

Curtlett. I know there was ſuch a ſmall ſpring.

L. C. J. Did it lie Eaſt of Fox's-lane, or Weſt, do you ſay?

Curtlett. Weſt, it lay.

Mr. Williams. Pray did the place where you uſed to ſwim, come up as far as the wall?

Curtlett. Oh, no.

L. C. J. I believe that was within the Thames only.

Mr. Williams. How near have you ſwam to Fox's-lane?

Curtlett. It was in the Thames, in an eddy, there the water went underneath the mill.

Mr. Att. Gen. In whoſe ground was that well that you call Shadwell?

Curtlett. I cannot tell in whoſe ground it was.

Mr. Att. Gen. Was it in the Lynches, or in the marſh-ground, upon your oath?

Curtlett. I cannot tell indeed whoſe ground it was in.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did it riſe very high?

Curtlett. It was out of the high ground where the Church is built.

Mr. S. Lutwich. Did you ever hear of any well but what lay between Fox's-lane and the mill?

Curtlett. Sir, I can only give an account where that well lies that was called Shadwell, where the Church is now.

Mr. Att. Gen. How many wells have you known?

Curtlett. None but that, Sir.

L. C. J. He does not know as many as there are panes of glaſs in the window, Mr. Attorney.

Mr. Williams. And this, he ſays, lay Weſt of Fox's-lane, and there is your Shadwell bounds for you.

Mr. Att. Gen. I ask you again, that ſpring which you mentioned, did it lie in the Dean and Chapter's Lynches, or no?

Curtlett. I tell you I know not whoſe the ground was; the Church ſtands there now.

Mr. S. Lutwich. Did it lie in upper Shadwell?

L. C. J. He anſwers as plain as any man can, it was where the Church now is.

Mr. Williams. Where is Kemp? Do you know the houſes in queſtion?

Kemp. The houſes in Shadwell I do know, between Bell-wharf and Fox's-lane; I knew them before they were built as they are now; there were ſome ſmall houſes built here and there all along. There was a pond and ditches to receive the water of the tide; but at Broad-bridge eſpecially, there were houſes along to the northward; among the reſt, Mr. Craven's houſe who had a large orchard and garden.

L. C. J. Where was that?

Kemp. Eaſtward of Fox's-lane, and ſeveral other houſes there were.

Mr. Williams. Whoſe Inheritance was it?

Kemp. Mrs. Moor was my maſter's landlady, and Shadwell was reputed her land and ground.

Mr. Williams. She was Leſſee under the Church.

Mr. S. Pemberton. Did you know the cuts and ditches in that ground?

Kemp. Yes, Sir.

Mr. S. Pemberton. How far went they weſtward?

Kemp. The ditch ran all in one till it came to Broad-bridge, where it parted to the northward and the weſtward.

L. C. J. How near Fox's-lane?

Kemp. Within a dozen, or twenty yards of Fox's-lane.

Mr. Att. Gen. What ſort of ground was it? was it not marſh-ground?

Kemp. A man that built boats in winter-time, put his ſhallops into the pond, otherwiſe it was very good ground to the northward; there were very many good houſes built, and ſince Mr. Neale had to do with Shadwell, they have built in Mr. Craven's, and built a water-houſe, and two other houſes there.

L. C. J. Read the ſurvey again, that mentions Craven's houſe there.

(Which was done.)

Kemp. That was bending northward that way.

Mr. Williams. It is part of the ſeven acres now in queſtion.

L. C. J. Do not you contend for the brew-houſe?

Mr. Att. Gen. For the water-houſe we do.

L. C. J. Is not the water-houſe built upon part of Craven's ground?

Kemp. Yes, my Lord, it is.

Mr. Williams. When did you know this firſt?

Kemp. Fifty years ago.

Mr. Williams. Was this ground orchards or gardens then?

Kemp. Several places of it were gardens and orchards; ſome places had houſes, chiefly to the northward, ſome good houſes and orchards, eſpecially Mr. Craven's.

Mr. Att. Gen. Do you ſpeak of the hilly or the low ground?

Kemp. The middle ground, chiefly that that lay northward.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did you know the Lynches, the hilly ground?

Kemp. Up higher to Ratcliff high-way, I did.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did you know the ditch that came under the bottom of the Lynches?

Kemp. The ſtream did run in ſeveral places, but the ground was good ground, northward ſpecially.

Mr. Att. Gen. Were there any houſes built on the ſouth ſide of that ditch?

Kemp. There were a great many built between the ditch and the Thames, between Bell-wharf and Fox's-lane.

Mr. Att. Gen. What, fifty years ago?

L. C. J. Your own ſurvey ſays ſo.

Mr. Williams. Call Daniel Hams——Swear him. (which was done)——Do you know the mill and lands in queſtion?

Hams. I knew it when it was a mill.

L. C. J. How long is it ſince you firſt knew it?

Hams. Forty years.

L. C. J. Prithee what kind of a mill was it?

Hams. A ground-ſhot mill; ſhe took in water at Bell-wharf, and it ran towards the weſt to Fox's-lane, in ſeveral branches and ditches.

L. C. J. How! A ground-ſhot mill, ſayſt thou? why theſe Gentlemen ſay it was an overſhot mill.

Hams. My Lord, it could be no overſhot mill, for the water will not riſe high enough to drive ſuch a mill; it ran in ſeveral ditches to preſerve it from riſing to overflow the ground. Beſides, my father, who was a mill-wright himſelf, told me he had known it threeſcore years, and knew it always a ground-ſhot mill: He told me of all the mills about London, what they were.

Mr. Att. Gen. Pray how old was your father when he told you ſo?

Hams. He had known them, he ſaid, ſixty years, and he has been dead twenty years.

Mr. Att. Gen. Why the mill was removed; he could not know it ſo long.

L. C. J. I know no proof of it but your deeds.

Hams. My Lord, there it was, he ſaid.

Mr. Att. Gen. Was there not a pond and ditches?

Hams. There muſt be ditches to receive the water as it came in; but ſtill the more the tide came in, that fill'd up the ponds; and as it went back again, it drove the mill.

Mr. Williams. What profeſſion are you of, pray?

Hams. I am a mill-wright.

Mr. Att. Gen. Pray do they make uſe of a trough in ſuch a mill?

Hams. They do for an overſhot mill.

Mr. Att. Gen. Here is a trough of lead in their leaſe. Do not they uſe a trough in an underſhot mill?

Hams. No, if it be by the tide, a ground-ſhot mill, there is no neceſſity of a trough.

Mr. Williams. We have a great many witneſſes to this point. Swear Grindy—(which was done)—Are you a mill-wright?

Grindy. I am only a miller.

Mr. Williams. Did you know the mill in queſtion?

Grindy. I cannot remember it, Sir.

L. C. J. How long have you known the place?

Grindy. Thirty or forty years: But I had no acquaintance with that mill they ſpeak of; but I know it is impoſſible for any overſhot mill to be there: For I keep part of a tide-mill my ſelf, and have done ſo this forty years; and I know the water muſt riſe at leaſt, ten, twelve, or fourteen foot higher than it needs in a tide-mill. For we take in our water as the tide comes in, and we have a pair of gates that are hung with hinges at the top, which open open as the tide comes in, but the water as it goeth out, ſhuts it again, and that keeps the water to ſtand three or four hours in ſome mills, and then we have only guts that belong to the wheel, and when we draw up the gates, the water goes out. We have no water that comes above the ſhaft, which is half the height of the wheel, which is ſixteen foot high. To talk of an overſhot-mill, the water muſt riſe ſo high as to go over the whole marſh.

L. C. J. And muſt drown all the town and country too. It is plainly ſo, Mr. Attorney, talk as long as you will.

Mr. Att. Gen. Friend, I ask you but one ſhort, plain queſtion: I would know, can they uſe a leaden trough with thoſe Tide-mills, as you call them?

Grindy. We can uſe none, nor do we make any ſuch thing.

Mr. Att. Gen. Would not the ſprings in the Lynches carry an overſhot-mill?

Grindy. Sir, I have ſeen the place all about many times, and I will lay any man 20 l. to 20 s. that all the ſprings thereabouts ſhall not produce a quarter enough water.

Mr. Williams. Where is George Care? Swear him——[Which was done.]——Do you know Fox's-lane?

Care. Very well.

Mr. Williams. How long have you known it?

Care. Eight and Fifty years.

Mr. Williams. Did you know Shadwell, the well ſo called?

Care. That I did, Sir.

Mr. Williams. Where ſtood it, pray?

Care. At the upper-end of Fox's-lane as we go weſtward, and juſt at the ſide of the Church-yard, there is one now, and brick'd over head, where they uſed to fetch water: I never knew any other.

Mr. Williams. Was that called Shadwell?

Care. I never knew any other but what I tell you of.

Mr. S. Stringer. Pray what was uſually taken to be the eaſt-bound of Wapping-marſh?

Care. The weſt-ſide of Fox's-lane was called Marſh-wall, or Wall-marſh, and that was the boundary to Stepkins's lands; and eaſtward was always the lands of the Dean of Paul's, and I have known it this eight and fifty years; nay, I was the firſt that ever built an houſe in Fox's-lane.

Mr. Att. Gen. Do you know the Lynches, or the high ground northward?

Care. I know it not by that name.

Mr. Att. Gen. This well you ſpeak of, did it not riſe out of that ground?

Care. It was by the Church-yard that is now.

Mr. Att. Gen. You have claim'd the Inheritance of it.

Mr. Williams. Sir, we hope we ſhall not need to be taught which is our Inheritance; where is Mr. Marr? We ſhall now, my Lord, anſwer the admeaſurement made by her Surveyor Holwell. Pray will you, Mr. Marr, tell the Court how many acres it is?

Marr. The land which is counted Wapping-marſh, which is bounded on Fox's-lane eaſt, on the Dean's land weſt, upon Graſh-mill, Well-cloſe, Nightingale-lane, &c. if we take it to the upper ground, doth contain 130 acres; but take in that which is in queſtion too, and it makes 141 acres.

Mr. Williams. Did you meaſure it too, Mr. Leyburn?

Leyburn. I did ſo too, Sir, and it is as he ſays.

L. C. J. How much is it?

Leyburn. I took the whole from St. Katherine's to Fox's-lane, and it makes 130 acres beſides the upland and foreland, and the like between Graſh-mill and Wall-marſh-wall: it is at leaſt ſo much; it is, I think, ſomewhat more, the ditches being undetermined.

L. C. J. Well, what is it all this while you keep my brother Gregory for?

Mr. Williams. If your Lordſhip pleaſe, we have only a ſhort queſtion to ask Mr. Baron Gregory; if he pleaſe to be ſworn——[Which was done]—— Where is Mr. Knowles? Sir, you were pleaſed to ſay that the writings were carried to Mr. Neale's Counſel in Gray's-Inn, and that that writing was among them.

Knowles. They were ſo, and I believe it was among them.

Mr. Williams. My Lord, Mr. Baron Gregory had the peruſal of the writings.

L. C. J. But, Mr. Williams, my brother Gregory was not named to be the Counſellor in Gray's-Inn.

Knowles. No, one Gage, or ſome ſuch name.

L. C. J. I ſuppoſe it was to Mr. Cage's chamber, that married Okey's widow.

Mr. S. Stringer. I believe it was, and I am ſorry we have kept Mr. Baron Gregory ſo long. Knowles, pray did you know they were with Mr. Baron Gregory?

L. C. J. Did you know they were with my brother Gregory?

Knowles. No, my Lord, that I remember.

L. C. J. Well, brother, we cannot help your ſtaying now, but remember you had an offer made you at firſt, and you are puniſhed for refuſing it. Go on, brother Stringer.

Mr. S. Pemberton. My Lord, that which we were ſurprized with the laſt Trial, was the newneſs of theſe Deeds to us. It look'd to us to be ſo ſtrange a thing, ſo amazing a thing to us, that we knew not how to give an anſwer to it. We have ſince conſidered of theſe things, and your Lordſhip doth ſee what account they themſelves have given of them; and what an improbability it is, that theſe deeds ſhould be found, as they ſay. Here was a poſſeſſion which we have proved under the Dean of Paul's leaſe for ſo long, this they would ſtrip us of, theſe Deeds they have trumped up. It made us look into it more warily, and we cannot conceive it probable, or any thing likely, that the Deed of Purchaſe, whereby this land is pretended to be purchaſed into the family of the Stepkins's, ſhould be found in the hands of the Dean of Paul's Leſſee, who likewiſe purchas'd it of the ſtate, as the inheritance of the Dean of Paul's. How could the Deed of Purchaſe from Hill be in our Leſſee's Houſe?

Mr. Att. Gen. It was not, that is a miſtake.

Mr. S. Pemberton. Good Mr. Attorney, do not interrupt me. We muſt rely upon it, that they ſwore it the laſt time, and that the Deed of Inheritance was made four days before our Deed, on purpoſe to warrant the trick. Here is likewiſe a ſurrender made between Hall and Stepkins produced. How ſhould the Dean's Leſſees come to have that Deed of ſurrender? But to ſatisfy your Lordſhip in this matter, we ſhall give a full and fair evidence that theſe Deeds are forged.

Mr. Bradbury. My Lord, we have had a violent ſuſpicion, that theſe Deeds were forged. But we ſuſpect it now no longer, for we have detected it, and will

will ſhew as palpable ſelf-evident forgery upon the face of theſe deeds as ever was. I deſire to ſee the Deed of the 13th of November, in the 2d and 3d years of Philip and Mary from Marcellus Hall to Roper: and that of the 22d of December, in the ſame years, from Marcellus Hall to Carter, I deſire to ſee too. Your Lordſhip ſees the uſe of theſe Deeds. The one is grafted upon our leaſe from Dean Fecknam, where it is recited, that the mill is demoliſhed, and a new one erected in another place (ſays their Deed;) and upon that they ſet up the notion of an overſhot-mill, and all the puzzling matter brought into this cauſe. But I dare undertake to prove them plainly forged.

Mr. Att. Gen. That is an undertaking indeed.

Mr. Bradbury. It is an undertaking indeed to detect the Defendant's articles; but I will venture upon it, and ſhall demonſtrate it ſo evidently, that Mr. Attorney himſelf ſhall be convinced they are forged.

Mr. Att. Gen. Come on, let us ſee this demonſtration.

Mr. Bradbury. The Deeds have brought that evidence upon their own faces, that is 1000 witneſſes.

Mr. Williams. Prithee open the Exception.

Mr. Bradbury. If your Lordſhip pleaſe to look upon them, the ſtile of the King and Queen in both run thus. The one is, This Indenture made the 13th day of November, in the ſecond and third years of the reigns of our ſovereign Lord and Lady Philip and Mary, by the grace of God, King and Queen of England, Spain, France, both Sicilies, Jeruſalem, and Ireland, Defenders of the Faith, Archdukes of Auſtria, Dukes of Burgundy, Millain and Brabant, Counts of Hasburg, Flanders and Tyroll. The other is, This Indenture made the 22d day of December in the ſame year. Now in November and December, ſecond and third of Philip and Mary, it was impoſſible for any man in the world to draw a Deed in this form that thoſe two writings are——

Mr. Att. Gen. Is that your demonſtration?

L. C. J. Pray let him go on, methinks it is very ingenious.

Mr. Bradbury. My Lord, I had the hint from my Lord Coke in his firſt Inſtitutes; not as to this particular ſtile, for I know he is miſtaken there, but for the detecting of forgeries in general.

L. C. J. It is very well, pray go on.

Mr. Bradbury. My Lord, at that time King Philip and Queen Mary, were, among other Stiles, ſtiled King and Queen of Naples, Princes of Spain and Sicily; they never were called King and Queen of Spain, and both the Sicilies then. And laſtly, Burgundy was never put before Millain. Now to prove all this that I ſay, I have here all the Records of that time, which will prove their ſtile to be otherwiſe. Firſt, We ſhall ſhew the Acts of Parliament of that time. The ſitting began the 21ſt of October, in that year, which was before their Deeds, and ended the 9th of December after. We ſhall firſt read the titles of the Acts of Parliament; and you will find them juſt as I have open'd them. Read the Statute-Book.

Clerk reads.] Acts made at a Parliament, begun and holden at Weſtminſter, the one and twentieth day of October, in the ſecond and third years of the reign of our moſt gracious ſovereign Lord and Lady Philip and Mary, by the Grace of God, King and Queen of England, France, Naples, Jeruſalem and Ireland, Defenders of the Faith, Princes of Spain and Sicily, Archdukes of Auſtria, Dukes of Millain, Burgundy and Brabant, Counts of Haſpurg, Flanders and Tyroll: and there continued and kept until the diſſolution of the ſame, being the ninth day of December then next enſuing.

Mr. Bradbury. Here in the Acts made by the publick Council of the Kingdom, the ſtile is in the ancient manner. And your Lordſhip obſerves theſe no ſmall differences. Here firſt Spain is left out in the enumeration of the Kingdoms, and ſo Sicily and Naples is inſtead of them. In the Deeds, Spain is put in before France, and the Sicilies made a Kingdom too. Secondly, Here in the ſtile of the Act they are called but Princes of Spain and Sicily, that in the Deeds is quite left out. And then in the Acts of Parliament, Millain is put before Burgundy, in the Deeds Burgundy before Millain. And how this great alteration of the ſtile ſhould come to be put in a Miller's leaſe, is ſtrange. We have next an account of all the fines of Hillary Term, which was the next Term following; for their firſt Deed happens to be in Michaelmas Term, and then the Parliament ſate too.

Many of which were read.

Mr. Bradbury. Here are likewiſe the Fines of Eaſter-Term following, which ſhew that ſtill the old ſtile continued in all the publick Records. And if we could as eaſily have brought all the enrolments of Deeds, that would prove the ſame.

The Fines of Eaſter-Term read.

Mr. Bradbury. Now, my Lord, we ſhall ſhew when the ſtile turn'd, that was in Trinity-Term after.

The Fines read.

Mr. Bradbury. But I cannot ſee how theſe Deeds could be truly made at that time, when they ſtand ſingle, and none like them can be ſhewn, except they come from the ſame forge that theſe do. I cannot believe the Miller alone, or he that drew his leaſes for him, could ſo long before propheſy what manner of ſtile ſhould hereafter be uſed.

Mr. Williams. Your Lordſhip has heard our Deed of the 10th of December, in the ſame year, read already; but we having here the Ledger Book of the Church of St. Paul's, which cannot be made for a turn, but was written at that time; we deſire the ſtile may be read there——[Which was done.]

——But to go a little further, to ſatisfy your Lordſhip that they are very likely to be forged, we ſhall give ſome evidence that this is not an unuſual thing with ſome people concerned in this cauſe. The witneſſes will name them to you, and give you an account of it. Swear this Lady and Sir Charles Cotterel. [Which was done.]

L. C. J. Well, what is it you call theſe perſons to?

Sir John Trevor. To ſpeak plain, my Lord, we call them to give an account of my Lady Ivy's forging a Mortgage from one Sir William Salkhill for 1500 l. of a houſe in St. Martin's-lane, to which forgery Mr. Duffet, that Lady's husband was privy, and what benefit he ſhould have by it, you will hear. Sir Charles Cotterel, pray will you tell what you know of my Lady Ivy in this matter.

Sir Charles Cotterel. My Lord, that which I have to ſay is this; my Lord, I am tenant to my Lady Salkhill, Sir William Salkhill's widow, in a houſe in St. Martin's-lane, and was ſo to her huſband a year and a half before he died. The houſe hath been built backward, and the garden ſide they kept to themſelves; but all the houſe that was firſt built, I took, and have it ſtill. My Lord, my

Lady

Lady Ivy did come to the houſe about three months before Sir William died, parting from her husband Sir Thomas Ivy: ſhe came thither as a refuge; where ſhe had been before, and was received very kindly. He died, as I ſaid, about three months after, and my Lady then deſired to know how accounts ſtood between Sir William and her about moneys he had lent her, and ſupplied her with. And upon the account ſhe appear'd to owe Sir William 96 l. ſhe then took 4 l. more out of my Lady Salkhill's money, and told her, now Madam, I owe you 100 l. She had been entertained as a gueſt there without paying any thing for it, and at his death ſhe continued with my Lady Salkhill three quarters of a year after. And being there (as ſhe pretended) in great kindneſs to me, ſhe perſuaded my Lady and me, that the leaſe of my Lady's houſe ſhould be turned over to me, in truſt for a debt of fourſcore pounds that was owing to me by Sir William Salkhill. Said I to my Lady Salkhill, Madam, I am in no doubt of my money, I pay as much rent as this in a year and more, I can pay myſelf that way; pray let me not meddle with any ſuch thing, Mr. Duffett will be perſuaded I intend to cheat them if I ſhould. But ſtill my Lady Ivy was at it, and prevailed upon my Lady Salkhill to preſs me to it. At laſt, upon their importunity, ſaid I, if it be neceſſary for my Lady's ſervice, let it be done what you think fit. She therefore gave direction to Mr. Sutton, and he came to me, and I directed him to draw a writing to turn over the houſe to me as a ſecurity. He asked me how much my debt was; fourſcore pounds, ſaid I. Said he, I ſhould ſee my Lord of Salisbury's leaſe to my Lady, for he muſt take out ſome things to draw this by. He did ſee it, and took as much by note out of it as he thought fit, to make the other by. Then a writing was drawn, this was in June 1670, or 1671. I am not certain particularly which, but ſhe brings this writing, and my Lady Salkhill ſigned it by her deſire; and my Lady Ivy and Mr. Sutton were both witneſſes to it. About a year after I heard that ſhe ſet on foot a Mortgage of her own upon this houſe from Sir William Salkhill. I wondred at it, becauſe when the account was made up, ſhe appeared to be in Sir William's debt; and I told thoſe that told me of it, I would believe it when I did ſee it. I was then informed the writing was at Malmeſbury. She after went out of town, and comes back again in a little while, and this writing, as I heard, was ſhewn to ſeveral perſons of my acquaintance, that came to me and told me they had ſeen it; but ſaid I, ſo have not I, but when I ſee it I will believe it. At laſt Serjeant Weſt, who was a relation of mine, I married his aunt, one day brought over this writing to me; and told me he had got this writing at laſt, and leave from my Lady Ivy to let me ſee it. I looked upon it, and there I did ſee at the bottom, where the Seal was, William Salkhill, and then I turned to look upon the witneſſes names. No, ſays he, you muſt not ſee that, who are witneſſes to the Deed; for my Lady Ivy made me promiſe, before ſhe let me have it to ſhew you, that you ſhould not ſee the witneſſes names. Then ſaid I again, I have ſeen enough to give me ſatisfaction: I was a little the more confirmed that the thing was not a reality but fiction, and ſo I told him. My Lady ſaw that would not paſs, ſhe offered, provided Mrs. Duffett, my Lady's daughter, might have the advantage of the houſe, to releaſe the matter.

L. C. J. Pray Sir, for how much was the pretended Mortgage?

Sir Charles Cotterel. For 1500 l. that Sir William Salkhill owed her; which I thought ſomewhat ſtrange, ſeeing, as I ſaid, ſhe owed Sir William ſo much at his death. At laſt I came to produce my writing, (for ſhe told me I might give Mrs. Duffett a right to the houſe.) Now I had not read over the writing made me, but now when I came to look upon it, inſtead of a Mortgage for ſecuring my debt, mine was a Deed of Sale from my Lady Salkhill, whereby the houſe and the leaſe from my Lord of Salisbury were ſold me for fourſcore pound; at which I was a little amazed. My Lady then was pleaſed to ſay I was a cheat, tho' I had no hand in it, nor indeed would have had any thing at all done; but upon my Lady Ivy's importunity, and my Lady Salkhill's, I gave direction only for a Mortgage.

L. C. J. What was it that Sutton took out of my Lord of Salisbury's leaſe?

Sir Charles Cotterel. He was to take notes, to draw a Mortgage of that leaſe by.

L. C. J. He got the notes tho', for aught I perceive, to draw another Mortgage by. A very trick, it ſmells rank of the Knave.

Mr. S. Stringer. Pray, Sir Charles, did you ever pay any money by my Lady's order.

Sir Charles Cotterel. I did lend my Lady Ivy 50 l. ſhe being in diſtreſs for money, afterwards it was made up 100 l. About February 1671, it was made up 1250 l. and by agreement among them my Lady Ivy did relinquiſh that ſaid Mortgage ſhe had thus ſet on foot: and there was a Deed Tripartite made between me of the firſt, my Lady Ivy of the ſecond part, and ſome Truſtees for Mrs. Duffett of the third part, whereby the reverſion was given to Mrs. Duffett, and my Lady confirm'd it, and gave my Lady Salkhill a Bond of 1000 l. in which Colonel Gravener was bound for her, that ſhe ſhould not trouble my Lady about the houſe; yet notwithſtanding did ſhe afterwards write to Mr. Duffett, as I have heard, that ſhe would ſet it on foot again, and ſhe ſhould have half of what ſhe had recovered.

L. C. J. The Inheritance of the houſe, it ſeems, is in my Lord of Salisbury.

Sir Charles Cotterel. Yes, my Lord, Sir William Salkhill had the original leaſe from my Lord of Salisbury.

L. C. J. What direction did you give Sutton about it?

Sir Charles Cotterel. To make a Mortgage only to ſecure fourſcore pound.

L. C. J. And what did he make?

Sir Charles Cotterel. An abſolute Deed of Sale.

L. C. J. Was there no proviſo in it, to be void upon payment of money?

Sir Charles Cotterel. No, nothing but an actual Sale for ſo much money.

L. C. J. You ſay my Lady Ivy afterwards did relinquiſh her pretended Mortgage, pray had ſhe nothing for it?

Sir Charles Cotterel. Nothing that I know of, ſhe joined in that Deed Tripartite.

Mr. Williams. What ſhould diſpoſe her to give Mrs. Duffett 1500 l. if it were really owing her.

L. C. J. Is that Mortgage here among your writings, Mr. Attorney?

Lady Ivy. Indeed, my Lord, I would have brought it, if they had given the leaſt notice of what they now talk of.

Mr.

Mr. Att. Gen. Sir Charles Cotterel, do you know that my Lady Ivy forged that Deed?

Sir Charles Cotterel. Not I, but it did appear to me to be no true Deed, upon what I found and knew.

Lady Ivy. You muſt give an account for what you have ſaid here—

L. C. J. Nay, Madam, pray do not be in a paſſion: he has ſworn what he has ſaid here?

Lady Ivy. If he doth ſwear it, he is forſworn.

L. C. J. Nay, Madam, you muſt be more moderate in the Court?

Mr. Williams. My Lady thinks ſhe has occaſion to be angry, but it may be we ſhall give her more exerciſe for her paſſion before we have done. Pray ſwear that Lady, Mrs. Duffett. Will you acquaint my Lord and the Jury what you know has been done by my Lady Ivy, or by her direction, in making and altering of Deeds.

Mrs. Duffett. My Lord, I did ſee Mr. Duffett forge and counterfeit ſeveral Deeds for my Lady Ivy.

L. C. J. Do you hear what ſhe ſays, Mr. Attorney?

Mr. Att. Gen. Yes, my Lord, we ſhall give an account of her anon.

L. C. J. Truly, I hope I miſtook her, and did not hear right what ſhe ſaid. Pray Miſtreſs ſpeak it over again, and conſider well what you ſay.

Mrs. Duffett. I ſay, my Lord, I did ſee Mr. Duffett forge and counterfeit ſeveral Deeds for my Lady Ivy. The firſt thing that I do remember was in the Trial between her husband and ſhe; Mr. Duffett did by her order counterfeit a bond from him to ſome third perſon for 1000 l. and ſeveral letters pretended to be written from Sir Thomas to my Lady Ivy were counterfeit. The next thing that I remember; Mr. Duffett was writing upon a parchment: I asked him what he was writing? He anſwered me, he was counterfeiting one Glover's leaſe, by which my Lady would get many hundreds of pounds, and for which he ſhould have 500 l. I deſired him to conſider what he did, for before that time he had been accounted a very honeſt man. Some time after that, my Lady Ivy did upon a pique to my mother, my Lady Salkhill, ſet a-foot a Mortgage ſhe pretended to have of the houſe in St. Martin's-lane for 1500 l. from my father. She did once tell me ſhe had ſuch a Mortgage, as ſhe pretended real, but that it was drowned in a trunk of writings coming from Malmesbury. Said I, my mother and Sir Charles Cotterel will not believe it, if you do not let them ſee it. I am ſatisfied as to my concern in it, and would not have you proceed in in it, for ſhe pretended ſhe did it for my advantage. But afterwards Mr. Duffett and ſhe did agree to make a writing, in my ſight, of a Mortgage.

L. C. J. Was my Lady Ivy by, when the writing was made as you ſay?

Mrs. Duffett. She was by, giving him order how to make it, and what Ink he ſhould uſe to make it look old; and they forced me to make the Ink, and to fetch ſaffron to put in it to make it look old.

Mr. S. Stringer. Now will be the time to ſhew my Lady's letters.

L. C. J. Miſtreſs, I would ask you one queſtion by the way, whether while theſe things were doing at any time, any body did come in and give you any interruption?

Mrs. Duffett. My Lord, Mr. Duffett and my Lady made me oftentimes ſtand at the door (for we were but lodgers) that no one might come and diſturb them, and I never remember any that came in thither but one Mr. Sutton an Attorney, my Lady's Attorney.

L. C. J. Did he ſee any of this done?

Mrs. Duffett. I cannot ſay he helped to do any thing, for when he came in, they ſometimes ſent me out to ſee that no body ſhould come upon them; and ſo what he did, I cannot ſay. But he was let in when Mr. Duffett was counterfeiting for my Lady Ivy.

L. C. J. When was this, about what time?

Mrs. Duffett. Of the day, my Lord?

L. C. J. No, how long ago is it?

Mrs. Duffett. It might be about 70, or 71.

L. C. J. You are my Lady Salkhill's daughter, I think, and married Duffett.

Mrs. Duffett. I did ſo, my Lord, I am her daughter.

Mr. S. Stringer. Pray what did they do to the Deeds they made, to make them look like ancient true Deeds?

Mrs. Duffett. For the making of the outſides look old and dirty, they uſed to rub them on windows that were very duſty, and wear them in their pockets to creaſe them, for ſome weeks together, according as they intended to make uſe of them.

Mr. Att. Gen. My Lord, as it happens we have that Deed ſhe talks of, called Glover's leaſe, here.

L. C. J. Ay, I ſuppoſe you have ſuch a Deed; it is a famous Deed in Weſtminſter-hall.

Mr. Att. Gen. Here it is, we deſire ſhe may look upon it. [Which ſhe did.]

Mrs. Duffett. As for this Deed, I cannot ſwear this is the Deed, there have been ſo many made by them. But he did counterfeit a Deed that he told me was one Glover's leaſe.

Mr. Williams. Miſtreſs, you were going on to tell how they did uſe their Deeds they made. Pray tell us how they uſed to lay them in the Balconies, and all you know of the art.

L. C. J. Ay, how was it?

Mrs. Duffett. When they had been rubbed upon the window to make them look dirty, and they were to paſs for Deeds of a great many years ſtanding; it was uſed to lay them in a balcony, or any open place, for the rain to come upon them and wet them, and then the next ſun-ſhine day they were expoſed to the ſun, or a fire made to dry them haſtily, that they might be ſhrivelled.

L. C. J. Is your husband dead or alive?

Mrs. Duffett. Dead, Sir.

Mr. Att. Gen. How long has he been dead?

Mrs. Duffet. I was not at his death with him, he died beyond ſea.

L. C. J. Was your husband alive when Mr. Johnſon's buſineſs was?

Mrs. Duffett. Yes, he was.

L. C. J. Yes, I know he was in Court; tho' I asked the queſtion, I remember all that buſineſs.

Mrs. Duffett. I was ſubpœna'd in at that time, but my Lady Ivy would not let me ſwear.

L. C. J. Pray Miſtreſs, what had your husband for his pains?

Mr. Williams. Had he any ſhare of the money lent by Sir Charles Cotterel?

Mrs. Duffett. My Lady Ivy gave him in my ſight 200 l. of Sir Charles Cotterel's money.

Mr. Williams. Do you know any body elſe that had any of that money?

Mrs.

Mrs. Duffett. The Attorney had 200*l.* of the ſame money too.

L. C. J. What Attorney do you mean?

Mrs. Duffett. Mr. Sutton.

L. C. J. Had he ſo, how come he to deſerve it?

Mr. Dobbins. Pray, Madam, what do you know of counterfeiting any ſeals?

Mrs. Duffett. Mr. Duffett once had the impreſſion of a ſeal in his hand, with which he ſaid he was going to one Mr. Dryden, to have it counterfeited; but I do not remember what the ſeal was.

Mr. Williams. When the deeds were written, how did he uſe to put the names to them?

Mrs. Duffett. I have ſeen my Lady her ſelf write ſome great Letters of the names firſt upon other papers, which Mr. Duffett could not ſo well hit, and he has writ the reſt.

Mr. Williams. Can you tell the names?

Mrs. Duffett. Truly, I do not remember what names.

Mr. Williams. We have another witneſs who will give you an account of ſome Letters of my Lady's, which we ſhall deſire to be read. Swear Mrs. Elizabeth Rycott. (which was done.)

Mr. Att. Gen. She talks of Glover's leaſe——

L. C. J. She ſays, ſhe doth not know whether that be the deed, there were ſo many forged, Mr. Attorney. But ſhe ſwears thus, my husband did forge a writing he called Glover's leaſe.

Mrs. Duffett. She had two or three mortgages forfeited.

Mr. Williams. Come Miſtreſs, where had you theſe Letters?

Mrs. Rycott. I had theſe Letters from Mr. Duffett.

Mr. Williams. Pray where had you theſe bottles?

Mrs. Rycott. This is the ink I ſaw Mr. Duffett write for my Lady Ivy with, at Mrs. Lee's houſe, at the table in the kitchen.

L. C. J. Who did he write for?

Mrs. Rycott. For my Lady Ivy; I did not know what they were that were written, but he ſaid they were forged; and with ink out of theſe bottles he ſaid he could make new-written writings look like old ones very ſoon.

Mr. Williams. Did you ever ſpeak with my Lady Ivy? Do you know her hand?

Mrs. Rycott. I do not know theſe Letters to be her hand; but Mr. Duffett gave me them as her Letters.

Mr. Williams. Sir Charles Cotterel, pray will you look upon them; you know my Lady Ivy's hand.

Sir Charles Cotterel. I do ſo ——they are all of a hand, and I think they are my Lady's: I believe it truly.

Clerk reads.] This is ſigned T. I.

All the Letters were read.

Mr. Williams. Your Lordſhip ſees one of theſe Letters tells Mr. Duffett, ſhe intends to ſet Sir William Salkeld's mortgage on foot, and ſhould have half what ſhe recovered. If it were a true mortgage, why ſhould ſhe give him half?

L. C. J. They were very great together, that is plain, they were very familiar. What were Mr. Duffett's merits towards my Lady, I cannot tell. Will you go on? it is late.

Mr. Williams. This is all we ſhall offer at preſent, till we have occaſion further from them.

L. C. J. Well, what ſay you to this, Mr. Attorney?

Mr. Att. Gen. If they have done——

L. C. J. They have, they ſay.

Mr. Att. Gen. Then may it pleaſe your Lordſhip, and you Gentlemen of the Jury, I ſhall begin to anſwer their evidence about the firſt. They have produced ſome argumentative evidence out of many Records, to convict our deeds of forgery. In truth, if they had not bragg'd of this very thing, it had been a ſhrewd objection, becauſe we could not have been prepared to have given an anſwer to what we could not have foreſeen we ſhould have been accuſed of. But upon their boaſts they have put us upon the ſearch as well as they, and we can give as good an account of it. They tell you, they had their hint from my Lord Coke; but that hint has led them into a great error; for he is miſtaken himſelf in the computation of this time, as he is in a great many other things.

Mr. Bradbury. I know he is miſtaken; but I depend not upon his remarks of that time. I ſaid only, I had the general hint about detecting forgeries from thence.

Mr. Att. Gen. But yet for all your confidence of the demonſtration, your foundation fails: For, my Lord, to ſettle the fact, we ſhall ſhew that the King of Spain, Charles V. who was likewiſe Emperor, reſigned his Crown the 25th of October, in the 2d and 3d years of Philip and Mary. It is true, the Parliament-Rolls, in the title of them relating to the firſt day of the ſeſſion, there the ſtile that was uſed at firſt could not be altered. But the fact of their being the King and Queen of Spain, was ſo notorious to all the World, that we ſhall ſhew you in multitudes of the Rolls of that year, the ſtile was in our deeds; ſo that the uſe might be various: But that will not prove our deeds forged. It may be, the Courts of Law might not take notice of it, as to alter the ſtile till Trinity Term; though we have not ſearched ſo far among them, but in the common conveyances which are upon Record in the Rolls, there it is altered. And as to the time of their becoming King and Queen of Spain, we have an Hiſtory that tells you the very day when the King reſigned, which was the 25th of October.

L. C. J. I tell you, Gentlemen, methinks Mr. Attorney has been very fortunate to-day, in giving very ſatisfactory anſwers to two objections: Firſt, they would quite deſtroy Mr. Neale's title to this land, by a piece of evidence that they had never had, but that Mr. Neale had bragged of it; and that was the ſurvey, which with much confidence of the victory was produced: and yet, when it was ſo, to me it ſeemed the ſtabbingeſt enemy the defendant's Cauſe had; but that you are to have with you, and muſt judge upon it. Now he tells you again, Mr. Neale has been a blab of his tongue, and could not keep the ſecret to himſelf, but muſt brag that the deeds were forged, for the ſtile of the Queen's reign is changed; and by this bragging they have ſmoked the buſineſs, and can ſhew Records for it. But now inſtead of Records, the upſhot is a little louſy Hiſtory. Can that be an anſwer to thoſe great numbers of Records brought by the other ſide? Is a printed Hiſtory, written by I know not who, an evidence in a Court of Law?

Mr. Att. Gen. My Lord, beſides that, which we muſt ſubmit to your Judgment, whether upon ſuch a point of fact in a foreign Country to be done ſuch a day, a foreigner's Hiſtory, not printed for this purpoſe, ſhall be a ſort of evidence; but I ſay, beſides that, here is a Gentleman Mr. Clerk, that ſearched the Roll, and he will tell you what they are in this point.

Mr. Clerk. I did ſearch in the Rolls, and find many in that year like theſe. And my Lord Coke is utterly miſtaken; he ſays it was not altered till the 4th and 5th years of Phil. and Mary.

L. C. J. I care not what my Lord Coke ſays, but what the Records ſay, let us ſee them.

Mr. Clerk. I ſaw a great many in that year.

L. C. J. Lord, Gentlemen, what do you make of us, to keep us here with I do not know what! Mr. Attorney, he tells us that Mr. Neale was ſo great a blockhead to brag of this, and ſo we were prepared for an anſwer; but all the anſwer is, my Lord Coke is miſtaken, and there are many Records, but we have none of them, Præmoniti, Præmuniti. If he did brag ſo, and you knew it, and would not bring Records to wipe off the objection, it is ten times worſe than if it had been anſwered only with the unexpectedneſs of it.

Mr. Bradbury. My Lord, I dare affirm that there are none of the Rolls of that year ſo, till after Eaſter-Term——

L. C. J. Lord, Sir, you muſt be cackling too; we told you, your objection was very ingenious, but that muſt not make you troubleſome; you cannot lay an egg, but you muſt be cackling over it. The objection is now upon them, let them anſwer it if they can. Have you any of the Records here?

Mr. Sol. Gen. We have not, it ſeems, my Lord.

L. C. J. Then this muſt paſs unanſwered, and muſt be left to the Jury.

Mr. Sol. Gen. But, my Lord, they have gone a little farther in this caſe, and indeed farther than becomes them, I think, to lay aſperſions upon my Lady Ivy, as if ſhe were frequently guilty of forgery. And for that Sir Charles Cotterel ſwears, that ſhe did pretend ſhe had a mortgage of a houſe in St. Martin's-lane for 1500 l. and this mortgage he ſays he was told of by ſome that did ſee it; whereupon he did likewiſe deſire to ſee it, and without ſeeing of it, he declared, he would never be ſatisfied of the reality of the thing: And thereupon Mr. Serjeant Weſt brought it him, and he ſaw it, but was not permitted to ſee the witneſſes names, and thereupon he was more diſſatisfied than before about it. But if Sir Charles Cotterel had given any the leaſt intimation of ſuch a thing, now we would have gratified them with a ſight of it in Court, where he ſhould have had his full view; for my Lady has it ſtill, and it is a true mortgage, and for a real conſideration. But he ſays this is releaſed, and ſhe did that, as is ſuppoſed, to ſuppreſs any inquiry after it. But with reverence to Sir Charles Cotterel, the fact is otherwiſe. My Lady Salkell pretended to a debt from my Lady Ivy, for nine years diet for four Perſons; and the reckoning being made according to my Lady Ivy's quality, was made ſo high, that it paid off the mortgage: But he has the deed ſtill——

L. C. J. But what ſay you to the deed of ſale and my friend Sutton's notes out of the leaſe; and the debt of 96 l. and 4 l. but a little before acknowledged by my Lady Ivy——

Mr. Sol. Gen. My Lord, in anſwer to that, we ſay, he has been pleaſed to give it a great deal of garniture; and as he is maſter of the ceremonies, to adorn the ſtory with abundance of flouriſhes of his own kindneſs and intereſts—

L. C. J. Mr. Sollicitor, you are not to judge of that, whether it be flouriſh only or ſubſtance; the Court and the Jury are the Judges of that, and truly I think it very material to the Cauſe. I aſſure you I do, let the dirt be taken off as it can, it ſticks very much; I muſt ſpeak my mind.

Mr. Sol. Gen. When I am over-ruled, I acquieſce in the Judgment of the Court.

L. C. J. Pray, Sir, apply your ſelf to anſwer the evidence.

Mr. Sol. Gen. So I do, my Lord, as well as I can. The next witneſs is this Gentlewoman, Mrs. Duffett; ſhe ſwears, that ſhe ſaw her husband Mr. Duffet, counterfeit many deeds, ſhe does not particularize them: And here have been likewiſe ſeveral Letters read, that did import a tranſaction and correſpondence between my Lady Ivy and him.

L. C. J. Pray, Mr. Sollicitor, remember ſhe ſwears ſhe ſaw that Leaſe of Salkell's, and that called Glover's leaſe.

Mr. Sol. Gen. My Lord, this witneſs that ſwears this, is not only a Perſon unfit to be believed, but is contradicted by a Record; and for that, my Lord, it ſtands thus: Mr. Johnſon, as is well known, had his trial for the matter about which ſhe now ſwears; for Mr. Johnſon, on the behalf of Alderman Ireton, undertook to pay 500 l. to Mr. Duffett, to procure ſomebody to ſwear the deed, called Glover's leaſe, to be forged. Upon this there was an information exhibited in this Court againſt Mr. Johnſon, for ſubornation; and upon full evidence Johnſon was convicted for his endeavour. And the Record of that conviction we have here, and deſire to have produced and read.

L. C. J. And I tell you, Mr. Sollicitor, that is no evidence in this Caſe.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Why, pray, good my Lord, did not they here juſt now ſwear her?

L. C. J. But the Information put in by Mr. Attorney Noy, pray remember, was not ſuffered to be read, becauſe not againſt any of the Parties, but third Perſons.

Mr. Sol. Gen. But pray, my Lord, give me leave to apply it to the objection here made in our Caſe, to the credit of our deeds. They ſay it is ſuſpicious, becauſe my Lady Ivy uſed to forge deeds; and particularly Duffett, they ſay, did once forge for her Glover's leaſe. Now to anſwer that, we come to ſhew that my Lady Ivy did not forge Glover's leaſe; but there was indeed an art uſed to perſuade Duffett to ſwear it forged, when indeed it was not; for which trick, Johnſon, that was the agent, or inſtrument, was convicted; and that conviction is, I think, a good evidence that it was not forged.

L. C. J. None in the World, Mr. Sollicitor; and that from the very evidence that has been given in this Cauſe this day: For it is plain, if you will believe this woman, (and I yet ſee no Cauſe to the contrary) that ſhe was coming into the Court to have ſworn the truth, which would have perhaps cleared Johnſon; but my Lady Ivy would needs keep her away. Now if Duffett were ſo great a rogue as to forge, he would not ſtick to ſwear, to protect that forgery: And then how eaſy a thing was it, had Johnſon been the greateſt Saint in the World, to have got him convicted upon what Duffett came to ſwear againſt him? though had ſhe come then in, Duffett would have appeared one not at all fit to be credited.

Mr. Sol. Gen. My Lord, I have then one thing more to offer; I cannot tell indeed whether it be material, for it ſeems I have been ſo unhappy as to offer ſome things that have not been thought material —— L. C. J.

L. C. J. You have ſo indeed, Mr. Sollicitor, I muſt ſpeak the truth; there have been ſeveral things offered as evidence, which in another Cauſe and Place, would not, I am ſure, have been offered.

Mr. Sol. Gen. My Lord, I ſubmit what I offer for my Client, to the Judgment of the Court. But that which I would ſay now, is this: We have here the husband's oath concerning this matter, that this woman who now takes upon her to ſwear theſe forgeries and things, told him ſhe could have 500 l. if ſhe would ſwear againſt my Lady Ivy.

L. C. J. Is that evidence againſt the wife?

Mr. Sollicitor. He is now dead, it ſeems; but here is his oath.

L. C. J. Pray conſider with your ſelf, could the husband have been a witneſs againſt the wife about what ſhe told him upon an Information for that offence of ſubornation?

Mr. Sol. Gen. No, my Lord, I think not.

L. C. J. Could the wife be an evidence againſt the husband for the forgery?

Mr. Sol. Gen. No, my Lord, ſhe could not; and yet ſhe ſwears it upon him here.

L. C. J. That is not againſt him, man; he is out of the caſe, but againſt my Lady Ivy; and how can the oath of the husband be evidence here?

Mr. Att. Gen. Cryer, call Mr. Gibſon, to give an account of this Gentlewoman.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Suppoſe, my Lord, that both husband and wife were brought as evidence againſt my Lady Ivy, were that good?

L. C. J. Certainly that were very good.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Why then, my Lord, one of them ſays, that ſhe ſaw ſuch and ſuch things done by Lady Ivy, and by him for her; and the other ſays, ſuch things were not done, but ſhe confeſſed ſhe could have 500 l. to ſwear they were done: Shall not this evidence be admitted to contradict the other?

L. C. J. Why, good Lord! Gentlemen, is the Philoſophy of this ſo witty, that it need be ſo confidently urged? Is it good Logick, that becauſe they both were good witneſſes againſt my Lady Ivy, therefore either of them is a good witneſs againſt the other? Shall the husband's oath be read againſt the wife, to fix a crime upon her? Sure you do not intend this ſhould paſs for argument, but to ſpend time.

Cryer. Here is Gibſon now, Sir.

Mr. Att. Gen. Swear him. (which was done.)

Mr. Sol. Gen. We are not now, my Lord, examining what Duffett ſwore about forgery or not forgery; but is not this confeſſion of hers an argument againſt the credit of her teſtimony? who now ſays, ſhe ſaw my Lady Ivy do ſo and ſo, when ſhe has confeſſed ſhe could have money to ſwear againſt my Lady Ivy.

L. C. J. But, Mr. Sollicitor, if you will not apprehend the queſtion, I cannot help it: is it not the husband that ſwears againſt the wife?

Mr. Att. Gen. Do you know that Gentlewoman there, Gibſon?

Gibſon. I have heard of her.

L. C. J. Nay, be not angry, Mr. Sollicitor; for if you be, we cannot help that neither. The Law is the Law for you as well as me.

Mr. Sol. Gen. My Lord, I muſt take the Rule from you now.

L. C. J. And ſo you ſhall, Sir, from the Court, as long as I ſit here; and ſo ſhall every body elſe, by the Grace of God. I aſſure you I care not whether it pleaſe or diſpleaſe; we muſt not have our time taken up with impertinent things; for I muſt ſay, there have been as many offered in this Cauſe to-day, as ever were in any Cauſe that ever I heard; and if all be not as ſome would have it, then they muſt be in paſſion preſently. The Court gives all due reſpects, and expects them.

Mr. Att. Gen. Have you any acquaintance with that woman?

Gibſon. I have ſeen her a great while ago.

Mr. Att. Gen. What do you know of her? what reputation is ſhe of?

Gibſon. I know nothing of her reputation; I know ſhe was Mr. Duffett's wife.

L. C. J. And ſo do we, ſhe tells us ſo: What then?

Gibſon. I have ſeen her a-bed with Mr. Frogmorton, and ſhe told me ſhe had then a frog in her belly.

Mr. Williams. It ſeems then by having this Gentleman ſo ready, they were aware of this too: I ſuppoſe Mr. Neale bragg'd of this too, or elſe the guilty conſcience put them upon preparing for it. But yet I think they do us no great harm by it.

Mr. Att. Gen. You will give our evidence an anſwer I ſuppoſe by and by: But we will go on to the reſt of yours. As to the bill and anſwer in the year 1629, in that of John Stepkins, it is ſaid, he makes the bounds eaſtward to be Fox's-lane. But it is plain, he that gives in that anſwer was not acquainted with the tranſactions of the Eſtate before his own time. And if you conſider the time of that anſwer, there was near fourſcore years then paſt ſince the leaſe made, and ſo long it had been out of the family, rendering a pepper-corn rent; and ſo the profitable intereſt was only the four acres ſurrendered to him by the tenant, before the licence to aliene: and it appears not that he had any notice of the reverſion. But I obſerve in the anſwer there is one paſſage remarkable; that there was a way, time out of mind, that did part this land, and that which was reputed the Dean and Chapter's land. Now that doth not tie it up to make Fox's-lane that ſame way, but only ſays generally, there was an old way, which muſt be underſtood of the way down from Cock-hill to Bell-wharf: So that I take it, that this is no concluſion upon us. Nor upon the ſame ground is that leaſe made 13 Jacobi, by John Stepkins, where he abutts his land upon that wall which is called Wall-marſh wall, and covenants to have the rent increaſed, if any thing beyond that be recovered; for there was near threeſcore years to come then of this leaſe, and he had no pretence of title to conteſt it at that time; and ſo the verdicts are all anſwered that way, the leaſe expired not till the year 1680.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Then, my Lord, for the ſurvey that they produce of the late times, by order of the Committee of Parliament for ſale of Church-lands, how that ſhould give a title, I do not underſtand. It is the firſt time I ever heard of a particular of Dean and Chapter's lands to be an evidence, when at that time there was no Dean and Chapter. But that which is a clear anſwer to it is this: Winterburn, who had the leaſe from the Church, did alſo claim under Marcellus Hall, who had a leaſe for ninety years: that in time expired in the year 1640. That intereſt being then determined, he gets theſe put into the ſurvey (which it was his intereſt to do) as the inheritance of the Church, which would gain him a fee ſimple upon his purchaſe, he concealing the long leaſe, and they being ſo long in poſſeſſion; whereas otherwiſe he could only have an Eſtate for years: and it appears all the deeds were in his cuſtody at that time. For the other witneſſes that ſpeak to the Wall, that we muſt leave to the Jury's conſideration, upon the ballance of the evidence. For, with ſubmiſſion, my Lord, taking the evidence as it ſtands together, if that leaſe of Marcellus Hall be a good leaſe, theſe ſeveral conveyances we produce are ſupported and do explain that: He ſurrenders four acres, which are the lands that are afterwards conveyed to Fox, which is mentioned in the deed of his ſurrender to be the green Hilly-Bank, and that was the boundary of the four acres; but what becomes of the other ſeven acres and an half? they have given no account of it hitherto. But ſurely, my Lord, upon that firſt ſurvey, I take it, there is a ſtrong evidence concurring with our aſſertion: For that ſaith, the ſouth boundary of the Dean's Lynches is Wall-marſh. Now then, if there be ſeven acres to go forward from thence, that juſt reacheth up to Cock-hill; and all the other bounds plainly concur with ours: And upon the peruſal of the ſurvey, which it is conſented to on both ſides the Jury ſhall have with them, I believe they will be ſatisfied our bounds and that agree. Upon the whole evidence I ſubmit it for the Defendant. We have done, my Lord.

Mr. Att. Gen. Only I would ask Mr. Sutton a queſtion; whether the bill and anſwer now given in evidence, were not given in evidence at the laſt trial?

Sutton. Yes, it was.

Mr. Att. Gen. And yet the verdict went for us then, as I hope it will now.

L. C. J. Have you all done, Gentlemen? Will you ſay any thing for the Plaintiff?

Mr. Williams. No, my Lord, we leave it to your Lordſhip and the Jury.

L. C. J. Then, Gentlemen of the Jury, this evidence has been very long: I think the trial has held us as long as any cauſe that ever happened in Weſtminſter-hall, of this nature; I mean, except one, theſe many years. I think we meet with but one in all our Books, that held near ſo long: That indeed was rather ſomething longer, the famous Cauſe of Colt, in this Court; but beſides that, I never heard of a Cauſe of this length before.

But, Gentlemen, it is a Cauſe of value, and a Cauſe of great weight and conſideration: It hath depended in the evidence of it, upon abundance of circumſtances, ſo that it may be impoſſible for me to remember all the evidence that hath been given. But as near as I can, I will give you what aſſiſtance I am able, in recollecting what hath been ſaid on both ſides. Some of you I have obſerved have taken notes, and that will ſave me and you ſome trouble: I will give you a ſcheme fairly of that which is the queſtion. And it will be very much more eaſy to you, becauſe you have had a view of the matter, than can be thought I can make it by any direction of mine.

The Queſtion in ſhort is, Whether ſeven acres and an half of land, now built upon to a very great value, as the witneſſes ſay, 2000 l. a year, lying on the eaſt ſide of the lane, that is called by the name of Fox's-lane, betwixt that and the mill, called Ratcliff-mill, be part of the marſh that formerly belonged to the Family of the Stepkins's; or whether or no that be not part of the Dean and Chapter of Paul's Inheritance. If it belong to the Dean and Chapter of Paul's, then the iſſue is with the Leſſor of the Plaintiff: But if it be the Inheritance of the Stepkins's, and part of the marſh-land, and was ſo according to the ancient boundaries, then the iſſue is with the Defendant.

The Plaintiff comes and ſhews for his title, firſt, that this was all along enjoyed under the Church of Paul's leaſes. Knowles, who formerly did receive the rents of the very thing in queſtion, till (77) before this queſtion, ſays, in his teſtimony, he received them in the right, and on the behalf of Mr. Neale, who claims by leaſe from the Dean of St. Paul's.

That is not ſufficient to maintain his title, but they come and ſhew the original; and in point of time 5 H. 8. they ſay that one Dean Collet made a leaſe of the lands in queſtion, for 45 years. And to prove this, a Book is produced to you, wherein there is a ſhort Entry made, which takes no notice at all of any thing more, but that there was ſuch a leaſe of a mill in Shadwell, with the appurtenances. But upon their producing that Writing, it is found to be a paper Writing; and there was an objection, and a material one, made upon the face of the thing it ſelf: For there were two places that ſeemed to be ſuſpicious, as made directly to humour an evidence of ſuch a leaſe in 5 H. 8. having Dr. Collet's name inſerted, who happened to be Dean of Paul's at that time: Whereas Nowell was originally the name that was ſet there, with the ſame hand that the other part of the Writing was. Thereupon it came to be enquired into, how it came to paſs that Nowell's name was ſtruck out, and Collet's put in. That ſeemed to inſinuate, as if this was contrived on purpoſe to ſhoar up an evidence, and humour the time. For it could not be imagined that Nowell ſhould come to be Dean when that leaſe was made, who was not Dean till ſo long after, in Queen Elizabeth's time, as I take it. Now had this objection met with this Book alone, it would have made the evidence lame, and they would have been thought to have ſet an ill leg forwards. But to take off that, they come after and ſhew a parchment ſcroll, which takes notice likewiſe of ſuch a leaſe: And their Officer, Spencer, ſays he had ſeen that ſcroll many years, and ſo it could not be a new thing for this purpoſe. It is an old rental, or ſome ſuch thing, in time, in ſome ſhort time after, where is mention made of a leaſe by Dean Collet, 5 H. 8. for 45 years; which humours the time exactly, and ſupports the credit of the other evidence. This is that they give as an anſwer to that objection. It might be a miſtake as to the name, but this will ſhew that it was not a contrived matter for this purpoſe.

The next piece of evidence they go to, is 5 Ed. 6. and for that time they come and produce leaſes, thoſe that are at leaſt in law evidences of leaſes; and thoſe are the Church-Books, ancient Books that have been always read and allowed for evidence. And thereby they ſhew that one Dr. May, then Dean of St. Paul's, viz. 23 Feb. 5 Ed. 6. did let the lands in queſtion to Joan Hall and Marcellus Hall; and he let it as the Dean and Chapter of Paul's lands, for 45 years, at the rent of 10 l. a year.

Then they tell you in the 2d and 3d of Phil. and Mar. 10 Dec. one Dean Fecknam takes notice of the former leaſes, and lets it to Marcellus Hall, and that is for 90 years; wherein there is the old rent taken notice of, and ſome increaſe made: And there is in that leaſe a covenant to repair the mill, and that has given a riſe to ſomething that makes part of the preſent queſtion, which they that are for the the Defendant, call a licence to remove the mill. You, Gentlemen, will have the Deeds with you, and are to judge of them.

The leaſes from 5 H. 8. to this Dean Fecknam, are only leaſes made for years; and by reaſon of theſe leaſes for years, and the long leaſe which they pretend to, the Defendant's Counſel inſiſt upon it, that they could not be let in to controvert the Plaintiff's title; for the laſt leaſe for 128 years, from Stepkins to Hall, expired in time but in the year 1680.

Now, ſay the Plaintiff's Counſel, (and they produce that which is very material in the Caſe) 5 Aug. 1636 this was then let to one Mary More, the relict of one Adrian More, formerly the aſſignee of the leaſe that came from Dean Fecknam to Marcellus Hall. And there, inſtead of continuing it a leaſe for years, he lets to Mary More, in conſideration of the former leaſes, and turns it into an Eſtate for three Lives. So far then was the Dean of Paul's from apprehending himſelf to be but Leſſee for years, that he takes upon him to create freeholds, which only he that has the inheritance can do.

They go on further, and tell you, that in 1640, the ſame Dean of St. Paul's, ſhe having ſold her intereſt to one Whitwick and Winterburn, there is a new Eſtate made to them for three Lives. Theſe continue in poſſeſſion under that leaſe, till Mr. Neale purchaſed in their intereſt: and his Grace of Canterbury, then Dean Sancroft, he made another leaſe to the ſaid Mr. Neale for three Lives; and there is a great increaſe of rent, 80 l. during the life of one of the former ſurviving Lives, and then to 100 l. Then comes the leaſe made to the now Leſſors of the Plaintiff, by this reverend Divine that is here, now Dr. Stillingfleet, the preſent Dean of St. Paul's, at yearly 240 l. And this is the ſubſtance of the evidence firſt given by the Plaintiff, for his title which is underneath that laſt leaſe of Dean Stillingfleet, which they ſay is a good title: and in caſe it doth appear that the lands are the inheritance of the Dean of Paul's, it is not controverted by the Defendants, but that the Plaintiff muſt have a verdict for him.

But ſay they which are for the Defendants, this is not their inheritance, but the Defendant's; and to prove their objection, they produce abundance of deeds, of which, as well as I can, I will give you a punctual and particular account. For with all the faith and fidelity I can, I will give you the ſubſtance of what has been ſaid on both ſides.

Firſt, It is not to be doubted, for it is beyond all contradiction plain, there were 130 acres of marſh-land, lands covered with water, which one Vanderdelf, a Dutchman, undertook to drein, and had an Act of Parliament made, anno 27 H. 8. to encourage him for his endeavours to drein it, giving him the one half. That Act of Parliament is produced, and it is there ſaid to be 130 acres.

Now you are to take notice of the boundaries of this marſh-land, as making the ſtate of this queſtion. The Act of Parliament bounds the marſh upon the Hermitage, or ſuch a mill, called Graſh-mill, upon the Weſt. It is bounded on the high-way leading to Ratcliff, on the North, which is called Ratcliff high-way to this day: It is bounded to the river of Thames on the ſouth; and it is bounded upon the Town of Ratcliff towards the eaſt.

Afterwards, in H. 8th's time, comes in Richard Hill, who was owner of ſome part of this marſh, (Vanderdelf's moiety) and he in time, 23 H. 8. became indebted to one Salvago and another, and there he comes and acknowledges a Statute to them for their debt. And (becauſe I would have you have all things before your view, that were done at one time) in the ſame year there is a mortgage made of the lands of Richard Hill, (among which, they for the Defendant apprehend, are comprized the lands in queſtion, as marſh-land, to Salvago, for the payment of their money:) and in that mortgage the ſame words are made uſe of for the boundaries, as are in the dreining Act. This, to derive their title, they produce to ſhew, that there was ſuch an ownerſhip, and ſuch a mortgage.

Then they tell you, that in 37 H. 8. the ſame Richard Hill, he goes and divides ſome part of theſe lands, that is to ſay, eleven acres and an half, and that he conveys away by leaſe for 34 years, to Marcellus Hall; whom I name the more particularly, becauſe it is a name that has been much canvaſſed, and gives a countenance to the title on both ſides. Now in that deed, whereby this is thus conveyed to Marcellus Hall, there is no notice taken particularly of the eaſtern boundary to be the mill, or the mill-bank, or the hilly-bank. Now, ſay they, the mill was juſt upon the point, hard by that place that is called now by the name of Cock-hill; and ſo that boundary doth take in the thing in queſtion, the ſeven acres and an half, becauſe that deed takes notice of the mill, hilly-bank, or way.

In the next place, they offer you this for evidence, that in 6 Ed. 6. the ſame Richard Hill, for 130 l. ſells his land to Thomas Stepkins. And when it comes to convey the inheritance to him, it is laid to be under the ſame boundaries as are mentioned there, bounded on the hilly-bank, or mill-bank, eaſtward. Now, ſay they, that ſheweth plainly, that ſtill the mill was the thing that was intended to be the boundary; and there being ſeven acres and an half of land between the mill and the weſtern bounds, thoſe ſeven acres cannot be conſtrued to extend to a mill with the appurtenances, but rather it is to bound upon the mill and include the lands, than to have the lands go with the mill.

They proceed further and ſay, that Thomas Stepkins, the ſame year, did for 50 l. let this to Marcellus Hall, for 128 years, at a pepper-corn rent, which leaſe expired but in 1680, and till now we could not come to litigate that matter, becauſe he had made ſuch a leaſe. But then I am to take notice by the way, and ſo muſt you into the bargain; there is another boundary made there, abutting on the well there, called Shadwell, and the way leading from Shadwell to the Lynches.

After this they come to tell you further, that Marcellus Hall, 22 Dec. 2 and 3 Phil. and Mar. let a leaſe to Carter, and that was for 20 years. Now you are to take notice, that in this leaſe of Carter's, there is notice taken of a mill, and about an acre of land thereto belonging, very carefully put in. And that, ſay they, ſheweth that your boundary could not extend to ſo much as ſeven acres.

And to back that evidence, they ſhew you a certain ſurvey, taken in Queen Elizabeth's time, concerning the manor of Stepney, which you are by conſent to have with you; and you will do well to conſider it well in your peruſal of it.

And now comes the main deed. Say the Defendants Counſel, it falls out that you are but Leſſee under Marcellus Hall, who was Leſſee under us, and was obliged in a particular covenant, that he ſhould not

not let any part of this land without the licence of our anceſtor Stepkins, who made him ſuch a long leaſe. But it happened he had a mind to let ſome part of this land to the Dean of Paul's, from whom he had a leaſe of the mill. And accordingly he had a licence from Stepkins ſo to do; which, ſay they, is the reaſon why they come to lay claim to our land. This they take notice to be in time, 16 Nov. 2 and 3 Phil. and Mar. when I muſt tell you by the way, that the firſt leaſe, pretended by them to be made to Marcellus Hall, is the long one, 6 Ed. 6. by Thomas Stepkins; ſo that Marcellus Hall came to be Leſſee under the Dean and Chapter, before he had any authority or intereſt from Stepkins, nay, before he had any leaſe from Hill.

Mr. Att. Gen. My Lord, if your Lordſhip pleaſes to remember, Marcellus Hall did take firſt by leaſe from Richard Hill, in 37 H. 8.

L. C. J. Pardon me, Mr. Attorney, I did not miſ-repeat it; I ſay, he firſt had a leaſe from the Dean and Chapter.

Mr. Att. Gen. That was of the mill only——

L. C. J. That is conteſted, and the very giſt of the queſtion; Mr. Attorney, how much is comprehended in that leaſe?

But to go on with the Defendant's evidence. Then in Nov. 2 and 3 Phil. and Mar. is the deed to Roper, of which I ſhall have occaſion to ſay more anon.

In 5 and 6 Phil. and Mar. comes Jaſper Hill, the Son of Richard Hill, (the firſt owner of the land, and that entered into the Statute to Salvago) he makes a conveyance to Macheline Stepkins, Thomas's his widow, and John Stepkins, his heir, mother and ſon; upon which, afterwards there is a ſurrender made by Marcellus Hall to John Stepkins, ſon and heir of Thomas, of four acres; which, ſay they, was not aſſigned with the other ſeven to the Dean of Paul's.

Then in 3 Elizabeth, purſuant to the conveyance made by Jaſper Hill to the Stepkins's, there is a fine and recovery ſuffered; and 4 Elizabeth, a deed to lead the uſes of that fine which are to John Stepkins and his mother, and the heirs of John. But ſtill in all theſe deeds and conveyances, there is mention made of the mill, mill-bank, or hilly-bank, or hilly-way, to be the boundaries; and likewiſe of Shadwell.

After that, they produce a bond, wherein Spinola is bound to Stepkins, to take off the Statute entred into 32 H. 8. by Richard Hill.

Then 14 Elizabeth, they produce a commiſſion of ſewers, where notice is taken of the ſeveral landholders of Wapping-marſh, who were liable to make ſatisfaction for any want of repairs or defects in the marſh. There Roper is taken notice of as a tenant, and one James and Stepkins too: and they do infer from hence, that James and Roper's land is part of this, and was under Stepkins, and is enjoyed to this day under the title of the Stepkins's.

They go on further, and tell you, that 15 Eliz. Stepkins became indebted to the Crown, by taking a teller's debt upon him, and had a mind to ſecure the debt, and therefore conveys his land to the then Treaſurer, Attorney-General and Sollicitor-General, to ſecure a great ſum of money; and this land they would have to paſs among the reſt.

Afterwards, 17 Eliz. the commiſſioners ſit again, and there is a Return made of all thoſe that were landholders, the ſame named before.

Then 7 Jacobi, was there a re-grant out of the Crown, made to Stepkins of all his land. Wherein, generally ſpeaking, the bounds of the land belonging to Stepkins, are called the Mill-bank, &c. This muſt, ſay they, of neceſſity take in the lands in queſtion, otherwiſe it is impoſſible that ſhould be the boundary. And they make uſe of this further argument: Say they, we have taken a ſurvey of all the lands, thoſe in queſtion and the other marſh-lands, from Hermitage-dock, alias St. Katherine's, even to this mill; and it doth juſt humour the number of acres in the Act for dreining Wapping-marſh; that is to ſay, it makes juſt 130 acres. All which, they ſay, plainly belongs to the Stepkins's.

They then come to examine their living witneſſes, and they have produced them in this order as I name them: their witneſſes have been as they are in my paper. One Hughs, and Somerly, and Holmes, and Barefoot, and Cope, and Holewell. And the ſubſtance of what they ſay is this: The old woman, Barefoot, ſays, ſhe has known the place in queſtion, theſe threeſcore and odd years; ſhe remembers well the ſituation of it, and that the water drove another mill firſt, and did not come near to Fox's-lane by a quarter of a mile, but run more to the North. And this land, ſhe ſays, was always reckoned to be Stepkins's, and ſhe never knew any one have any thing to do there but they. And in as much as there was ſome diſcourſe concerning a well; ſhe ſays, ſhe doth remember there was a well between Fox's-lane and the mill, and that was half a mile off Fox's-lane, and was called Shadwell. She remembers it ſo well, that if there were as many wells as there are panes in the glaſs window before you, that was the right well, and there was no other well called Shadwell, but that.

Then Hughs tells you, he remembered the land before it was built upon, that at common ordinary tides, the water uſed to come up to Fox's-lane, and at high tides, over it; but the land has been raiſed much higher ſince that.

Then Cope, he gives an account of his knowing it above threeſcore years ago; and he in general ſays, he did not know how far weſtward the water went that drove the mill; but Fox's-lane, he ſays, was the way from North to South, weſtward of the mill, and he knew not any way eaſtward of the mill but Fox's-lane; for Cock-hill is eaſtward of the mill. And much like to this was the teſtimony of the other witneſſes; which being done, they concluded with the evidence of the ſurveyor Holewell, about the admeaſurement. And this, as I remember, or can collect, is the evidence of the Defendant's ſubſtance, before the Plaintiff's reply.

And then as to that which was offered by the Defendants, as evidence of the boundaries, the Plaintiffs give this anſwer; and it is that which will be the pinching queſtion in this Cauſe to all eternity: Whether or no, Mill-bank, or Mill-hill, or the Hilly-way, or whatſoever elſe it is called in their old Deeds, be not that which is now called Fox's-lane?

Say they, Firſt, by your own evidence, (that ſame ancient ſurvey that you produced, and which, by conſent, you Gentlemen of the Jury are to have with you;) there is notice taken of 130 acres that belongs to the marſh; there is notice taken of the Lynches, as belonging to the Dean and Chapter of Paul's. But then in the laſt paragraph of the back-ſide of the leaf, (ſo we call the ſecond ſide, for diſtinction ſake) you will find this taken notice of; which which ſaid marſh doth bound on the lands hereafter mentioned on the Eaſt. And what are the lands thereafter mentioned? Theſe you will find; Item, holden by the Dean and Chapter of Paul's, one meſſuage, called Derrick-hills, another tenement called ſo and ſo, and ſeveral orchards, gardens, ponds, &c. and a water-mill thereunto belonging. So that there was on the Eaſt part of the marſh-land, orchards, gardens, a meſſuage, a tenement, waters, ponds, fiſhings, and a mill, and ſeveral other things. Now if in caſe the Eaſtern boundaries of the marſh came up to the mill you ſpeak of, how comes it to paſs, that you your ſelf in your own ſurvey, make the Eaſtern bounds to be upon theſe lands, and all theſe belonging to the Dean and Chapter of Paul's. And when they come to read the particulars of what belonged to the Dean and Chapter, that ſurvey bounds to the Dean and Chapter's land upon the marſh-land. You that have been upon the view, may the better underſtand it; and you ſee the Eaſtern part of the mill was the waſte ground, and made a lane to carry down ballaſt, as the witneſſes ſay. This doth juſt humour all the old boundaries.

Nay, to ſhew that this is really ſo, they ſay, that in time, in the year 1615, there was an action commenced before my Lord Chief Juſtice Coke, when he ſate in this Court, wherein this controverſy aroſe. Fox, who was as well tenant to the Dean and Chapter of Paul's, as he was to Stepkins, he comes, and he builds upon that old wall, called Wall-marſh-wall, which begot a conteſt betwixt Stepkins, who was the anceſtor of my Lady Ivy and this Fox; and upon that conteſt this was the queſtion, Whether there had been any incroachment upon the marſh? Not but that the wall was reckoned, even by Stepkins, to be the boundary, though running as Stepkins ſaid, twenty ſoot into the Eaſt part of the marſh; and there Stepkins was non-ſuited. Afterwards it came into the Common Pleas, and there there was a verdict, whereby it was ſettled, that the whole wall belonged to the Dean and Chapter of Paul's.

But afterwards Mrs. Moor, the Leſſee of the Church, would not be quiet with this, but exhibits a bill againſt John Stepkins, and others, and to ſettle the boundaries, becauſe he pretended incroachments upon his ground: they therefore require him to aſcertain the matter upon his oath. He in his anſwer confeſſeth, he had heard of the verdict before-mentioned, but knew nothing of it himſelf; but when he comes to ſet forth the boundaries, he is ſo far from taking notice that the boundaries take in the lands in queſtion, that he tells you there was an ancient bank, which was the ordinary bounds between his land and the land of the Church; and this is a high-way, a common high-way. But it was true, as he believed, they had incroached, though ſuch a verdict and nonſuit were obtained by them. Not that ever he pretended to any thing on the Eaſtern part of that paſſage or bank, called Fox's-lane; but he pretended to twenty foot on the weſtern part of it, as an incroachment.

They ſay further too, that notwithſtanding all this, John Stepkins was not ſo confident of his title to even thoſe twenty foot on the weſt part; but that he comes and makes a bargain with another man: I will let you this Eaſt part of the marſh-land, and if I recover any of the wall, you ſhall pay ſuch a rent for it; but if not, you ſhall hold it as you did before. So jealous he was of his title, even to that which he thought was incroached upon.

And they fix it thus, to humour and explain the particulars mentioned of orchards, ponds, gardens, &c. for here were a great many ſluices and cuts for the water to be received in, and ſo all may well be comprehended under the name of a mill with the appurtenances; and that they ſay goeth a great way in the queſtion. You are to conſider of it, Gentlemen.

Then they further ſhew, that whereas the other ſide ſurmiſe the boundary to be Shadwell, which they would have to be placed a great way higher, by the place called Cock-hill; here comes an old man that tells you, he knew the place ſixty years ago and above, and there was no other well called Shadwell, but that which was where the Church now ſtands, and that is on the Weſt part of Fox's-lane. Now I muſt tell you, upon the evidence it is pretty ſtrong, becauſe he gives ſuch an account of it that it was bricked over, and a common well to all People, which muſt make the thing very notorious; and he never heard of any other well called Shadwell. It is true, there might be a ſpring on the one ſide of this ground in queſtion, and the other; you have heard the evidence on both ſides, I muſt leave it at large to you.

Then to make the thing more plain, they offer to you that this was a tide-mill, and not as the Defendant pretends, an overſhot-mill; and that is notoriouſly plain it is ſo, and it is againſt ſenſe it ſhould be otherwiſe. Here was one that wrought at the mill, and his father before him, ſixty years; nay, it appears that to have water to drive an overſhot-mill in that place, muſt drown the whole level, becauſe it muſt be raiſed ſo much higher than the wheel; and if ſo, that ſtands higher than the place were it raiſed never ſo high, of late called Fox's-lane. But there were tides that came within twenty foot of it; and you muſt give me leave to tell you, I underſtand ſo much of it, that a tide-mill is never ſuffered to have the water juſt ſwim up and back again; but they have cuts to retain the water a while, that it may go the eaſier off. And ſo the great number and length of the cuts and ponds, and ditches here, were but only receptacles and baſins to receive the tide, which did not riſe (as they tell you it ſhould not) above half the wheel. The nature of the thing it ſelf ſpeaks againſt what they would have it to be; and to ſtrengthen the argument, they have called five or ſix, or more witneſſes, that have known it all along ſo to be: And yet this I apprehend, the other ſide take to be their moſt material point to make it marſh-ground.

But the Counſel for the Plaintiff ſay this further to you: They have a ſurvey taken in Oliver's time, which they produced, but were oppoſed by the Counſel of the other ſide; and I muſt confeſs I did wonder to hear the objection, that it was ſtrange this ſhould be ſurveyed as Dean and Chapter's lands, in a time when there were no Deans and Chapters; whereas it was ſurveyed as that which was ſo, while there were ſuch things as Deans and Chapters, and it was in order to be ſold as ſuch. And upon my word, if the lands of the Dean and Chapter's Inheritance, were no bigger than the Defendant would have them, there was a good round ſum paid to the State for the mill only. But alas! you have a witneſs that tells you (there being in the ſurvey mention of one Craven) that there was a Craven on the

Eaſt

Eaſt part of the ground, that had a large orchard and garden, and ground. And upon this purchaſe made by Winterburn, who was Leſſee of the Church, the Plaintiff's Counſel do raiſe a very conſiderable argument, that this was the Church's Inheritance: For, ſay they, Why ſhould Winterburn, that had a leaſe in being, which would have continued him to be ſure in poſſeſſion, and that too before all theſe houſes were built, (for they talk all the fine houſes were built ſince the King came in) give 9500 l. for the Inheritance under the title of the Dean and Chapter, if he knew (as he muſt if he had the long leaſe in his poſſeſſion, and ſo Knowles ſwears he had) it was not theirs; and he himſelf had a leaſe for thirty years to come, under a trivial rent of a peppercorn. Eſpecially conſidering that thoſe times ſold lumping penny-worths of other Peoples lands.

But then they come to the laſt point of evidence, and that you muſt very narrowly obſerve and weigh. Say they, becauſe you depend ſo much upon Carter's leaſe, which takes notice of ſuch and ſuch boundaries; and alſo that of Roper, which you pretend to be made at ſuch a time, theſe, we ſay, are forged. And for it they give this evidence.

The firſt part is a natural legal evidence, and a proper evidence in things of this nature, to detect a forgery; an evidence that we learn out of our Books of Law, and it is an argumentative one. If you produce deeds made in ſuch a time, when, ſay you, ſuch titles were uſed, and ſuch prefaces made to them in their preambles, when indeed there were no ſuch titles uſed at that time, that ſheweth your deeds are counterfeit and forged, and not true deeds. And there is Digitus Dei, the finger of God in it; that though the deſign be laid deep, and the contrivance ſculk, yet Truth and Juſtice will appear one time or another: and though they may put ſome gull upon Juſtice for a while, yet it will in time be diſcovered, to the confuſion and ſhame of the Undertakers. Say they, you have taken wonderful care to have both deeds carry the ſame flouriſh at the top of each of them, you call Philip and Mary King and Queen of Spain, and both Sicilies; and you put Burgundy in the ducal ſtile, before Millan: This is the language of both deeds, but that ſheweth them not to be true deeds, that carrieth forgery in the very face of it; for Philip and Mary never came to write themſelves King and Queen of Spain and Sicily, till Trinity Term, in the ſecond and third years of their Reigns; whereas your deeds bear date in November before. Till Trinity Term Naples was a Kingdom, and they were but Princes of Spain and Sicily. And beſides, they uſed always before that time, to put Millan among the Dukedoms firſt before Burgundy.

For inſtances and proofs of this objection, they ſhew you the titles of the Acts of Parliament in that year, in October, November, and December; they ſhew you the fines levied in Hillary Term, and Eaſter-Term, and Trinity-Term; till which Term the Records of the Kingdom, of Fines and Recoveries, bore all the old ſtile; and ſo do the Conveyances enrolled and not enrolled of that time. And with great bravery they challenge the Defendant's Counſel to ſhew any one Conveyance or Record (except thoſe of your own making) that is otherwiſe. And as a further evidence they ſay, we have ſome leaſes entred in our Books, and ſo not calculated for this purpoſe, which have no other than the old ſtile of the King and Queen.

And in truth this is a material evidence to prove theſe to be forged deeds: and it is made the more material by this circumſtance, which Mr. Attorney was pleaſed to mention; and that is the notice they had from Mr. Neale's bragging of this very objection to their deeds, and yet they ſhould not come prepared to give it an anſwer. And I muſt deal plainly with you, that very one thing makes it an objection of very great weight and moment.

But ſtill, ſay they, beſides all this evidence we ſhall go a ſtep further, and evince the likelihood that theſe deeds ſhould be forged; for your client, the Defendant, is apt to forge deeds. And to prove that, we produce this evidence.

Firſt of all, Sir Charles Cotterel gives you an account of a long ſtory which doth not only reach the Defendant, my Lady Ivy, but it looks very bad upon my Friend Sutton too; who, if Sir Charles Cotterel ſwears true, is a very knave. Now Sir Charles Cotterel, though he does not ſwear he ſaw her forge the mortgage ſhe pretended to from Sir William Salkell, yet he gives a ſhrewd evidence to make it untowardly ſuſpicious: For he tells you upon Sir William's death, my Lady Ivy was ſo far from pretending to any debt from Sir William, that upon accounts ſtated between my Lady and her, ſhe was indebted to Sir William 96 l. which upon her parting from her husband, and being under great want, Sir William had lent her, beſides his relieving her otherways: And, ſays Sir Charles Cotterel, I was preſent when ſhe took 4 l. more of my Lady Salkell's money, and then acknowledged heſelf to owe my Lady 100 l. After this, my Lady Ivy, without the ſeeking or intreaty of Sir Charles Cotterel, comes to him, and, ſays ſhe, Does not my Lady Salkell owe you money? Yes, ſaid he, ſhe does, fourſcore pounds; but I live in her houſe, and can ſoon eat it out in rent. But, ſays my Lady Ivy, ſhe has a mind you ſhould have the houſe made as a ſecurity to you. Good now, how comes my Lady Ivy to be ſo concerned for Sir Charles Cotterel's ſecurity, when he was not concerned for himſelf? Nay, and why ſhould ſhe be ſo earneſt to have him have a ſecurity upon that houſe, which, if it were true, was mortgaged before to her ſelf. If her mortgage were a true one, this practice carrieth no great face of honeſty or vertue in it, I muſt needs ſay; I muſt crave leave to make that obſervation by the way. Ay, but into the bargain, when Sir Charles Cotterel yielded to her importunities, Mr. Sutton is the man that muſt be intruſted to draw the Writing, and to that purpoſe muſt ſee my Lord of Salisbury's leaſe, who is the head landlord. What needed that? I ſuppoſe it was recited in my Lady Ivy's mortgage before: But he muſt take notes out of it, forſooth, to make over the leaſe and houſe as a ſecurity to Sir Charles Cotterel for 80 l. and when it is brought as ſuch, knowing no otherwiſe, Sir Charles Cotterel takes it; and they two, my Lady Ivy and Sutton, are witneſſes to it. What it proved afterwards you hear, an abſolute deed of ſale; and yet all this while my Lady Ivy (who, as Sir Charles Cotterel underſtood it, was indebted 100 l. to Sir William Salkell) has a debt of 1500 l. owing from Sir William, by mortgage to her on the ſame houſe.

Sir Charles Cotterel. My Lord, I am ready to make it all good.

L. C. J. Firſt of all, I ſay, it was not well done if there were ſuch a ſecurity for 1500 l. to perſuade Sir Charles to accept the houſe as a ſecurity for his fourſcore pounds, without telling him of the prior mortgage. Then it is ſtrange, ſhe ſhould acknowledge her ſelf indebted 100 l. upon her taking the four pounds from my Lady Salkell, if ſhe had ſo great a ſum owing her. And what a ſlovenly anſwer is that given by the Counſel for my Lady Ivy, that ſhe and others were called upon for nine years diet? Whereas Sir Charles Cotterel ſwears, ſhe owned her ſelf upon the account indebted 100 l. and there was no bartering for diet; but that ſhe had gratis for three quarters of a year after Sir William's death, as ſhe had it ſeveral times before.

And now, while it is in my memory, I would remind you of one thing more before we come to the other witneſſes, there is a thing that to me cramps this buſineſs very home upon my Lady Ivy: How comes it to paſs my Lady Ivy ſhould be ſo wonderful kind to my Lady Salkell's daughter, as to part with 1500 l. ſo ſecured, to have the houſe ſettled upon her, without any conſideration in the World that I can hear of? That is ſuch a melting piece of kindneſs, that they would do well to find out ſome flam to authorize it. It ſeems upon Sir Charles Cotterel's deſire to ſee this pretended mortgage, and its being brought him by my brother Weſt, who is now dead, ſhe was wonderful careful that he ſhould not ſee the witneſſes to it, it was ſo precious and tender a thing: But, alas! it is all melted down and gone of a ſudden, without any conſideration at all whatſoever; and ſhe can readily join with Sir Charles Cotterel to ſettle this upon Mrs. Duffett, the Lady Salkell's daughter, and enter into bond not to diſturb the enjoyment.

Then there comes another evidence, and that is the Gentlewoman Mrs. Duffett, who it ſeems they would have to be a looſe ſort of creature; but methinks ſhe has a good round oath upon her tongue: for ſhe does directly ſwear that ſhe was preſent, and ſaw Mr. Duffett her husband forge that very mortgage Sir Charles Cotterel ſpeaks of; that my Lady Ivy directed it, and gave her order to put ſaffron in the ink to make it look old; that ſhe ſaw him writing in a parchment, which he told her was Glover's leaſe, and other things, and all for my Lady Ivy. Nay, ſhe tells you my Lady Ivy was ſo extraordinary an artiſt at the managing of ſuch an affair, that this maſter workman, Duffett, was not ſo dextrous at it as ſhe; for he could not write the firſt great Letters of the names that were to be put to the forged deeds, but ſhe did that her ſelf, and the reſt he did. How far ſhe is to be believed, I muſt leave to you; you hear what is objected againſt her about the frog in her belly, and I do not know what; whether that will take off the credibility of her teſtimony, I leave to you. She doth give a very free and large account how they uſed to order their matters to make the ink look old, (as I ſaid) they put ſaffron in it; then they rubb'd the outſides of the deeds in dirty windows, and after that uſed to lay them in a balcony for the rain to come upon them in the nights, and to dry them in the ſun, or by the fire, to ſhrivel them up. And this ſhe ſays was their method, and proceſs they uſed. All which the Plaintiff's Counſel urge, to ſhew the probability that theſe deeds of theirs are forged.

Then they tell you, which is yet ſomewhat more to ſtrengthen her evidence, there is a woman, that tho' ſhe ſpeaks out of Mr. Duffett's mouth, and that can be no evidence againſt my Lady Ivy, yet ſays, ſhe received from him a parcel of Letters, which are ſworn by Sir Charles Cotterel to be all of my Lady Ivy's own hand writing; which Letters have been read to you: and they ſhew a great familiarity between my Lady Ivy and Mr. Duffett, a great care and concern for the promotion of this Duffett, the Gentlewoman's husband; and of ſome deeds that were likely to be thought new and ſuſpected. And ſhe tells him at the latter end of one, that ſhe is ſollicitous till the trouble be over: But ſhe was reſolved to ſet on foot Sir William Salkell's mortgage, and if that thing did go well, he ſhould have half.

That ſupports the credibility of the woman's teſtimony: But beſides that, there is another thing that looks very untoward, becauſe Mrs. Duffett doth directly ſwear, that out of the 1000 l. paid my Lady Ivy by Sir Charles Cotterel, 200 l. was paid and given to her husband, and Mr. Sutton forſooth had 200 l. more: For what ſervice, I wonder, muſt my Lady Ivy be ſo liberal to Mr. Sutton and Mr. Duffet? Let Mr. Sutton ſhuffle, and rouze himſelf as he pleaſeth, it will ſtick upon him; and I muſt confeſs it looks untowardly, his getting my Lord of Salisbury's leaſe to pick notes out of it, and then to have ſuch a mortgage trumped up in this manner. It is very rank, I aſſure you.

This is the ſubſtance of the evidence that has been offered by the Plaintiff, to prove, and induce you to believe theſe deeds forged.

Now in anſwer to this, they on the other ſide would offer, that Sir Charles Cotterel's evidence is a ſurprize upon them: They ſay they have ſuch a Writing, and ſuch and ſuch deeds, Glover's leaſe, and Salkell's mortgage; but they are not prepared to give ſuch an anſwer as they would have done, had they had notice. Here has been likewiſe great ſtruggling and ſtriving to have the verdict read to overthrow Mrs. Duffett's teſtimony; but that cannot be allowed to be given in evidence between theſe parties. Then they would have read her husband's oath, he being dead: but that is no point of evidence at all neither; for in caſe the man were alive, it would not be evidence what he ſhould have heard his own wife ſay. If both of them indeed had been here together, and teſtified againſt my Lady Ivy, it had been good evidence; or they both might have teſtified for her. But by the Law the husband cannot be a witneſs againſt his wife, nor a wife againſt her husband, to charge them with any thing criminal, except only in caſes of high-treaſon. This is ſo known a common rule, that I thought it could never have born any queſtion or debate.

This is the ſubſtance of the evidence on both ſides, as near as I can recollect it; ſave only that which indeed I ſhould have mentioned before the Defendant had produced an exemplification of a verdict obtained the laſt Michaelmas-Term. To which they for the Plaintiff anſwer, We were not prepared to anſwer your deeds, which were very new, ſurprizing and unexpected to us: We have now given new evidence that we never gave then, and it was a verdict obtained by ſurprize: We now ſhew our boundaries better than we could then; and ſo that they make to be the reſult of the whole matter.

Now upon the main, after this very long evidence, tho' the Caſe has been darkened as much as ever any Caſe could be endeavoured to be; and tho' the event of it be a matter of conſiderable value, yet the matter of fact is as clear as the ſun at noon-day; and a plain point of fact it is, and muſt depend upon. If we do admit all their deeds to be good deeds, without any conſideration of the forgery, pro or con, yet if the mill-ponds, ditches, orchards, gardens, &c. can be taken to be ſeven acres; then the boundaries upon the mill or hilly-bank, which may well be Fox's-lane, that will anſwer both the deeds of the Plaintiff and of the Defendant. And tho' never ſo many houſes be built upon it, it will ſignify nothing in the Caſe. And that it is ſo, whereas the Defendant's ſurveyor ſwears, that 130 acres will not be made up without the lands in queſtion; the Plaintiff has brought two ſurveyors, that ſwear there is full 130 acres, and more, without them. So you have two ſurveyors on the one ſide, and one on the other; and you yourſelves have viewed it.

After this long evidence, Gentlemen, you have had as good an account of the ſubſtance of it, as I can by my notes and memory recollect. If any of the Gentlemen that are of the Counſel for the Plaintiff, or for the Defendant, do think I have omitted any thing that is material, on either ſide, they have free liberty to remind the Court of it. You are the Judges of this Fact, whether this land do of right belong to the Plaintiff or to the Defendant: And I leave it to your conſideration.

After which, the Jury withdrew to conſider of their Verdict, and the Court aroſe. That Evening the Jury gave in a private Verdict before a Judge; and appearing the next morning at the Bar, were called over, and demanded if they did abide by the Verdict they had given the night before; to which they anſwered, Yes: which being declared by the Secondary to be for the Plaintiff, the Jury were diſcharged.

Then a motion was made by the Plaintiff's Counſel, that ſeveral deeds produced by the Defendant, that were detected of forgery, might be left in Court, in order to have them purſued, and convicted of the forgery. The Court, upon debate of the matter, and the Plaintiff's Counſel declaring they would proſecute an Information of forgery, the deeds of the 13th of November, and the 22d of December, 2 and 3 Philip and Mary, were ordered to be left with the Clerk of the Crown till further Order, and in the mean time the Plaintiff to have Copies of them from the Clerk; and by Rule of Court a Trial at Bar is ordered in Michaelmas Term.

XXXVIII. The Trial of William Diſney Eſq; by the King's Special Commiſſion of Oyer and Terminer, held at the Marſhalſea in Southwark, on Thurſday, June 25. 1685. for High-Treaſon.

A SPECIAL Commiſſion of Oyer and Terminer for the County of Surrey, being appointed for the trying of Mr. Diſney, before the Lord Chief-Juſtice of England, and other his Majeſty's Juſtices; he was brought before the King's Commiſſioners at the Marſhalſea in Southwark, on June 21, in order to his Trial upon an Indictment for High-Treaſon: "For printing and publiſhing a "moſt vile and traitorous Paper againſt his moſt "ſacred Majeſty and his Government, intituled, "The Declaration of James Duke of Monmouth, and "the Noblemen, Gentlemen, and others now in Arms, "&c." And being arraign'd thereupon, he pleaded not guilty, and deſir'd he might have Counſel granted him, but was denied; the Court telling him it was not allowable in capital caſes: yet upon his farther requeſt, he had leave to make uſe of what Books he thought fit to prepare for his defence, and allow'd till the 25th.

On Thurſday the 25th, he was brought to his Trial; when the Meſſenger depoſed, that having a warrant for the apprehending of William Diſney Eſq; he took ſome files of Muſquetteers, and two or three Gentlemen to his aſſiſtance; when approaching to the houſe of one Tyrrell a Gardener in the pariſh of Lambeth, on Monday, June the 15th, 1685. between twelve and one of the clock in the morning, he broke into the apartment of Diſney; where entring his chamber, he found the priſoner in his ſhirt, who crav'd his breeches: but the Meſſenger replied no, ſaying, if he had a Night-Gown he might put it on. Immediately after viewing his breeches, there was found a dagger in his pocket, and alſo ſome other things, likewiſe a brace of piſtols, and a great hanger in the nature of a Scimeter.

His maid Mary Allett was ſuppoſed to be in bed with him, by reaſon her clothes were upon his bed: his daughter about eleven years of age or thereabouts was in another part of the room a-bed alone. The Meſſenger farther depoſed, that getting into the Printing-houſe, he there found the Forms (as Printers call them) of the traitorous declaration in the Printing-room, there being by computation about 750 of them printed on one ſide, and about five of the ſaid traitorous Declarations perfect. Upon the Meſſenger's queſtioning how they came there; he pretended ignorance.

The evidence appearing very plain, and he making little or no defence for himſelf, was found guilty of High-Treaſon; ſentenced to be drawn, hanged, and quarter'd; which was accordingly done at Kennington-Common in the county of Surrey, on Monday the 29th of June 1685, and his quarters ſet upon the city-gates.

A true and full Account given by the Miniſter of St. George, concerning the Behaviour and laſt dying Speech of William Diſney Eſq; June 29*th*, 1685.

BEtween nine and ten of the clock in the morning, I was ſent for by the High Sheriff of Surrey, to officiate as Ordinary at the execution of the priſoner at the Marſhalſea. Before he was brought out, a neighbouring Miniſter and I (upon the Sheriff's motion) went into the room where he was; when the reverend Parſon (having ſeen him the night before) ask'd him whether he had conſidered of thoſe things which he had formerly offer'd him; and did very pathetically preſs him that he would give glory to God, by a full and ingenuous confeſſion of his crime, intimating to him the fatal conſequences that might have followed, if he had perfected that evil work: how many men's lives might have been loſt in the quarrel; whoſe blood he was ſo far guilty of, as he contributed to the increaſe of the rebellion, by his printing the traitorous paper, (or words to the ſame effect.) To which the priſoner anſwer'd (with ſome ſigns of diſcontent) to this purpoſe; that he hoped (ſpeaking to the Miniſter) he did not come to preſs him to unburden himſelf now: that he had nothing to ſay, that might bring any perſon into trouble, and his time was ſhort, ſo he deſired not to be troubled about any ſuch matter; ſo that few words paſſed e'er we parted. Finding him reſolved not to make any diſcovery, I only told him, I did intend to meet him at the place of execution, and he thanked me.

When he came to the gallows, and was in the cart, I came to him and asked him, how he deſired to improve thoſe few moments of his life, that were yet to come; he anſwer'd, in prayer. I asked, him will you pray for yourſelf, or ſhall I pray for you? He anſwer'd, I will pray, and deſire you to pray for me. Whilſt the executioner was preparing the rope, I ſhew'd him the Bible, ſaying, Sir, what comfortable ſentence do you remember out of this word of God for your preſent uſe? He anſwer'd, Jeſus Chriſt came into the world to ſave ſinners, of whom I am chief. And then he proceeded in general terms to acknowledge himſelf a great ſinner againſt God; but affirm'd that he had made his peace with God, that he had confeſs'd his ſins with humility and fervency, and had begg'd God's pardon; and did not doubt but God had for the merits of his ſon Jeſus Chriſt pardon'd all his ſins, and he was now under very comfortable hopes that he ſhould ſoon be happy, not upon the account of his own merits, but the merits of Jeſus Chriſt. I told him this was very good, if his hopes were well grounded. He replied, his hopes were grounded on the ſcriptures, which aſſured him that Chriſt died to ſave ſinners. Whereupon I recounted to him ſome other gracious promiſes of God to true Penitents, as that of Ezekiel, If the wicked man turneth away from his wickedneſs, and doth that which is lawful and right, he ſhall ſave his Soul alive, &c. After which he made his addreſs to God in prayer, that he would forgive him all his ſins, and ſanctify this his affliction to him; and prayed God to bleſs the King, and that he may be merciful and kind to his ſubjects, as well as juſt to his enemies: he farther obſerved, how gracious God was to him in giving him this admonition, (as he call'd it) for God might have taken him off by ſome ſudden death, or deprived him of his ſenſes, and then (he ſaid) it muſt have been worſe with me, but now God hath given me time to bethink myſelf; ſo that, though the dolour and the ſhame of this death, having ſo many ſpectators (upon whom he look'd) may ſomewhat diſcompoſe me, yet I have peace and comfort within. Afterwards he deſired me to pray with him, which I did briefly, according to his mind and preſent example; and cloſing with the Lord's-Prayer, he anſwer'd every petition deliberately, and calmly: he declared that he lived in and did now die in the communion of the Church of England, which he repeated again in theſe words, the Proteſtant Church of England. After Prayer, I ask'd him, whether he wou'd ſing ſome part of a Pſalm; he anſwer'd no. Then I asked him, whether he had any thing more to do or ſay; he anſwer'd, I have nothing more but to return you thanks for your care of me. And I pray God bleſs you and hear your prayers for me, and mine for you, and our Saviour Chriſt for us both. And ſo I left him going to his long home.

This, according to the beſt recollection of my thoughts, is the ſum, and, as near as I can remember, the words that paſs'd between Mr. Diſney, and me,

Andrew Weſton.

XXXIX. The Trial of Sir Edward Hales Bart. for neglecting to take the Oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance, with his Plea thereto, upon the King's diſpenſing with the Stat. 25 Car. II. and the Opinion of the Judges thereupon. 1686.

Paſchæ, 2 Jac. II. In the King's-Bench.

Arthur Godden Plaintiff, in an Action of debt of 500 l. grounded upon the Act of 25 Car. II. for preventing dangers from Popiſh Recuſants.

Sir Edward Hales, Bart. Defendant.

THE Plaintiff declares, That the Defendant after the firſt day of Eaſter-Term, 1673. ſc. 28 Nov. 1 Jac. II. at Hackington in Kent, was admitted to the office of a Colonel of a Foot-Regiment:

That being a military office, and a place of truſt under the King, and by authority from the King.

And the Defendant held that office by the ſpace of three months, next after the 28 Nov. 1 Jac. II.

And from thence, till the time of this action begun, he was, and ſtill is an inhabitant and reſident of the pariſh of Hackington.

And the Plaintiff taking it by proteſtation, that the Defendant within three months next after his admiſſion into the ſaid office of Colonel, did not receive the ſacrament in manner as the Act directs, but neglected to receive it;

Avers, that the Defendant did neglect to take the Oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance, either in the Chancery, or in the King's-Bench, or at any Quarter-Seſſions in Kent, or in the place where he was reſident, either the next Term after his admiſſion to his ſaid office, or within three months after.

And that the Defendant after ſuch neglect, ſc. 10 Mar. 2 Jac. II. at Hackington in Kent, did exerciſe the ſaid office, and ſtill doth, contrary to the Statute of 25 Car. II. * for preventing dangers from Popiſh Recuſants.

Where-

* 25 Car. II. cap. 2. An Act for preventing Dangers which may happen from Popiſh Recuſants.] For preventing dangers which may happen from Popiſh Recuſants, and quieting the minds of his Majeſty's good Subjects, be it enacted, &c. That every perſon that ſhall bear any office, civil or military, &c. or ſhall have command or place of truſt from or under his Majeſty, &c. within the Realm of England, &c. ſhall perſonally appear in the Court of Chancery, or of the King's-Bench, or at the Court of Whereupon the Defendant at Rocheſter, at the Aſſizes held 29 Mar. 2 Jac. II. was duly indicted for ſuch his neglect, and for executing the ſaid office contrary to the ſaid Statute.

And thereupon duly convict, as by the Record thereof appears, whereupon the Plaintiff became entitled to this 500 l. as forfeited by the Defendant.

The Defendant pleads, that the King within the three months, in the declaration mentioned, and before the next Term or Quarter-Seſſions, after his admittance to the ſaid office, and before his ſuit began, ſc. 9 Jan. 1 Jac. II. by his Letters Patent under the Great Seal, and here produced in Court, did diſpenſe with, pardon, remit and diſcharge (among others) the Defendant from taking the ſaid oaths, and from receiving the ſacrament, and from ſubſcribing the declaration againſt tranſubſtantiation or teſts in the Act of 25 Car. II. for preventing dangers from Popiſh Recuſants, or in any other Act, and from all crimes, convictions, penalties, forfeitures, damages, diſabilities, by him incurred by his exerciſing the office of Colonel.

Or by the Act intituled, An Act for the preſerving of the King's Perſon and Government, by diſabling Papiſts from ſitting in either Houſe of Parliament. Or by the Acts made in the firſt or third years of King James I. or the Acts made 5 Eliz. or 23, or 29, or 35 Eliz.

And the King, by his Letters Patent, granted, that the Defendant ſhould be enabled to hold that office in any place in England, or Wales, or Berwick, or in the Fleet, or in Jerſey, or Guernſey, and to receive his pay or wages.

Any clauſe in the ſaid Acts, or in any other Act notwithſtanding & non obſtante, that the Defendant was or ſhould be a Recuſant convict.

As by the ſaid Letters Patent doth appear.

Whereupon the Defendant prays the judgment of the Court, whether the Plaintiff ought to maintain this action.

The Plaintiff demurr'd generally to this Plea.

The Defendant joined in demurrer.

The queſtions are two, 1. Whether the Defendant ought to have pleaded this pardon and diſpenſation to the indictment, or whether he may not plead it in bar to the action?

2. Admitting he may plead it to the action, whether it be a good bar, and whether the King by his prerogative may diſpenſe with the Statute?

Mr. Northey, who argued for the Plaintiff, held that the Defendant may not be permitted to plead this matter in bar of the action, becauſe he ought to have pleaded it to the indictment; and he having not pleaded it then, the Law will conſtrue it to be waving of it, as the caſe in Brook's Abridgment, Charter of Pardon, 15. That in caſe of an indictment for murder, one that has pleaded not guilty, cannot plead the pardon after, unleſs dated ſince this plea of not guilty. So 3 Crooke in a Fieri Facias, if the Defendant appears, and has a releaſe, and does not plead it, he has loſt the benefit of it, and ſhall not be releaſed by Audita Querela: now the Defendant ſhall not be permitted to plead it againſt the Plaintiff, no more than he could have pleaded it againſt the King; for this action is in the nature of an execution upon a judgment, and may be likened to this caſe; an adminiſtrator de foins non, by 17 Car. II. is enabled to ſue forth an execution upon a judgment, recovered by an executor of the firſt teſtator, and the Statute doth put the adminiſtrator in the ſame caſe as the executor was; and the Defendant in that caſe can alledge no other matter againſt the adminiſtrator, than he could have done againſt the executor, neither can he avoid this execution by any plea that he might have pleaded to the firſt action. And if this Defendant ſhall be received to plead this plea now, he will falſify the indictment, that was found againſt him; for if the offence be pardoned, he ought not to have been indicted: but admit this Defendant may well plead this plea, yet I hold it no bar to the Plaintiff's action.

I do allow that the King may diſpenſe with ſeveral penal Laws in ſome caſes, but that prerogative of the King is bounded, ſo that with ſome Statutes he cannot diſpenſe, wherein the ſubject is intereſted, as in 4 Inſtit. (135.) So the King cannot licenſe a man to make a nuiſance or commit a murder, as 11 Henry VII. 11, 12. And that this is an Act wherein all the ſubjects have an intereſt, I humbly ſubmit to the Judgment of the Court.

The King cannot diſpenſe with the Statute 31 of Eliz. chap. 6. againſt Simony, nor with the Statute 17 Edw. VI. 1. againſt buying and ſelling of offices, as appears by the 1 Inſtit. 12. a. 30. Inſtit. 154. 20. Crooke 385. Hobart 75. 1 Inſtit. 234. a. A man that is diſabled by Law to take ſuch an office, the King cannot capacitate him; as if the King ſhould grant to one to ſell an office, within the Statute Ed. VI. and to another to buy that office, theſe Grants would be void, as in Vaughan 534. in the caſe of Thomas and Sorrel, there are ſeveral caſes put, wherein the King cannot diſpenſe with a Statute.

Now by this Statute that we are upon, it is enacted, that every officer ſhall take the oaths, that every perſon that does neglect it, ſhall be diſabled to hold the ſaid office; now this Act does not work upon the taking, but upon the holding; and if ſuch conditions be not performed, he is thereby rendred uncapable to hold his office, and the King can never enable a man whom the Law hath diſabled, 3 Inſt. 154. But I foreſee the caſe in 12 Coke 18. will be objected againſt me, where it is ſaid, that no Act of Parliament can bind the King from any prerogative which is ſolely and inſeparably annexed to his perſon, but that he may diſpenſe with it by a non obſtante;

Quarter-Seſſions in that County where he ſhall reſide within three Months next after his admittance into any of the ſaid offices, and there in open Court, take the ſeveral Oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance, and ſhall alſo receive the Sacrament of the Lord's-Supper, according to the uſage of the Church of England, in ſome Pariſh-Church, upon ſome Lord's-day, immediately after Divine Service.

And every the perſon aforeſaid, that doth or ſhall neglect or refuſe to take the ſaid Oaths and the Sacrament in the ſaid Courts, and at the reſpective times aforeſaid, ſhall be ipſo facto adjudged uncapable, and diſabled in Law to all intents and purpoſes whatſoever, to have, occupy or enjoy, the ſaid office or employment, and every ſuch office and place ſhall be void, and is hereby adjudged, void.

And every perſon that ſhall neglect or refuſe to take the ſaid Oaths or the Sacrament as aforeſaid, and yet, after ſuch neglect or refuſal, ſhall execute any of the ſaid offices, after the ſaid times expired, wherein he ought to have taken the ſame, and being thereupon lawfully convicted upon any information, &c. in any of the King's Courts at Weſtminſter, or at the Aſſizes, every ſuch perſon ſhall forfeit 500 l. to be recovered by him that ſhall ſue for the ſame.

And at the ſame time when the perſons concerned in this Act ſhall take the ſaid Oaths, they ſhall likewiſe ſubſcribe the declaration againſt the belief of Tranſubſtantiation under the ſame penalties as by this Act is appointed.

ſtante, and the Book doth inſtance in the caſe of Sheriffs upon the Statute, 23 Hen. VI. which does enact that all Patents made or to be made of any office of a Sheriff, &c. for term of years, &c. within any County of England, &c. ſhall forfeit 200*l.* Yet ſays that Book, the King may diſpenſe with that Statute, and cites 2 Hen. VII. 66. to be there ſo adjudged by all the Judges of England, and that this is the only authority that ſeems to countenance this caſe. But this is the opinion only of my Lord Coke, for the Book which he cites and depends upon, was never adjudged, as appears by Brook 5 pl. 45. 109. and what was ſaid in that caſe, was only ſaid by one Judge, and never judicially determined, nor ſo much as ſpoken to by any other Judge; therefore the foundation that my Lord Coke has laid, failing, the ſuperſtructure muſt needs fall, and ſo with ſubmiſſion, that ſingle opinion in 12 Coke, fol. 18. is not Law. But admitting the caſe to be Law, that can be no rule to guide this caſe by, for that Statute was made, rather to deprive the King of his power of making Sheriffs, and ſo conſequently commanding his Sheriffs not to ſerve him, than to diſable the ſubject, and thereby reſtraining the King's prerogative, which is ſo inherent in him. But by the Statute 25 Car. II. 2. the prerogative of the King is not touched, for the King may grant the office to any of his ſubjects, and it is only a direction to the ſubject to qualify himſelf for the King's ſervice; and if he be uncapable to ſerve the King, 'tis through his own fault and neglect, and may be puniſhable for the ſame, as in the caſe of Sir John Reade in 27 and 28 Car. II. in the Exchequer he was made and ſworn Sheriff of Hertfordſhire, and neglected to take the oaths according to this Statute; by reaſon of which, the office became void, and afterwards there was an information exhibited againſt him upon this Statute we are now upon, for neglecting to take the ſaid oaths, and executing his office, and upon this he was convicted and fined. And the Court was of opinion that no ſubject could put himſelf out of a capacity to ſerve the King, but for ſo doing he is puniſhable, and in the Law of the Sheriffs the diſpenſation is in the Patent, but in our caſe the diſpenſation is after the Patent, and ſo a difference between the two caſes: and for theſe reaſons, I pray your Lordſhips judgment for the Plaintiff.

Arguments for the Defendant.

Sir Thomas Powis the King's Sollicitor, argued for the Defendant.

AS to the firſt point, that ſuppoſing the Defendant ought to have pleaded the diſpenſation to the Indictment, it does not appear by this Record, but that he did; for the declaration is, that he was Legitime Modo Convictus, and does not ſay whether he pleaded not guilty, or how he pleaded, and for any thing that appears, he did plead it againſt the King, yet he may be admitted to plead it againſt the Plaintiff who is a ſtranger.

If they ſtand upon this as an eſtople, they ought to have relied upon it, and replied, that he had the diſpenſation at the time of the Indictment, and refuſed to plead it; for he that pleads an eſtople, muſt rely upon it, as the authorities are which treat of eſtoples. And therefore as to the firſt point, I think, with ſubmiſſion, we have very well pleaded the pardon and diſpenſation in bar of the action.

As to the ſecond point, whether the King can diſpenſe with the Statute or no; I humbly conceive, with ſubmiſſion, the King may very well diſpenſe with the Statute; 'tis admitted that the King may in many caſes diſpenſe with an Act of Parliament, and let us conſider why not this? It's well obſerved in 2 Inſtit. 496. that the King's prerogative is as much the Law of England as any other Law whatſoever; and the King may upon any cauſe moving him in reſpect of time, place, or perſon, by a non obſtante diſpenſe with any particular perſon, and that he ſhall not incur the penalty of the Statute 7 Coke 36, 37. Vaughan 333, 347. Glanvil in his argument ante P. 205. doth admit a power in the King to diſpenſe with Penal Laws, and yet he was no friend to the prerogative. Though the conſent of the Lords and Commons be requiſite to the making of the Act of Parliament, yet it is the King that gives the ſanctions to the ſaid Laws, and moſt of the ancient Statutes began in form of Charters, as it appears in 8 Coke 19. and the intents and meanings of Acts of Parliament, are every day by the Judges extended and changed, according to a better rule of Reaſon and Juſtice than the words will bear, Hobart 229. and the Judges have an authority over the Statute-Laws, to mold them according to the trueſt and beſt ſenſe. Hobart 346. and Statutes which have been made againſt common right, have been conſtrued void, 8 Coke 118.

There is a diſtinction taken in our Books between Malum in ſe, and Malum prohibitum.

The former the King cannot diſpenſe with, the latter he may; as where the Statute generally prohibits any thing upon a Penalty, which was lawful before, (the Subject receiving no Injury by ſuch a Diſpenſation) the King there may diſpenſe with ſuch an Act. Vaughan 343. Dyer 5. 2. The King granted a licence to carry Bell-metal out of the Realm, notwithſtanding the Statute, Dyer 54. It was enacted by Statute 4. Hobart 9. that none ſhould convey wine into England out of Gaſcoigne, but in Engliſh ſhips; and the King granted a licence to a man, that he, his deputies and factors might convey, &c. in any ſhip, notwithſtanding the Statute, 28 Coke 32. Vaughan 352, 353, 354. Now to apply the caſes to the caſe in queſtion, this is Malum Prohibitum, whether is the diſpenſation any damage to the ſubject; if it were any wrong, it were to the King himſelf, and ſure the King may very well diſpenſe with that, which only relates to himſelf.

I muſt diſtinguiſh between thoſe Acts of Parliament which concern Property, and thoſe which concern Government; Acts of Parliament which concern Property, the King cannot diſpenſe with; but thoſe which concern Government he may; and this for the great inconveniencies which may happen, or urgencies of ſtate which may force him to it, and thoſe unforeſeen at the time of making the Law: for it may happen by a viciſſitude of times, thoſe Laws that were made for the preſervation of Government, ſhould turn to the deſtruction of it, if the King could not diſpenſe with them.

The Common Law in ſome caſes does very much reſpect the prerogative, that it leaves the private intereſt of the ſubject unregarded, and the King may dig in any of his ſubjects land for Saltpetre to make Gunpowder. Now this Statute 25 Car. II. was made to diminiſh the King's prerogative, tive, but to ſecure him from his enemies, and for the preſervation of the Government; and the King is beſt judge what will be moſt for his own ſecurity, and the Government's preſervation. No Act of Parliament can diſcharge the ſubject from his allegiance which he owes to the King, every one is bound by his allegiance to ſerve his Prince when he ſhall be required. Therefore no Act of Parliament can diſable any man to ſerve the King. But they object, that this Act doth make no one incapable, but at his own election.

If this were ſo, it would be in the election of ſome or all the ſubjects to incapacitate themſelves to ſerve the King, and the King would be unſerved: for if it were not in the power of the King to force the ſubject, he would not (it may be not) be ſerved at all; as in the caſe of Sir John Read, cited by the other ſide; he neglected to take the oaths, and thereby the office became void; ſo that the next elected might refuſe, and the next. In the mean time the King's ſervice lies neglected, and no buſineſs of the County can proceed, for want of a Sheriff. To pardon murder, is a prerogative ſolely and inſeparably incident to the King, and may diſpenſe with Statutes reſtraining it, 12 Coke 18. He may diſpenſe with non reſidente. Hobart 146. 3 Inſtitut. 339. In 3 Inſtit. the Lord Coke ſpeaking of Acts of Parliament that were made to reſtrain the King's power of pardoning murder, ſays, that ſuch Acts are good for Kings to follow, but not binding, Coke 18, 19. There are ſeveral Statutes cited, with which the King by his prerogative may diſpenſe, as the Statute 36 Hen. VI. which does enact, that no man ſhall be Sheriff of one County two years together. Yet it was adjudged by all the Judges of England, ſays that Book, that the King may diſpenſe with it; the Statute of 4 of Hen. IV. 31. that no Welſhman ſhall be Juſtice, or other Officer whatſoever in any part of Wales; and yet the King may diſpenſe with it. The Statute 8 Rich. 22, and 33 Hen. VIII. 24. do enact, that none ſhall be Juſtice of the Aſſize in the County where he was born, and yet the King with a ſpecial non obſtante may diſpenſe with that Statute. And in Plowden 502. 13. the King may grant to a man to be an Eſcheater for life, notwithſtanding that Statute.

To anſwer the Statutes which have been cited, which the King cannot diſpenſe with: I ſay, as to the Statutes of Simony and Uſury, the King cannot diſpenſe with them; but what is that to the matter in hand? For there is no reſtriction of the ſubjects ſervice, but the King may have the benefit notwithſtanding. Then as to the Statute 5 Ed. VI. 16. againſt buying and ſelling of judicial offices, of which Statute, there is a clauſe in the 1*ſt Inſtitut.* 134. That the King may not diſpenſe with that Statute: There is a difference between that Statute and this, for that does enact, that if any perſon ſhall bargain and ſell any office, &c. ſhall loſe the office, &c. and all ſuch bargains and contracts ſhall be void; and that he that ſhall give any ſum of money, &c. for any ſuch office, &c. ſhall be a diſabled perſon in Law, to have, occupy, or enjoy the ſaid office, &c.

Now the Statute doth diſable the party upon doing ſuch an act, to take the office; for the making the bargain is prior to taking the office, and thereby he is diſabled to take it, ſo that he can never have the office legally veſted on him, if the King cannot diſpenſe with a conditional ſubſequent, and ſo that does not come near this. And for this reaſon I humbly pray Judgment for the Defendant.

Then the Lord Chief-Juſtice Herbert ſpake thus:

Chief-Juſtice. THIS is a caſe of great conſequence, but of as little difficulty as ever any caſe was, that raiſed ſo great an expectation; for if the King cannot diſpenſe with this Statute, he cannot diſpenſe with any Penal Law whatſoever.

As to the firſt point, whether he ſhall be admitted to plead this diſpenſation, and pardon to this action of debt; (having not pleaded it to the Indictment) I think he may: for this Court ſhall not be bound by the finding of the Jury below, for he (for any thing that does appear) did plead it there, and the Jury might have gone againſt the direction of the Court, yet that ſhall not conclude us; but if the party has good matter to diſcharge himſelf, we may ſhew it: as if a man be convicted of an aſſault and battery againſt the Defendant, the Plaintiff may give the former conviction in evidence, but yet he muſt alſo prove the battery, or elſe he ſhall not recover.

And this being an eſtople, it ſhall not bind, becauſe the Plaintiff was not party to the firſt ſuit.

As to the ſecond point, whether the King can diſpenſe with the Act or no, I think it a queſtion of little difficulty. There is no Law whatſoever but may be diſpenſed with by the ſupreme Law-giver; as the Laws of God may be diſpenſed with by God himſelf; as it appears by God's command to Abraham, to offer up his ſon Iſaac: So likewiſe the Law of man may be diſpenſed with by the Legiſlator, for a Law may either be too wide or too narrow, and there may be many caſes which may be out of the conveniencies which did induce the Law to be made; for it is impoſſible for the wiſeſt Law-maker to foreſee all the caſes that may be, or are to be remedied, and therefore there muſt be a power ſomewhere, able to diſpenſe with theſe Laws. But as to the caſe of Simony, that is objected by the other ſide, that is againſt the Law of God, and a ſpecial offence, and therefore malum in ſe, which I do agree the King cannot diſpenſe with. And as to the caſes of Uſury and Non-Reſidence, thoſe caſes do come in under that rule, that the King cannot diſpenſe with them, becauſe the ſubject has a benefit by them; for in caſe of Uſury the Bond is made void by the Statute, and therefore if the King ſhould diſpenſe with it, the ſubject would loſe the benefit of the avoiding the Bond. And as to the caſes of buying and ſelling of offices, which are objected, there is no need of reſolving, whether the King could diſpenſe with that Statute or no, becauſe the party was diſabled to take any ſuch office by the contract, and the diſability was attacked by force before the office was veſted, ſo that the King could not remove the diſability: and ſo I do agree it would have been in this caſe, if the Defendant had by his neglect or refuſal to take the oaths, rendred himſelf incapable before he had taken the King's diſpenſation; for the King's diſpenſation coming before the diſability attacked, it does prevent it.

The caſe of the Sheriff is much a ſtronger caſe than this, and comes up to it in every particular, for that Statute doth diſable the party to take, and the King to grant; and there is alſo a clauſe in that

Statute

Statute, which ſays, that the Patent ſhall be void, notwithſtanding any Non obſtante to the contrary; and there is a penalty of 200 l. like to our Caſe: and yet by the opinion of all the Judges of England, the King has a Power of diſpenſing with that Statute; yet that Statute does expreſly ſay, the King ſhall not diſpenſe with it by a Non obſtante: ſo if an Act of Parliament had a clauſe in it that it ſhould never be repealed, yet without queſtion, the ſame Power that made it, may repeal it. Beſides, that Statute makes the Patents void at the time of granting them; but by this Statute the Patents are good at the time of granting them, and continue ſo till the neglect to take the oaths, for doing of which the Patentee has three months time. And if the caſe of the Sheriff be Law, as it hath been taken ever ſince Hen. 7th's time, and is cited for good Law in many of our Books, and never till now queſtioned; for the common courſe and experience have been according to it: then I defy all the World to ſhew me any material difference between that and this, only that this is the ſtronger caſe of the two, in many particulars. But becauſe the Caſe has been denied by the Plaintiff's Counſel, it does concern us to take the opinion of our Brethren, it being a matter of ſo great conſequence in the circuits; for if it be not Law, then there are ſome Sheriffs that be not lawful, and ſo have not power to return the Juries, and then we have no power to try and give Judgment upon any offenders; and it alſo concerns us who go into our Countries, to take advice of it: for if that caſe is not Law, our Patents, which are Non obſtante's to 23 Hen. 8. 24. may not be good, and ſo we have no authorities to go the circuits; and therefore I will ask the opinion of all the Judges, as well in that caſe as this *.

On Monday the 21ſt of June, after having conſulted with all the Judges, his Lordſhip delivered their Opinions in open Court, thus:

" In the Caſe of Godwin and Hales, wherein the " defendant pleads a diſpenſation from the King; " it is doubted, whether or no the King had ſuch " a Prerogative? Truly, upon the argument be" fore us, it appeared as clear a Caſe as ever came " before this Court: But becauſe men fancy I " know not what difficulty, when really there is " none, we were willing to give ſo much counte" nance to the Queſtion in the Caſe, as to take the " Advice of all the Judges of England. They were " all aſſembled at Serjeant's-Inn, and this Caſe was " put to them; and the great Caſe of the Sheriffs " was put, Whether the Diſpenſation in that Caſe " were legal? becauſe upon that depended the ex" ecution of all the Law of the Nation: And I " muſt tell you, that there were ten upon the " place, that clearly delivered their opinions, That " the Caſe of the Sheriffs was good Law; and that " all the Attainders grounded upon Indictments " found by Juries returned by ſuch Sheriffs, were " good, and not erroneous; and conſequently that " men need not have any fears or ſcruples about " that matter. And in the next place, they did " clearly declare, that there was no imaginable " difference between that Caſe and this; unleſs it " were, that this were the much clearer Caſe of the " two, and liable to the fewer exceptions.

" My Brother Powel ſaid, he was inclin'd to be " of the ſame opinion; but he would rather have " ſome more time to conſider of it: But he has " ſince ſent by my Brother Holloway, to let us know, " that he does concur with us. To theſe eleven " Judges, there is one Diſſenter, Brother Street; " who yet continues his opinion, That the King " cannot diſpenſe in this Caſe: But that's the opi" nion of one ſingle Judge, againſt the opinion of " eleven. We were ſatisfied in our Judgments be" fore, and having the concurrence of eleven out " of twelve, we think we may very well declare " the opinion of the Court to be, That the King " may diſpenſe in this Caſe: And the Judges go " upon theſe grounds;

" 1. That the Kings of England are ſovereign " Princes.

" 2. That the laws of England are the King's laws.

" 3. That therefore 'tis an inſeparable Pre" rogative in the Kings of England, to diſpenſe " with penal Laws in particular Caſes, and upon " particular neceſſary Reaſons.

" 4. That of thoſe reaſons and thoſe neceſſities, " the King himſelf is ſole Judge: And then, which " is conſequent upon all,

" 5. That this is not a truſt inveſted in, or " granted to the King by the People, but the an" cient Remains of the ſovereign Power and Pre" rogative of the Kings of England; which never " yet was taken from them, nor can be. And " therefore ſuch a Diſpenſation appearing upon " Record to come time enough to ſave him from " the forfeiture, Judgment ought to be given for " the Defendant†,

Quod querens nil capiat per billam.

This Judgment making a great noiſe, the Lord Chief-Juſtice, in juſtification of his opinion, publiſhed the following Vindication.

A Short Account of the Authorities in Law, upon which Judgment was given in Sir Edward Hales's Caſe: Written by Sir Edward Herbert, Chief-Juſtice of the Common-Pleas, in vindication of himſelf.

HAving been called to a place of Judicature in difficult times, and after my moſt ſincere reſolutions and uttermoſt endeavours of diſcharging the duty of that place, with a good conſcience, having yet

* See Comberbach's Reports, pag. 21, & ſeq. where this Caſe is largely reported.

† Biſhop Burnet, in his Hiſtory of his own Time, Vol. I. pag. 669. ſays: Sir Edward Hales, a Gentleman of a noble Family in Kent, declared himſelf a Papiſt, tho' he had long diſguiſed it; and had once to my ſelf ſo ſolemnly denied it, that I was led from thence to ſee, there was no credit to be given to that ſort of men, where their Church or Religion was concerned. He had an Employment, and not taking the Teſt, his coachman was ſet up to inform againſt him, and to claim the 500 l. that the Law gave to the Informer: When this was to be brought to trial, the Judges were ſecretly asked their opinions; and ſuch as were not clear to judge as the Court did direct, were turned out; and upon two or three canvaſſings, the half of them were diſmiſſed, and others of more pliable and obedient underſtandings, were put in their places: Some of theſe were weak and ignorant to a ſcandal. The Suit went on in a feeble proſecution, and in Trinity-Term Judgment was given.

And in pag. 671. the Biſhop ſays,

But Judges, who are before-hand determined how to give their opinions, will not be much moved, even by the ſtrongeſt arguments. The ludicrous ones uſed on this occaſion at the bar, were rather a farce, fitter for a mock-trial in a Play, than ſuch as became men of Learning in ſo important a matter: Great expectations were raiſed, to hear with what arguments the Judges would maintain the Judgment that they ſhould give; but they made nothing of it: and without any arguing gave Judgment for the Defendant, as if it had been in a Cauſe of courſe.

yet had the hard fortune to fall under the greateſt infamy and reproach that is poſſible for any man to lie under, of perjury, and breach of truſt; in giving a Judgment in Sir Edward Hales's Caſe, contrary to Law, and contrary to my knowledge and opinion (for that only can make it criminal;) and which, they ſay, tends to the ſubverſion of all our Laws, contrary to the oath that every Judge takes, and to that high truſt repoſed in him, to judge to the beſt of his underſtanding, according to Law: Although I cannot hope to wipe off that univerſal ill impreſſion that the malice of ſome people, who underſtand the nature of this Caſe very well, has made upon moſt men who do not underſtand it; yet in order to clear my ſelf to all juſt and diſ-intereſted perſons who are only my enemies by miſtake, I think my ſelf obliged to give ſome ſhort account of that Judgment, and the grounds upon which it was given: and this I will do, not by making an elaborate and legal argument, to make out by reaſons of my own, that the Judgment then given is conſonant to Law; which whether it be or no, is like to be conſidered in Parliament, and to whoſe determination, I ſhall as intirely and as chearfully ſubmit as any other perſon in the Nation. But I ſhall ſet down, not all the variety of Caſes that we meet with in our Books, touching the King's Power of diſpenſing with Acts of Parliament; for that would ſwell this Paper to an unreaſonable length, and diſcourage many from reading any part of it; but only ſome few of the chiefeſt and plaineſt authorities in Law, upon which the reſolution in the Caſe of Sir Edward Hales was grounded. I ſhall not only cite the Books and Pages where thoſe Caſes are to be found, but tranſcribe the very words, that every body may be convinced, that if we were in a miſtake, it was no wilful miſtake, but that we had the authority of former Judgments given by great men that went before us, (and for which they were never queſtioned) to lead us into it.

The Caſe, (for I muſt ſtate it upon my memory, not having any Copy of the Record by me) was ſhortly this.

An action popular was brought againſt Sir Edward Hales, upon the Statute 25 Car. 2. *c.*2. for the penalty of 500 l. wherein the Plaintiff declares, that whereas it was provided by the Statute, &c. (ſetting forth the Statute:) Notwithſtanding which, the Defendant having a commiſſion to ſerve the King as a Colonel of Foot, and not having received the Sacrament, nor taken the oaths and teſts, &c. within the times preſcribed by the Act, and after the times expired wherein he ought to have received the Sacrament and taken the oaths and teſts as aforeſaid, he did execute the ſaid Office, and continued to act by colour of the ſaid commiſſion; of which he was indicted and convicted at the Aſſizes in Kent. &c. whereby the action accrues to the Plaintiff for the penalty of 500 l. the Defendant pleads, that before the time expired, &c. he had a diſpenſation under the broad ſeal, to act, non obſtante that Statute.

To which the Plaintiff demurs.

And Judgment was given for the Defendant, that his Plea was good.

And firſt it will be neceſſary to ſhew what this diſpenſing Power is, which is warranted by our Judgment; and that will beſt appear by the definition of it which is given in the 11th Report of my Lord Coke, pag. 88. in the Caſe of Monopolies: Diſpenſatio mali prohibiti eſt de jure Domino Regi conceſſa propter impoſſibilitatem prævidendi de omnibus particularibus; & diſpenſatio eſt mali prohibiti provida relaxatio, utilitate ceu neceſſitate penſatâ. "For "true it is, (ſays the Book) that in as much as an "Act of Parliament, which generally prohibits "any thing upon a penalty that is popular, or "only given to the King, may be inconvenient to "divers particular perſons, in reſpect of perſon, "time, or place; for this purpoſe the Law gives "a power to the King to diſpenſe with particular "perſons." And in the 7th Rep. p. 63. in the Caſe of penal Statutes, which was the opinion of all the Judges of England, 2 Jacobi, it is reſolved, That the King may diſpenſe with any particular perſon, that he ſhall not incur the penalty of the Statute, tho' it be an Act made pro bono publico; and that this is a truſt and confidence inſeparably annexed to the royal perſon of the King. I cite theſe two firſt Caſes, chiefly to ſhew, that a Diſpenſation in its nature is particular, and given to particular perſons by name: which is all the power that is attributed to the King by our Judgment. And this I mention, becauſe of an unreaſonable miſtake of moſt People that talk of the diſpenſing Power, as though the King's declaration of Liberty of Conſcience, whereby all the laws that concern Religion, are at once totally ſuſpended and laid aſleep, were warranted by it: Let that declaration ſtand or fall upon its own bottom, I am ſure the Caſe I am now ſpeaking of, has nothing to do with it. And having by theſe caſes cleared the nature of all Diſpenſations, which are always granted to particular perſons, (as Sir Edward Hales's was in our Caſe, who was the firſt, and I think the only perſon who then had ſuch a Diſpenſation,) I ſhall now cite ſome of the chief authorities upon which our Judgment was given in that caſe: And the firſt and great caſe that I cite, wherein the King's diſpenſing Power is deſcribed and limited, is in the year-book of Hen. 7. *fol.*11. & H. 7. *fol.*12. in theſe words; "There is a diverſity (ſays the Book) be-"tween malum prohibitum, and malum in ſe, as a "Statute forbids any man to coin money, and if he "does he ſhall be hanged; this is malum prohibi-"tum; for before the Statute, coining money was "lawful, but now it is not ſo, and therefore the "King can diſpenſe with it. So if a man ſhip wool "in any place but Calais, it is malum prohibitum; "becauſe it is prohibited by Act of Parliament, and "the King can diſpenſe with it, and ſo in like ca-"ſes: But that which is malum in ſe, the King, "nor no other perſon can diſpenſe with; as if the "King would give a man power to kill another, "or licenſe one to make a nuſance in a high-way, "this were void; and yet the King can pardon "theſe things when they are done." Theſe are the very words of that Book: and my Lord Vaughan diſcourſing of, and explaining this caſe in the Caſe of Thomas and Sorrell, in his *Rep. p.*333. firſt ſhews, how a Diſpenſation differs from a Pardon. For a Diſpenſation does jus dare, and makes the thing prohibited (to all others) lawful to be done by him that has it. And therefore the King cannot diſpenſe with mala in ſe, becauſe they never were, and can never be made lawful: But even theſe, (ſays the Year-book) may be pardoned after they are done.

From theſe Caſes reſults this plain Syllogiſm: Whatever is not prohibited by the Law of God, but was lawful before any Act of Parliament made to forbid it, the King, by his Diſpenſation, granted to a particular perſon, may make lawful again; to that perſon who has ſuch Diſpenſation, though it continues unlawful to every body elſe.

But to execute any Office without taking the oaths and the teſts antecedent to any Acts of Parliament made to forbid it, was lawful.

Therefore the Diſpenſation granted to Sir Edward Hales, did make it lawful for him to do ſo, though it continued unlawful for any body elſe.

In this argument the premiſes are none of our own, we have them out of our law-books; and the authority of thoſe books have never yet been queſtioned. I appeal then to any indifferent perſon, whether it can be criminal in Judges, to draw a neceſſary concluſion from premiſes and book-caſes that have been taken for Law for ſo many ages together.

The next great Caſe, is the Reſolution of all the Judges of England, in 2 Hen. 7. in the Exchequer-Chamber, upon the King's Power of diſpenſing with the Statute of 23 Hen. 6. cap. 8. That no Man ſhould be Sheriff for above one year. The recital in the preamble, and the whole purview, if compared with our Statute of 25 Car. 2. cap. 2. equals it in every particular, and in ſome goes beyond it: for the miſchiefs recited in this latter Statute, are only in theſe words, For preventing dangers which may happen from Popiſh Recuſants, and quieting the minds of his Majeſty's good Subjects. The Cauſe of making the Statute of 23 Hen. 6. is for preventing the importable damage of the King and his People, perjury, manſlaughter and great oppreſſion. The Purview enacts,

1. That no man ſhall be Sheriff for above a year.

2. That all Letters Patent made for years or lives, ſhall be void.

3. That no Non obſtante ſhall make them good; (which ſhews that the Parliament thought the King could otherwiſe have diſpenſed with this Act by a Non obſtante.)

4. Whoever acts by colour of ſuch Letters Patent, ſhall forfeit 200 l.

5. He ſhall be utterly diſabled to bear the office of Sheriff in any County of England.

6. That every Pardon for ſuch offence ſhall be void.

Notwithſtanding all this, it was adjudged in that Caſe before-cited by all the Judges of England, (who were at that time as learned as ever ſate upon the Bench;) I ſay it was adjudged by all the Judges in the Exchequer-Chamber, that the King's Diſpenſation with that Statute was good.

Having then this Caſe before us, if we ſhould have judged the Diſpenſation not good in Sir Edward Hales's Caſe, it muſt have been upon one of theſe two grounds: that is, either, 1. In the firſt place, we muſt have found ſome difference between the King's power in that caſe and in this, which I confeſs, after the wiſeſt inquiry does not appear to me, and I wiſh any man would ſhew me any ſuch difference if he can: or elſe, 2. We muſt have adjudged that ſolemn reſolution given in the Exchequer-chamber by all the Judges of England ſo long ago, and which has been taken for good Law ever ſince, we muſt adjudge no Law: whereas the known rule is, that after any point of Law has been ſolemnly ſettled in the Exchequer-chamber by all the Judges, we never ſuffer it to be diſputed or drawn in queſtion again.

But our enemies ſeeing the force of this argument have had the confidence to ſay, that that point is not reſolved in that caſe; they might with as much modeſty affirm, Thou ſhalt not bear falſe Witneſs againſt thy Neighbour, to be none of the ten Commandments; we can only reply in this caſe as in that, that if we have eyes to read, and common ſenſe to judge, it is there reſolved. Indeed there is another point about the Sheriff's paſſing his accounts, which the Judges were divided in; but in the point of the diſpenſation they all agreed: or elſe, that other point could never have come in queſtion.

But to put this beyond all controverſy, we have two things to offer.

Firſt, That it has been cited as adjudged in ſeveral books of great authority.

Secondly, It has been the conſtant practice to have ſuch diſpenſations in all Kings reigns ever ſince that reſolution.

As to the firſt, Though I might cite many books, yet I will only cite three or four of the cleareſt and greateſt authorities: and the firſt ſhall be Fitzherbert, in his abridgment of this very caſe, Tit. Grant. 33. who lived near this time, and could not eaſily be miſtaken in the ſenſe of the Year-book: The patent, ſays he, was adjudged good by all the Juſtices; but the Statute ſays expreſsly it ſhall be void: therefore it is only made good by the King's diſpenſing.

2. Next to him ſhall be Plowden, who, as all Lawyers will confeſs, is as little like to be miſtaken in the ſenſe of the Year-books, as any reporter we have; and he in his Commentaries, p. 502. in the caſe between Greendon and the Biſhop of Lincoln, after citing the caſe both out of the Year-book, and out of Fitzherbert's abridgment, has theſe words where the Statute was, That the King's grant to any man to be Sheriff of any county for longer time than a year ſhall be void, notwithſtanding any clauſe of non obſtante to be put into the patent: There it is held, that the King's grant to the Earl of Northumberland, to be Sheriff during life muſt have a clauſe of non obſtante, becauſe of the preciſe Words of the Statute before mentioned; and with ſuch a clauſe of Non obſtante, the patent to the Earl was good.

3. Next is my Lord Coke, who aſſerts the King's prerogative touching this matter in much higher terms than we would preſume to do, in giving Judgment in Sir Edward Hales's caſe: for in his twelfth report, page 18. he has theſe words; No Act can bind the King from any Prerogative which is ſole and inſeparable to his perſon, but that he may diſpenſe with it by a Non obſtante, as a ſovereign power to command any of his ſubjects to ſerve him for the publick weal; and this ſolely and inſeparably is annext to his perſon: and his royal Power cannot be reſtrained by any Act of Parliament, neither in Theſi nor in Hypotheſi, but that the King by his royal Prerogative may diſpenſe with it: For upon the Commandment of the King, and Obedience of the Subject does his Government conſiſt; as is provided by the Statute of 23 Hen. 6. cap. 8. That all Patents made or to be made of any office of Sheriff, &c. for term of years, for life, in fee-ſimple or in tail, are void and of none effect, any clauſe or parol de non obſtante, put or to be put into ſuch patents, to be made notwithſtanding. And further, whoſoever ſhall take upon him or them, to accept or occupy ſuch office of Sheriff, by virtue of ſuch grants or patents, ſhall ſtand perpetually diſabled to be or bear the office of Sheriff within any county of England, by the ſame authority; and notwithſtanding that by this Act, Firſt, The Patent is made void. Secondly, The King is reſtrained to grant non obſtante. Thirdly, The grantee diſabled to take the office: yet the King by his royal ſovereign power of commanding, may command by his patent (for ſuch cauſes, as he in his wiſdom doth think meet and profitable for himſelf and the commonwealth, of which he himſelf is ſolely Judge) to ſerve him and the weal publick as Sheriff of ſuch a county for years, or for life, &c. And ſo it was reſolved by all the Juſtices of England in the Exchequer-chamber, 2 H. 7. And after ſome other caſes to this point of the King's prerogative, he has this farther (ſays he) ſee 4 Hen. 4. cap. 31. in which it is ordained that no Welchman be Juſtice, Chamberlain, Treaſurer, Sheriff, Steward, Conſtable of a caſtle, Eſcheator, Coroner or chief Foreſter, nor other officer whatſoever, nor keeper of Records, &c. in any part of Wales, notwithſtanding any patent made to the contrary, with clauſe of Non obſtante licet ſit Wallicus natus: and yet without queſtion the King may grant with a Non obſtante. Thus far that book, and I have tranſcribed the book at large, that every body may ſee that the King's power of diſpenſing with ſuch Acts of Parliament as reſtrain his granting offices, ſtands upon a peculiar reaſon beſides the general one; upon which his power of diſpenſing with other penal Laws is founded. And that if this be a pernicious opinion, we are not to ſuffer as the firſt authors of it. But leſt it ſhould be objected, that this is my Lord Coke's ſingle opinion; or that the twelfth report is not of ſo great authority as the reſt of his reports are; the ſame is reſolved by all the Judges of England, (if my Lord Coke be a faithful Reporter) in Calvin's caſe in the ſeventh report, p. 14. in theſe words: Every ſubject is by his natural allegiance bound to ſerve and obey his ſovereign, &c. It is enacted by the Parliament of 23 H. 6. That no man ſhould ſerve the King as Sheriff of any county above one year, and that notwithſtanding any clauſe of non obſtante to the contrary; that is to ſay, Notwithſtanding that the King ſhould expreſly diſpenſe with the ſaid Act; howbeit it is agreed 2 H. 7. that againſt the expreſs purview of that Act, the King may by a ſpecial non obſtante diſpenſe with that Act. For that the Act could not bar the King of the ſervice of his ſubject, which the law of nature did give unto him. This is reported (unleſs my Lord Coke had a mind to deceive the ſucceeding Judges, and draw them in, to give pernicious opinions) as the ſenſe of all the Judges of England in King James's time, in the Exchequer-chamber.

common

And now I would aſk, theſe caſes thus ſolemnly reſolved, are they Law? Or are they not? If it ſhall be ſaid, that they are not Law, what foundations have the Judges to ſtand upon? or what certain meaſures can they take in giving Judgment, either between the King and his ſubjects, or between party and party; if ſo many ſolemn reſolutions by all the Judges in England in the Exchequer-chamber, are not to be relied upon? If they are Law; then I appeal to all mankind, whether our caſe does not come up in every tittle to the reaſon of thoſe reſolutions: whether the Act of 25 Car. 2. do not bar the King of the ſervice of ſome of his ſubjects; and whether therefore for great reaſons, and in particular caſes, he may not diſpenſe with it.

But beſides the authority of this caſe, we have the conſtant practice, that this Statute of Sheriffs has been conſtantly diſpenſed with ever ſince it was made; and if thoſe diſpenſations were not good, then all perſons convicted upon Indictments found by grand Juries, returned by ſuch Sheriffs, are illegally attainted; then all pannels of Juries returned and other Proceſs executed in Civil Cauſes, by ſuch Sheriffs, was altogether erroneous, and it is ſtrange that no body in ſo long a time ſhould hit that blot.

Obj. The only Objection, that I hear, is made to this, by eminent men of our profeſſion, (who freely acknowledge the authority of theſe Caſes, and the reſolution in them, that no Act of Parliament can debar the King of the ſervice of his ſubjects which the Law of nature gives him, to be good Law;) is this, that ſay they, It is not the Act of Parliament that debars the King of the ſervice of his ſubjects in this caſe, but it is the default of thoſe ſubjects, who will not qualify themſelves for his ſervice, by doing thoſe things that the Statute requires. But for a full and plain anſwer to this, I ſay, Firſt, We are not now conſidering theſe Grants of Offices, as they are beneficial to the ſubjects, on whom they are conferred, but as the King has an intereſt in the ſervice of thoſe Subjects; and it is a known rule in Law, that among common perſons, no man ſhall ſuffer by the default of another; much leſs ſhall the King be prejudic'd by the default of any of his people.

But ſecondly, Pray where is the difference between an Act of Parliament's barring the King directly of the ſervice of his Subject, and doing of it by neceſſary and inevitable conſequence? As, if an Act of Parliament were made, that no man that is lame or deaf ſhould ſerve the King in any Office, though they were otherwiſe well qualified for it; the King were as effectually debarred of the ſervice of ſuch Subjects, as though they had been expreſſed by name. I know it will be ſaid, that theſe are natural defects, which the Subjects cannot help; but the others are wilful Impediments, that may be removed, if they pleaſe.

But to prove that this is not ſo: I ask, whether when the Act requires Declarations and Subſcriptions to be made, it ſhould be done contrary to a Man's opinion, or according to it? Certainly, no Man will ſay, contrary to a Man's opinion, for that would be high Diſſimulation, and more elude the ends of the Act, than not doing it at all. If then it muſt be done according to a Man's opinion, it is no more in any Man's power to change his opinion, than to cure himſelf of Deafneſs or Lameneſs. Every man believes, not becauſe he will, but becauſe he muſt believe. Error is a diſeaſe of the mind, as much as thoſe before-mentioned are of the body. It is true, a Man may ſeek for inſtruction, and uſe all means to be better informed; and ſo may a Man, in the other caſe, try all proper Remedies to cure his diſtempers; but proper Remedies do not always effect the cure, and often when they do, there is much time taken up in the operation: and the King, who is in no default at all, loſes the ſervice of his ſubject in the mean time. And if this Prerogative be, as my Lord Coke ſays, Proprium quarto modo, and that it belongs to our King's. as he ſays, Omni, ſoli & ſemper; the King can be no more debarred of the ſervice of his ſubject for a a month, or a year, than he can be debarred of it for ever; eſpecially ſince in that month or year may happen ſuch occaſions, which afterwards during the joint lives of the King that is to command, and of the ſubject to be commanded, may probably never happen again.

Many other caſes of Acts of Parliament might be cited, as 8 R. 2. 2. That no Man ſhould go Judge of Aſſize into his own country. And 10 E. 3. 3. That whoever has a pardon of Felony, ſhall find ſureties of the good Behaviour, or his pardon ſhall be void; which Statutes have been conſtantly diſpenſed with ever ſince they were made. But I reſolve not to heap up all the caſes of diſpenſations, but to confine myſelf to thoſe that were, as they are before cited, the principal ground of our giving Judgment in Sir E. Hales's caſe: only after I have anſwered ſome objections, I have two authorities more to offer, which I take to be of greateſt weight in this caſe; and that is, two Conceſſions of the Commons of England in Parliament, acknowledging this power of diſpenſing to be in the King.

But firſt, To anſwer an objection or two that I hear is made:

1. Obj. This Act was made pro bono publico, and in the caſe before cited, of 11 H. 7. the King cannot diſpenſe with a common nuſance; and this caſe diſpenſed with, would be as bad as diſpenſing with a common nuſance.

Anſw. Tho' this will receive an eaſy anſwer, yet I ſhall avoid giving it in words or reaſons of my own, (as I do all along, becauſe I know they would be ſuſpected and miſconſtrued) but in the words of my Lord Vaughan; whom I cite the oftener, becauſe every body remembers him, and it is very well known, he was never guilty of ſtraining the King's prerogative too high. In Thomas and Sorrel's caſe; the chief Reaſon why the King can't diſpenſe with a publick nuſance, is ſaid by him to be, becauſe every particular Perſon who has received damage by it, may have his action, which the King cannot bar. Nor ſee I any reaſon, ſays he, pag. 335. why the King may not diſpenſe with thoſe nuſances by which no Man has a right to a particular Action, as well as he may with any other offence againſt a penal Law, by which no third perſon has cauſe of Action: from whence it follows, That if an Act of Parliament call an offence a nuſance, from whence no particular damage can ariſe to a particular perſon to have his Action, the King may diſpenſe with ſuch a nominal nuſance.

Now to apply this to our caſe, for exerciſing an office without taking the teſt, no particular perſon can have an Action, becauſe no particular perſon can have any damage by it, (for an Action, as an informer, is not meant, that being the caſe of all popular Statutes) and therefore the King may diſpenſe with it, before the action brought; and in page 341. he explains this very well: No offence, ſays he, againſt a penal Law could be diſpenſed with, if the reaſon of not diſpenſing, were becauſe the offence is contra bonum publicum, for all offences againſt penal Laws are ſuch, p. 342. though ſuch Laws are pro bono publico, they are not Laws pro bono ſingulorum populi, (which are the Laws that the King cannot diſpenſe with, as will appear at large in the Conceſſion of the Commons, 3 Caroli, which I will cite by and by) but pro bono Populi complicati, as the King in his diſcretion ſhall think fit to order them for the good of the whole. In this notion the eſtate of every Pater-familias may be ſaid to be pro bono communi of his Family, which yet is but at his diſcretion and management of it; and they have no intereſt in it, but have benefit by it.

Obj. 2. But it is again objected, that in Statutes that are pro bono publico, in a leſs degree, the King may diſpenſe. But this Statute was ſo highly neceſſary for the publick, that it could not be diſpenſed with.

Anſw. To which my Lord Vaughan anſwers in the caſe before cited, p. 344.

1. All penal Laws, when made, and in force, are equally neceſſary; and in things neceſſary, there is no gradation of more or leſs neceſſary.

2. If any penal Laws were poſſibly leſs diſpenſible than others, thoſe capitally penal, were leſs diſpenſible than thoſe leſs penal. But it is not ſo: for coining Money of right alloy in imitation of the King's coin, is capitally penal without licence, but it may be licenſed, &c. It is capital to multiply Gold or Silver by the Statute 5 Hen. 4. c. 4. but may be licenſed, as was done to John Faceby, tempore H. 6. The diſpenſation with a Non obſtante to that Statute may be ſeen, Coke, Placita Coronæ, fol. 74. cap. 20.

Obj. 3. But if the King have a power to diſpenſe with one, he may diſpenſe with twenty, with an hundred, and ſo the Statute may become of little force.

Anſw. From the abuſe of a thing to draw an Argument againſt the thing itſelf, is no conſquence at all; it is, as is reſolved in the caſes above cited, a high truſt repoſed in the King, and if the King will violate his truſt, there is never a one of his Prerogatives but may be abuſed, to the ruin of his people. To inſtance in one or two.

1. Every body will grant, that the King can pardon murther and robbery; yet if he ſhould pardon every murther and every robbery that is committed, it were better to live with the Cannibals in America, than in our native country; and the human Laws that are made to puniſh thoſe crimes, would be rendred of as ſmall force and effect, as it is objected the Law in our caſe would be by frequent diſpenſations.

2. There is no doubt, but the King may create any man a Peer of England, and thereby give him a vote in Parliament; yet if the King ſhould abuſe his power ſo far as to create ten thouſand Peers, or confer this Honour upon every body that aſks it, no doubt it were a total deſtruction of the Legiſlative Power of the Nation. And yet in either of theſe caſes, (or in any other branch of the King's Prerogative) if the Judges ſhould judge the King had ſuch a Prerogative, it were an unreaſonable objection to ſay, Theſe Prerogatives may be abuſed; Ergo, the Judges have given a pernicious Judgment.

When we were to give Judgment in Sir Edward Hales's caſe, we could neither know, nor hinder, if we did, any ill uſe the King might make of this Power; we were only to ſay upon our Oaths whether the King had ſuch a Power or no, and for that we had the great authorities above-cited, and too much greater than thoſe; I mean, two ſeveral clear Conceſſions of all the Commons of England in Parliament aſſembled, of this diſpenſing Power to be in the King; and that not in a ſubmiſs complying temper, but when they were in a high debate with the Crown (eſpecially in the latter caſe) about the violation of other Laws.

And the firſt of theſe is Rot. Parl. 1 Hen. 5. n. 15. and it is printed in Rolls's ſecond Abridgment Tit. Prerogative 180. the Record is in theſe words: The Commons pray that the Statutes for voiding of Aliens out of the Kingdom, may be kept and executed: To which the King agrees, ſaving his Prerogative, that he may diſpenſe with whom he pleaſes. And upon this the Commons anſwered, that their intent was no other, nor never ſhould be by the Grace of God. There were as great apprehenſions of dangers and inconveniencies from Aliens then, as there is from Roman Catholicks now.

And afterwards, in the ſame Parliament, [Rot. Parl. 1 Hen. 5. n. 22.] when the Commons pray'd that the Statutes of Proviſors, Statutes of the ſame nature nature with this in our caſe; (for they were made againſt the Court of Rome's encroaching Juriſdiction in England); I ſay, when they make the like Prayer, that theſe may be put in execution, being admoniſhed by the King's anſwer in the former caſe, they themſelves inſert in their very Prayer, a ſaving for this Prerogative of the King, and then the King agrees to it.

But the plaineſt Conceſſion of the Commons of England aſſembled in Parliament, was that 3 Caroli, upon a Debate between the two Houſes, upon the Petition of Right; ante P. 204, 205. as it was delivered by Mr. Glanvil, in a full Committee of both Houſes of Parliament, 23 May, 1628. in the painted Chamber: and that what he ſays as to this matter, may not paſs for the ſingle opinion of Mr. Glanvil, (tho' he was a learned Man) he in the preſence of the Commons, addreſſes himſelf to the Lords in theſe words, p. 204. Having thus reduced to your Lordſhip's memory the effects of your own reaſons; I will now, with your Lordſhip's favour, come to the points of our reply, wherein I moſt humbly beſeech your Lordſhips, to weigh the reaſons which I ſhall preſent, not as the ſenſe of myſelf, the weakeſt Member of our Houſe, but as the genuine and true ſenſe of the whole Houſe of Commons, conceived in a buſineſs debated there with the greateſt Gravity and Solemnity, with the greateſt concurrence of Opinions, and Unanimity, that ever was in any buſineſs maturely agitated in that Houſe. And then coming to ſpeak of the Point in queſtion, he delivers the ſenſe of the Commons in theſe words: (ante pag. 205.) There is a truſt inſeparably repoſed in the perſons of the Kings of England, but that Truſt is regulated by Law; for example, when Statutes are made to prohibit things not mala in ſe, but only mala quia prohibita, under certain forfeitures and penalties to accrue to the King, and to the Informers that ſhall ſue for the breach of them: the Commons muſt, and ever will acknowledge a regal and ſovereign Prerogative in the King, touching ſuch Statutes, that it is in his Majeſty's abſolute and undoubted Power, to grant diſpenſations to particular perſons, with the clauſes of non obſtante, to do as they might have done before thoſe Statutess, wherein his Majeſty conferring grace and favour upon ſome, doth not do wrong to others. But there is a difference between thoſe Statutes and the Laws and Statutes whereon the Petition is grounded: By thoſe Statutes the ſubject has no intereſt in the Penalties, which are all the fruit ſuch Statutes can produce (that is, to ſuch Informer) until by Suit or Information commenc'd, he become entitled to the particular forfeitures, whereas the Laws and Statutes mentioned in our Petition are of another nature; there ſhall your Lordſhips find us to rely upon the good old Statute called Magna Charta, which declareth and confirmeth the ancient common Laws of the Liberties of England. There ſhall your Lordſhips alſo find us to inſiſt upon divers other moſt material Statutes, made in the time of King Edward 3. and King Edward 4. and other famous Kings, for explanation and ratification of the lawful Rights and Privileges belonging to the Subjects of this Realm: Laws not inflicting Penalties upon offenders in malis prohibitis, but Laws declarative or poſitive, conferring or confirming ipſo facto, an inherent right and intereſt of liberty and freedom in the ſubjects of this Realm, as their birthrights and inheritances deſcendible to their Heirs and Poſterity: Statutes incorporate into the body of the common Law, over which (with reverence be it ſpoken) there is no truſt in the King's ſovereign power or prerogative royal, to enable him to diſpenſe with them, or to take from his ſubjects that birthright or inheritance which they have in their Liberties, by virtue of the common Law and of theſe Statutes.

I have the rather cited this at large, becauſe it is a clear acknowledgment of the King's diſpenſing Power in as large a manner as we have adjudged it, and does at the ſame time vindicate it from one of the moſt clamorous, the moſt malicious, but withal, the weakeſt objections that ever was made againſt it. By this Judgment, ſay they, you have cancell'd all our Laws, and given up our lives, liberties, and eſtates, to be diſpoſed of at the King's pleaſure. It is plain, that this is no conſequence at all; for the Commons here in Parliament, at the ſame time that they expreſly grant that the King has undoubted Power of diſpenſing with Laws prohibiting things that are not mala in ſe, but only mala quia prohibita; Laws that are made, as my Lord Vaughan expreſſes it, pro bono populi complicati; yet they utterly deny, as they had good reaſon to do, that the King can diſpenſe with one tittle of Magna Charta, or any of thoſe other Laws whereby the lives, the liberties, the intereſts of any of the ſubjects are conferr'd upon, or confirm'd to them; for theſe are Laws pro bono ſingulorum populi, which the King can never diſpenſe with. And as to this matter, I do not know whether it will be proper, but any man ſo ſenſibly touch'd in his reputation, may be provok'd to commit ſome Indecencies. I muſt appeal to all men that have obſerved my actions and behaviour ſince I have had the honour to ſit upon the Bench, whether I uſe to be guilty, in Laws of this kind, to ſtrain the conſtruction of them for the King's intereſt. Firſt, in ſuch Laws wherein the lives of men have been concerned, I confeſs, I have been ſcrupulous even to a fault; for in ſome caſes upon Statutes that had been adjudged felony by wiſer and better Judges than myſelf, and it was highly for the King's ſervice they ſhould be ſo; yet I could never give Judgment of Death, becauſe I could not ſatisfy my own conſcience that thoſe Statutes were now in force. And in other caſes wherein the rights of the ſubjects have been brought in queſtion, how ſtrictly I have kept to that ſubſtantial difference taken by the Houſe of Commons, that though the King in Laws of Government, in penal Laws of a publick nature, has a power to diſpenſe in particular caſes; yet he cannot diſpenſe with Laws which veſt any the leaſt right or property in any of his ſubjects; will appear by the opinion I gave in the caſe of Magdalen College, (for the truth of which, I appeal to all that know any thing of the tranſactions in that caſe) wherein, when the King's right againſt the college was endeavoured to be aſſerted by a diſpenſation granted by himſelf, I utterly denied that diſpenſation to be of any force at all, becauſe there was a particular right and intereſt veſted in the members of that college, as there is in the members of many other Corporations, of chuſing their own head. So far have I been from giving up all Men's lives, liberties and properties to the King's pleaſure.

I had forgot to take notice of two or three objections more that are uſually made.

Obj. Firſt, here is a diſability, and the King cannot diſpenſe with a diſability. As the Statute againſt buying offices, the King, ſay they, cannot diſpenſe with for that reaſon.

Anſw. There is the ſame diſability in the caſe of Sheriffs, and yet reſolved that the King can diſpenſe in that caſe; and the reaſon in the Statute of buying offices, or ſitting in Parliament without taking the oaths, is becauſe there is a diſability actually incurred, and when any perſon is actually diſabled, he cannot have his diſability taken off but by Act of Parliament. But in the Statute diſpenſed with, in the caſe of Sir E. Hales, there is no diſability actually laid upon any man; but certain things are required to be done, and as a penalty for diſobeying the ſaid Act, and omitting the doing thoſe things required by it, the diſability with the other forfeitures are to be incurr'd after conviction. Now the nature of diſpenſations being, as was ſhewed before, to make the thing lawful to him who has it, which is unlawful to every body elſe; it does plainly prevent the committing any offence by that perſon, and conſequently the incurring any penalty or diſability at all. But in the caſe of buying offices, the perſon is diſabled before the diſpenſation comes; for he is diſabled ipſo facto by contracting or dealing for the office. So the true difference between the caſe of Sheriffs, and the caſe of buying offices, is this, That the King in the one caſe can prevent the incurring a diſability, but cannot purge it in the other after it is incurred. To illuſtrate this by a caſe of the like nature, The King may prevent an attainder, but he cannot purge an attainder. If a man has committed Treaſon or Felony, the King by granting his pardon may infallibly prevent the Offender's ever being attainted; but after he is once actually attainted, the King can by no means take off that attainder, or purge the corruption of blood, but by Act of Parliament; provided the Judgment by which he is attainted be not erroneous.

the

Obj. But it is objected, that theſe Laws were made for the intereſt of Religion, and all offences againſt Religion are mala in ſe, and therefore not to be diſpenſed with.

Anſw. I anſwer, that true it is, all offences that are directly againſt Religion, as it is conſtituted ſuch by the divine Law, are mala in ſe, and not to be diſpenſed with, and in this caſe the Parliament is bound as well as the King; for an Act of Parliament made againſt Religion in that ſenſe is utterly void, as is inſtanced in Doctor and Student, of an Act, That ſhould forbid the giving of Alms upon any occaſion, &c. But human and politick Conſtitutions, though made for the intereſt of Religion, as they had a beginning, ſo they are alterable by the ſame power that made them; and therefore the breaches of them are in their nature mala prohibita, as was reſolved in the great caſe of diſpenſations, in 11 H. 7. above cited, and inſtances given; as the King may diſpenſe with a Prieſt holding of two Benefices, though the Laws againſt pluralities were made for the intereſt of Religion, and the better edification of the people. So the King may diſpenſe with a Baſtard's entering into Prieſt's orders, &c. Theſe inſtances are taken for Law in that Year-Book.

But to all this I know it is ſaid, that theſe high truſts and prerogatives might be always ſafe, and ſometimes uſeful in a Proteſtant Prince's hands, who would faithfully diſcharge the duty of one that ought to be cuſtos utriuſque tabulæ; but when theſe prerogatives are aſſerted to a Prince who is of a contrary religion to that eſtabliſhed by Law, there would be always danger of their being abuſed to the prejudice or deſtruction of the eſtabliſhed Religion.

To which I anſwer, that it cannot be forgotten, that the promoters of the Bill of Excluſion uſed the ſame argument: If you leave him King, ſay they, he will have all the prerogatives of a King, and thoſe prerogatives may be made inſtrumental to the ruin of your religion; which could not be denied by the gentlemen on the other ſide, who oppoſed that Bill. Their only reply was, Fiat Juſtitia, ruat cælum, it is his right, and we muſt not do evil that good may come; we muſt not do wrong, no not to promote the intereſt of religion itſelf. The ſame argument that weigh'd with them to aſſert the right of ſucceſſion to the Crown of England, and conſequently to all the prerogatives together, was the Rule we had to guide us in giving Judgment in this caſe concerning a particular branch of them. We muſt not break our oath, nor give Judgment contrary to what ſeem'd to us to be Law, let the conſequence be what it will.

But it has been farther objected to me, by ſome of my friends, that, though I could not in conſcience have given Judgment againſt the King, being of the opinion that I was, yet I ſhould rather have parted with my place, than to have given a Judgment even according to Law, which might be ſo prejudicial to that excellent religion that I profeſs; and of which when I ceaſe to be, let me ceaſe to be at all.

I anſwer, that neither in prudence nor in conſcience I could have taken that courſe.

Firſt, Not in prudence; for I confeſs, that ſaying, Omnia dat, qui Juſta negat; had great weight with me in the caſe: and that I was of opinion, ſince an incroachment of Juriſdiction was fear'd, there could not be a greater, nor more dangerous provocation to it, than for proteſtant Judges to refuſe to give Judgment for a prince of a different perſuaſion, in that which we could not deny to be his right.

And next, in conſcience I could not decline giving Judgment in this caſe; for by our oaths we are as much obliged to give Judgment one way or other, as we are to give what we think a righteous Judgment in all caſes that come before us.

It has been objected, that all this was a contrivance, an informer ſet up, and all but a feign'd action.

As to this matter, I can truly ſay that I don't remember that I ever heard of this Action, till after it was actually brought; but in this there ſeems to be no hurt or inconvenience at all. The Law is as well tryed and ſettled in a feign'd Action, as in a true. There are feigned Actions directed every day out of Chancery to this very purpoſe, that great and difficult points of Law may be ſettled by them; and why the King might not direct ſuch an Action to be brought to ſatisfy himſelf whether he had ſuch a power, and if he had, that the people might be ſatisfied, and acquieſce in it; I confeſs I ſee no difference at all. If there were indirect means uſed for procuring opinions, or the like, I have nothing to ſay to it. I ſtand upon my innocence, and challenge all the world to lay any thing of that kind to my charge. My part was only to give my own opinion, in which, if either by miſunderſtanding the books that I have cited, or by drawing weak concluſions from them, I have erred in the Judgment that I gave; how can I for this be charged as a Criminal? The Law neither ſuppoſes, nor requires an infallibility in any of his Majeſty's Courts of Juſtice; it were very uneaſy ſitting in them, if it did. We can but judge according to the books that lie before us, and according to the meaſure of our underſtanding of theſe books:

we have not always ſo much light to guide us, as we thought we had in this caſe. We often meet with caſes new and rare, and very ill ſettled by former Judgments, where we are forced to dig truth as it were out of the mine, to compare and diſtinguiſh, to ſkreen and ſift, and gather the ſenſe of the Law out of the confuſion of diſagreeing, and very often contradictory opinions, as well as we can: and if after all our labour and our pains, we happen to be miſtaken, it was never yet imputed as a crime. The Judgment is reverſed in a writ of error, not only without any accuſation, but without the leaſt reflection upon him that gave it. Nor can a miſtake in Judgment be more criminal in a matter of a greater concernment, than it is in matters of the leaſt conſequence: It would be very miſchievous and very dangerous, if it ſhould. For if in queſtions of Prerogative, any miſtake ſhall be made capital on the one hand, when Judgment is given for the King; why ſucceeding Princes may not be as angry at any miſtakes on the other hand, I cannot imagine. And when once affairs are come to that paſs, there will be great encouragement for any man, that can make the leaſt ſhift to live without it, to undertake thoſe very neceſſary, but very difficult, and very troubleſome employments; great freedom for men to give Judgment according to their opinion and their conſcience; and great reliance upon the reſolutions of thoſe, who know they ſhall be ſure to pay with their lives and fortunes for any miſtake of theirs, either to the King or the People, as either of them ſhall happen to get the upper hand. For my own part, I thank God, I can ſay theſe two things: Firſt, that for theſe ten years together, wherein (with very little intermiſſion) I have ſate as a Judge in ſeveral Courts, though I may be juſtly accuſed of many weakneſſes and miſtakes, yet I have never given Judgment in any one Caſe againſt the clear dictates of my reaſon and my conſcience. And the ſecond thing is, that I never gave Judgment in any controverted Point, wherein I had ſo many, and ſo great authorities to warrant it, as I have to warrant that Judgment which was given in Sir Edward Hales's Caſe. And this I ſay, not to ſet up that opinion again in a Pamphlet, which was ſo ill reliſhed in a Court of Juſtice, nor to oppoſe my Senſe to the Judgment of the Nation; for I think it is very fit that this dark Learning (as my Lord Vaughan calls it) of Diſpenſations, ſhould receive ſome light from a determination in Parliament; that Judges for the time to come, may judge by more certain Rules, which Acts of Parliament the King may, and which he may not diſpenſe with. But I have cited thoſe authorities at this time in my own defence, and for theſe particular purpoſes; in the firſt place, to ſhew,

1. That we are not the firſt inventors of this diſpenſing Power, but that it has been allowed without controverſy, to the Kings of England in all ages, that they might diſpenſe with many Acts of Parliament.

2. That if our Judgment was erroneous, and that the King could not diſpenſe with that Act of Parliament; yet that error was but an error in that ſingle Caſe, and had no ſuch large and miſchievous conſequences as is pretended. For that, becauſe we judged that the King could diſpenſe with that Statute, for others to conclude from thence, that therefore he had a Power to diſpenſe with all other Statutes; eſpecially ſuch as confer, or veſt in any of the ſubjects any manner of intereſt whatſoever, in their lives, liberties, or eſtates; or that, becauſe the King may diſpenſe with a penal law, wherein a diſability is annexed to the breach of it as a penalty, and that penalty not to be incurred before a legal conviction, and where the King's diſpenſation makes the thing diſpenſed with lawful, and conſequently prevents any conviction or penalty at all: For others to conclude from thence, that therefore the King may diſpenſe with ſuch Statutes, where a precedent diſability is actually laid upon any man, as there is upon the members of both houſes, till they have taken the oaths and teſts preſcribed; and therefore without queſtion, is not in the King's power to diſpenſe: I ſay, theſe are conſequences which may flow from the heated imaginations of angry men, but have no warrant or foundation at all from the Judgment given by us.

I have one thing more to ſay in my juſtification, which is, that if I have been guilty of ſo heinous offences as I am accuſed of, where is the temptation or the reward? If it was to keep in my Judge's place, which otherwiſe I might have loſt, I can only anſwer, That if that were the caſe, I then became the worſt man in the world, only to keep that, which it is pretty well known, I was with much difficulty, by the perſuaſion of my friends, prevailed with to accept: and for any other reward, whoever is acquainted with the circumſtances of my fortune, will, I am confident, notwithſtanding the falſe and idle reports, of I know not what great reverſions lately fallen to me, as eaſily acquit me of having been corrupted by the King, to give a pernicious Judgment in this Caſe, as of having enriched my ſelf by taking bribes in caſes between party and party.

All that I have to add more, is, that howſoever this that I have ſaid in my defence, may happen to be underſtood at preſent, yet I could not deny my ſelf the ſatisfaction of having put in a Plea of Innocence at leaſt; that whatſoever ſhall happen to me now, may perhaps meet with a more equal Judgment in after-times; ſince it ought to be much leſs uneaſy to me to loſe my life, if any body be very fond of taking it, than to let the aſperſions that are every day caſt upon me, to paſs in ſilence; or ſuffer my ſelf to be tranſmitted to poſterity under the character of a betrayer of my Religion, or a ſubverter of the laws and liberties of my Country.

Sir Robert Atkins, at the End of his Enquiry into the Power of diſpenſing with Penal Statutes, makes the following ſhort Argument upon the Pleadings of the aforementioned Caſe of Sir Edward Hales.

THE firſt Point argued by the Plaintiff's Counſel, was, That it appears by the Declaration, and it is now confeſſed by the Defendant's joining demurrer, that the Defendant had been indicted for this offence, in exerciſing the Office of a Colonel without having taken the Teſts.

And upon the Indictment he either did plead this Diſpenſation, or might have pleaded it. And he is now convict, according to the direction of the Act of 25 Car. 2. ſo that he now comes too late to plead it to this Action: For he cannot falſify the conviction, nor aver any thing againſt the Record of it, and bring the Fact to be tried over again in this Action; but is concluded and eſtopped in Law to ſay any thing to the contrary of that Record, by which he is found guilty of the offence againſt this Act of Parliament.

The Defendant either did plead this Diſpenſation or Pardon to the Indictment, in diſcharge of the Indictment, and it hath been over-ruled by the Judges at the Aſſizes, (as by Law it ought to be, being no good Plea:) Or he might have pleaded it, if he had been adviſed it had been a good Plea. And not having done it, he had elaps'd his time, and now comes too late to plead it, being convict of the crime.

To this it was objected, (as I hear) that the Plaintiff, if he will take the advantage of an Eſtoppel, ought to have ſet it forth by way of replication to the Defendant's Plea, and to have relied upon it.

For the Rule is, That he that pleads an Eſtoppel, muſt rely upon it as an Eſtoppel.

It is true, if a man will plead an Eſtoppel, he muſt rely upon it.

But in this Caſe the Plaintiff does not plead the Eſtoppel, but the Eſtoppel appears by the Declaration, and the Defendant's own Plea together: ſo that there was need for the Plaintiff to ſet that forth by way of replication, which doth ſufficiently appear by the Defendant's own Plea, viz. That he did not take the teſts within the time limited by the Act, and the conviction is confeſſed by his Plea, and joining in demurrer.

If a man recover a debt upon a bond, and before execution dies, if his executor ſue a Scire Facias upon that Judgment, the Defendant cannot plead any Plea that he might have pleaded before, as non eſt factum, or by Dureſs, or the like: for he is concluded by the Judgment.

In Jaſon and Kete's Caſe, in Syderfin's Rep. fol. 43. by Bridgeman, Chief-Juſtice, a man ſhall never help himſelf by Audita Querela (tho' that is an equitable ſuit at Law) for any matter that he might have pleaded before.

There is no eſtoppel in this Caſe, for the conviction is upon an Indictment, which is the King's ſuit: and this is the ſuit of another, viz. the now Plaintiffs, and ſo they are two diſtinct ſuits.

The conviction upon the Indictment is an eſtoppel againſt the Defendant himſelf, of which any man may take the advantage, and he himſelf ſhall never be admitted to aver againſt it: As in Maynye's Caſe, in Leonard's firſt part, fol. 3.

An attainder for treaſon is an univerſal Eſtoppel; of which any ſtranger may take the advantage, not only againſt the Party attainted, but againſt his wife too, if ſhe ſue for dower. And it does not run in privity: By Manw. Ch. Bar.

Where a man is attainted by his own confeſſion of a felony, a ſtranger is not eſtopped to ſay he was not guilty*: But if A. commit felony, and after enfeoff J. S. of his land; and after A. is attaint of this felony by verdict, there J. S. is eſtopped, and may not aver that A. was not guilty, becauſe he claims under him: much leſs ſhall A. himſelf aver againſt the verdict, that he is not guilty†.

If a man be acquitted of felony, all the World, ſays Grevil, in Keilwey Rep. 81. b. is eſtopped to ſay the contrary ‡. So vice verſâ, if he be convict, by the ſame reaſon ‖.

As to that which is objected, that the conviction is upon an Indictment (which is the King's ſuit) but this is another ſuit, and therefore the verdict ſhall not conclude the Defendant in this ſuit:

This is not another ſuit, but in effect an execution upon the conviction, and grounded upon that Record, and therefore not merely a new ſuit, but a dependant action; as a Writ of error, or an Audita Querela, or a Scire Facias upon a Record, are dependant ſuits, or an action of debt upon a Judgment.

The Act of 25 Car. 2. c. 2. hath made it criminal in any perſon, after his neglect of taking the two Oaths, or of the Sacrament, by the times limited, to execute any ſuch office or place of truſt; and for ſuch offence hath made him indictable at the aſſizes: and upon a conviction the offender incurs (among other penalties) the forfeiture of 500 l. and gives it to any one that will ſue for it in an action of debt.

So the Statute hath directed the method of trying the offence, and of convicting the offender, by Indictment at the Aſſizes.

And if he that ſues for the forfeiture ſhall be driven to prove the offence over again, then the conviction at the aſſizes ſerves for nothing, but was all in vain. And ſuch conſtruction defeats the intention of the Law-makers; for they intended this for the only trial, and not to have ſeveral trials: For ſuppoſe it ſhould be tried again in this action, and a verdict paſs for the Defendant, here ſhall be trial againſt trial, and verdict againſt verdict: and ſuch conſtruction ought to be made of Acts of Parliament, as may not elude, but agree with the intent of the law-makers; and ſo as that no words, clauſe or ſentence, ſhall be altogether idle and inſignificant.

And this conviction upon the Indictment is the very ground of the action of debt brought by the now Plaintiff; for the words of the Act are, And being thereupon lawfully convicted upon any Indictment, every ſuch perſon ſhall from thenceforth forfeit 500 l.

So that till there be ſuch a conviction, there is no forfeiture incurred of 500 l. nor no action can be brought for the 500 l. The offence muſt be proved and determined before any action can be brought; and therefore the proof of the offence, whereof the Defendant is convict, muſt not be made in this action over again: if it muſt, what ſerves the conviction for?

Suppoſe the Plaintiff here had brought this action, after the neglect of the Defendant of taking the Oaths, and of receiving the Sacrament, and his acting in his office after ſuch neglects, and before any conviction upon Indictment, and had only averr'd, that the Defendant had ſo neglected, and yet acted; would this action have been well brought? Or, ſuppoſe there had been a conviction, but the Plaintiff had not ſet it forth in his declaration, but had only averr'd the offence committed, would this have been a good declaration? Surely it would not. This proves, that the Record of the conviction is the very ground and foundation of this action, and the action would not lie without ſuch conviction; ſo that it is not a meer new action, but a dependant action.

And the uſual difference is where the action is a dependant action, depending upon a Record, and grounded upon it; and where it is a collateral ſuit, not depending upon that Record.

An

An action againſt the Sheriff for an eſcape of one taken in execution; this is a dependant action, and is grounded upon the Record of the Judgment given againſt the party that eſcaped. The Sheriff cannot aver any thing againſt that Record, and examine it over again; nor can he take any advantage of error, or erroneous proceeding, in obtaining that Judgment. Saunders's Rep. 2 part. 101*.

So in an action of debt grounded upon a Judgment, or in an Audita querela, to be relieved upon a Judgment.

And ſo in our Caſe, this action of debt for the 500 l. is grounded upon the conviction; which muſt ſtand for truth as long as it remains in force not avoided by error or attaint.

A Writ of Error to reverſe a Judgment, is a dependant action: In error, the Plaintiff may not aver any thing againſt the Record. Mullens verſus Weldy. Syderfin's 1*ſt part*, 94. Error was ſued in the King's-Bench to reverſe a Judgment given in the Palace-Court: And the Plaintiff in error, aſſigned for error, that the Duke of Ormond (who is principal Judge of that Court by Patent) was not there. It was agreed by the Court, that it might not be aſſigned for error; for it was contrary to the Record.

But per Cur. in an action of treſpaſs, or falſe impriſonment, which, (ſays that Report) are collateral actions, he may falſify and aſſign that, if he be taken upon ſuch Judgment.

So if a man be indicted and convict of an aſſault and battery, and afterwards the perſon ſo aſſaulted brings his action for the battery, this hath no dependance upon the Indictment or Conviction; for it may be ſued, though there were no Indictment, but is a diſtinct and collateral ſuit. The Indictment and Verdict is no eſtoppel, nor can ſo much as be given in evidence: as is held by the whole Court, in the Caſe of Sampſon verſus Yardley, and Tothill, 19 Car. 2. B. R. Keble's 2 part, 384. The like in an appeal of murder, Keble's 2 part, 223.

Another penalty upon the offender againſt this Statute of 25 Car. 2. is, that he ſhall be diſabled to ſue in any action. Now ſuppoſe a perſon convict at the Aſſizes, ſues an action, may not the Defendant in that action take the advantage of that diſability, and plead the conviction? As in caſe of an Outlawry pleaded in diſability; there need not be ſet forth all the proceedings in that ſuit wherein the Plaintiff was outlawed, but he may plead the Record of the Outlawry, and rely upon it; and it ſhall not be examined whether there was any juſt cauſe to ſue him to the Outlawry, or not.

The Indictment, the Defendant's Plea to it, and the Verdict upon it, have determined the matter of fact, that the Defendant is guilty of the offence againſt this Act of Parliament.

The Act it ſelf hath pronounced the Judgment, which conſiſts of many particulars; one whereof is, that the Defendant ſhall forfeit 500 l. to him that will ſue for it; and the action of debt for the 500 l. brought by the Plaintiff, grounded upon all theſe, is in the nature of an execution.

And all theſe put together, are not ſeveral and diſtinct ſuits, but in effect all but one ſuit and proceſs, one depending upon the other.

The ſecond Point is, Whether the Diſpenſation pleaded by the Defendant, be a good barr to the action of debt? And this is properly called, The great Point of the Caſe:

For which the Reader is referred to Sir Robert Atkins's Large Pamphlet, of, The Enquiry into the Power of diſpenſing with Penal Statutes.

Then Sir Robert adds a Poſtſcript: Being ſome Animadverſions upon a Book writ by Sir Edward Herbert, Lord Chief-Juſtice of the Common-Pleas, entituled, A Short Account of the Authorities in Law, upon which Judgment was given in Sir Edward Hales's Caſe.

[After a ſhort Apology for making ſome Animadverſions upon the ſaid Book, he proceeds thus:]

THE Chief Juſtice Herbert, ante pag. 617. gives us the definition of a Diſpenſation out of Sir Edward Coke's 11*th Rep. fol.* 88. viz. Diſpenſatio mali prohibiti eſt de jure Domino Regi conceſſa, propter impoſſibilitatem prævidendi de omnibus particularibus.

And again, Diſpenſatio eſt mali prohibiti provida relaxatio utilitate ceu neceſſitate penſata.

Upon the word Conceſſa, I would gladly be ſatisfied, when, or by whom that Power was ever granted to the King; where ſhall we find that Grant?

It is clear, that whoever hath the entire power of making a Law, may juſtly diſpenſe with that Law. And therefore Almighty God, being the ſole and ſupreme Law-giver, might diſpenſe even with the moral Law: as he did with the ſixth Commandment, when he commanded Abraham to ſacrifice his ſon Iſaac; and with the eighth Commandment, when he commanded the Iſraelites to borrow the jewels of the Egyptians, and to go away without reſtoring of them.

But it ſtands not with reaſon, that he who hath but a ſhare with others in making of a Law, (as the King hath no more) ſhould have the power by himſelf alone to diſpenſe with the law, unleſs that power were expreſly intruſted with him by the reſt of the law-makers; as ſometimes hath been done.

Sir Edward Coke, in his 7*th Rep.* in the caſe of penal Statutes, fol. 36. towards the lower end, does affirm, that this diſpenſing Power is committed to the King, by all his ſubjects. So that it is not claimed Jure Divino, but by Grant from the People. But where to find any ſuch Grant we know not.

I have, as I conceive, made it appear in my larger argument, p. 14. that the firſt invention of Diſpenſations with laws, began by the Pope, about the time of Innocent III. and by our King Henry III. in imitation, and by encouragement from the Pope; ſo that it was not by the Grant of the People, but ever exclaimed againſt by all good men, and generally by all the People; and ever fenced againſt by a multitude of Acts of Parliament.

It is true, the diſpenſing with laws hath ever ſince been practiſed; and they began at firſt here in England to be uſed only in Caſes where the King alone was concerned, in Statutes made for his own profit, wherein he might have done what he pleaſed. But it is but of latter times that they have been ſtretched to Caſes that concern the whole Realm. See my Argument, fol. 13. Hence it evidently appears, it cannot be a legal prerogative in the King; for that muſt ever be by preſcription, and reſtrained to thoſe caſes that have been uſed time immemorial, and muſt not be extended to new caſes.

* Jaques verſus Cæſar. And Dr. Drury's Caſe, 8 R. 142. And Mackelly's Caſe, 9 R. 68.

Now there hath been no ſuch uſage as will warrant the diſpenſing with ſuch an Act of Parliament as is now before us, that of 25 *Car.*2. c. 2.

The Chief-Juſtice Herbert, from the definition before recited, and thoſe two authorities of Sir Edward Coke, in his caſe of monopolies, and that other of penal Statutes, frames an argument to prove, that the Diſpenſation granted to Sir Edward Hales, was good in Law.

Becauſe a Diſpenſation is properly and only in caſe of a Malum Prohibitum; he thence infers, that the King can diſpenſe in all caſes of mala prohibita.

Which is a wrong inference, and that which Logicians call, Fallacia à dicto ſecundum quid ad dictum ſimpliciter. Becauſe he can diſpenſe with ſome, that therefore he can diſpenſe with all, is no good conſequence.

It appears by the late Chief-Juſtice Vaughan's Reports, in the Caſe of Thomas and Sorrel, (ſo often cited by the Chief-Juſtice Herbert) Vaughan's Rep. fol. 333. the fourth Paragraph, that his opinion is, That the King cannot diſpenſe with every Malum Prohibitum; and he gives many Inſtances of ſuch Mala Prohibita, that are not diſpenſable, fol. 342, and 334. parag. 4.

Therefore the Lord Chief-Juſtice Herbert ſhould, as I conceive, regularly firſt have given us the diſtinction of Mala Prohibita, into ſuch as are diſpenſable, and ſuch as are not diſpenſable; and then have ſhewn, that the Diſpenſation granted to Sir Edward Hales, fell under the firſt part: But that learned Reporter, the Chief-Juſtice Vaughan, (ſo often cited by our now Lord Chief-Juſtice) in the aforeſaid caſe of Thomas and Sorrel, fol. 332. the laſt Paragraph ſave one, quarrels with the very diſtinction of Malum Prohibitum, and Malum in ſe, and ſays it is confounding.

From whence I would obſerve, and from the whole Report in Thomas and Sorrell's caſe, that the notion of diſpenſation is as yet but crude and undigeſted, and not fully ſhaped and formed by the Judges.

The Pope was the Inventor of it, our Kings have borrowed it from them; and the Judges from time to time have nurſed and dreſſed it up, and given it countenance. And it is ſtill upon the growth and encroaching, till it hath almoſt ſubverted all Law, and made the regal power abſolute, if not diſſolute.

I muſt agree, that our Books of late have run much upon a diſtinction, viz. Where the breach of a penal Statute is to the particular damage of any perſon, for which ſuch perſon may have his action againſt the breaker of that law; there, tho' it be but Malum Prohibitum, yet the King cannot diſpenſe with that penal Law, according to the rule in Bracton:

Rex non poteſt gratiam facere cum injuriâ & damno alterius.

As for inſtance, there are ſeveral Statutes that prohibit one man from maintaining another's ſuit, though in a juſt cauſe. See Poulton de pace Regis & Regni, in his chap. of maintenance, fol. 55.

Now it is held, that the King cannot diſpenſe with thoſe laws, becauſe it would be to the prejudice and damage of that particular perſon, againſt whom the ſuit is ſo maintained by another; for there can be no maintenance, but it is to the wrong of a particular perſon.

So of carrying a diſtreſs out of the Hundred.

But there are many other penal laws, where, by the tranſgreſſing of them, no ſubject can have any particular damage, and therefore no particular action for the breach of them.

As upon the Statute that prohibits the tranſportation of wool, under a penalty. By the breach of this law, that is, by the exportation of wool, no one particular man hath any damage, more than every other man hath, but it is only againſt the publick good.

And the breach of ſuch a penal law is puniſhable only at the King's ſuit, by indictment or preſentment.

And the like where ſuch a penal Statute gives an action popular, to him that will ſue for the penalty, who hath no right to it more than another, till his ſuit be commenced.

In theſe caſes, it is commonly held, that the King may diſpenſe with ſuch penal Statutes, as to ſome particular perſons, and for ſome limited time, (whereof they make the King the ſole Judge;) becauſe, as the reaſon is given in the Chief-Juſtice Vaughan's Reports, fol. 344. parag. 2. ſuch offence wrongs none but the King. This is now the common received opinion and diſtinction. And the breach of ſuch kind of penal Statutes, are ſaid to be only the King's damage in his publick capacity, as ſupreme Governor, and wronging none but himſelf. Lord Vaugh. Rep. 342. parag. 3.

But if we will narrowly ſearch into this diſtinction, and weigh the reaſons ſo given, we ſhall find it is without any juſt ground.

The damage done to the particular perſon in the Caſes paſt, in the firſt part of this diſtinction, are meerly his own proper and peculiar damage; and he is intitled to his particular action for it, in his own proper perſonal right; and therefore if he diſcharge and diſpenſe with them, it is no wrong to any other man: he may do what he will with his own.

But the Caſes in the ſecond part of this diſtinction, are where the King hath a right to the ſuit, and the offence and damage are ſaid to be to him only.

But are they ſo (as the former) in his own perſonal right, as his Lands and other Revenues are? or are they to him but as a truſtee for the publick, for which reaſon he is called Creditor Pœnæ? And may he therefore, upon the like reaſon, diſpenſe with them, or diſpoſe of them, as a ſubject may do with his own particular Intereſts?

Again, ſhall a publick damage and injury to the whole Nation, be more diſpenſable by the King, than the loſs of one private man?

——fuit hæc ſapientia quondam
Publica privatis ſecernere——

And therefore in my apprehenſion, the King cannot in ſuch caſes of Diſpenſations, be truly ſaid to wrong none but himſelf; and it is not agreeable to the definition before given, Utilitate Compenſata, for the King wrongs the wholeRealm by it. Whereas if he grants a diſpenſation with a Penal Law of the firſt ſort of this diſtinction, he only wrongs ſome particular perſons.

The caſes and authorities for diſpenſations in our Books that were granted in ancient times, will generally be found to be only where the Penal Statutes were made for the King's own proper intereſt and bene-benefit: as his diſpenſing with the Statute of Mortmain. For in ſuch caſes it was to the King's own loſs only, in caſes where the King might by Law have given away his lands or ſervices. So the King may in his Patent of grant of lands, diſpenſe with the Statutes, 1 Hen. IV. cap. 6. that require there ſhall be mention of the true values of them. And by a non obſtante to thoſe Statutes (which is now generally uſed) the King doth in effect declare, that it is his pleaſure to grant thoſe lands, whatever the value of them be, more or leſs: and the Statute does by expreſs words ſave a liberty to the King in that caſe.

The King is not a truſtee for others in ſuch caſes, nor can theſe diſpenſations be ſaid to be directly to the damage of the publick. And ſuch Penal Laws as meerly concern the King's own revenue or profit, may juſtly be thought to be intended, to be made only to put the King's matters into an ordinary method and courſe, and ſo ſave the King a labour, as the Lord Hobart ſays; and ſo prevent the King's being ſurpriz'd or miſ-inform'd, when Patents are gain'd from him, and not deſign'd to tie the King's hands, or to reſtrain his power: as out of all doubt was done and intended by the Law-makers in our Act of 25 Car. II.

But in all the late caſes and authorities which we meet with in our Books concerning non obſtante's, and diſpenſations, as in the time of King Hen. VII. and ſo downward to this day, we ſhall find them practiſing upon ſuch Penal Statutes as meerly concern the publick good and benefit, and the Laws of ſuch a nature, by the breach of which the whole Nation ſuffers: while ſome particular perſons, it may be, by giving a large fine, or a yearly ſum, obtain the favour to be diſpens'd with and exempt from a Penal Law, while all others continue to be bound by it.

As for example; where a Statute forbids the exportation of Wool, or of Cloth undyed or undreſs'd, under a penalty; ſuch a Law is greatly for the publick good, and it takes care that our own people ſhall have employment and maintenance. Yet this is ſuch a Law, as according to the receiv'd diſtinction, the King may diſpenſe with, there being no particular damage to one man more than to another, by breach of ſuch a Law, although it be a mighty damage to the whole Nation: for by ſuch a diſpenſation, the perſon ſo diſpens'd with to export ſuch white Cloth undyed, will have the ſole trade, which before the making of that Penal Statute was equal and common to all. I wiſh the Houſe of Commons would enquire what vaſt riches have been heretofore gotten by ſuch as have obtain'd the diſpenſations with this Penal Statute, beſides the ſums they paid to the Crown for them. Theſe are meer Monopolies.

In ſuch a caſe it may rightly be applied, That Sin taketh occaſion by the Law. It had been better for the Nation, that ſuch Laws were never made, being no better obſerv'd: for here again the diſpenſation is neither Utilitate, nor Neceſſitate penſata.

Look into the caſe of Thomas and Sorrel, and you will find few or no caſes of diſpenſations cited out of our Books, but of the time of King Henry VII. and much more of very late times: ſo that the ill practice is ſtill improving and ſtretching.

The Lord Chief-Juſtice Herbert, in the next place, page 618. proceeds to mention the great caſe of 2 Hen. VII. a reſolution of all the Judges in the Exchequer-Chamber, upon the King's diſpenſing with the Statute of 23 Hen. VI. cap. 8. That no man ſhould be Sheriff above one year. This is the great leading caſe and authority, upon which the main ſtreſs is laid to juſtify the Judgment given in Sir Edward Hales's caſe.

I would avoid repeating what I have already ſo largely ſaid to this authority, to which I muſt refer my Reader, by which I hope it is moſt evidently made out, that the King neither hath, nor never had any juſt right or power to elect Sheriffs: but the right of electing was anciently and originally belonging to the Freeholders of the ſeveral Counties; and ſince it was unjuſtly taken from them (as they have ever been on the loſing hand) it hath been lodged in the great Officers of the Realm, as the Lord-Chancellor, Lord-Treaſurer, Lord Privy-Seal, and the Judges, &c. as appears by the ſeveral Statutes.

And they are to make ſuch choice every year in the Exchequer, on a day appointed by the Statute for that purpoſe. So that the Sheriffs are by thoſe Statutes to continue in their offices for one year only; and the King cannot hinder ſuch election.

Only by his Patent or Commiſſion to the Sheriff, hath he uſed to ſignify to the Sheriff himſelf that is ſo choſen; and to publiſh to all others who the perſon is that is ſo choſen. This is all the uſe of the Patent; but it is the proper election of thoſe great Officers that truly veſts them in their office.

And it does as clearly appear, that when former Kings have diſpens'd with a Sheriff's continuing in his office for longer than one year, contrary to the ſeveral Statutes ſo forbidding it, the King hath ſo done it by virtue (not of his prerogative) but by a ſpecial Act of Parliament enabling him to do it, for ſome extraordinary occaſions, and for ſome limited time only. See for this the Statute of 9 Hen. V. cap. 5. in the Statutes at large, and my larger argument, fol. 34.

The truth is, the power of diſpenſing is originally in the Legiſlators. He only can diſpenſe with a Law, that can make a Law. The power is equal; and the Legiſlators can confer the ſame power upon the King or any others, for ſome convenient time, &c. as appears by the laſt inſtance of the Sheriff, and divers other like caſes, mentioned in my foregoing argument, where I have alſo obſerv'd many other things upon that reſolution of 2 Hen. VII. concerning Sheriffs.

The Chief-Juſtice Herbert ſuppoſes the miſchiefs recited in the preamble of that Statute of 23 H. VI. cap. 8. concerning Sheriffs continuing in their offices longer than one year, to be equal, if not greater (as he judges) than the miſchiefs recited in the Statute of 25 Car. II. by Papiſts being in offices. And from thence, I preſume, would infer, that the caſe of Sir Edward Hales is not ſo fatal in the conſequence, as the caſe of a Sheriff.

I may appeal to any ordinary judgment, and to the ſad experience and trial we have ſo lately had, and to the danger we were ſo lately in (from which Almighty God, by no leſs than a miracle, hath in great mercy deliver'd the Nation) whether the miſchiefs that could any way poſſibly ariſe from the diſpenſing with the former, (I mean the Statute concerning Sheriffs) be comparable to the infinite miſchiefs ariſing from putting Papiſts into office, and intruſting them with our Religion, and all our Civil Rights.

The Chief-Juſtice, upon thoſe words of the Statute concerning Sheriffs, viz. That no non obſtante ſhall make them good, infers pag. 618. that thoſe words do ſhew, that the Parliament which made that Act concerning Sheriffs, was of opinion, that had it not been for that clauſe, the King could otherwiſe have diſpens'd with that Act by a non obſtante.

Anſw. This to me ſeems a ſtrained inference, and that it is very far from ſhewing any ſuch opinion in that Parliament. It rather ſignifies, that had not the Parliament inſerted that clauſe into the Act, the King might have done again as he had frequently practis'd before, viz. granted diſpenſations upon that Statute: which ill practice they endeavoured to prevent for the future, not approving the practice, nor owning the power of doing it. Ex malis moribus bonæ oriuntur leges. A good Law rather condemns a contrary practice before uſed.

I heartily deſire my Reader (as I have done in my foregoing larger argument) carefully to obſerve and examine of what ſort and nature thoſe ſeveral caſes are, which the reſolution of the caſe of 2 H. VII. urges to warrant that reſolution. As thoſe caſes concerning the true value of lands, which the King grants; and that concerning the ſhipping of wool to a certain ſtaple, &c. and let the Reader judge how vaſt a difference there is between thoſe Statutes in the nature, and import, and reaſon of them, and this weighty important Statute now before us; and how little that reſolution of 2 Hen. VII. can be warranted by the caſes there cited, being of ſo inferior and minute a conſideration, in compariſon of the principal caſe.

It is true, Sir Edward Coke (if the twelfth Report which goes by his name, be truly his) hath ſince that reſolution given in 2 Hen. VII. found out new and different reaſons and arguments, which are not urged, and therefore I preſume never ſo much as thought on, at that time by the twelve Judges, who gave the reſolution in that caſe of 2 Hen. VII.

Thus ſays Sir Edward Sandys, in his relation of the Religion uſed in the weſt parts of the World: thoſe of the Roman Religion made their greatneſs, wealth and honour, to be the very rule by which to ſquare out the Canons of their Faith; and then did ſet Clerks on work to deviſe arguments to maintain them.

Sir Edward Coke ſeems to juſtify that reſolution concerning Sheriffs, from this ground, viz. That the King hath a ſovereign power, to command any of his ſubjects to ſerve him for the publick-weal. And this is (ſays he) ſolely and inſeparably annexed to his perſon, and that this royal power cannot be reſtrain'd by any Act of Parliament; 12 Rep. fol. 18.

That it is not ſolely annexed to the King's perſon, appears by the ſeveral Acts of Parliament, which I have cited to this purpoſe in my larger argument, fol. 34. where the power of diſpenſing with ſome particular Acts, was given to the King by the Parliament, and by him accepted for ſome ſhort time. And the whole Parliament have in divers caſes themſelves exercis'd this very power.

Judge of the weight of the reaſons ſaid to be given there by Sir Edward Coke, by that one inſtance of his in the caſe he puts of purveyance, 12 Rep. fol. 19. which (he ſays) cannot be taken from the King, no not by Act of Parliament.

Yet we have lived to ſee it lately taken away by Act of Parliament; which in the judgment of a Parliament (which is of the higheſt authority in Law) may therefore be taken from the King.

And is the King in truth reſtrain'd from commanding his ſubjects to ſerve him for the publick-weal, either by thoſe Statutes that diſable Sheriffs to continue in their offices longer than one year, or by our Statute of 25 Car. II. that diſables Popiſh Recuſants to bear publick offices: becauſe ſome very unfit, uncapable, and dangerous perſons are diſabled to bear offices of truſt and power, (and this by the King's own conſent to the Act, and by the advice of the great Council the Parliament) and indeed of the whole Realm?

Does the King by this (which the Judges miſcall a reſtraint) want for choice of fit perſons to ſerve in offices? Doth the publick-weal ſuffer by this reſtaint? Is it not rather preſerv'd by it? Hath not the King proteſtant ſubjects enough to bear offices? And are Popiſh Recuſants (who account Proteſtants, Hereticks, and to be rooted out and deſtroy'd, and with whom they hold no faith is to be kept, and againſt whom they have been continually plotting miſchief) are theſe the fitteſt to be intruſted with the defence of the Proteſtant Religion, and with our Lives and Eſtates, which are all concern'd, more or leſs, in every publick office and truſt?

And are thoſe perſons (the Papiſts) that have a dependance upon the See of Rome, and a foreign power, fit to be intruſted with the power of the Nation, with the Militia, and the Sea-Ports?

Is not this to commit the Lamb to the cuſtody of the Wolf?

This Act that diſables Papiſts to bear offices, cannot be juſtly ſaid to be a reſtraint upon the King; that expreſſion ſounds ill, and takes the matter by the wrong handle. It rather imports the King's declaration and reſolution, by advice of his great Council, to employ none in offices and places of truſt, but ſuch as are moſt capable and fit, and will moſt faithfully anſwer the great ends for which they are ſo intruſted, that is, the preſervation of the Proteſtant Religion, which is the true Engliſh Intereſt.

And this agrees with the rules of the Common Law, that if an office be granted to one that is Inidoneus, the Grant is void, though granted by the King himſelf. Of this I have treated more largely, in my argument, fol. 37.

The Lord Chief-Juſtice Herbert, page 619. asks the queſtion, whether ſo many ſolemn reſolutions of all the Judges of England in the Exchequer-Chamber, are not to be rely'd upon for Law? And I anſwer, that if they were ten times as many more, yet they are not to be rely'd on againſt many expreſs poſitive Acts of Parliament directly to the contrary. For what words could the Parliament uſe more emphatical and expreſs, and more to the purpoſe, than by ſaying, that a non obſtante, or a diſpenſation, or a Grant of ſuch a thing, (prohibited by that Law) ſhall be abſolutely void, and ipſo facto adjudged void, and the perſon made uncapable to take? And is not a Judgment in Parliament, and by Act of Parliament, of the higheſt authority?

But (ſays the Chief-Juſtice, fol. 619.) the conſtant practice hath been to diſpenſe with the Statute of Sheriffs. I anſwer, it hath alſo been a very frequent practice too for the King, to make ſuch perſons Sheriffs, as were none of the number nominated or choſen, as aforeſaid, by the Chancellor, Treaſurer, Judges, and other great Officers; and it paſſes for current that he may ſo do, though it be a vulgar error: for it hath been reſolv'd by all the twelve twelve Judges, to be an error in the King. See Sir Edward Coke's 2 Inſtit. or Magna Charta, fol. 559. and yet it is practis'd to this very day.

The Chief-Juſtice, page 619. ſeems to excuſe Popiſh Recuſants, for not qualifying themſelves for offices, by taking the oaths and the teſt, &c. for that no man (ſays he) hath it in his power to change his opinion in Religion as he pleaſeth, and therefore it is not their fault. It is an error of the mind, &c.

Anſw. Here is no occaſion taken to find fault with them for their opinion; let them keep their Religion ſtill, if they like it ſo well, who hinders them? This Act of 25 Car. II. impoſes no penalty upon them for their opinion. But is there any neceſſity of their being in offices? Muſt they needs be guardians of the Proteſtant Religion? The Penalty upon them by this Act, is not for their opinion, but for their preſuming to undertake offices and truſts, for which they are by King and Parliament adjudg'd and declar'd unfit.

Page 620. The Chief-Juſtice Vaughan is brought in, arguing for the King's power of diſpenſing with (Nominal) nuſances, (as he is pleas'd to call and diſtinguiſh nuſances.) The word (Nominal,) as there underſtood, imports, that though a Parliament declares any thing to be a nuſance, (as ſometimes they do in Acts of Parliament, to render them indiſpenſable) which yet in its proper nature would not otherwiſe be ſo conceiv'd to be; that ſuch a nominal nuſance (as he holds) may however be diſpens'd with by the King, though regularly by Law the King may not diſpenſe with any nuſance.

Anſw. Shall any ſingle or particular perſon, though a Chief-Juſtice, preſume to call that a meer nominal nuſance, which a Parliament by a ſolemn Act and Law have adjudg'd and declar'd to be a real nuſance? Are we not all concluded by what a Law ſays? This arrogance is the miſchief now complain'd of.

The Chief-Juſtice Herbert, page 620. ſays, that from the abuſe of a thing, an argument cannot be drawn againſt the thing itſelf. I agree this is regularly true; yet we have an inſtance to the contrary in the Scripture, in that point of the Brazen Serpent. But in our caſe the abuſe doth ariſe from the very nature of the thing itſelf, from the conſtitution of it.

For the King practiſes no more in diſpenſing, than what theſe reſolutions of the Judges allow him to do by this pretended prerogative. The error is in the foundation.

They have made his power to be unlimited, either as to number of perſons, or as to the time how long the diſpenſation ſhall continue. Sir Edward Coke ſays, and ſo the other Books, That the King is the ſole Judge of theſe.

Nec metas Rerum, nec Tempora ponunt.

The Chief-Juſtice Herbert, fol. 620. cites two clear conceſſions (as he is pleas'd to call them) of all the Commons of England in Parliament, which he eſteems much greater authorities, than the ſeveral reſolutions of all the twelve Judges.

But how far theſe are from conceſſions, will eaſily appear to an indifferent Reader. They are no more than prudent and patient avoiding of diſputes with the ſeveral Kings. And there are multitudes of the like in the old Parliament-Rolls.

It is but an humble clearing of themſelves from any purpoſe in general, to abridge the King of any of his prerogatives, (which have always been touchy and tender things;) but it is no clear nor direct allowance of that diſpenſing there mention'd, to be any ſuch prerogative in him.

However, I am glad to ſee an Houſe of Common, to be in ſo great requeſt with the Judges. It will be ſo at ſome times, more than at others.

Yet I do not remember, that in any argument I have hitherto met with a vote, or order, or opinion of the Houſe of Commons hath been cited for an authority in Law, before now. Will the Houſe of Peers allow of this authority for Law?

It will be ſaid, that this is but the acknowledgment of parties concern'd in Intereſt; which is allowed for a good teſtimony and ſtrongeſt againſt themſelves.

Anſw. I do not like to have the King and his people to have divided intereſts. Prerogative and the peoples liberties, ſhould not be look'd upon as oppoſites. The prerogative is given by Law to the King, the better to enable him to protect and preſerve the ſubjects rights. Therefore, it truly concerns the people to maintain prerogative.

I could cite ſeveral Parliament-Records wherein the poor Houſe of Commons have been forced to ſubmit themſelves, and humbly beg pardon of the King, for doing no more than their duty, meerly to avert his diſpleaſure. See the caſe of Sir Thomas Haxey, whom the King adjudg'd a Traitor, for exhibiting a Bill to the Commons for the avoiding of the outragious expences of the King's houſe, 20 R. II. num. 14, 15, 16, 17, and 23. and the Commons were driven to diſcover his name to the King, and the whole Houſe in a mournful manner craving pardon for their entertaining of that Bill.

No doubt, as good an authority againſt the Commons for ſo ſaucily meddling in a matter ſo ſacred, and ſo far above them. Yet afterwards, 1 Hen. IV. num. 91. that Judgment againſt Sir Thomas Haxey was revers'd.

As for the diſtinction, page 622. of a diſability actually incurr'd before the meddling in an office, and where the diſability is prevented by the coming of a diſpenſation; I anſwer, that its beingſo prevented, is but Petitio Principii, and a begging of the queſtion. And to this diſtinction I have (I think) fully ſpoken in my larger argument, fol. 40.

The late Parliament, in making this Act of 25 Car. II. had, no doubt, a proſpect that probably the Crown would deſcend upon a Popiſh Succeſſor; and they levelled this Act againſt the dangers that might then befall our Religion and Liberties, and they thought it a good ſecurity: but it is all vaniſhed and come to nothing, by occaſion of this Judgment in the caſe of Sir Edward Hales. And that muſt be juſtified by a Fiat Juſtitia.

As to the objection that the Chief-Juſtice fancies might have been made againſt him, or advice given him that he ſhould rather have parted with his place, than to have given a Judgment ſo prejudicial to the Religion he profeſſes, pag. 622.

This, I ſay, that for my part I ſhould never have advis'd him to have parted with his place, much leſs to have given a Judgment againſt his own opinion. But let his opinion be what it was, yet ſeeing the clear intention of the makers of the Law, contrary to that his opinion, and knowing the deſperate effects and conſequences that would follow upon diſpenſing with that Act, (for we were upon the brink of deſtruction by it) and taking no-notice (as this Chief-Juſtice and the reſt of the Judges needs muſt) that the King had firſt endeavour'd to have gain'd a diſpenſing power in this matter from both Houſes (which was the fair and legal courſe) and that yet that very Parliament which out of too great a compliance with thoſe times, had over-look'd ſo many grievances, and conniv'd at the King's taking and collecting of the Cuſtoms, (tho' in truth the Collectors, and all that had any hand in the receiving of them, incurr'd a Præmunire by it) not to mention the ill artifice uſed in gaining the Exciſe; yet that Parliament of the King's, boggled at the diſpenſing with the Act of 25 Car. II. knowing the mighty importance of it.

And though they could not but take notice that ſo many Judges at once had been remov'd, becauſe they could not ſwallow this Bitter Pill, and others brought into their places, as might be juſtly ſuſpected to ſerve a turn, and the King's learned Counſel could not at firſt find out this prerogative to do his work with, till ſo many ways had been attempted, and all prov'd ineffectual; ſure in ſuch circumſtances it had been prudence, nay the duty of the Judges, to have referr'd the determination of it to a Parliament; and the rather, becauſe it was to expound a Law newly made, and the conſequences ſo dreadful, and the intent of the Law-makers ſo evident.

And this hath been frequently practis'd by Judges, in caſes of far leſs difficulty and concernment. This I have alſo enlarged upon in my large argument, pag. 26.

Object. But it might have been a long time before any Parliament had been called.

Anſw. We ought to have Parliaments once a year, and oftner if need be; and eadem præſumitur eſſe mens Regis, quæ Legis; and we then ſtood in great need of a Parliament even for the ſake of this very caſe.

And theſe haſty Judgments are one ill cauſe why Parliaments meet no oftner; the work of Parliaments is taken out of their hands by the Judges. And it is the intereſt of ſome great Officers, that Parliaments ſhould not be called, or elſe be haſtily prorogu'd or adjourn'd.

As to the point of the feigned action, which the Lord Chief-Juſtice ſeems to juſtify, I conceive he miſtakes the force of the objection. Feigned actions may be uſeful; but this action againſt Sir Edward Hales, is ſuſpected not only to have been feigned and brought by Covin between him and his ſervant and friend, but it was feignedly and faintly proſecuted, and not heartily and ſtoutly defended.

This ſolemn reſolution was given upon a few ſhort arguments at the Bar, and without any at the Bench, and upon other reaſons (as I have heard) which were then made uſe of, are now given by the Chief-Juſtice; but the times will not bear them.

After all, I intend not by this to do the office of an accuſer, nor to charge it as a crime. But as I think myſelf bound in duty, on the behalf of the whole Nation, of myſelf, (though a ſmall part and member of it) and of my friends, I humbly propoſe, that the Judgment given in Sir Edward Hales's caſe, may, after a due examination, (if there be found cauſe) be legally revers'd by the Houſe of Lords, and that reverſal approv'd of and confirm'd by a ſpecial Act of Parliament.

But as that Judgment of the Lord Chief-Juſtice's was of the utmoſt conſequence, and his Vindication far from ſatisfying the People; Mr. Atwood, a very conſiderable man in his profeſſion, at that time, undertook the anſwering the Chief-Juſtice: Therefore to ſet the whole matter in a true light, and to obſerve an exact impartiality, Mr. Atwood's Examination of the Chief-Juſtice's Account, is here inſerted, as follows.

The Lord Chief-Juſtice Herbert's Account examin'd, by William Atwood Eſq; Barriſter at Law; wherein is ſhewn, That thoſe authorities in Law, whereby he would excuſe his Judgment in Sir Edward Hales's caſe, are very unfairly cited, and as ill applied.

WERE it not the reproach of our times, to have had men advanc'd to Courts of Judicature, for other merits, beſides Integrity and Learning in the Laws of their country; it might ſeem a great piece of vanity in me, to anſwer a Book ſtamp'd with the name and authority of a Chief-Juſtice.

Yet, perhaps, I might be thought not without cauſe to take this as my more immediate Province; having been the firſt of the profeſſion, who ventur'd in publick companies to ſhew, how wofully that innocent Book-caſe 2 Hen. VII. in relation to Sheriffs, has been miſtook, or wreſted to ſerve for colour to that haſty Judgment in Sir Edward Hales's feigned caſe.

Wherefore, how needful ſoever the Chief-Juſtice may find it, to make proteſtations of his ſincerity *vid. Account p.*616. this may ſuperſede any ſuch from me. Nor would I willingly call his a proteſtation contrary to apparent fact (eſpecially conſidering that weakneſs of Judgment manifeſted by this defence) did he not give too great occaſion for it. 1. From the large ſteps which he took to precipitate, and, as I am well aſſured, to ſollicite that reſolution. 2. The manner in which he delivered it, widely differing from what he now prints. 3. The unfairneſs of his preſent quotations. And, 4. The unhappineſs, not to ſay worſe, of thoſe inſtances which he is pleaſed to give of his ſincerity.

I ſhall not diſpute, or repeat his Lordſhip's ſtate of the caſe: but the queſtion upon it being, whether the King may by his prerogative diſpenſe with the Statute, 25 Car. II. cap. 2. requiring all perſons in any office under the King to take the teſt againſt Popery, I ſhall enquire,

1. Whether thoſe Books, which he relies on as authorities for his Judgment, give any colour to it.

2. Whether, admit they did, they would countenance the reſolution as he delivered it.

3. Whether thoſe Inſtances which he offers of his ſincerity, may reaſonably be taken for ſuch.

4. Whether he in any meaſure clears himſelf from the imputation of being highly criminal.

His Lordſhip, like a maſter-diſputant, begins, as he thinks, with a definition of a diſpenſation, which he ſays, Account, p. 617. is given by the Lord Coke *: Diſpenſatio mali prohibiti eſt de jure Domino Regi conceſſa, propter impoſſibilitatem prævidendi de omnibus; & diſpenſatio eſt mali prohibiti provida relaxatio, utilitate, ſeu neceſſitate penſatâ.

Where, I muſt ſay, he very unlearnedly clogs the definition of a diſpenſing power, with the perſon ſon in whom 'tis ſuppoſed to be lodged : nay, and the reaſontoo why it ſhould be ſo, which neither the Lord Coke, nor common ſenſe, gives him any warrant to bring into the definition. However, it ſeems, according to this, a diſpenſing Power, in ſome caſe or other, is veſted in the King ; which yet is far from proving any thing to his purpoſe : for either the King may in all caſes diſpenſe as to particular perſons, and then his diſtinction of malum prohibitum, *v. p.*617. and malum in ſe, falls to the ground ; or elſe it reaches only to thoſe caſes, in which the judgment or flattery of Judges have aſcribed it to him.

He adds out of the Lord Coke,(*p.*617.)11*Rep.f.*88. as an enlargement upon what he calls the definition, Inaſmuch as an Act of Parliament, which generally prohibits any thing upon a penalty that is popular, or only given to the King, may be inconvenient to divers particular perſons, in reſpect of perſon, time, or place ; for this purpoſe the Law gives a Power to the King to diſpenſe with particular perſons. Where the Lord Coke manifeſtly reſtrains the penalty, to ſuch as is given the King as Head of the People, upon which account only he calls it popular : nor, indeed, can be thought to take in what is granted to any ſubject that will inform ; it being mentioned without diſtinction, whether before or after an Information commenced.

And that the Lord Coke's words here,7*Rep. f.*36. ought not to be ſtrained farther, is yet more evident, from the caſe of penal Statutes, on which Sir Edward Herbert's miſ-repreſentations will occaſion my more particular remarks.

As Sir Edward, conſidering what intereſt he has ſerv'd, may be preſum'd ſomething converſant with Prieſts and Jeſuits, he might, among others of leſs uſe, have conſulted the learned Suarez *, who after the definition, which he makes to be Legis humanæ relaxatio, in a diſtinct Chapter ſhews, with whom the ordinary power of diſpenſing (which he diſtinguiſhes from that which is delegated) is lodged, where he ſays, ib. c. 14. f. 395. Certum eſt eum habere ordinariam poteſtatem diſpenſandi, qui legem tulit : And he gives the reaſon, Quia ab ejus voluntate & potentiâ pendet. So that none can have this power, but he, or they who are veſted with the legiſlative, excluſive of others, or ſuch as have it delegated from thence. That the King has not the legiſlative excluſive of others, is what I have formerly proved at large † ; and it lies on the other ſide to ſhew, that the diſpenſing power has been delegated to him. Yet thus much may be ſaid on the contrary.

Firſt, That the King could not in law be preſumed to have exerciſed ſuch a power by himſelf ; for that the ancient law provided, that he ſhould have a Council choſe in Parliament, who (as the Charter affirm'd to be declaratory of the ancient law, and ſworn at the coronation of Hen. 3. has it ‡) were ſworn quod negotia Domini Regis & Regni fideliter tractabunt, & ſine acceptatione perſonarum omnibus juſtitiam exhibebunt : and that it was accounted the Law long after that, appears by the impeachment of Roger Mortimer, 4 E. 3. part of which was, that Whereas it was ordained in the Parliament next after the King's Coronation, that four Biſhops, four Earls, and four Barons, ſhould ſtand by the King, Pur luy Counſeiller ; without whoſe aſſent Nul gros Buſoign ne ſe Feuſt : nevertheleſs Mortimer would undertake to manage all by himſelf, accroaching royal Power ‖: And it is eaſily to be ſhewn, that ſuch a Counſel was in uſe, or continually inſiſted on, as the right of the Kingdom, from the time of the Charter, confirm'd 28 Hen. 3. till the end of the Reign of Hen. 6.

2. A Power to grant non obſtante's to Statutes, could not have been a right in the Crown at common law ; for we have clear proofs of its odious and condemned beginning from the ſulphureous fountain of Rome, as an honeſt popiſh lawyer confeſs'd with a deep ſigh. 35 Hen. 3. This non obſtante Matthew Paris calls, a deteſtable addition againſt all Reaſon and Juſtice : And when, the year after, King Henry urged the example of the Pope for non obſtante's, the Prior of Jeruſalem ſays, God forbid you ſhould uſe this unpleaſant and abſurd word ; as long as you obſerve Juſtice you may be King, and as ſoon as you violate it, you will ceaſe to be King ; which ſhews how little foundation in law it then was thought to have ; and what the whole Nation thought of the Pope's uſe of it, may be ſeen at large in Matthew Paris, and Mr. Prynne's Animadverſions on the 4*th Inſtitute* §.

Farther, the reaſons given why the King ought to have this power, fail here upon many accounts.

1. In that the intereſt of the whole, of which the Legiſlators are the beſt Judges, when they make the law without exception, ought to outweigh all private inconveniences.

2. The Law has provided a more certain and equal remedy ; having taken as ſufficient care for the meeting of Parliaments, once a year at leaſt, and I may ſay,  ſitting too, as it has for the ſitting of the common Courts of Juſtice ; as appears from the ſeveral Statutes in print, and others in the Rolls, which avoid the common cavil upon the words, oftner if need be.

And theſe were, like the famous triennial Act, proviſions for the greater certainty of meeting ſo often at leaſt, but no receſſions from the old law ; which, as appears both by the Mirrour, and the life of King Alfred ††, was for the great Council to meet twice a-year at London.

3. The great reaſon aſſigned in the Latin quotation from the Lord Coke, propter impoſſibilitatem prævidendi de omnibus particularibus, which is after diſtinguiſhed, as to perſon, time, and place, can by no means be applied to the caſe in queſtion : For, 1. The law was made but very few years before their Lordſhips Reſolution, and not grown more inconvenient by length of time, to any par-particular perſon, than it was at the making of the Act. 2. The law-makers had in their immediate proſpect every particular perſon of the Romiſh communion; and the time when, and place where the danger would happen, if any ſuch were commiſſioned.

Let us now ſee what help he can have from his ſecond quotation from the Lord Coke, which is 7 Rep. fol. 73. But he intends, I ſuppoſe, fol. 37. and would have it believed, that it was the opinion of all the Judges in England, 2 Jac. 1. that the King may diſpenſe with any particular perſon, that he ſhall not incur the penalty of the Statute, tho' it be an Act made pro bono publico; and that this is a truſt and confidence inſeparably annexed to the royal perſon of the King, Account, *p.*617. In which, 1. He again overthrows his diſtinction of malum in ſe, and prohibitum, making that power at large, in relation to any Statute pro bono publico. 2. He manifeſtly perverts the Lord Coke's ſenſe, whoſe words are, 7 *Rep. fol.*36. When a Statute is made pro bono publico, and the King, as Head of the Commonwealth, and the fountain of Juſtice and Mercy, is by all the Realm truſted with it; this is a truſt and confidence inſeparably adjoined and annexed to his royal perſon, in ſo high a point of Sovereignty, that he cannot transfer it to the diſpoſition or power of any private perſon, or to any private uſe; for this was committed to the King by all his ſubjects, for the publick good, &c. But true it is, that the King can upon any cauſe moving him, in reſpect of time, place, or perſon, &c. make a non obſtante to diſpenſe with any particular perſon, that he ſhall not incur the penalty of the Statute.

Where the ſole queſtion was, of transferring over a penalty granted to the King, as entruſted by all the Realm to ſee the Statute put in execution, by inflicting the penalty. This truſt is adjudged inſeparable, and not to be transferred over; but that however the King may diſpenſe with the penalty granted to himſelf: upon which, I muſt ſay, our Chief-Juſtice has made a very foul ſtretch; for what is this to the informer's part, concerning which the queſtion before him was? But ſurely there is a mighty difference between theſe two propoſitions: "Where the ſubjects have entruſted the King with "a Statute made for the publick good, this truſt "is inſeparable, and cannot be transferred to ano-"ther: but the Statute ſo entruſted, may be diſ-"penſed with;" which is all that is to be gathered from my Lord Coke: And this, "Tho' an Act "be made for the publick good, yet the King "may diſpenſe with it, and this is a truſt and con-"fidence inſeparably annexed to the royal perſon "of the King"; which is Sir Edward Herbert's perverſe Comment. In ſhort, Lord Coke ſays, Where the King is entruſted with the execution of a Statute made for the publick good, he may diſpenſe with that Statute. Sir Edward Herbert ſays, He may diſpenſe with any Statute made for the publick good. Upon which 'tis to be obſerved, that the queſtion in the Lord Coke, was not of diſpenſing, but granting over the penalty; which penalty, he ſays, is not to be transferred over: the other would make it of diſpenſing, and that that power is inſeparable, and not to be transferred; ſo apparently changes the ſtate of the queſtion.

His next ſtep is to the Year-book of H. 7. f. 11, & 12. in which he leaves us to ſeek the year, which is 11. This he calls the firſt, and great caſe which he cites, wherein the King's diſpenſing power is deſcribed and limited.

"There is a diverſity, ſays the Book (Account, "*p.*617.) between malum prohibitum, and malum in "ſe; as a Statute forbids any man to coin money, "and if he does, he ſhall be hanged; this is malum "prohibitum: For before the Statute, coining mo-"ney was lawful, but now it is not ſo, and there-"fore the King can diſpenſe with it. So if a man "ſhip wool in any place but Calais, it is malum "prohibitum, becauſe it is prohibited by Act of "Parliament. But that which is malum in ſe, the "King, nor no other perſon can diſpenſe with: as "if the King would give a man power to kill ano-"ther; or licenſe one to make a nuſance in the "high-way, this were void; and yet the King "can pardon theſe things when they are done." Upon this caſe 'tis obſervable, that the power of diſpenſing is here aſſerted in relation to things, and not perſons: wherefore according to this, taken in Sir Edward Herbert's latitude, the King may grant diſpenſations to all in general, where the matter is only malum prohibitum: Whereas he himſelf owns, that the nature of a diſpenſation is particular, and given to particular perſons by name. 2. Many things in Magna Charta, nay the moſt, are but mala prohibita; and ſo Magna Charta it ſelf may be diſpenſed with: when he himſelf owns, that the King cannot diſpenſe with one tittle of Magna Charta: And methinks he could not but obſerve this contradiction. Wherefore the rule there, admit it were a Judgment in law, as it was not, being only ſpoken obiter, by one of the Judges *, can be applied only to ſuch caſes as are there cited. The firſt is that of coining money, which goes upon the ground in Moor's Reports †, where 'tis ſaid, that ſuch Statutes as give a Prerogative may be diſpenſed with: And that of ſhipping wool at Calais, the King's Staple, is of the ſame nature; and both ſufficiently ſhew the diſtinction of malum prohibitum from malum in ſe, to relate barely to ſuch things as become evil by accident, as they are againſt an accidental prerogative: which no way interferes with the rights of the ſubjects in general, or particular.

And I much wonder that Sir Edward Herbert ſhould cite my Lord Vaughan, in the caſe of Thomas and Sorrel, as confirming what he would infer from the Year-book, when Lord Vaughan ſays, fol. 332. That old Rule has more confounded men's Judgments on the ſubject, than rectified them; and fol. 333. himſelf denies that the King can diſpenſe with every malum prohibitum by Statute, tho' prohibited by Statute only.

Oh, but my Lord Vaughan ſhews, that a Diſpenſation does jus dare; and makes the thing prohibited to all others, lawful to be done by him that has it. Does he ſay this of every malum prohibitum? By no means: Wherefore we muſt apply it to the caſe then in queſtion, which concerned wine-licences; about which the King had a Prerogative by ſtatute law: and the diſpenſing with that, falls within the rule in Moor ‡, agreeing with the Lord Coke, in the caſe of penal Statutes ‖. Yet even thus much was a point gained by the Prerogative, ſince the 1*ſt* of H. 7. for it is then made a doubt before all the the Judges of England, in the Exchequer-Chamber, and adjourned over for the difficulty*, Whether the King could licenſe the ſhipping wools elſewhere than at Calais; one of the very inſtances which Sir Edward Herbert relies on: And Chief-Juſtice Huſſey was poſitive, that the King could not licenſe it; tho' indeed the Chief Baron, and ſome others, held as Fineux did afterwards. Wherefore no body of leſs aſſurance than our Chief-Juſtice can ſay, from theſe Caſes reſults this plain ſyllogiſm:

Whatever is not prohibited by the Law of God, but was lawful before any Act of Parliament made to forbid it, the King by his diſpenſation may make lawful again, to that perſon who has ſuch diſpenſation, tho' it continues unlawful to any body elſe, &c. Acc. p. 617. In which if we grant his major, I will own, the concluſion to bring it to Sir Edward Hales's caſe, is not criminal. Yet the propoſition is ſo pernicious, ſtriking at the very foundations of our Government, that if there were a reſolution, inſtead of an extrajudicial opinion, giving that countenance which even that looſe opinion does not; yet it ought to be rejected: For if all Acts of Parliament contrary to Magna Charta are void, as ſome have held, I am ſure much more ſo would ſuch Reſolutions of Judges be. And that ſuch an one would be contrary to that Great Charter, is evident: for no man can ſay, that all things prohibited by Magna Charta, are prohibited by the law of God.

To come to Sir Edward's next great caſe, as he calls it, Acc. p. 618. but indeed the only one which has coloured the reſolution to the world; which is that 2 H. 7. Notwithſtanding his promiſe, he p. 617. has not been ſo fair to give the words of that caſe, or ſo much of them as is material, leſt every body might judge of how little uſe it would be to him; nay, leſt men ſhould be for ſatisfying their own eyes, he has not directed to the folio.

The Engliſh of the material part is thus†: "In "the Exchequer-Chamber all the Juſtices were "ſhewn for the King, how King Edward the "fourth, by his Letters Patent, had conſtituted "the Earl of N—— Sheriff of the ſame County; "and had granted the ſaid Earl the office of She-"riff of the ſaid County for the term of his life, "with all the other offices tended, thereto belong-"ing; rendring to the King at his Exchequer, an-"nually, 100 l. without any account, or any o-"ther thing to be given for it, &c.

"Now, 1. Whether this Patent was good? And "alſo, 2. How this Patent ſhall be intended? "were the points in queſtion. And as to the firſt "point, the Juſtices held the Patent good; for it "is a thing which may well be granted for term of "life or inheritance: as divers Counties have a "Sheriff by inheritance; and this commenced by "a Grant of the King. Then was ſhewn a Re-"ſumption: and then was ſhewn a Proviſo for H. "Earl of N. ſo that the Patent remains in its force. "Radcliff ſhews the Statute of 28 E. 3. c. 7. and "24 E. 3. c. 5. That no Sheriff ſhall be more than "one year, &c. altho' he had a non obſtante. And "notwithſtanding this, that the King ſhall always "have his Prerogative, as of the value and certain-"ty of the land, and other things granted by the "King, and of wools ſhipped, and of Charters of "murder, and many other caſes where the Sta-"tutes are, That Patents that want theſe things "ſhall be void; yet the Patents are good with a "non obſtante: But without a non obſtante the Pa-"tents are void, by reaſon of the Statutes. So here "the Patent, with a non obſtante, &c."

This is all that is ſaid in the Book upon the firſt point, upon which 'tis obſervable,

1. By the Book it would ſeem, that this Radcliff was but a Serjeant at Law; for at the end of the caſe, Brian Juſtice demands of Brian Radcliff, &c. Yet indeed I find upon ſearch, that he was a Baron of the Exchequer.

2. What Radcliff ſays, is after the reſolution of the Judges is over, and no way influenced that.

3. Whereas Sir Edward Herbert ſays, the reſolution was upon 23 H. 6. c. 1. Radcliff, who ſhould better know the ſubject of debate, diſcourſes only concerning the Statutes, 28 E. 3. c. 7. ‡ and 12 E. 3. c. 5. which are barely prohibitory, without any mention of non obſtantes, or any avoiding or diſabling clauſe. Indeed Radcliff, it being upon a ſudden diſcourſe, as the Book ſhews, miſtakes the Statutes, as if they had ſuch clauſes: and Brook‖, who cites part of the Patent, which it ſeems he had ſeen, ſays, there was in it a non obſtante to the Statutes 28 E. 3. c. 7. and 12 E. 3. c. 9.

Fitzherbert  indeed ſays, R. objected the 23 H. 6. but for that ſit liber judex.

4. But above all, tho' our Chief-Juſtice calls them the Judge's enemies, Acc. p. 618. who ſay, the point of non obſtante is not reſolved in this caſe, which he calls confidence; and that they may as well deny one of the ten Commandments: 'Tis manifeſt beyond contradiction, that the reſolution ended at iſſint que le Patent demurr en ſa force: after which comes Radcliff's diſcourſe, and the reſolution went upon two grounds.

1. That this was a thing grantable for inheritance, or for life; which if it were, it could not be preſumed to be touched by the prohibitory Statutes: And beſides, if the queſtion had been upon the other, the caſe had been an exception out of the Statute; for the ‡‡ Statute excepts ſuch Counties in which divers of the King's Liege People be inheritable to the office of Sheriff at the making of the Statute; and alſo ſuch perſons who have Eſtate of freehold in the office of Sheriff, at the making of the Letters Patent made to them of the office of Sheriff, &c. Now whether this were really a County ſo inheritable, or of an Eſtate of freehold, at the time, or no, is not ſo very material; being at leaſt it was ſo look'd upon by the Judges, nay, and by the Parliament too, as will appear by their ſecond ground.

But that this County was ſuch an one, I take to be alſo true in fact: For it is to be conſidered, that this was the County of Northumberland †‡; which was a Palatinate; upon which reaſon this, with other Counties under it, was left out of the Survey in Doomſday-Book, as being penſitationibus liberi: This Palatinate comprized Cumberland and Weſtmorland, among other Counties; in the laſt of which, the Sheriffwick is at this day enjoyed in fee: Indeed Northumberland came ſoon into the Crown, as early as the time of William the Second, upon the rebellion of Mowbray, conſtituted Earl thereof in the time of William the First: But the authority in law is much clearer, that this Sheriffwick, if ever held in fee, would remain in the Crown as an inheritance in groſs, and was not merged, than any Sir Edward Herbert has produced on his ſide: for which we may obſerve the rule taken in the Caſe of the Abbot of Strata Mercella, 9 Rep. f. 25. b. which is this: "When a Liberty, Franchiſe, or Juriſdiction was at the beginning erected and created by "the King, and there was no ſuch Flower in the "Crown before; there by the acceſſion of them "again to the Crown, they are not extinct."

Where inſtances are given of the caſes of Markets, Hundreds, and Earldoms; nor can any one ſay, that Sheriffwicks are ancient Flowers of the Crown: But more directly to our caſe, is that between Sir Robert Atkins and Robert Holford *, which, tho' not in our Books, is well known. The Caſe was of the Grant of the Seven Hundreds of Cirenceſter, with the returns of Writs to the Abbot and Convent of Cirenceſter: This came to the Crown by the diſſolution of Monaſteries, 31 H. 8. but yet that it was not merged thereby, but remained as an inheritance in groſs, without the help of any Statute, was the opinion of the Great Hales, then Chief-Baron, and of two other Barons, Windham and Turner. Part of Hales's words, as I find them excellently well reported, and full to this point, are:

"Such Hundreds as were anciently ſever'd from "the Counties, and come again to the Crown by "eſcheat or forfeiture, were ſometimes, but rarely committed to the Sheriff, and rejoined to the "County, but for the moſt part kept as diſtinct: "Ret. Brevium, and the Hundred to which it was "annexed, without an actual and ſpecial re-annexion "to the County, remains in the King in groſs; "for the Ret. Brevium is a thing created de novo. "Suppoſe it were a Court or Juriſdiction meerly "created by the King, and the Hundred it ſelf, "tho' ancient, yet by return to the Crown it is not "merged or annexed: This I know in the caſe of "the Courts belonging to the Honours of Gloceſter "and Hereford, that came to H. 5. by marriage of "a co-heir, it is ſtill in eſſe."

This were enough to ſhew, that the Judges reſolution 2 H. 7. had a better legal foundation than what Sir Edward Herbert would ſuggeſt.

2. But then, beſides that, there was another ground mentioned in the Book, which was, That a reſumption was ſhewn before the Judges; and then was ſhewn a Proviſo for H. Earl of N. and ſo (ſays the Book) the Patent remains in its force. This reſumption was an Act of Reſumption 1 H. 7. and if this Act provided for that Earl's Grant, as the Judges it ſeems thought it did, who can doubt but the Grant was good? The Act of Reſumption is to be ſeen upon Record, Rot. Parl. 1 H. 7. part 2. It is a reſumption of Grants made by Edward the Fourth; and among others, of the Yefts, that is, Gifts of Offices: The Proviſo runs thus;

"Provided always, that this Act of Reſump-"tion, or any other Act made or to be made in "this preſent Parliament, be not in any wiſe pre-"judicial or hurtful to the ſeveral Grants and Let-"ters Patents made to Henry Earl of Northumber-"land, &c." Which indeed does not make good any void Grant, but ſuppoſes all the Grants to him to be good in Law; nor would the Judges diſpute their ſuppoſal.

I admit with him, Acc. p. 618. that Fitzherbert ſays, and that truly, that the Patent was adjudged good; but the reaſon he gives agrees with what I have ſhewn: his words are, for ſuch a thing may begrantable for Inheritance, or for Life. And then I am ſure that the Statute does not ſay expreſly, the Patent ſhall be void, tho' Sir Edward affirms that it does. Vid. Acc. p. 618.

Obj. It may be objected, that the exception in the Statute relates to eſtates in the ſubject; but if this were an intereſt in groſs in the King, that it could not be taken from him without expreſs words, cannot be denied me.

What he cites from Plowden, Acc. p. 618. can be of no more ſervice; for he only ſays, there it is held, and I agree it is held by Radcliff, Acc. p. 618. with a miſtake of the Statute, That the King can grant a Sheriffwick for more than a year: Yet whereas he magnifies this as cited by Plowden, who, as he ſuppoſes, well underſtood the ſenſe of the Year-book:

1. It does not † appear that it was Plowden, but one who was of Counſel in the caſe for the Defendant, who mentions this.

2. He mentions it only as a Caſe in Fitzherbert, Plowden, f. 502. without referring to the Book, 2 H. 7.

But the ſecond point raiſed before the Judges, 2 H. 7. which occaſioned the main debate in that caſe, as appears by the Book, ſhews, that the reſolution could not be upon the point of Prerogative; for they queſtioned whether the King could diſpenſe with his own profit: And all the Judges, except Brian and Catesby, held, that the Patentee ſhall account for the green wax, and other things, notwithſtanding the clauſe of abſque reddendo computum: But the debate concerning other things ariſing upon that ſecond point, was adjourned; the firſt reſolved upon the grounds above.

Tho' hitherto there is no proof, that any one of authority in the Law has taken the Book 2 H. 7. in Sir Edward Herbert's ſenſe, which yet would be of no moment if they were expreſs, being the Book is to be ſeen, and clearly otherwiſe; yet he thinks my Lord Coke will bear him out, and to this purpoſe he cites two places: one, where he ſuppoſes that the Lord Coke not only authorizes this ſenſe of the caſe, but aſſerts the prerogative, Acc. p. 618. in much higher terms than they would preſume to do: and by the ſecond he would have it believed, that if the Lord Coke be a faithful Reporter, all the Judges of England took that caſe in the ſame ſenſe.

The firſt is the caſe of cuſtoms, 24 Eliz. which is pregnant with many objections againſt its being of any force in this caſe.

1. The Book, 12 Rep. f. 17. is of ſuſpected authority, being printed in the late times, and what the Lord Coke never owned, or thought fit to print in his life-time.

2. This comes foiſted in among caſes in the time of King James, without any parallel caſe which might occaſion the placing of it there.

3. It was when the Lord Coke was but a young Reporter, it being ten years before he was King's Sollicitor. ‡

4. It is not only no point in queſtion relating to the caſe where 'tis cited, and ſo extrajudicial, but wholly foreign to it: For the queſtion was, Whether goods ſold before they were landed, were to pay pay cuſtom within the Statute 1 Eliz. c. 11. Wherefore being barely a memorandum of a young Reporter, no way occaſioned by what went before, it cannot poſſibly have any weight.

5. The fancy'd reaſon here given why the King may diſpenſe with the Statute of Sheriffs, is none at all; for whereas it ſays, 12 Rep. f. 18. That the King has a ſovereign Power to command any of his Subjects to ſerve him for the publick weal, and this ſolely and inſeparably annexed to his perſon; and this royal power cannot be reſtrained by any Act of Parliament: There is no authority cited for this, but the caſe 2 H. 7. which, as appears to any body that reads it, neither has that reaſon been mentioned ſo much as by any one Judge, nor in the leaſt goes upon the point of the prerogative. Beſides, if the King can command any ſubject to ſerve him for the publick weal, either he is to be Judge, or the Laws: If the latter, then no perſon not qualified by law is obliged to act; nor tho' qualified, to do any thing forbid by the laws: If the former, as the words imply, then the King's commands may be pleaded to juſtify any ill miniſter who has rendred himſelf obnoxious to the laws. But that this cannot be, is ſufficiently evinced by neceſſary examples in all ages. And this, by the way, may ſhew how falſe, as well as pernicious, that doctrine is which tells us, that ἐξουσία in the New Teſtament, always ſignifies the authority of a Perſon, not of a Law. Or, as another has it to the ſame purpoſe, By higher Powers, it is evident, we are to underſtand the perſons of ſovereign Princes, or Governors, not the Laws and Conſtitutions, as our Republican Doctors pretend.

Of the ſame batch is another memorable poſition, That the King's moſt illegal Acts, tho' they have not the authority of the Law, (for indeed, to ſay they have, would be a blunder with a witneſs) yet they have the authority of ſovereign Power. Some will ſay, that this is qualified by what follows, Which is irreſiſtible and unaccountable: as if the King had this power only ſo far as it is irreſiſtible and unaccountable. Whereas it is evident, the propoſition is entire before, being the medium whereby he would prove, that the King's illegal Acts are not inauthoritative; in proof of which medium, he afterwards affirms, that the ſovereign Power which made the laws, and can repeal and diſpenſe with them, is inſeparable from the perſon of the Prince.

Reduc'd to a Syllogiſm, it runs thus; The authority of Sovereign Power is irreſiſtible and unaccountable; but the King's moſt illegal acts have the authority of Sovereign Power. This is an entire propoſition, upon which he concludes, Ergo, the King's moſt illegal acts are irreſiſtible and unaccountable. This aſſumption he goes to prove from the ſuppoſition, that ſuch a Sovereign Power as he deſcribes, is inſeparable from the perſon of the Prince; upon which, or the like Doctrine, another raiſes this comfortable uſe: In all Sovereign Governments, (and ſuch he at large endeavours to ſhew England to be) Subjects muſt be Slaves as to this particular; they muſt truſt their lives and liberties with their Sovereign.

But for the honour of our Gown, this may be ſaid, That ſuch hereticks never appeared among lawyers, 'till Divines began thus to wreſt the laws and ſcriptures to their own damnation. But as the former quotation out of the Lord Coke can do Sir Edward Herbert no ſervice, upon the reaſons above ſhewn; much leſs can the other, which is one of Sir Edward's uſual perverſions: He tells us, Acc. ante p. 619. That it is reſolved by all the Judges, (if my Lord Coke be a faithful Reporter) that it is agreed 2 H. 7. that the King may, againſt the expreſs proviſion of the Act 23 H. 6. diſpenſe with that Act; for that the Act could not bar the King of the ſervice of his ſubjects, which the law of nature did give unto him. He adds, This is reported (unleſs my Lord Coke had a mind to deceive the ſucceeding Judges, and draw them in to give pernicious opinions) as the ſenſe of all the Judges of England, in King James's time, in the Exchequer-Chamber. Whereas the Lord Coke, on purpoſe to prevent ſuch an abuſe of his words, ſays in the beginning of the Caſe, 7 Rep. f. 4. "I ſhall give no juſt offence to any, if I challenge "that which of right is due to every Reporter; "that is, to reduce the ſum and effect of all to "ſuch a method, as upon conſideration had of all "the arguments, he himſelf thinketh to be fitteſt "and cleareſt for the right underſtanding of the "true reaſons and cauſes of the Judgment, and "reſolution of the caſe in queſtion."

Upon which it is evident, that if any one of the Judges mentioned this, the Lord Coke is a faithful Reporter; but had he been ſilent as to this matter, no man could ſuppoſe, that ſuch a tedious argument as that in Calvin's caſe was the reſolution in which the Judges concurred in every expreſſion.

But Sir Edward Herbert's own eyes might, and ought to have ſatisfied him, that the Judges 2 H. 7. gave no determination upon the 23 H. 6. nor does the Book ſay, that ſo much as any one perſon ſpoke to that Statute, or mentioned the reaſon deviſed in Calvin's caſe; For that the Act could not bar the King of the ſervice of his Subject, which the Law of Nature did give unto him. Nor could Sir Edward chuſe but know the abſurdity of that ground: for according to that, all ought to be left in the ſtate of nature, as it was before any law made; ſo that not only any perſon might act, tho' prohibited by ſubſequent laws, but he might act any thing forbid by any poſitive law; which would make a mad world. And this would come of a natural allegiance due to the perſon of a King, without reſpect to the laws of his Government *. And the reſolution of the Judges in Calvin's caſe, is quite contrary to this ſuppoſal; for it is there reſolved, That they who were born under King James's allegiance, before he had the Crown of England, were aliens here, notwithſtanding that acceſſion †.

But my Lord Coke is ſo far from giving any real countenance to ſuch a reſolution, as that in Sir Edward Hales's caſe, that he, in concurrence with all the Judges of England, is expreſs to the contrary; for in relation to the Court of Admiralty, he and the reſt of the Judges declare, 4 Inſt. f. 135. "That the Statutes of 13 R. 2. c. 3. 15 R. 2. c. 5. "and 2 H. 4. c. 11. being Statutes declaring the "juriſdiction of the Court of the Admiral, and "wherein all the ſubjects of the Realm have inte-"reſt, cannot be diſpenſed with by any non obſtan-"te." Nay, he gives another reſolution of Judges, tho' not ſo ſolemn as the former; yet what he ſays is warranted in the Books, and the reſolution comes up to our caſe in terminis, 3 Inſt. f. 154. his words are, "When an Act of Parliament is made, that "diſableth any perſon, or maketh any thing void, "or tortious, for the good of the Church or Com-"mon-wealth; in that law all the King's ſubjects have

" have an intereſt, and therefore the King cannot " diſpenſe therewith, no more than with the Com- " mon Law."

All the chimerical foundation of ſolemn reſolutions being thus deſtroy'd, I need not concern myſelf with the vain airy ſuperſtructure, which muſt vaniſh in fumo; and inſtead of the Appeal, What may be relied upon, if ſuch reſolutions may not? Acc. ante p. 619. I appeal to all mankind, whether our ſenſes are not ſufficient Judges againſt theſe accidents, ſubſiſting without any ſubject, meer tranſubſtantiation nonſenſe! Such are reaſons devis'd for a reſolution which never was to be ſeen.

But we are told, That beſides the authority of the caſe, we have conſtant practice that this Statute has been diſpens'd with ever ſince; and if it were not ſo, the conſequences would be dreadful, illegal Convictions, &c. Acc. ante p. 619. But to this I ſay,

1. A facto ad jus non valet argumentum, till there be legal determinations on the ſide of the fact.

2. The fact cannot be ſhewn, for any Sheriff to have enjoy'd the office for more than one year by the ſame Patent.

3. However the conſequences would not neceſſarily follow *; for we know, even Laws made by Kings de facto, have always been look'd on as binding, and ſo have the admittances to Copyhold eſtates, made by diſſeiſors, and others without title. And, tho' I love not to lay any great ſtreſs upon precedents of our own time, yet it may ſerve to Sir Edward; and we well know, that notwithſtanding the late illegal choice of Sheriffs in the City of London, yet no challenges were allow'd, becauſe they were Sheriffs de facto.

That I may not be here unneceſſarily detain'd, with what he ſays to real or fancied objections; I ſhall haſten to his other pretended authorities, and ſhall begin with his laſt, as having the moſt immediate reference to the caſes above-cited, and which he ſeems to be moſt proud of: and that is Serjeant Glanvil's argument, delivered at a conference between the Lords and Commons; wherein he owns, that in ſuch things as are only mala quia prohibita, Acc. ante p. 621. under certain forfeitures and penalties to the King, and the Informer, there the King may diſpenſe. This indeed is more than appears from any caſe that Sir Edward Herbert has cited, as I have ſhewn above; yet is no more than what the Lord Coke ſaith elſewhere †, immediately after he has denied that power in things made void or tortious, for the good of the Church or Commonwealth; in which, he ſays, all the King's ſubjects have an Intereſt, and therefore the King cannot diſpenſe therewith, no more than with the Common Law.

All that is more in Serjeant Glanvil, relates only to the nature of thoſe Laws, which were then inſiſted upon; if he went further, it could no more be an evidence of the opinion of the Houſe of Commons in that point, not being the point put to the queſtion, than his quotation out of Calvin's caſe, is of the opinion of all the Judges. But the firſt part of his ſpeech cannot be ſtretch'd farther than mala prohibita had formerly been taken, that is, in relation to new prerogatives, or at leaſt things wherein the ſubjects in general have no intereſt veſted in them; and he expreſſly reſtrains it to ſuch caſes, wherein his Majeſty by conferring grace and favour upon ſome, doth not do wrong to others; Acc. p. as it is in my Lord Coke above, and in Moor , where 'tis held, that Statutes which give a prerogative, or reſtrain the prerogative, may be diſpens'd with; but not ſuch as give, or diſpoſe of Intereſts. And as to what reſtrains the prerogative, not coming within the mala prohibita, tho' it falls not under conſideration here; yet we may obſerve the difference taken in Lord Hobart ††, where a Statute is made to eaſe the Sovereign of labour, not to deprive him of power. In the firſt caſe the King may diſpenſe, not in the other.

And I think no man can doubt but the Statute, 25 Car. II. cap. 2. which not only requires Officers to take the oaths, and teſt, to diſtinguiſh them from Papiſts, but diſables them that do not take them within three months, veſts an intereſt, not only in ſeveral particular perſons, who may be reverſioners, but in all the ſubjects in general; and is of the nature of thoſe Statutes inſiſted on in the Petition of Right, and preſs'd for by Serjeant Glanvil, Acc. ante p. 621. " Not Laws inflicting penalties in " malis prohibitis; but Laws declarative, or poſitive, " conferring, or confirming ipſo facto an inherent " Right, and intereſt of liberty, and freedom in the " ſubjects of this Realm, as their birthright, and in- " heritances deſcendable to their heirs and poſterity." A freedom, I may add, from Popiſh ſlavery and tyranny; Statutes incorporate into the body of the Common Law, over which, with reverence be it ſpoken, there is no truſt in the King's ſovereign power, or prerogative-royal, to enable him to diſpenſe wih them, or take from his ſubjects that birthright, or inheritance, which they have in their liberties, by virtue of the Common Law, and of theſe Statutes: I may ſay, this Statute.

And ſuch a Statute it is, that no man that wiſhes well to the Proteſtant Intereſt, not only here, but thro' Chriſtendom, would conſent to the abrogating or impairing the force of it; without obtaining ſuch Laws for reſtoring the ancient conſtitution, both for the choice of Sheriffs and Counſellors, among other things, as might more effectually keep out the Booted Apoſtles; than any other means, next to the glorious expedition of his Highneſs the Prince of Orange: whoſe miraculous ſucceſſes are not only the ſubject of preſent admiration, but have been plainly foretold in paſt ages, and will be celebrated in all future.

But to return from this ſhort digreſſion: 'Tis manifeſt that Serjeant Glanvil ſpeaks as well of ſuch Laws as are poſitive, as thoſe that are delarative; ſuch as confer an inherent Right, as that confirm it; and of Statute, as well as Common Law, not to be diſpens'd with: ſo that he is manifeſtly on our ſide, and ſeems not in the leaſt to have exceeded the Lord Coke, where he makes ſo expreſs an exception of our caſe, from that diſpenſing power which he allows. By inherent, the Serjeant can mean no more, conſidering the import of confer, than actually veſted, and inherent, and inſeparable by any leſs power than that from which it was derived. Thus in relation to thoſe prerogatives that have been counted inherent, and inſeparable in relation to penalties, and the like |||, the true meaning can be only, that while they continue, they are not to be ſeparated, and transferred over to another. Yet no thinking man man will doubt the power of a Parliament, in relation even to them; and if they cannot be receded from in particular, at leaſt they may in groſs; when a King does cedere imperio, or abdicare Regnum, which moſt prerogative-caſuiſts † own may be, not only by actual ceſſion from the Government, but by Acts amounting to an Abdication, and ſhewing a fix'd intention no longer to treat his people as ſubjects. Nor perhaps could there be greater evidence of ſuch intention, than the diſpenſing at a lump, not barely by retail to particular perſons, with thoſe Laws which were made by the united wiſdom of the Nation to ſecure it, as much as they thought human means could, or, at leaſt, the Court would yield to, againſt thoſe real dangers, which were in their immediate proſpect. Nor in all probability had this encloſure been laid waſte, if the diſpenſing Judges had not made the firſt gap.

As to Sir Edward's ſuppos'd clear conceſſions of this power from all the Commons of England, 1 H. V. Acc. ante p. 620. they are quite otherwiſe than he repreſents them, nor would be concluſive to his point however.

In the firſt, ſays Sir Edward, "The Commons "pray, that the Statutes for voiding of Aliens out "of the Kingdom, may be kept and executed; "to which the King agrees, ſaving his prerogative, "that he may diſpenſe with whom he pleaſes; "and upon this the Commons anſwered, that their "intent was no other."

But the Record ſays, Sauvant a luy ſa prerogative, "ſaving to him his prerogative." Whatever that was, they declare, they never intended to injure it. Then it goes on with the copulative and, which adds new matter, and is diſhoneſtly left out by Sir Edward, Et qil purra diſpenſer oveſque cex queux luy plerra, "And that he may diſpenſe with whom he "pleaſes:" Which is an additional grant, or licence to that King; but that this ſaving is but a general ſaving of the prerogative, appears by the very next Record, which he cites of the ſame Parliament.

Sir Edward's words are, "In the ſame Parlia"ment, when the Commons pray, That the Sta"tutes of proviſors, Statutes of the ſame nature "with this in our caſe, (for they were made againſt "the Court of Rome's encroaching juriſdiction in "England) I ſay, when they make the like prayer, "that theſe may be put in execution; being ad"moniſhed by the King's anſwer in the former "caſe, they themſelves inſert in their very prayer, "a ſaving for this prerogative of the King's, and "then the King agrees to it." Where he would inſinuate, that this prerogative of diſpenſing with particular perſons, is there ſav'd; when the Record is expreſs to the contrary: the words in Engliſh are,

"Alſo the Commons pray, for the good and "profit of the Realm, that all the Statutes made "againſt proviſors, in the times of the moſt noble "Kings E. III. R. II. H. IV. * your Father, "whom God be merciful to; may ſtand in their "force, and may be held, and executed in all "points; and that no protection, nor other grant, "to any perſon, by our Lord the King, working "to the contrary, in forbearance of the execution "of the ſaid Statutes, be allowable or available to "any perſon whatſoever in this matter. And if "any thing be done to the contrary, let it be "held for null, or void: ſaving all times the pre"rogative of the King."

The King anſwers, "Let the Statutes thereof "made, be held and kept." Which is plainly meant according to their prayer, without the King's impeding the execution of them by any protection, or other grant to any perſon whatſoever; and if ſuch grant be, that it ſhall be void. Is not this as much as to ſay, (Vid. Acc. ante p. 618.) That no non obſtante ſhall make any ſuch Grant good? Oh, but Sir Edward will tell us, That this ſhews that the Parliament thought the King could otherwiſe have diſpens'd with thoſe Acts. By no means; it only argues an abuſe crept in (which Matthew Paris ſhews to have been as early as the time of H. III.) and likely to be allow'd of by the Judges; but the Parliament would prevent even that; and ſurely they would never provide, that a non obſtante, or grant to a particular perſon, ſhall be void, if they thought the King had a prerogative to defeat this when he pleas'd: much leſs, when they expreſly pray againſt ſuch an abuſe, can they be thought to contradict themſelves, and in the ſame breath that they deſire that no perſon whatever may be diſpens'd with, yet leave the King a prerogative to diſpenſe with whom he pleaſes. The abſurdity of which reaſoning, he might have ſeen in that excellent ſpeech of Serjeant Glanvil ‡, which he himſelf receives as the ſenſe of the Commons of England, aſſembled in Parliament.

Wherefore the ſavings in both the Records, Acc. ante p. 621. can be but general ſavings, of ſuch prerogative as the Kings had, whatever it were: which the Kings, as they began to encroach upon the people, or to be jealous of their encroachments, would have inſerted out of abundant caution, before they would yield to ſeveral Acts. And theſe being Acts of Parliament, which could paſs but as the King conſented, the people were forc'd often to gild the pills with ſuch ſavings; but 'twas otherwiſe of judgments in Parliament, to which no conſent of the King was requiſite.

Farther yet, admit the King had a prerogative of diſpenſing with particular perſons, both as to Aliens, and Proviſions; yet there could no general rule be taken from thence, becauſe it would only argue, that the fondneſs for Aliens, and fear of diſpleaſing the Court of Rome, had at firſt occaſioned the reſerving the power of eaſing ſome particular perſons, without which the Kings would paſs no Act againſt them. However it was, the frequent complaints of the Commons ‖, and Acts made againſt both the one and the other, ſhews that thoſe Laws were little regarded or executed, and yet that the King had not a prerogative allow'd him, any more for particular perſons, than for all in general.

Sir Edward has five other trivial inſtances of the diſpenſing power, which however I ſhall not omit. One is the diſpenſing with the Statute 8 R. II. c. 2. Account, † Vid. Grot. de Jure Belli & Pacis. Vid. Falkner's Chriſtian Loyalty, p. 544, 545. ſpeaking of the Pariſian Maſſacre, &c. But if ever any ſuch ſtrange caſe as is propoſed, ſhould really happen in the World, I confeſs it would have its great difficulties. Grotius thinks that in this utmoſt extremity, the uſe of ſuch defence, as a laſt refuge, ultimo neceſſitatis præſidio, is not to be condemned, provided the care of the common good be preſerv'd. And if this be true, it muſt be upon this ground, that ſuch attempts of ruining do ipſo facto include a diſclaiming the governing thoſe perſons as ſubjects, and conſequently of being their Prince or King. Vid. Biſhop Bilſon, of Chriſtian Subjection, Ed. 1586. p. 280. I never denied, that the People might preſerve the foundation, freedom, and form of their Commonwealth, which they forepriz'd when they firſt conſented to have a King.

Acc. p. 619. which requires, that no man ſhould go Judge of Aſſize into his own Country: but for this there is only practice, which has paſs'd ſub ſilentio, and ſo could be of no authority in Law. Beſides, the Statute is barely prohibitory, and does not render the Patents void if otherwiſe; yet I cannot ſay but an information would lie, tho' there were a non obſtante in the caſe.

The ſecond is of diſpenſing with the Statute 10 Ed. III. cap. 3. Acc. ante p. 619. which provides, That whoever has a pardon of felony, ſhall find ſureties of the good behaviour: of which he ſays, as of the other, That it has been conſtantly diſpens'd with ever ſince it was made. But if the practice had been ſo, which he does not prove, it would not avail, unleſs it had come in queſtion judicially, whether the pardon would be valid to one who had not given, or at leaſt tendred ſureties. Indeed there is a caſe in our Books, where the Court did not require ſureties, becauſe of a particular clauſe in the pardon diſpenſing with it: but this was no earlier than 16 Car. I. * the Judges of which time paid ſufficient deference to prerogative; but that caſe ſeems to be not only primæ impreſſionis, and without any reaſon given, but in effect condemn'd by the reporter, as he ſhews that the Court abus'd their diſcretion, if they had any in the matter: 'twas the caſe of Sir Matthew Mints, who appear'd to be guilty of ſeveral miſdemeanors, for which he deſerv'd to be bound to the good behaviour, committed after the time to which he was pardon'd.

The third and fourth inſtances, ſcatter'd from the reſt, are of diſpenſing with pluralities, and baſtards entring in Prieſt's orders; Acc. ante p. 622. which, if poſſible, will be leſs ſerviceable to him: For,

1. Such diſpenſations are never granted by the King †, but by the Archbiſhop; and the King only licenſes, or confirms, the Archbiſhop's diſpenſation in unuſual caſes.

2. That the King's licence or confirmation in caſes unwont, as the Statute has it, is of any force, is owing to the Statute, 25 Hen. VIII. cap. 21.

3. Even in uſual caſes, where the Archbiſhop might diſpenſe, tho' the King's confirmation be added, yet unleſs it come in due time, it will not prevent a lapſe incurr'd upon the Statute 21 Hen. VIII. cap. 13. againſt pluralities; as was adjudg'd in Digby's caſe , tho' the diſpenſation came before induction. And this comes up fully to one of the points in Sir Edward Hales's caſe, which our Chief-Juſtice has not been ſo fair as in the leaſt to mention to be a point in the caſe: nay, quite contrary, he ſuppoſes it to be a caſe, Acc. ante p. 623. where a diſability is annex'd as a penalty, and that penalty is not to be incurr'd before legal conviction, and where the King's diſpenſation makes the thing diſpens'd with lawful, and conſequently prevents any conviction or penalty at all; forgetting, that in the very ſtate of the caſe, he owns there was a conviction before the diſpenſation came. So that here was a diſability actually incurr'd, and that upon Record, as appears in the pleadings; and while that Record remains, there is no falſifying of it, tho' in fact the conviction were before the three months given in the Statute to prevent a diſability ††; and he had no other means, than either to plead no ſuch Record, or to bring his Writ of Error. Wherefore this diſpenſation comes clearly within Digby's caſe, as being too late, ſuppoſing otherwiſe it were valid.

As Sir Edward ſhews that he has read Thomas and Sorrel's caſe, he might have known another reaſon of theſe two caſes, viz. ||| "That the King may "diſpenſe with a baſtard to take Holy Orders, or "with a Clerk to have two benefices with cure, "which were mala prohibita by the Canon Law, "and by the Council of Lateran, not by Act of "Parliament;" which is moſt true. For theſe are mention'd in the Book of Hen. VII. before any Act made againſt pluralities.

There is another inſtance in that wild Annotation, upon the caſe of Cuſtoms in the 12 Rep. where 'tis ſaid, "See (Acc. p. 619.) 4 Hen. IV. cap. 31. "in which 'tis ordain'd, that no Welſhman be Ju-"ſtice, &c. in any part of Wales, notwithſtand-"ing any Patent to the contrary, with clauſe of "non obſtante licet ſit Wallicus: and yet without "queſtion the King may grant with a non obſtante."

Nor do I queſtion it neither, even before 21 Jac. I. cap. 38. when that Statute was repeal'd, provided the Welſhman uſe not Welſh ſpeech; and this by 27 H. VIII. cap. 26.

But as to theſe three laſt inſtances, it might be ſaid further, that if they were ſtronger than they prove, yet they might fall under the difference receiv'd by him from Lord Vaughan, where he ſays, the King may diſpenſe with Laws made pro bono populi complicati, but not with ſuch as were made pro bono ſingulorum populi; in which the Lord Vaughan is not ſo abſurd, as to mean, that tho' the King cannot diſpenſe with a Law in which any man in particular is ſo far intereſted, as to be intitled to an action for himſelf alone, yet he may with thoſe in which all the ſubjects are intereſted. But his meaning, to make him conſiſtent with himſelf, muſt be reſtrain'd to Lord Coke's ſenſe upon the Penal Statutes, which makes this power to be only where the King, as head of the Commonwealth, is truſted by all the Realm ; in which ſenſe, he alone is to look after the intereſt of the populus complicatus under him as head. Thus Lord Vaughan, 1. Expreſly (Acc. p. 620.) qualifies it, when he ſays, "They are "pro bono populi complicati, as the King in his diſ-"cretion ſhall think fit to order them for the good "of the whole." 2. He illuſtrates it by the example of a Pater-familias †††; "Whoſe eſtate, he "tells us, may be ſaid to be pro bono communi of his "family, which yet is but at his diſcretion, and "management of it, and they have no intereſt in "it, but have benefit by it." 3. Both he, and Sir Edward Herbert allow inſtances, where every particular man is not entitled to his action, and yet the Statutes are own'd to be pro bono ſingulorum populi, and not to be diſpens'd with; Account, p. 620. and ſuch are Magna Charta, and thoſe other Laws mentioned by Serjeant Glanvil and Sir Edward. Acc. p. 620. And if ſome difference can be found between the intereſt ſingulorum populi in all thoſe Statutes, and in ours, to uſe his words, I wiſh any man would ſhew me any ſuch difference; or elſe we muſt ſay, that not only the former reſolutions, but Lord Vaughan here, as well as where I before obſerv'd, is full againſt him; nay, he is even againſt himſelf:

himſelf: which I would be loth to think that Lord Vaughan is *, who owns, That the King cannot diſpenſe in any caſe but with his own right, and not with the right of any other; which he confines not to individual perſons, conſider'd ſingly; for he ſays expreſsly †, "If the wiſdom of the Parliament hath "made an Act to reſtrain, pro bono publico, the im- "portation of foreign manufactures, that the ſub- "jects of the Realm may apply themſelves to the "making of the ſaid manufactures for their ſup- "port and livelihood, to grant to one or more "the importation of ſuch manufacture, without "any limitation, non obſtante the ſaid Act, is a "Monopoly and void." For this I am ſure, particular perſons are not entitled to actions upon their own accounts. Indeed, he ſuppoſes the King may licenſe, limiting the quantity, and that for private uſes ‖, not by way of merchandize, as not being againſt the end of the Act. Wherefore in our caſe all ſubjects being intereſted as Proteſtants, their ſupport and encouragement being provided for by the Act, and the letting Papiſts into the Government againſt the end of it, who can doubt but Lord Vaughan would have pronounc'd Sir Edward Hales's diſpenſation void?

And whereas our Judge pleads in his excuſe, Account, p. 622. That tho' this Law was made for the intereſt of Religion, the offence is not directly againſt Religion, but againſt a politick Conſtitution, tho' made for the intereſt of Religion; he might not only have learnt from Lord Coke, that the ſubjects have ſuch an intereſt as the King cannot diſpenſe with, in what is made void or tortious, that is, unlawful, for the good of the Church; but Lord Vaughan ſhews ††, that there are mala polilica, not to be diſpens'd with, and inſtances in ſome things, which are nuſances in ſpecie.

Now, beſides what already has been ſhewn, to diſable theſe three laſt inſtances urg'd by Sir Edward; that they are not pro bono ſingulorum populi, as that rule is vindicated from miſapplications, may appear, in that neither of them affect all the people in general. As to the Clergymen, they can only do injury in their reſpective pariſhes where they are benefic'd, and the Welſhman in that part of Wales where he is an officer; nor beſides, can the Clergymen be ſuppos'd much to prejudice the intereſt of Religion, being the Pluraliſt cannot ſupply his cure but by one qualified, and the baſtard might be a good man, and good preacher. And yet even theſe would fall within Lord Vaughan's acceptation of his own rule ‖‖; for he ſhews, that Laws made for the benefit of but part of the Kingdom, Artificers, and Husbandmen, cannot be diſpens'd with to any one perſon, to fruſtrate the ends of the Statutes.

This leads to another flouriſh which he makes with the Lord Vaughan's authority, in anſwer to the objection, that the Law was made pro bono publico, Acc. p. 620. and was highly neceſſary for the publick. Indeed Lord Vaughan will have it, that the ſole reaſon why a Statute cannot be diſpens'd with, is not, that the Law was made pro bono publico, becauſe all Laws were made for publick good; and yet diſpenſations had been allow'd in ſome, nor was the degree of publick good that which alter'd the caſe; yet he ſhews that the extent of it does: and ſeems ſtill to keep to Lord Coke's rule, where the People had entruſted the King with the Law, as head of the complicated body, there the truſt was entirely in him; but when the Law extended in intereſt not only to individual perſons, but to a conſiderable part of the Nation, much more when to all, in either of which caſes the Statute is pro bono ſingulorum populi, in neither of theſe can the King diſpenſe. And that the Statute in queſtion is of the largeſt extent, appears as the Nation is a Proteſtant Nation, this the Religion eſtabliſh'd by Law; and theſe proviſions neceſſary means to preſerve it; and therefore tho' the Papiſts have no benefit by it; they are not in Law, in this reſpect, any part of the people; for people always is taken for them that have legal intereſts. Thus when the Statute provides , that the People of Counties ſhall chooſe their Sheriffs, it relates not to all the People in general, but only to Freeholders.

Secondly, Having thus ſhewn, that thoſe grounds which our Judge pretends to have gone upon, afford no countenance even to his palliation of the Judgment, they will appear much leſs to countenance it as it was deliver'd; which to evince, I ſhall here ſet it down ipſiſſimis verbis, from that faithful reporter Mr. Blaney.

It was on that memorable day, when, as another mark of his ſincerity, he directed the willing Jury, and concurr'd in the infamous ſentence againſt that excellent Author Mr. Johnſon; when the Jury was gone out, the Chief-Juſtice took occaſion to inveigh againſt ſpreading of ſcandalous reports about caſes depending in the Court; and to prevent any thing of that nature in the caſe of Sir Edward Hales, he thought fit to deliver the opinion of the Judges in this manner:

Chief-Juſtice. "In the caſe of Godwin and Hales, "wherein the Defendant pleads a diſpenſation from "the King, it is doubted, whether or no the King "had ſuch a prerogative? Truly, upon the argu- "ment before us, it appear'd as clear a caſe as ever "came before this Court: But becauſe men fancy "I know not what difficulty, when really there is "none, we were willing to give ſo much counte- "nance to the queſtion in the caſe, as to take the "advice of all the Judges in England. They were "all aſſembled at Serjeant's-Inn, and this caſe was "put them, and the great caſe of the Sheriffs was "put; whether the diſpenſation in that caſe were "legal, becauſe upon that depended the execution "of all the Law of the Nation? And, I muſt tell "you, that there were then ten upon the place, "that clearly deliver'd their opinions, that the caſe "of the Sheriffs was good Law, and that all the "Attainders grounded upon Indictments found by "Juries return'd by ſuch Sheriffs, were good, and "not erroneous; and conſequently, that men need "not have any fears or ſcruples about that matter. "And, in the next place, they did clearly declare, "that there was no imaginable difference between "that caſe and this, unleſs it were, that this were "the much clearer caſe of the two, and liable to "the fewer exceptions. My brother Powel ſaid, "he was inclin'd to be of the ſame opinion, but he "would rather have ſome more time to conſider of "it; but he has ſince ſent by my brother Hollo- "way, to let us know that he does concur with us. "To theſe eleven Judges, there is one diſſenter, "brother Street, who yet continues his opinion, "that

" that the King cannot diſpenſe in this caſe. But " that's the opinion of one ſingle Judge, againſt " the opinion of eleven: We were ſatisfied in our " own judgments before, and having the concur- " rence of eleven out of twelve, we think we may " very well declare the opinion of the Court to be, " that the King may diſpenſe in this caſe; and the " Judges go upon theſe grounds.

" 1. That the Kings of England are ſovereign " Princes.

" 2. That the Laws of England are the King's " Laws *.

" 3. That therefore, 'tis an inſeparable pre- " rogative in the Kings of England, to diſpenſe " with Penal Laws in particular caſes, and upon " particular neceſſary reaſons.

" 4. That of thoſe reaſons, and thoſe neceſſi- " ties, the King himſelf is ſole Judge: and then, " which is conſequent upon all,

" 5. That this is not a truſt inveſted in, or " granted to the King by the people; but the ancient " remains of the ſovereign power, and prerogative " of the Kings of England, which never yet was " taken from them, nor can be. And therefore " ſuch a diſpenſation being pleaded by the Defen- " dant in this caſe, and ſuch a diſpenſation appear- " ing upon Record to come time enough, to ſave " him from the forfeiture, Judgment ought to be " given for the Defendant, quod querens nil capiat " per billam."

'Tis evident, that theſe propoſitions are very wide from any thing he has, or could have urg'd from the Books, unleſs where a brand of infamy has been ſet upon the Judges. The examples of which, made in ſeveral ages, one would have thought, might have given ſufficient caution; yet, indeed, he might have had enough of this kind from thoſe of the other gown, who, I think, are now pretty well aſham'd of theſe notions. Whatever power of diſpenſing the King has, the Books ſuppoſe it to be entruſted by the people; but, according to this reſolution, it came down from Heaven the Lord knows how. And as he goes upon the ſuppoſition of an abſolute ſovereignty in the King †, inſepara- ble from his perſon, as ſuch will have it, unleſs that be granted, all that he builds upon it are but caſtles in the air: for this we are to have recourſe to our con- ſtitution, to ſee what that power in the Prince is; which, the great Forteſcue ſays, is, à populo effluxa, " deriv'd from the people." But for that we have no occaſion, from any ſo much as pretended proof of his aſſertions; nor can any be offer'd but from the reſolution of the infamous Ship-money Judges, which ſeems to run parallel to this, but is indeed far ſhort of it: for tho' they made the King the ſole Judge of the Kingdom's neceſſity, yet they ſuppos'd it to be at a time when there was a real danger to be prevented by the exerciſe of this Judgment; where- as here it is abus'd to the bringing in what the Par- liament labour'd to prevent.

But I muſt obſerve, vid. Account, p.623. 1. That whereas Sir Edward Herbert owns the diſpenſing pow- er to be of dark learning, and that it is very fit it ſhould receive ſome light from a determination in Par- liament, that Judges may judge by more certain rules, which Acts of Parliament the King may, and which he may not diſpenſe with. Grant his premiſſes, and there can be no darkneſs in it; for the power will extend to all caſes, as far as the legiſlative does; and that he has determin'd poſitively in this point, Account, p.617. when he makes all things not forbid by God's Law, to be diſpenſible by the King. Nay, if he might diſpenſe with every malum prohibitum, that is not malum in ſe, without ſuch qualification as I have ſhewn ought to be, it would go farther, even as far as God's power ‖, who never diſpenſes with more than his own poſitive Laws, not ſuch as are founded upon eternal reaſons: and thus the poſitive Laws of God and Man would be ſubject to the pleaſure of the Prince. 2. He has taken it out of the power of the Parliament, to ſettle the bounds of this extravagant power: for, what he aſcribes, he ſays, never was taken from the Crown, nor can be; becauſe, forſooth, 'tis the ancient remains of the ſovereign power and prerogative of the Kings of Eng- land. Wherein, by the way, there is an implication contrary to what he would infer; for this implies, that 'tis but the remains of a power diminiſh'd and impair'd. 3. His printed and parol reſolutions are not only very different, as is obvious by the compariſon, but very contrary: Account, p. 623. One ſays, 'tis a dark learning; the other, the caſe is as clear as ever came before the Court.

Thirdly, Tho' his inſincerity is ſufficiently evident from every part of his defence, yet it may not be un- profitable for the publick, that he ſhould be fol- low'd to thoſe inſtances in which he glories; for which, 'tis not enough for him to ſhew ſome one Act wherein he is ſingular, if he follows the multi- tude to ſin in others, even of the ſame kind; which if he does, he can no more acquit himſelf of Per- jury and breach of Truſt, Account, p.616. than the reſt of the tainted herd.

In matters of blood, Account, p.621. he affects the reputation of great tenderneſs, and thinks he has been ſcrupulous even to a fault. For, ſays he, in ſome caſes upon Statutes, that had been adjudg'd Felony by wiſer and better Judges than myſelf, and it was highly for the King's ſervice that it ſhould be ſo, yet I would never give judgment of death, becauſe I could not ſatisfy my conſcience, that thoſe Statutes were now in force. It is a fault, it ſeems, not to give judg- ment againſt his conſcience, when the narrow inte- reſt of the Court exacts it, and other Judges, in- fluenc'd from thence, would countenance it: But we may obſerve, that thoſe Statutes concerning Sol- diers , of which he is to be underſtood, not only give no warrant for ſuch judgment, as is obvious to the meaneſt capacity; but if they could admit of any queſtion, the unbiaſs'd Judgment of the then Recorder of London, Sir John Holt, ought to out- weigh the whole Bench.

But I wiſh our Chief-Juſtice could as well acquit himſelf in the caſe of the Lord Brandon. The fa- ther's heroick merits of the Crown, too great to be rewarded; and the ſon's hereditary valour, dange- rous to thoſe who had reaſon to fear brave ſpirits, occaſioned the rigorous proſecution of both. The father father was obliged to change his ſoil, till it might become more equal, not unmindful of our Saviour's advice, or rather precept, When perſecuted in one Country, to flee into another; that tho' he contemned Death, he might not provoke it. The ſon falling into their hands, both his life and honour, which the ſevereſt trials approved to be moſt valu'd by him, were deſigned for a ſacrifice. In ſubſerviency to which, our Chief-Juſtice directed the willing Jury to find him guilty of high-treaſon, chiefly upon a ſuppos'd conſpiracy to ſeize the Caſtle of Cheſter; which, if true, were but felony by a Statute*, as to that part, yet in force, and ſo could be no evidence of treaſon. Nor would he ſuffer the fact to be found ſpecially, tho' he pretended not to anſwer the Caſes and Records, which were cited to ſhew, that the matter alledged could not be treaſon: nor did the then Sollicitor undertake the task, notwithſtanding that ſhew of reaſoning, with which he labour'd to ſet aſide the authority of Lord Coke †, pleading expreſly and unanſwerably for that injur'd Hero, (of whom the Age was not worthy) the Lord Ruſſel.

Nor was the proof in Lord Brandon's caſe leſs defective than the matter; for beſides the ſcandalous Sexton, who ſwore to deſigns againſt another King, there was but one witneſs in the eye of the law: he indeed is ſo far legal, as that he might be heard, being an Approver ‖; but no way credible, conſidering how far he had been drawn with his fetters about his heels, even to  contradict himſelf. The other by no means legal, being under an outlawry for high-treaſon, unrevers'd: For tho' the execution of that Judgment (for ſo in law it is) was pardoned by the King, yet the crime was by no means purged, to ſet him right as to fame; which tho' the Counſel offered to make good, they were not ſuffered to ſpeak to it: and yet the point is very ††clear by ancient authorities, and confirmed by later, without any thing really to the contrary. Nay, farther, tho' beſides all theſe things, another matter was urged in arreſt of Judgment, upon which Judgment had ‖‖ formerly been arreſted; yet, without enquiring whether the fact were true, or the Book-law, that, with the reſt, was over-ruled, to come at the life of a perſon obnoxious to the Government, as ſome called themſelves. Such was Sir Edward's great ſcrupulouſneſs and tenderneſs where the life of man was concerned.

He adds a ſcruple in a caſe before himſelf, and the other uſurpers of the high-commiſſion Court; but his ſingularity therein, can be no excuſe for his acting at all upon a commiſſion apparently againſt the Statute; which took away not only the power of fining and impriſoning, which that Court illegally pretended to, but the ſpiritual authority which it really had: and ſuch a commiſſion it was, as never received countenance till the Act  long ſince repealed; which not only made H. VIII. Head of the Church, but gave him power, which he afterwards delegated to Lord Cromwel, (v. 31 H. 8. c. 10.) to redreſs all errors, hereſies and abuſes, by ſpiritual authority.

Fourthly, I ſuppoſe it is by this time pretty evident, that Sir Edward's crime will admit of no extenuation; but the aggravations are many, it appearing,

1. That he (Acc. p. 623.) and his brethren were the inventors of this diſpenſing Power, in ſuch extent as he contends for in the Print; but much more in his real reſolution.

2. That the error (V. ib.) was not an error in that ſingle caſe, but of large and miſchievous conſequences: and if the King could diſpenſe with that Statute, upon the reaſons given, and circumſtances appearing in Sir Edw. Hales's caſe, others may well conclude from thence, that therefore he has a power to diſpenſe with all other Statutes, even ſuch as confer or veſt in any of the ſubjects any manner of intereſt whatſoever, in their lives, liberties, and eſtates, Acc. p. 623. And there being a conviction, and conſequently a diſability actually incurred before the diſpenſation, therefore, by reaſon of this caſe, the King may diſpenſe with ſuch Statutes where a precedent diſability is actually laid upon a man, as there is upon the members of both Houſes, till they have taken the oaths and teſts preſcribed. Theſe are not conſequences which may flow from the heated imaginations of angry men, but ſuch as have warrant and foundation from their Judgment.

3. His ſo far undervaluing the wiſdom of the Nation, as to make the benefit of a law againſt the undue continuance of Sheriffs, equal, nay, go beyond what they could deviſe for the ſecurity of their religion; or rather, ſo to undervalue the holy religion, which I think he yet profeſſes, when however it would not come up to the point, according to the differences which himſelf receives. Acc. p. 618. ſpeaking of the Statute 23 H. 6. c. 1. he ſays, The recital in the preamble, and the whole purview, if compared with our Statute of 25 Car. 2. c. 2. equals it in every particular, and in ſome goes beyond it: For the miſchiefs recited in this latter Statute, are only in theſe words, "For preventing dangers which may "happen from Popiſh Recuſants, and quieting the "minds of his Majeſty's good ſubjects:" The other, "For preventing the importable damage of the King "and his People, by perjury, manſlaughter, and "great oppreſſion." Then he goes to the purview, expreſs againſt non obſtante's, and creating a diſability: but, according to his uſual haſte, he ſtays not here to make the compariſon, but haſtens to his ſham reſolution, as has been ſufficiently evinced already.

already. The queſtions here will be, 1. Whether the miſchiefs intended to be prevented, are equal in both? 2. Admit they were equal in degree, whether they are in extent? which if they are not, ſtill the reſolution, if real, will fail him; according to the difference which he himſelf receives, of pro bono populi complicati, and ſingulorum populi.

1. For the firſt, I ſuppoſe he thinks the Epithet importable, gives the odds; as if Popery wanted an Epithet to repreſent it to Proteſtants, for what they ought to do their utmoſt to prevent; as if it did not carry in the belly of it, perjuries, manſlaughters, and great oppreſſions, by whole-ſale; or that miſchiefs more remote and accidental, as the continuance of Sheriffs, may habituate to corruption, and that occaſion the other fatal train; could equal the more immediate and certain conſequences, unleſs by good laws prevented, of French converſions, proceeding from fix'd principles. But then to give Judgment to fruſtrate this neceſſary law, at a time when the Papiſts had a King of their own ſuperſtition to head them, is to make the King as much above the law, as our ancient lawyers tell us, the Law and his Court by way of eminence, that is, the great Council, or Parliament, are above him *.

2. As this proves the intereſt of the ſubject in the law about Sheriffs, to be neither equal, nor ſo immediate as in our Statute, there needs not many words to ſhew the difference of the extent: The peace only of particular Counties, and that by ſmall inſenſible degrees, is there concerned. Nay, admit the King had this power, and ſhould ſo violate that truſt which Sir Edward will have to be repoſed in him, (Acc. p. 620.) as to extend it to all Counties, where he puts in the Sheriffs, yet this could not affect all the People; becauſe there might be a retreat to London, Middleſex, and Weſtmorland; in neither of which has it been pretended that the King had ſuch a power, till the late violence of ſome, and treachery of others, gave that unhappy inlet of perjury, manſlaughter, I may ſay, murder and oppreſſion; before which, London was a perfect Goſhen in an Egyptian Kingdom.

4. But what can excuſe our Chief-Juſtice's ſo apparent falſifying both Records and Law-books? or if not, at leaſt, his ſhameful negligence in not going to the fountain-heads, but ſetting up the recitals of caſes againſt the caſes themſelves; and the extra-judicial opinions or arguments of Judges; nay, the very annotations of Reporters, foreign to any matter in queſtion, againſt ſolemn reſolutions; which either wilful falſifications, or criminal negligence, has occaſioned the anſwering objections with a caſe which never had a reſolution, but what he and his brethren gave, when it was brought in by head and ſhoulders, only to be a leading caſe to this.

5. He could not but know, that the caſe was faintly argued againſt Sir Edward Hales; either he, or the late Empſon and Dudley, having given the fees on both ſides: wherefore 'twas comical for the Chief-Juſtice to ſay, That the Caſe appeared clear upon the argument. I am ſure he is inexcuſable, that when cauſes of leſs conſequence, and of leſs dark learning, uſed to be argued twice at leaſt; this was but once: And the learned Mr. Wallop, who could have ſet it in the trueſt light, was refuſed to be heard to it, tho' he required it.

6. Our Chief-Juſtice might eaſily have found, that the beginning of non obſtante's was within time of memory, which would not be enough to entitle the King to a prerogative: For as 'tis in Plowden, every prerogative contains a preſcription, for it reſts in uſage †; that is, ſuch as are not derived from known Grants of the People. And he might have learnt from that great man, whom he would fain draw to his ſide, That Precedents are uſeful to decide Queſtions; but in ſuch Caſes as theſe, which depend upon fundamental principles, from which demonſtrations may be drawn, millions of Precedents are to no purpoſe ‡.

Time of legal memory is well known to extend to the Reign of R. 1. ‖ And tho' non obſtante's, as I obſerved above, are complained of within that time, as early as 35 H. 3. yet that diligent and faithful ſearcher into antiquity, Mr. Prynne, ſhews, That they were then made uſe of, only to revoke ſome indiſcreet grants or privileges, but not to elude, ſubvert, or diſpenſe with any penal Laws, or Acts of Parliament, till they were introduced by religious perſons, after the Statute of Mortmain, 7 E. 1. to elude and fruſtrate the Act. And if this be true, I am ſure thus far there is no colour for the late reſolution; for they might have ſeen in Lord Vaughan, f. 356. that the King in that caſe diſpenſes only with his own right, and concludes not the mean Lords.

Tho' ſucceſſive reſolutions of Judges are but evidences of the law, and ſuch as are to be examined and rectified by the conſtitution and fundamental maxims of the inherent rights and liberties of a free-born People; yet if Sir Edward had had the diligence to read what might have occurred on this ſubject, or the honeſty to hear it from others, he might have known, that it is far from being a ſettled point, That the King might diſpenſe with particular perſons, as to whatever is not prohibited by the law of God; and that his diſpenſation makes the thing prohibited lawful to be done by him that has it . The farther we look back ſince this power has come in queſtion, the leſs does it ſeem allowed.

Edward III. †† with the aſſent of that Council, which, as I obſerv'd before, was choſe in Parliament, had granted to merchants denizens, for a time, the ſame liberty about ſtaple commodities which merchants aliens had: tho' this was not by the King alone, and for the benefit of natives, yet the merchants fearing that they might be impeached in time to come for their merchandize which they had ſo paſſed by virtue of ſuch grants, foraſmuch as they were made out of Parliament, for their ſure-

But the vexata quæſtio * was about licenſing the ſhipping of wool elſewhere than at Calais: that the King might do this, the pretence was ſpecious. Calais was no part of the ancient demeſne of the Crown, but a new acquiſition, whoſe intereſts the King ſeemed to have more abſolutely at his diſpoſal; according to the reſolution of our Judges, anno 1667, before the Houſe of Lords, who declared, That tho' the Canaries were the Dominion of the King of Spain †, they were no part of the Dominion of Spain. And if Sir Edward had taken notice of Lord Coke, where he is againſt, as well as where he ſeems to favour him, he ought to have obſerved, 3 Inſt. f. 186. that one Lyons, a merchant, and Lord Latimer, were ſentenced in Parliament, for procuring of Licences and Diſpenſations for tranſporting of wool. And this they laid to the deſtruction of the ſtaple, and of the money of Calais, to the great damage of the King and Realm ‖. Indeed the year after the Lord Latimer's ſentence is remitted at the requeſt of the Commons, alledging that the charge againſt him was not true, not for defect of matter; 51 E. 3. n. 75. So that here is a Judgment of the Houſe of Lords in point, againſt one of thoſe very caſes; upon which Court-Judges have ſince founded their diſtinction of malum prohibitum, and malum in ſe: Acc. p. 617. And it is an eaſy thing to know which ought to turn the ſcale.

After this, 37 H. 6. f. 4. it came to be a queſtion before all the Judges in the Exchequer-Chamber, Whether this offence, being pardoned, (which that the King might do after it was committed, has not been diſputed) the pardon, before an information brought, would defeat the informer of his ſhare? There the Court held, that if the ſuit were the party's, the pardon ſhould not bar him: But the ſole queſtion was, Whether the party was entitled to any ſuit, being the advantage was given to the diſcoverer, which he might have by a ſuggeſtion in the Exchequer, but the Statute gives no action ‡? However this received no determination at that time.

But if the queſtion had then been of a diſpenſation, and whether that would bar the Informer's action given by Statute, can any man doubt but that they would have adjudged it could not? when, notwithſtanding a pardon, and that in a caſe where an action was not expreſly given; yet it was ſo doubtful, that they would not determine againſt the Informer. But that the diſpenſation would not have availed with them; or at leaſt, they would not have look'd upon it to authorize what was prohibited by any Statute, appears from other paſſages there: as where it is ſaid,  That in a recognizance of the peace, (which is not confined to one entered into at the requeſt of a ſubject) the King cannot pardon or releaſe, till the peace is broken. And where a man ought to repair a bridge, the King can pardon only for the fine due to himſelf: But however, the party ſhall be obliged to repair the bridge, becauſe this is to the damage of all the People. And to the ſame purpoſe is that 3 H. 7. †† that tho' the King may pardon, or free from a pecuniary mulct before the occaſion happen, yet he cannot pardon or diſcharge the treſpaſs it ſelf: and inſtance is given in voluntary eſcapes. So far were they from believing, that the King, in remitting the pecuniary mulct, could make the thing lawful: Nor could this in the leaſt be inferred from the other, becauſe, however, an Act may be made void or tortious. Indeed in the Reign of R. III. (2 R. 3. f. 12.) whoſe character blemiſhes the Judgments of his time; it was held by all the Judges in the Exchequer-Chamber, that the King might licenſe the ſhipping of wool elſewhere than at the ſtaple; yet even they were not of opinion that the licence made the thing lawful, for then the diſcoverer could not have had his ſhare, which they agreed that he ought to have, and ſo the licence was only as far as it concerned the King. They alſo ſettled the other point, which before was a doubt, ‖‖ That a pardon before an information brought, would defeat the informer. But then the authority of the firſt point is ſuſpended by a doubt remaining before all the Judges, afterwards aſſembled upon a re-hearing of this cauſe, in a more ſettled time. Indeed they agreed the other, of an information after a pardon; but hitherto there is no manner of proof of any caſe, wherein the King by his diſpenſation could diſcharge the penalty given not only to himſelf, but alſo to an Informer, who has his action given by Statute. But for this we muſt take a leap downwards, as far as 13 Jac. 1. which we may ballance with the 7th of his Reign, when it is held by Lord Coke, 3 Inſt. 154. that where a Statute concerns the benefit of the King alone, he may diſpenſe with it by a non obſtante: And by the Court, That where it concerns the benefit of the ſubject, the King cannot diſpenſe. Roll's Ab. tit. Prer. f. 179.

7. Whereas our Chief-Juſtice thinks, that a Statute's providing againſt non obſtante's, ſhews that the King could otherwiſe have diſpenſed with the Act by a non obſtante, Acc. p. 618. it is not only unconcluding, becauſe it might be no more than an argument of an abuſe of the law; but turns very ſtrong againſt him: For, admit the reſolution of the Judges, 2 H. 7. were as he contends, yet he, who makes ſo much of a conceſſion of the Commons of England aſſembled in Parliament, Acc. p. 621. when he thinks it of his ſide, ought ſurely to yield, that the Judgment of King, Lords and Commons, is of uncontrolable authority. Wherefore, when not only one, but ſeveral Parliaments provide, that all non obſtante's ſhall be void, is it not plain that their Judgment was, that ſuch non obſtante's could not be ſet up by any reſolution of Judges? And for this we have the Judgment of King, Lords and Commons, and that of but late days, That even where a Grant is made to the King, where 'twill be ſaid he is ſolely entruſted for the publick good, yet it may be out of his power to defeat it by a non obſtante. This appears by the Statute 19 Car. 2. c. 8. ‡‡ which provides, That no Letters Patent granted to any perſon, of exemptions from ſubſidies, &c. ſhall free them from the charges of any ſum granted by that Act: And all non obſtante's in Letters Patent, made, or to be made in bar of any Act or Acts of Parliament, for the ſupply or aſſiſtance of his Majeſty, are thereby declared to be void and of none effect.

And even where Statutes have not expreſly provided againſt non obſtante's, tho' the Statutes were ſuch as reſtrain what many take to be the King's prerogative; yet if we receive the ſenſe of Lords and Commons, the King has no prerogative warranting non obſtante's to them, as appears by the articles againſt King Richard the ſecond *; one of which is, For that the King, contrary to the Laws and Wills of the Juſtices, ſuffered Sheriffs to continue longer than one Year, &c.

This were enough to ſet aſide all pretences taken from Calvin's caſe, tho', as Sir Edward Herbert pleaſantly ſuggeſts, Acc. p. 619. it were reſolved there, That that was reſolved 2 H. 7. which was never mentioned till after the reſolution. Here is the authority of Lords and Commons in competition with that of mercenary Judges: And, (Acc. p. 621.) if the conceſſions of the Commons alone aſſembled in Parliament, are of weight with him, I know not why their denials ought not as well to be urged againſt him; which if we may do, not only the fictions and looſe reaſonings in Calvin's caſe †, but the main reſolution there, may be juſtly called meer Court-law. Such I am ſure it is, that the honeſt Houſe of Commons, 4 Jac. 1. ‖ would not bear it: and any one that reads the arguments of thoſe learned men who managed the conference with the Lords upon the queſtion of the union of the two Kingdoms, may eaſily ſee how inexcuſable the Judges of that time were, to proceed to the Judgment in Calvin's caſe, after they had been ſo enlightned. Nor could they but know, that the then Parliament was broke up; becauſe they were not ſo complying as the Judges ſhewed themſelves both then and afterwards. But they ſecured their cuſhions by it, while Sir John Bennet , father of the preſent Lord Oſſuſton, loſt his in the Prerogative-Court, and had a ſwinging fine impoſed upon him into the bargain, ſeveral years after, upon pretence of extortion; but, as I am well informed, the real ground was, his diſreliſhing ſpeech in Parliament upon this ſubject. 'Tis well known, ſome Princes us'd to have good memories that way. Manet altâ mente repoſtum, &c.

8. Non obſtante's having no other foundation than in the encroachments of Princes, and ſervility of Judges, eſpecially if we except caſes concerning the King alone; they ought not to be ſtrained to any new caſe. The advice of Bracton †† will riſe up in judgment againſt ſuch men, who tells them, If ſuch things never happened before, and the Judgment is without light from former Caſes, and difficult, let it be adjourned to the Great Court. According to which, adjournments to enſuing Parliaments have been frequent in former days, when there were more learned Judges; and that as often for the weightineſs of the matter, as intricacy of the points.

9. But for the cloſing aggravation, Acc. p. 622. whereas our Chief-Juſtice denies all indirect means for procuring opinions, and ſtands upon his innocence, challenging the world to lay any thing of that kind to his charge; I think, by this time, few will the leſs ſuſpect him, becauſe of his aſſurance: if either threats or ſollicitations can be proved upon him, the world will judge either of them indirect means; and I am much miſ-inform'd, if both cannot be juſtly charged.

If after all, he can excuſe himſelf with renouncing infallibility, Acc. p. 623. and making aſſeverations of keeping to the clear dictates of his conſcience, I muſt ſay, Judges in former ages have had hard luck, and been made examples to little purpoſe. King Alfred would loſe the reputation of his Juſtice, in hanging above thirty Judges |||; and Parliaments have been very barbarous to proceed againſt others as traitors, who yet, either were ſo ingenuous to confeſs their faults, or, at leaſt, not ſo provoking as to juſtify them.

It is well known in ſtory , that ſix Judges, and two of the King's Counſel at law, ſuffered for treaſon, upon a Parliamentary proſecution, 11 R. 2. for delivering their opinions, That they were to be puniſhed as traitors, who hindred the King from exerciſing his Sovereignty and Prerogative over a Statute, and an Ordinance and Commiſſion made in the foregoing Parliament †‡†. The ſubſtance of their crime lay in aſcribing to the King a power to defeat the proviſions of the Parliament for the ſafety of the Nation; and is a direct precedent, at which our Judges ought to tremble. Nor can it avail them, that the expreſs words of the Statute 25 E. 3. c. 2. do not condemn them, ſince that Act tranſmits common-law treaſons to the Judgment of Parliament: and the Statute 1 Mar. c. 1. leaves that power untouch'd. And who can doubt but ſuch a reſolution, and that juſtified in print, and publiſhed to the world, is an overt-act of treaſon, as it tends to the ſubverting the fundamental rights of Parliaments: Nor can they have any colour for asking, with the Lord Stafford, Where is the Buoy? when they ſee ſo many ſhipwrecks to admoniſh them.

Nor ought Sir Edward to wonder at a treaſon againſt the Government, tho' not directly againſt the perſon of the King, his relatives, officers, or his coin; nor yet an actual levying of war within his Kingdom, or adhering to his enemies ‡; for he may find among the Articles againſt the Lord Kimbolton, and others, exhibited Anno 1641, by his father, then Attorney-General,

"That they have traitorouſly endeavoured to "ſubvert the very Rights and Beings of Par-"liaments."

But ſince Sir Edward pleads conſcience for what he did, Acc. p. 623. and might have urged the authority of ſpiritual guides, who would make the ſcripture-notion of higher powers a ſufficient warrant for ſuch a Judgment; I ſhall conclude with the good Queen Elizabeth's doctrine of the famous Bilſon, afterwards Biſhop of Wincheſter ‡‡.

Which is as follows.

An Humble and Hearty Addreſs to all the Engliſh Proteſtants in this preſent Army.

Gentlemen,

NEXT to the duty which we owe to God, which ought to be the principal care of men of your profeſſion eſpecially, becauſe you carry your lives in your hands, and often look death in the face; the ſecond thing that deſerves your conſideration, is, the ſervice of your native Country, wherein you drew your firſt breath, and breathed a free Engliſh air. Now I would deſire you to conſider, how well you comply with theſe two main points, by engaging in this preſent ſervice.

Is it in the name of God, and for his ſervice, that you have joined yourſelves with Papiſts; who will indeed fight for the maſs-book, but burn the bible: and who ſeek to extirpate the Proteſtant Religion with your ſwords, becauſe they cannot do it with their own? And will you be aiding and aſſiſting to ſet up maſs-houſes to erect that popiſh Kingdom of darkneſs and deſolation amongſt us, and to train up all our children in Popery? How can you do theſe things, and yet call yourſelves Proteſtants?

And then what ſervice can be done your Country by being under the command of French and Iriſh Papiſts, and by bringing the Nation under a foreign yoke? Will you help them to make forcible entry into the houſes of your countrymen, under the name of Quartering, directly contrary to Magna Charta, and the Petition of Right? Will you be aiding and aſſiſting to all the murders and outrages which they ſhall commit by their void commiſſions? which were declared illegal, and ſufficiently blaſted by both Houſes of Parliament, (if there had been any need of it) for it was very well known before, that a Papiſt cannot have a commiſſion, but by the law is utterly diſabled and diſarmed. Will you exchange your birth-right of Engliſh laws and liberties for martial, or club-law; and help to deſtroy all others, only to be eaten laſt your ſelves? If I know you well, as you are Engliſhmen, you hate and ſcorn theſe things. And therefore be not unequally yoked with idolatrous and bloody Papiſts: Be valiant for the truth, and ſhew your ſelves men.

The ſame conſiderations are likewiſe humbly offered to all the Engliſh ſeamen, who have been the bulwark of this Nation againſt Popery and Slavery, ever ſince Eighty-Eight.

And the other, viz. The Opinion is this, That Reſiſtance may be uſed, in caſe our Religion and Rights ſhould be invaded †: " Tending to withdraw them " from their duty and allegiance, and to excite and " ſtir up the ſoldiers, &c. to mutiny and rebel- " lion, &c." After this, the Information was, by the King's Counſel, opened to the Jury, as to the nature and circumſtances, together with the evil conſequences that might attend ſuch bold and dangerous attempts: which being rendred largely and exact-exactly, as to the particulars mentioned in the ſaid Information, wherewith the Priſoner was charged, they proceeded to call their witneſſes to prove the fact.

And Firſt, Mr. Belamy, at the Three Bruſhes in Southwark, being ſworn, gave evidence, That coming acquainted ſome time ſince with the Priſoner, and about a fortnight before Whitſuntide laſt, diſcourſing with him, the ſecond of theſe Libels was mentioned: And ſoon after he ſent him a box with ſome reams of them in it, to be diſperſed, and gave him notice that he had a ſecond Paper in the Preſs; and withal, a caution not to publiſh thoſe he had ſent before, till he had received that which proved to be the former Libel before-mentioned. And further, that about ſix or eight months before that, the Priſoner had ſent him other Libels to diſperſe: and being ſhewed the Libels mentioned in the Information, he depoſed they were the ſame that had been ſent him. His man likewiſe gave evidence, That he had received a box nailed up, but could give no account of what was in it, as to particulars.

Anne Whitny, ſometime ſervant to the Priſoner, being ſworn, gave evidence, That by her maſter's or miſtreſs's direction, ſhe was not certain which, ſhe took a porter, and cauſed him to carry a box, wherein one of the Libels mentioned, viz. the ſecond, was incloſed, to Mr. Belamy: And that ſhe had, by the like order, carried other papers looſe; ſome of which were the Addreſs, &c. And being asked by the Priſoner, how ſhe knew that? her reply was, That ſhe knew it, inſomuch that ſhe had read the title, and very well remembred it.

The Porter that carried the box gave evidence, That the maid had hired him to carry a box to the Three Bruſhes, and that ſhe went with him, and paid him according to agreement, and that he took it up in Spittle-Fields. After this, the meſſenger who ſearched the Priſoner's lodging with the Right Honourable the Earl of Sunderland's warrant, being ſworn, gave evidence, That he found a paper in writing, upon a table or ſhelf, which appeared in Court to be part of the copy, or the ſame with the paper, entitled, The Opinion, &c. he ſwearing, upon ſight thereof, that it was the ſame he found in the Priſoner's lodging. Then was the Book of the Veſtry, or pariſh-affairs of St. Paul's, Covent-Garden, produced; wherein the priſoner ſometime paſt, had given an acquittance for money received, as an aſſiſtant curate, &c. which being compared with the paper, ſeemed not to differ in the hand. But no other evidence appeared in that caſe, than that the Book had been always kept in the veſtry, and for the moſt part under lock and key, and it being put to the priſoner, he did not greatly deny it. When, for a further confirmation, John Darby a printer, and his wife, were ſworn: The former depoſing, That he had printed a book for the priſoner from the manuſcript, and that hand was very like that of the libel produced in Court; but he had never ſeen him write, and therefore could not be poſitive that that manuſcript was his own hand.

As for his wife, her evidence was, that the priſoner paying her ſome money, ſhe had given him an acquittance; but that, as ſhe conceived, he wrote all but her name; for going up ſtairs, he ſoon returned with an acquittance, which ſhe ſubſcribed.

This being what materially was given in evidence for the King, the priſoner had leave to make his defence: who, after ſome diſcourſe, alledged, That he had been confined, and had not had opportunity to prepare for his defence, as not having leave to go to his Counſel. To which the Court replied, That he had leave upon the motion made on his behalf, to ſend for Counſel; and that they ought not to be refuſed coming to him. Then he urged ſeveral other matters, which being over-ruled by the Court, he proceeded to intimate, that he hoped, that ſeeing he was indicted for a ſeditious and ſcandalous Libel, &c. the Jury would conſider whether thoſe papers they had heard read, were ſo or no: But was told, that the Jury ought to conſider it only, as to the matter of fact, whether he was guilty of writing or publiſhing them, &c. and that the reſt lay in the breaſt of the Court to conſider. Thereupon he urged, that though they might be ſent, yet it was no publication, as it was laid in the indictment, becauſe the box was nailed. But being fully anſwered in that point, and looſe papers appearing likewiſe to be ſent, the Counſel for the King ſummed up their evidence to the Jury, none appearing on the behalf of the priſoner.

After which, the Court gave the charge, putting the Priſoner, as well as the Jury, in mind of the great miſchief that ſuch libels might occaſion: And minded him likewiſe, that it was within a ſmall matter of high-treaſon; and might have been raiſed to that degree, were not the laws, and thoſe who managed them, tender of life, &c.

After the charge was given, the Jury withdrew; and returning within a quarter of an hour, brought in the priſoner guilty of the high miſdemeanour.

Nov. 16, following, Mr. Johnſon's Sentence was pronounced by Sir Francis Withins, as follows; To pay 500 marks to the King, and to lie in priſon till it was paid; to ſtand three times in the pillory, on the Monday following, in the Palace-yard, Weſtminſter; on Wedneſday at Charing-Croſs; and the Monday after at the Royal-Exchange; and to be whipt by the common hangman from Newgate to Tyburn *.

After Sentence was paſſed upon him, in order to load him with the greater ignominy, the Courtiers, on pretence of reſpect to the Church, moved, that before execution of the ſentence, he ſhould be degraded from the order of prieſthood. This ought to have been done, according to the Canons, by his own Dioceſan, the Biſhop of London; but that Prelate was then under a ſuſpenſion himſelf, becauſe he would not obey the King's Orders to ſuſpend Dr. Sharp, now Archbiſhop of York, for preaching againſt Popery in his own Pariſh-Church of St. Giles's in the Fields. Dr. Crew, Biſhop of Durham; Dr. Sprat, Biſhop of Rocheſter, and Dr. White, Biſhop of Peterborough; being then Commiſſioners for the dioceſe of London, in the place of the ſuſpended Biſhop,

* Mr. Johnſon, 1683, was tried on an Information in the King's-Bench, for writing Julian the Apoſtate, and fined 500 marks, and committed Priſoner to the King's-Bench, till he ſhould pay it; which they knew was the ſame with perpetual impriſonment, ſince he was not able to pay that ſum. Thus he was condemned and committed, to the great Joy of the Papiſts; when in him they ſaw the Laws of England condemned by the Judges, who ſtudy'd more to oblige the Court than to do their duty. See ſome Memoirs of Mr. S. Johnſon, p. 7. in his Works.

Biſhop, were appointed to degrade Mr. Johnſon; which they performed in the Chapter-houſe of St. Paul's, where Dr. Sherlock and other Clergymen attended: but Dr. Stillingfleet, then Dean of St. Paul's, refuſed to have any hand in it.

When they came to the formality of putting a Bible in his hand, and taking it from him again, he was much affected, and parted with it with difficulty, kiſſing it, and ſaying with tears, That they could not however deprive him of the uſe and benefit of that ſacred Depoſitum. It happened that they were guilty of an omiſſion, in not ſtripping him of his caſſock; which, as ſlight a particular as it might ſeem, render'd his degradation imperfect, and afterwards ſaved him his benefice.

On the 1ſt of December, 1686, the ſentence was put in execution; which Mr. Johnſon endured with as firm a courage, and as chriſtian a behaviour as ever was diſcovered on any ſuch occaſion: tho' at the ſame time he had a quick ſenſe of every ſtripe which was given him, with a whip of nine-cords knotted, to the number of 317.

In the firſt Parliament after the Revolution, when the Houſe of Commons was preparing an Act of Indemnity, Mr. Johnſon was adviſed by his friends to get a clauſe put into it, that he might have his remedy at law againſt ſuch as had been his illegal oppreſſors. They ſeemed to be ſenſible that they were obnoxious, and could not juſtify what they had done. About that time the Lord Biſhop of Durham gave Mr. Johnſon and his lawyer a meeting, and made his peace with him, to their mutual ſatisfaction.

Sir Francis Withins, who pronounced the Sentence againſt him, ſent a relation of Mrs. Johnſon's to tell him a feign'd ſtory, that Sir Francis lay dangerouſly ill, and could not die in peace, unleſs Mr. Johnſon would forgive him: To which he reply'd, That he heartily forgave him what injury he had done to him. Some few days after, the ſame perſon brought Sir Francis to Mr. Johnſon, as he was walking in Weſtminſter-hall; where Sir Francis ſaluted him, and told him, That his Chriſtian and kind anſwer had prov'd a reviving Cordial to him. To which Mr. Johnſon reply'd, That he heartily forgave the injury done to himſelf; but as he had been an enemy to his Country, he hoped he would be made accountable for it: it being a common ſaying with him, That he was obliged to forgive his own enemies, but not the enemies of his Country.

The Parliament taking Mr. Johnſon's caſe into conſideration, reſolved, June 11, 1689. That the Judgment given againſt him in the King's-Bench, upon an information for a miſdemeanor, was cruel and illegal.

A Committee was at the ſame time appointed to bring in a bill for reverſing that Judgment: and being alſo ordered to enquire how Mr. Johnſon came to be degraded, and by what authority 'twas done; Mr. Chriſty, the chairman, ſome days after, reported his caſe to this purpoſe:

" That in Trinity-Term, 1686, an information " was exhibited againſt Mr. Johnſon, in the name " of Sir Robert Sawyer, Attorney-General, for " writing and publiſhing a ſcandalous and ſeditious " Libel, intitled, An humble and hearty Addreſs, &c. " That the ſame Term they forced him to plead, " got a Jury to find him guilty, and Sir Francis " Withins pronounced the following Sentence upon " him: To pay five hundred marks to the King, and " to lie in priſon till 'twas paid: To ſtand thrice in " the pillory, in the Palace-yard, at Charing-croſs, " and at the Old Exchange: and to be whipt by the " Common Hangman from Newgate to Tyburn. " That the Judges then in Court, were the Lord " Chief-Juſtice Herbert, Sir Francis Withins, Sir " Robert Wright, and Sir Richard Holloway. That " apprehending 'twould be a ſcandal to the Clergy " to have ſo infamous a puniſhment inflicted on a " Miniſter, they deſired Mr. Johnſon might be firſt " degraded: in order to which, being a priſoner " in the King's-Bench, in the dioceſe of the Biſhop " of Wincheſter, he was ſummoned to appear the " 20th of November, in the convocation-houſe of " St. Paul's, in the dioceſe of London; his Living " being within that dioceſe, and brought thither " by Habeas Corpus: where he found the Biſhops " of Durham, Rocheſter and Peterborough, Com- " miſſioners to exerciſe the juriſdiction of the Bi- " ſhop of London, during his ſuſpenſion; with ſome " Clergymen, and many Spectators. A Libel was " exhibited againſt him, charging him with great " miſ-behaviours, tho' none were ſpecified or prov- " ed. That Mr. Johnſon demanded a copy of the " Libel, and an advocate, both which the Biſhops " denied, and immediately proceeded to ſentence; " That he ſhould be declared an infamous perſon, that " he ſhould be deprived of his Rectory, that he ſhould " be a meer Layman, and no Clerk, and be deprived " of all right and privilege of Prieſthood; that he " ſhould be degraded thereof, and of all veſtments and " habits of Prieſthood. Againſt which proceedings " Mr. Johnſon proteſted, as being againſt law, and " the 132d Canon; not being done by his own " Dioceſan. But his proteſtation was refuſed, as " was alſo his appeal to the King in Chancery.

" After which, they proceeded to degrade him, " by putting a ſquare cap on his head, and then " taking it off: by pulling off his gown and gir- " dle; which he demanded as his proper goods, " bought with his money, which they promiſed to " ſend him, but he could not get them till he paid " twenty ſhillings. Then they put a bible into his " hands, which he not parting with readily, they " took it from him by force. That on the 22d of " November, the Judgment in the King's-Bench be- " gan to be executed with great rigour and cruel- " ty: that Mr. Rouſe, the Under-Sheriff, tore off " his caſſock on the pillory, and put a frize coat " upon him: that he was whipp'd with a whip of " nine-cords, knotted, which was ſhewed to the " committee. That Mrs. Johnſon had alſo an In- " formation exhibited againſt her, for the like " matter as that againſt her husband.

" On all which, the Committee came to the fol- " lowing reſolutions; which, on the report, were " all agreed to by the Houſe: That the Judgment " againſt Mr. Johnſon was illegal and cruel: That " the Eccleſiaſtical Commiſſion was illegal, and conſe- " quently the ſuſpenſion of the Biſhop of London, and " the authority committed to the three Biſhops, null " and illegal. That Mr. Johnſon not being degraded " by his own Dioceſan, if he had deſerved it, was il- " legal: That a Bill be brought in, to reverſe the " Judgment, and to declare all the Proceedings before " the three Biſhops null and illegal. And that an " Addreſs be made to his Majeſty, to recommend Mr. " Johnſon to ſome Eccleſiaſtical Preferment, ſuitable " to his ſervices and ſufferings."

The Houſe likewiſe ordered, That in the ſaid bill the proceedings upon the Eccleſiaſtical Commiſſion ſhould be declared void.

The

The Houſe preſented two Addreſſes to the King in behalf of Mr. Johnſon: But tho' his Majeſty was inclinable enough to have complied with their requeſt, Mr. Johnſon could never obtain any Church-Preferment. Mr. Johnſon however being a man of ſuch merit, did not paſs altogether without a reward; for the King gave him three hundred pounds a-year out of the Poſt-Office, for his and his ſon's life; beſides a thouſand pounds in money, and likewiſe beſtowed a place of about a hundred pounds a-year on his ſon.

XLI. The Trial of Rowland Walters, Dearing Bradſhaw and Ambroſe Cave, Gent. (for murdering of Sir Charles Pymm Bart.) at the Seſſions held at the Old-Bailey, on Friday the firſt day of June, 1688. Before the Right Honourable Sir John Shorter Knt. Lord-Mayor of the City of London, and Sir Bartholomew Shower Knt. Recorder of the ſame City; together with others his Majeſty's Juſtices of the Peace for the City of London, and County of Middleſex.

Clerk. CRYER, make proclamation?

Cryer. O yes, O yes, O yes.

Clerk. Keeper of Newgate, bring the priſoners to the bar. Which was done.

Clerk. You the priſoners at the bar, thoſe men whom you ſhall hear called, and perſonally appear, are to try between our ſovereign Lord the King, and you who are arraigned, upon your ſeveral lives and death: if you ſhall except againſt any one of them, you muſt ſpeak before they be ſworn.

Clerk. Cryer, call Henry Dyer.

The Jurors ſworn are as followeth:

Henry Dyer,	William Villiers,
Giles Baggs,	John Frith,
Matthew Jerman,	John Hill,
Timothy Waldoe,	Obadiah Hickman,
Richard Chaſe,	John Read,
Samuel Burgeſs,	Francis Willis.

Who were all ſworn.

Clerk. Cryer, count theſe, twelve good men and true?

Clerk. Cryer, make proclamation? Which was done.

Clerk. You Gentlemen of the Jury, look upon the priſoners at the bar, and hearken to their charge, they ſtand indicted by the names of Rowland Walters, Dearing Bradſhaw, and Ambroſe Cave. Gent. for that they not having the fear of God before their eyes, but being inſtigated and ſeduced by the Devil and their own wicked Hearts, on the fourth day of May, in the fourth year of the Reign of our Sovereign Lord King James II. in the pariſh of St. Nicholas Cole-Abby, in and upon Sir Charles Pymm, Bart. feloniouſly, wilfully, and of their malice fore-thought, did make an aſſault; and that he the ſaid Rowland Walters, having then and there in his right hand, a certain Rapier made of iron and ſteel, of the value of about 5 s. and him the ſaid Sir Charles Pymm in and upon the right ſide of him the ſaid Sir Charles Pymm, a little above the right pap, did ſtrike and thruſt as aforeſaid; giving him the ſaid Sir Charles Pymm, a little above the right pap, one mortal wound of the breadth of one inch, of the depth of ten inches: and that they the ſaid Dearing Bradſhaw, and Ambroſe Cave, were preſent, aiding, abetting, and aſſiſting him the ſaid Rowland Walters, in the perpetration of the ſaid wilful murder of him the ſaid Sir Charles Pymm. So that they three, the priſoners at the bar, with malice fore-thought, did intentionally kill and deſtroy, and wilfully murder him the ſaid Sir Charles Pymm, againſt the peace of our ſovereign Lord the King, his Crown and Dignity, and againſt the form of the Statute in that caſe made and provided. Upon this Indictment they have been arraigned, and have hereunto pleaded Not Guilty, and for their Trial, have put themſelves upon God and their Country, which Country you are. Your buſineſs is to enquire, whether they or either of them committed this felony and murder as aforeſaid; if you find them or either of them guilty of the ſaid wilful murder, you are to enquire what goods and chattels they, or either of them had at the time of the committing the ſaid wilful murder; but if you find them not guilty, you are to ſay ſo; and hear your evidence.

Mr. Walters. My Lord, I humbly deſire theſe Gentlemen may be tried before me.

Court. That cannot be, Mr. Walters, becauſe you are all three put into one Indictment.

Counſel for the King. My Lords, and you Gentlemen of the Jury, I am here retained a Counſel for the King, againſt the priſoners at the bar, who all three ſtand indicted for the murder of Sir Charles Pymm Bart. in the pariſh of St. Nicholas Cole-Abbey, thruſting him through the body near the right pap, giving him a mortal wound, of which he then and there inſtantly died. The other two priſoners ſtand indicted for for aiding, abetting, and aſſiſting him the ſaid Walters in the ſaid Murder.

Another Council for the King. My Lords, this Murder fell out on the fourth day of May laſt, after this manner, viz. The ſaid Sir Charles Pymm, one Mr. Mirriday, and Mr. Neale, and Sir Thomas Middleton and others, dined at the Swan-Tavern upon Fiſh-ſtreet-hill; after they were come into the houſe they went up ſtairs, after which the priſoners at the bar came into the houſe, and took another room to dine of beef and other things. But one of Sir Charles's company deſired to have a plate of it; upon which Mr. Cloudſley told them ſome Gentlemen had beſpoke it for dinner, but he ſaid he would get them a plate of it, which was ſent up, and ordered to be reckoned into Mr. Walters the priſoner's bill. After dinner they drank their healths, and returned them thanks for their beef; and towards the evening Sir Charles Pymm and his friends came down ſtairs, and met the priſoners at the bottom, and Mr. Cave asked them how they liked the beef that was ſent up; upon which one in the company anſwered, and told them, they did not ſend it, for they had paid for it. Upon which farther words aroſe, and Mr. Bradſhaw drew his ſword and fell upon Sir Charles Pymm; but he got out into the ſtreet. After which Mr. Walters came forth, and plucked Sir Charles Pymm by the arms, and forced him to fight with him, ſaying, here is my hand, and here is my ſword; and as ſoon as he was in the ſtreet, he received this mortal wound, and ſo fell down dead. After this, Mr. Walters took him by the nape of the neck, and daſh'd his head upon the ground, and cried out, God damn you, you are dead; and ſaid farther, let the ſword alone in his body. My Lords, this ſhall be proved to be done, without any manner of provocation; and if ſo, I hope you Gentlemen of the Jury will find him guilty of wilful murder.

Cryer. Call Mr. Mirriday, Mr. Neale, Mr. Palms, and Mr. Bridges: who were ſworn.

Mr. Mirriday. My Lord, on the fourth day of May laſt, on a Friday, Sir Charles Pymm, myſelf, and theſe Gentlemen here in Court, came to dine at the Swan-Tavern in Old Fiſh-ſtreet. We asked for meat, and Mr. Cloudſley the man of the houſe, told us, we might have fiſh, for he had no meat, but what was beſpoke by Mr. Walters and his company. We deſired him to help us to a plate of it, if it might be got, which we had brought up ſtairs; after dinner we drank the Gentlemens health that ſent it, and returned them thanks for it. A while after Sir Thomas Middleton went away, and about an hour after that, or thereabouts, Sir Charles Pymm and the reſt of us came down to go away; and when we were in the entry, Mr. Cave met us, and asked Sir Charles how he liked the beef that was ſent up, who anſwered, we did not know you ſent it, for we have paid for it. Then the boy that kept the bar told us, that he did not reckon it in the bill; upon which Mr. Cave ſeemed to take it ill. But, my Lord, I cannot be poſitive whether Mr. Bradſhaw and Mr. Palms were at any words. Then I took Mr. Cave to one ſide into the entry, and he thought that I had a mind to fight him, but I did what I could to make an end of the quarrel. Upon which, the Court highly commended Mr. Mirriday.

Court. This was in the entry; but where was Sir Charles Pymm?

Mr. Mirriday. He was then in the entry.

Court. Where was Mr. Walters?

Mr. Mirriday. He was at the door, my Lord, but I cannot ſwear poſitively to any particular paſſage as to the murder; but Mr. Walters called Sir Charles Pymm rogue, and gave him very ill words, and I ſaw him take him by the neck, and forced his head downwards, and ſaid, God damn him, he is dead, to the beſt of my remembrance, my Lord. Then, I took Sir Charles up in my arms, and pulled the ſword out of his body, and then Mr. Walters ſaid, God damn him, let it ſtay in his guts, or in his body, or words to that effect.

Court. Was Mr. Cave or Bradſhaw at the place where Sir Charles fell?

Mr. Mirriday. No, my Lord, they were in the entry ſcuffling there.

Court. What came of Mr. Walters afterwards?

Mr. Mirriday. My Lord, he ſtay'd a little till I had pull'd the ſword out of his body, then he run away.

Court. Did they draw their ſwords in the entry?

Mr. Mirriday. I cannot tell that.

Court. Did you ſee them draw their ſwords?

Mr. Mirriday. I cannot ſay Sir Charles Pymm's ſword was drawn, but I ſaw Mr. Walters draw his ſword in the ſtreet.

Court. Do you know whether Mr. Walters was wounded or no?

Mr. Mirriday. I do not know that, for I did not ſee the wound given.

Court. Mr. Walters, will you ask him any queſtions?

Mr. Walters. Yes, my Lord: Mr. Mirriday, what did you ſay to Sir Charles Pymm in the Fiſhmonger's ſhop? Did you not ſay, go and fight him, and I will be your Second?

Mr. Mirriday. My Lord, I do not remember one word of that.

Court. Mr. Mirriday, were you in any Fiſhmonger's ſhop?

Mr. Mirriday. Yes, my Lord, I was there; but I do not remember one word between Mr. Walters and Sir Charles, and as I hope for ſalvation I ſaid no ſuch thing; and that's all I have to ſay.

Clerk. Cryer, call Mr. Neale.

Mr. Neale. My Lord, I went and met with theſe Gentlemen that dined with us at the aforeſaid Tavern, and we had fiſh and two beef marrow-bones, and a plate of beef for dinner; and when we came down to go away, theſe Gentlemen met us, and ſaid, God damn you, how did you like the beef? which raiſed a quarrel among us; but immediately after I thought it was all over, I ſaw Mr. Walters run Sir Charles Pymm thorough.

Court. Was his ſword drawn?

Neale. Yes, both of their ſwords were drawn.

Court. Where was Mr. Bradſhaw?

Neale. I cannot tell where he was directly: but, my Lord, I heard Sir Charles Pymm ſay nothing to Mr. Walters.

Clerk. Cryer, call Mr. Palms?

Palms. My Lord, after the reckoning was paid, we came down ſtairs and called for a Coach, and becauſe it rained, there was none to be had; and theſe Gentlemen followed us into the entry, and ſo words to the ſame purpoſe as aforeſaid paſſed between them; after which, I met Mr. Bradſhaw, and we fell out in the Fiſhmonger's ſhop.

Court. Who began?

Palms. I know not, I cannot remember that.

Court. Were you not in drink?

Palms. My Lord, we drank nine or ten bottles among ſix of us; after which Mr. Bradſhaw and I drew our ſwords, and then Mr. Mirriday came and took him away from me into the entry, and in the mean time while we were talking in the entry, the buſineſs was done.

Court. Were your ſwords put up again?

Palms. I had put up mine.

Council for the King. Did you take notice of what paſſed between Mr. Walters and Sir Charles Pymm?

Palms. I heard nothing of high words.

Court. Yes, yes, it was all about the beef?

Clerk. Cryer, call for Mr. Preſland the Bar-keeper.

Preſland. My Lord, I made the bill for the reckoning.

Court. Did you put the beef into the bill?

Preſland. No, I did not; when they came down ſtairs, the Coach was fetch'd for them, viz. for Sir Charles Pymm and his company, and the reckoning was paid. When Sir Charles Pymm and the reſt of his company came down into the entry, Mr. Walters came out of the room, &c. and I heard them argue about their dinner, and they came to me, and aſked me what was to pay for beef, and I told them nothing.

Court. Did you ſee the man killed?

Preſland. My Lord, I did not ſee him killed, not I.

Court. Who was it that quarrelled with the Coachman?

Preſland. My Lord, Mr. Neale quarrelled with the Coachman about his ſtaying, the Coachman refuſed going with him, becauſe his Horſes were hot.

Clerk. Cryer, call Mr. Brummidge.

Brummidge. My Lord, between eleven and twelve a-clock in the morning on the fourth of May laſt, Sir Charles Pymm came to Mr. Cloudſley's door in a coach, and aſked him what he might have for dinner; who told him that he might have a mullet and ſome ſmelts, and I ſold a mullet to Mr. Cloudſley: ſo Sir Charles went to the Exchange, and I ſaw no more of him till I ſaw him kill'd. While I was in the houſe came in one Mr. Allen and others to enquire for Sir Charles Pymm, and Mr. Cloudſley told them that he had beſpoke a dinner and was gone to the Exchange, viz. a mullet and ſome ſmelts; but one of the Gentlemen deſired a bit of the beef that was at the fire, ſo Mr. Cloudſley ſaid he would get a plate for him. So I went to the door, and the Coachman came, and his horſes being hot, he deſired to go away becauſe it rain'd; but Mr. Neale put his foot-boy into the coach, and the Coachman after pull'd his boy out of the coach and drove away. And after that, I ſaw Mr. Cave and others come to the door and juſtled each other into the next ſhop, and were at very high words; and ſo afterwards they went into the entry again, and Sir Charles Pymm and Mr. Walters came without the door, the latter of which ſaid, Here is my hand, and here is my ſword; but they returned both in again into the Tavern, and within two minutes came out again, and I ſaw Mr. Walters thruſt Sir Charles Pymm through his back.

Court. Did you ſee him do any thing to him after he was down?

Brummidge. No, my Lord, I did not.

Court. Did you not ſay, that Walters went over the kennel and drew his ſword, and ſtood upon his guard, and then you ſay that you ſaw Sir Charles Pymm come out with his ſword drawn; was his ſword drawn?

Brummidge. I did not ſee him draw it, but it was drawn.

Court. Where did he receive his wound?

Brummidge. Within a foot of the kennel; I was but a little way off, but I did not ſee him beat his head againſt the ground.

Clerk. Cryer, call Mr. Fletcher.

Fletcher. My Lord, on Friday in the evening on the fourth of May, I was going by the Tavern-door about ſeven a-clock at night, and I heard a noiſe and a talking of going to the other end of the town to be merry: and turning myſelf back to hearken further, I ſaw Mr. Walters come out of the door and drew his ſword, and Sir Charles Pymm came out, and drew his ſword; and preſently Mr. Walters's ſword was through Sir Charles Pymm's body almoſt a foot; and he fell down crinkling immediately, and when he was down, I ſaw Mr. Walters hit him in the kennel, and took him by the nape of the neck, and after cried, God damn him, let the ſword ſtick in his body; and afterwards I ſaw Mr. Mirriday pull the ſword out of his body.

Court. Did you ſee Mr. Bradſhaw there when Sir Charles fell?

Fletcher. No, my Lord, I ſaw none there but Mr. Walters and Sir Charles, they were out of doors, and the reſt were in the entry.

Mary White and Sarah Webb were call'd, who could give little or no evidence as to matter of fact, as concerning the death of Sir Charles; and being timorous, could not ſee what they might have ſeen.

Clerk. Cryer, call Mr. Allen.

Allen. I know but very little of the matter, but that there was a plate of beef ſent up to us, but we knew not from whence it came, till afterwards the Drawer brought us word that the Gentlemen below had ſent it up; after which, we drank their healths and returned them thanks for it. After which, I went to the Coffee-houſe hard by, and ſat about half an hour, and preſently heard a cry of murder, and I came down and ſaw Sir Charles Pymm lying with a wound in his body, and another in his head, but I did not know who it was, not then; but I asked who did this buſineſs, and exhorted the people to take them as ſoon as they could.

Court. I think you ſaid that Mr. Bradſhaw's ſword was drawn?

Allen. Yes it was, but I believe that he did not know that Sir Charles Pymm was kill'd.

Mrs. Sheepwaſh was call'd, but could depoſe nothing material.

Court. Mr. Walters, you have been here indicted, together with Mr. Bradſhaw and Mr. Cave, for the murder of Sir Charles Pymm Knt. and Bart. you have heard what charge hath been laid againſt you, which hath been a very ſtrong one, and now it behoves you to make your defence as well as you can.

Mr. Walters. My Lord, I was no way the occaſion of the quarrel; when I came thither, I aſked for ſome meat, and having not eaten all the day before, we had a piece of beef, of which Sir Charles Pymm and his company had ſome, who afterwards drank our healths, as I was informed. For my part, my Lord, I never ſaw the Gentleman before in my days: my Lord, I am very ſorry it ſhould be my misfortune to kill him in the quarrel. Sir Charles Pymm aſked me ſaying, God damn you Sir, what have you to do to meddle? I went preſently, my Lord, to a Fiſhmonger's where Mr. Mirriday was, and Sir Charles Pymm came, and Mr. Mirriday ſaid to him, Sir Charles, Damn you Sir, go and fight him, and I will be your Second. And preſently they came upon me, and I drew my ſword in my own defence, and he run me eight inches into the thigh, and at the ſame paſs, I had the misfortune, my Lord, to run him into the body.

Court. Would you ask Mr. Mirriday any queſtion?

Walters. Yes, my Lord. Mr. Mirriday, did you ſee me ſtrike Sir Charles's head upon the ground?

Mirriday. No, Sir, I did not ſee that, neither did I ſay any ſuch thing in the Fiſhmonger's ſhop, as to bid Sir Charles fight you.

Clerk. Cryer, call Matthew Perin.

Perin. My Lord, all that I ſaw of the buſineſs was, that when the Coachman was called to the door, Mr. Neale came and threatned him if he did not ſtay; then Mr. Cave and Mr. Bradſhaw were in the entry, and I heard them diſcourſe about beef, and ſome of them ſaid, You give us beef and make us pay for it; and there was anſwer made, they were Raſcals that ſaid ſo, for they did not. There was one of the Gentlemen in our ſhop hearing of it, ſaid, Let me come to him, I will fight him.

Court. Do you know the man?

Perin. No, I do not know who it was.

Mr. Walters. I was wounded at the ſame time, my Lord.

Court. That is admitted of?

Mr. Walters. Let him be asked whether I beat the head againſt the ground.

Perin. No, my Lord, I did not ſee him do that.

Court. He had a wound, the queſtion is, how he came by it, whether he might not fall upon it himſelf, it was a ſlanting wound?

Mr. Walters. Pray, my Lord, let Sir Charles's ſword be ſeen, all blood; but that gave no ſatisfaction on either ſide.

Court. Mr. Bradſhaw, what have you to ſay for yourſelf?

Mr. Bradſhaw. My Lord, I was there, but I know nothing of the death of Sir Charles Pymm, nor how he came by it; there was ſome words aroſe amongſt us, and I deſired them to ceaſe, for fear a further quarrel ſhould enſue upon it.

Court. Mr. Cave, what have you to ſay?

Mr. Cave. I know no more of the matter than this Gentleman ſaith: I ſaw not Sir Charles Pymm killed.

Clerk. Cryer, make proclamation.

Cryer. All people are commanded to keep ſilence upon pain of impriſonment.

Then Mr. Baron Jenner ſumm'd up the evidence as followeth:

Baron Jenner. Gentlemen of the Jury, you have three perſons indicted, viz. Mr. Walters, Mr. Bradſhaw and Mr. Cave, for murdering Sir Charles Pymm Bart. and have had ſeveral witneſſes called for the King, againſt the priſoners at the bar; the firſt of which was Mr. Mirriday, and he gives you this account, and it is all that each and every one gives, and it agrees on all ſides; and he tells you, that all thoſe Gentlemen were to dine at Mr. Cloudſley's, at the Swan-Tavern in Old Fiſh-ſtreet; and that they were there at dinner, it is very plainly prov'd. And being there, it ſeems that ſome of thoſe Gentlemen had beſpoke a fiſh-dinner, ſome fleſh, and had ſome, viz. a plate of beef; and he tells you alſo, that when dinner was over, ſome words did ariſe concerning the reckoning, and that one of the companies were got down ſtairs in the entry, where a further quarrel did ariſe. Mr. Mirriday tells you further, that Mr. Bradſhaw and he quarrelled, ſo there was a ſcuffle in the entry; after which, things were pretty well quieted there: in comes Mr. Walters and Sir Charles Pymm, and while Mr. Mirriday was ſecuring the firſt quarrel they, viz. Sir Charles Pymm and Mr. Walters, were got out at the door, and Sir Charles was ſtooping down, and Mr. Walters was puſhing upon his neck and throwing him down.

So ſaid Mr. Mirriday, and when he went to take the ſword out of his body, he ſaw him a dying man.

The next evidence was Mr. Neale, and he obſerves to you, that one of the Gentlemen did ſay, that the quarrel was not intended againſt them; and he gives an account of the ſtory, how that it was about the beef; how that Sir Charles was run through by Walters, but did not ſee him knock his head againſt the ground.

Mr. Palms gives the like account, and ſaith; that whilſt they were a ſcuffling in the entry, Sir Charles was kill'd at the door.

The next evidence is the Drawer, who tells you of a ſquabble that Mr. Neale had with the Coachman at the door, and how that there was left four of the Gentlemen behind, and that the Coachman was unwilling to wait becauſe it rained, his horſes being hot, they might catch cold; whereupon he put his foot-boy into the coach, and threatned the Coachman if he went away: this was before they fell out about the meat.

The next evidence was one Brummidge the Fiſhmonger, he gives the ſame account, how that a quarrel was amongſt them, and how that Mr. Walters was on one ſide of the kennel, and Sir Charles Pymm on the other ſide, and there they ſtood with their ſwords drawn; and as ſoon as they came to cloſe, they wounded each other, and Sir Charles Pymm was kill'd; but he did not ſee his head knock'd againſt the ground

Comes Fletcher, my Lord Mayor's Officer, and he tells you, that he was going by the door home into Bread-ſtreet, and he ſees a man that was wounded ſtooping down; and he ſwears that Mr. Walters took him by the nape of his neck, and knock'd his head againſt the ground, and heard him ſwear, let the ſword ſtick in him. Sarah Webb and another woman ſpeaks it to be in the like manner; and one of them talks of Mr. Walters's pulling Sir Charles Pymm out of the entry before he would come out.

Laſt of all, Gentlemen, here was Mr. Allen, one of their company, who went away to the Coffee-houſe, and hearing murder cried out, he came and found Sir Charles Pymm kill'd and quite dead. This, Gentlemen, is the evidence that you have heard as near as I can give it you.

Now, for the priſoner Mr. Walters, he would have you believe, as if Sir Charles had ſtruck him before he drew his ſword, but he has not proved it: likewiſe ſpeaks of Mr. Fletcher, but he does not remember that Sir Charles Pymm ſtruck him before he drew: but ſo it was, Gentlemen, there was a quarrel in which that honourable and worthy Gentleman, Sir Charles Pymm, loſt his life.

Now, for Mr. Bradſhaw, he confeſſeth that there was a quarrel, but he ſaith, that he did not know when or how, Sir Charles Pymm was killed; and for Mr. Cave, I do not find any thing objected againſt him, nor either of them.

Now, Gentlemen, I muſt tell you what the Law is in this caſe: Firſt of all to begin with Mr. Walters, ſo as it fairs with Mr. Walters, ſo you may be guided to deal with the other two. Now it hath not been made appear by any of the evidence, that you have heard, that there was any premeditated malice between them, for they were never in company before and knew not each other, ſo that there could be no manner of malice from him in particular.

The next ſtep, Gentlemen, is, here is nothing that can impute a general malice upon Mr. Walters, for if I had no deſign to kill a man, and kill another with whom I do not quarrel, that cannot be any premeditated malice; but I rather think that there was a little heat of wine amongſt them: and this whole action was carried on by nothing elſe but by a hot and ſudden frolick, and I am very ſorry that it ſhould fall upon ſuch a worthy Gentleman as he was. And if there was no malice premeditated, then he can be found guilty of nothing but manſlaughter; and as for the other two, they muſt be totally acquitted. If I have err'd in the ſumming up of theſe evidences, or miſtaken myſelf in any point, here are my brothers to help me:

Then the Gentlemen of the Jury withdrew for about the ſpace of half an hour, and returned into Court: upon a ſcruple of conſcience, one amongſt them ſpoke to the Court as followeth;

Juryman. My Lord, we are not ſatisfied in our conſciences concerning the death of Sir Charles Pymm, we find in it malice fore-thought; becauſe after he had run the ſword through his body, he was not ſatisfied with that, but muſt knock his head againſt the ground; ſo we do take it, that the ſaid Sir Charles Pymm was malicioufly murdered.

Mr. Juſtice Allibone. Gentlemen of the Jury, I ſhall endeavour to direct you in this caſe, and tell you what the Law ſaith, that it cannot reach a man's life, where no prepenſe malice is proved; that there is none proved, appears very plain to me, and I hope alſo to you, becauſe it hath been proved that thoſe Gentlemen, viz. the priſoners at the bar, and the deceaſed, had never been in company before.

Gentlemen, you are upon your oaths to ſerve the King as Jurymen, and I, as a Judge, am upon my oath to try the cauſe as well on the behalf of the living as the dead. So that upon the whole matter, Gentlemen, this can be called nothing elſe but a ſtorm, an ungoverned ſtorm that ſuch men are ſubject to; ſo that it does not reach precedent malice, but ſubſequent paſſion; which ſad paſſion was continued to that height, that Sir Charles Pymm in the midſt of it loſt his life.

Then the Jury went out again for about a quarter of an hour; and returning, brought in Mr. Walters guilty of manſlaughter, but the other two were acquitted.
